84711

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from internet archive

http://archive.org/details/nation154jannewy

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE, DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED 1865

VOLUME 154

JANUARY 3, 1942, to JUNE 27, 1942

84711

THE NATION, Inc.
55 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK
495

84711

INDEX TO VOLUME 154

JANUARY 3, 1942, to JUNE 27, 1942

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
Arc	Architecture
C	Correspondence
CH	Chart
Ct	Cartoon
D	Drama
E	Editorial Article
EP	Editorial Paragraph
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages		Pages
1- 20	January 3	381-408	April 4
21- 48	January 10	409-444	April 11
49- 76	January 17	445-472	April 18
77-104	January 24	473-500	April 25
105-148	January 31	501-528	May 2
149-176	February 7	529-556	May 9
177-204	February 14	557-584	May 16
205-240	February 21	585-612	May 23
241-268	February 28	613-640	May 30
269-296	March 7	641-668	June 6
297-324	March 14	669-696	June 13
325-352	March 21	697-724	June 20
353-380	March 28	725-744	June 27

A

- A. B. R.
  - Union for democratic action gains a member; C....722; see also E........... 561
- A. E. F. to Siberia. G. A. Borgese; S...416; see also S....369; EP.............. 409
- A. M.
  - Letter on F. Kirchwey's article on new leaders for old; C....323; see also... 210
- Abend, Hallett
  - America's debt to the Dutch; S........ 111
  - How Australia built for war; S....12; see also EP........................ 3
- Acland, Sir Richard. See Great Britain
- Aeronautics. See Aviation
- African war. See War, African
- Agencies, governmental. See United States
- Agriculture
  - All credit to the farm security administration. H. Lebrun; C.............. 407
  - Appropriation for bureau of agricultural economics cut; EP.................. 298
  - Byrd, Senator H. F., asks elimination of the farm security administration. J. Daniels; S.......................... 66
  - Enemy alien farmers on Pacific coast face removal; truck gardens of vital importance. R. Bendiner; S.......... 183
  - Farm bureau federation tries to kill farm security agency; EP................. 298
  - Farmers warned that farm program must be maintained and not jeopardized by taking advantage of the war situation; EP 298
  - Lewis, J. L., attempts organization of dairy farmers. W. Chasan and V. Riesel: S....309; see also C........ 379
  - New price bill open invitation to inflation; E.......................... 152
  - Photographs by R. Stryker for farm security administration show Americans of today. J. Daniels; S........ 194
  - Senate bill prohibiting sale of government-owned farm products at less than parity prices threatens living standards; EP 269
- Air power. See Aviation
- Aitken, Webster, recital. B. H. Haggin; M.. 349
- Akmakjian, Hrant
  - Comment on editorial, Court and profiteer; C....380; see also E.......... 245
- Alaska
  - Japanese occupy Attu; EP............. 697
  - Raids continue on Aleutian islands; EP 725
  - Route from Dutch Harbor the shortest to Japan. D. W. Mitchell; S........ 332
  - Should be equipped to support Soviet action if war is to be won; E........ 271
- Aleutian islands. See Alaska
- Aliens
  - Account of Japanese evacuation from west coast. F. B. Duveneck; C...... 556
  - American treatment of aliens from enemy countries praised; EP................ 24
  - Bridges, H., ordered deported. F. Kirchwey; S....646; see also S........674, 702
  - Friends and enemies; C............... 203
  - Resettlement of west coast Japanese badly managed; EP....643; see also S....649; C...................666, 722
  - Should enemy aliens be removed from Pacific coast? H. Costigan; S....184; see also S....183; EP....206; see also S............................ 276
- Allen, Jay
  - Letter commenting on state department's appeasement policy in Spain; C...... 154
- Allen, Robert S.
  - "Merry-go-round" column critical of the navy reported censored; E.......... 53
- Alter, Victor
  - Prominent leader of Jewish labor movement in Poland arrested by the Soviet authorities. F. Kingdon; C....104; see also S.......................... 163
- Aluminum
  - Jeffries, Z., blocks attempt to manufacture aluminum from clay. I. F. Stone; S....478; see also S............... 506
  - Jones, J., negotiates contract with Alcoa. D. MacDonald; S.................. 187
  - Public power plants provide war requirements. R. L. Neuberger; S...... 600
- Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
  - Demands entry of Great Britain and United States into field of political warfare; S.......................... 160
  - Discusses danger of Russia's position; demands invasion of Europe; S..... 618
  - Second front in west must be opened up in 1942 if ever; S....480; see also E. 505
  - Three years of Franco; S............. 391
  - World war III?; S.................. 704
- Amateur strategists. G. A. Borgese; S..... 369
- Amaya, Carmen. V. Mishnun; S........... 579
- America. See United States
- America first committee
  - Trial of L. Ingalls is indictment of committee; EP......................... 206
- American newspaper guild. See Newspapers
- Anderson, Marian. B. H. Haggin; S....... 609
- Angell, Norman
  - Politics of attack; demand for a political offensive; S........................ 513
- Appeasers, American
  - Advertisement (imaginary) for native Nazis to participate in war effort; EP 299
  - Cunningham, W. develops isolationist line in Boston Herald. D. Grant; S...... 334
  - Curb the fascist press! F. Kirchwey; S....357; see also EP....412; C 444, 499, 582
  - Editorial by Hearst applauds Riom trial; E 272
  - Isolationist campaign of Hearst and other newspapers seriously endanger war effort in election year; E........... 180
  - Lindbergh, C. A., offers his services to the army air force; EP.............. 23
  - Lindbergh's views on "yellow peril" given wide publicity in Swedish press; EP 151
  - Lord Halifax successfully defends England's share in war effort in answer to attacks; EP.................... 271
  - Moran, F. P., gives views on the war; EP....4; see also S................ 334
  - Social justice, Coughlinite paper, gives views on the war; EP....4; see also S 334
- Argentina
  - Accord reached at Rio conference strengthens pro-axis Argentine leaders. F. Kirchwey; S....109; see also.... 114
  - Congressional elections do not represent majority opinion of the country; EP.. 299
  - May oppose hemisphere unity at conference of the American republics. F. Kirchwey; S....................... 52
  - Nationalist party openly agitates in favor of Axis powers; EP............... 587
  - Opposes continental solidarity that might entail war against the axis. H. F. Artucio; S....114; see also 109
  - Protests to Germany on ship sinking; new activities of Nazi agents exposed; EP 699
  - Repressive measures strenghtened despite anti-Axis public opinion; EP........ 726
  - Sabotages the Rio conference on hemisphere unity; EP....78; see also.... 273
  - Signs trade pact with Spain. F. Kirchwey; S........................... 330
- Argentinita. V. Mishnun; S.............. 579
- Armaments. See Defense, national
- Armour, Richard
  - Exile; P. 304
  - Recognition; P. 255
- Army, United States. See United States army
- Arnold, Thurman. See Defense, national
- Art
  - Austin, D., exhibition. C. G.; A........ 321
  - Exhibition of American abstract artists. C. Greenberg; A................... 525
  - Exhibition of American primitives. C. G.; A. 441
  - Exhibition of origins and development of abstract painting and films. C. Greenberg; A. 525
  - Exhibition: A. Masson. C. G.; A...... 293
  - Exhibition: W. Quirt. C. G.; A......... 293
  - Gallatin collection. C. Greenberg; A..... 525
  - Show of masters of abstract art. C. Greenberg; A. 525
- Artucio, Hugo Fernandez
  - Why Argentina opposes continental solidarity; S. .... 114; see also 109
- Associated press
  - Extends membership rules but turns down application of Chicago Sun; EP...... 503
- Aunós, Eduardo
  - Negotiates Spanish-Argentine trade pact. F. Kirchwey; S..................... 330
- Austin, Darrel, exhibition. C. G.; A........ 321
- Australia
  - Casey, R. G., appointed member of British war cabinet and its representative in middle east; EP............. 354
  - Evatt, H. suggests Pacific war council meet in Washington with full Australian and New Zealand representation; EP 354
  - Fears that Pacific war area may be subordinated to other fronts; EP......3; see also 12
  - How Australia built for war. H. Abend; S. ....12; see also EP....................... 3
  - Prime minister objects to appointment of R. G. Casey as member of British war cabinet; EP...................... 354
- Automobile workers. See United automobile workers of America
- Automobiles. See Defense, national
- Aviation
  - Lack of planning in aircraft production revealed by Truman report; E....... 80
  - Lag in aircraft production investigated by Truman committee; E............. 413
  - Public power plants key to aluminum production for planes. R. L. Neuberger; S. 600
  - Will planes oust trains? K. Hutchison; S. 712

B

- B. M.
  - Honolulu blackout; C................ 323
- Baker, Gilbert
  - New phase in China; S................ 459
- Baldwin, Roger
  - Discusses article by F. Kirchwey, "Curb the fascist press"; C........... 444; see also S........357; EP.......412; C. 499, 582
  - Letter on "The limits of liberty" by R. Niebuhr; C.................175; see also 86
- Bali. See World war
- Balkan states
  - Central European federation, a. M. Hodza; S. ....570; see also C.......................... 668
- Ballet theater. B. H. Haggin; S.........498; see also S.......................... 46
- Ball of fire. A. Bower; MP................ 101
- Bard, Ralph A.
  - Testifies against labor at hearing of senate appropriations committee. I. F. Stone; S. 358
- Barker, George
  - New year poem; P.................... 39
- Bates, Ralph
  - Need we fear Russia? S............60; see also C.......................... 124
  - What's right with Britain; S.......388; see also C.......................499, 582
- Bavarian evening. T. Christen; S.......... 88
- Beaverbrook, Lord. See Great Britain
- Beekman, Gustave. See Fascism and nazism

- Bendiner, Robert
  - Are enemy aliens on Pacific coast to be removed? S....183; see also EP.... 206
- Bendix aviation. See Defense, national, contracts
- Benedict, Ernest, M.
  - Letter on "Mr. Hull should resign" by F. Kirchwey; C.......124; see also...... 1
- Bergel, Kurt
  - Refugees in Australian internment camps want to help in war effort: C......... 640
- Berle, Adolf A., jr.
  - His article on free movements. F. Kirchwey; S.................... 82
- Berryman, John
  - White feather, the; P.................. 574
- Bethlehem steel company
  - Supreme court rules in its favor in war profits case; E.................245; see also C.......................... 380
- Bible, the. See South, the
- Biddle, Francis
  - Orders deportation of H. Bridges. F. Kirchwey; S....................646; see also S......................674, 702
- Birge. Paul R.
  - Discusses R. Jarrell's article on modernist poetry; C........................ 472
- Binstock, Ruth Atlas
  - Red Cross accepts donations to blood bank from Negroes only on segregated basis; C. 296
- Blessed Bahamas. A. Liebers; S............ 368
- Block, Harry
  - Uncertainty in Mexico; S.............. 250
- Blue, Edna
  - Children in war time; S................ 545
- Blum, Léon
  - Demonstrates illegality of Riom trial. P. Cot; S........................306; see also EP.....................327, 354
- Board of economic warfare. See Defense, national
- Bonici, Edwin
  - Unconquered Malta; S................. 541
- Books
  - Oklahoma book trials. E. Z. Green; C... 176
- Borgese, G. A.
  - A. E. F. to Siberia; S............416; see also S.........369; EP......... 409
  - Amateur strategists; S................. 369
  - Pope's neutrality, the; S........... 621; see also C.......................... 722
- Bork, Edwald. See Mexico
- Borneo. See Dutch East Indies
- Boston
  - Coughlin's new capital. D. Grant; S.... 334
- Bower, Anthony
  - Reviews of motion pictures:
    - Ball of fire 101
    - Best films of 1941..................19; see also C.......................... 103
    - Girl from Leningrad, the.............. 19
    - Hellzapoppin 19
    - H. M. Pulham, Esq.................... 19
    - I wake up screaming.................. 101
    - Paris calling 101
    - Remember the day..................... 19
    - Shanghai gesture, the.................. 19
    - Sullivan's travels 101
    - Tarzan's secret treasure................ 19
- Brazil
  - Axis riots aimed at Vargas and pro-Nazis in his government. F. Kirchwey; S... 330
  - Nazi agents carry on activities through Spanish embassy: F. Kirchwey; S... 330
- Breech, Ernest R. See Defense, national—contracts
- Brenner, Jacob
  - Comments on I. F. Stone's article, "Labor and the long view"; C...379; see also S.......................... 275
  - Mr. Daniels will be missed; C......... 324
- Bridges, Harry
  - Attorney general orders deportation. F. Kirchwey; S.....................646; see also S......................674, 702
- Britain. See Great Britain
- Brindze, Ruth
  - Price ceilings; S...................710; see also S.......................... 629
- Browder, Earl
  - Prison sentence commuted. I. F. Stone; S. 591
  - Release from prison urged; EP.....355; see also C.......................... 472
- Brown, Alan N.
  - Resigns from American civil liberties union: C......582; see also S.....357; EP.............412; C............. 444
- Budget, public. See Finance, public
- Bulgaria
  - Premier calls for full support for Axis; EP 382
  - United States declares war on. F. Kirchwey; S.......................... 673
- Burma
  - British retreat before Japanese and Thai troops; EP.......................... 106
  - Chinese must pay price for loss of; E.. 586
  - Closing of road one of great disasters of war. D. W. Mitchell; S............ 278
  - Falls; E.............................. 531
  - Japanese consolidate hold; British evacuate; EP 586
  - Japanese successes there and in Malaya greatest threat to United Nations in Asia. D. W. Mitchell; S............ 682
  - Lack of air support and inadequate numbers handicap Chinese; EP........... 501
  - Land fighting shows superior initiative of Japanese. D. W. Mitchell; S...... 682
  - Loss imperils Chinese position; E....... 531
  - Victory of Japanese cuts off outside aid to China. D. W. Mitchell; S......... 682
- Business
  - Big business dominates war production; EP 179
  - Complacency among business men charged with production greatest danger to war effort. I. F. Stone; S................ 731
  - Congress can stop inflation. F. D. Graham, S.......................... 92
  - Congress offers plans for limiting profits on war contracts; EP.............. 411
  - Corporations shown to be making huge profits on arms contracts; EP........ 107
  - Delay in conversion of consumer goods to war production seriously hampers defense. I. F. Stone; S.............331; see also E......355; S........393; E. 476
  - Gold mining and employment in South Africa. K. Hutchison; S............. 517
  - House naval affairs committee investigates profits made on war contracts. I. F. Stone; S...................... 535
  - Industrial stock prices in two wars. K. Hutchison; S....................... 396
  - Inflationary spiral, the. K. Hutchison; S. 91
  - Inflation under price control. H. Mager; S.........629; see also S.......... 710
  - Jones, J. as head of R. F. C. plays vital role in national defense. D. MacDonald; S..................... 157, 187
  - Large increases in salary given corporation officials; EP.................... 446
  - Little use made of small business enterprises by War production board; EP.. 178
  - New price bill open invitation to inflation; E........................... 152
  - Organization of consumers can force real price-control; EP................... 106
  - President announces anti-inflation program; E.......................... 504
  - Price ceilings. R. Brindze; S.......710; see also S.......................... 629
  - Price increase since outbreak of war; Ch. 533
  - Private business groups shown hampering national defense effort in T. Arnold's report to congress; EP.............. 24
  - Proposal to abolish forty-hour week, abrogate all union contracts and limit profits worst kind of class legislation; EP ......326; see also EP......354; S.............358; EP............. 411
  - Senate bill prohibiting sale of government-owned farm products at less than parity prices threatens living standards; EP 269
  - Senate price-control bill actually prevents curb on prices; EP................. 51
  - Small concerns with war contracts may obtain capital from army, navy, or maritime commission; EP............ 383
  - Still fights all-out mobilization of industry in war effort; E.................. 589
  - Taxes and prices; E.................. 449
  - Wages and inflation; E............... 532
  - Wages, prices, profits; E.............. 208
  - Wall street in two wars; Ch........... 396
  - War profits for railroads. K. Hutchison; S. 219
  - Will Roosevelt veto the unsatisfactory price-control bill? EP.............. 106
  - Will there be post-war economic collapse? H. Strauss; S...............9, 32; see also C.......................... 104
- Byington, Steven T.
  - Asks secretary of state to end allegiance of United States citizens to country of their origin; C...................... 584
- By Jupiter. M. M.; D..................... 693
- Byrd, Harry Flood
  - Asks for the elimination of the Farm security administration. J. Daniels; S. 66

C

- C. G.
  - Austin, Darrel, exhibition; A........... 321
  - Exhibition of A. Masson; A........... 293
  - Exhibition of American primitives; A... 441
  - Exhibition of W. Quirt; A............ 293
- C.I.O. See Congress of industrial organizations
- Cafe Crown. J. W. Krutch; D............. 173
- Canada
  - May be asked to assume responsibility for neutrality of St. Pierre and Miquelon; EP...................... 150
  - Meighen, A., defeated in by-election; candidates backed by M. Hepburn lose election; EP....................... 207
  - Plebiscite permits legislation imposing conscription for overseas service; EP. 530
  - Prime minister asks for plebiscite to remove anti-conscription pledge of 1940; EP ....150; see also EP...... 207
- Captains of the clouds. P. H. Rye; MP.... 320
- Carlson, Samuel A.
  - Letter on state department; C.......... 175
  - see also 1, 6; EP.................. 2
- Carpenter, Helen D.
  - Letter on "Mr. Hull should resign" by F. Kirchwey; C.................124; see also 1
- Casey, Richard G. See Australia
- Catholic church. See Roman catholic church
- Celebes. See Dutch East Indies
- Censorship. See Freedom of the press
- Ceylon. See India
- Charleston in war time. J. Daniels; S...... 94
- Charts
  - Annual military expenditures.......... 396
  - How America traveled in 1941........ 657
  - National income and federal taxes...... 302
  - Our financial war effort................ 54
  - Price increase since outbreak of the war 533
  - Price increases in world war I and II.. 91
  - Raw materials for victory......... 212; see also EP....................... 207
  - Wage-earning women in the United States 484
  - Wall street in two wars............... 397
  - Warplane production in the United States 733
- Chasan, Will and V. Riesel
  - Describe attempts of J. L. Lewis to organize dairy farmers; S....... 309; see also C.......................... 379
  - Gerald L. K. Smith; S........... 566; see also C......................666, 722
  - Martin L. Sweeney of Ohio; S......... 626
  - Technocrats in uniform; S............. 395
- Chequer, Henry
  - Describes experiences with American consuls abroad; C.................695; see also S..........507; C........... 640
- Chicago Sun
  - Appraised. M. Mayer; S...........279; see also C......................323, 444
  - Denied membership in Associated press; EP 503
- Chicago Tribune
  - Attacks The Nation and New Republic for following communist party line. F. Kirchwey; S.................590; see also S.......................... 591
- Child labor. See labor
- Children in war time. E. Blue; S.......... 545
- Chile
  - Election of J. R. Rios as president commits Chile to democratic cause; EP.. 150
  - May support Argentina's position against a break with the axis because of its exposed Pacific coastline; EP....... 78
  - Strengthens stand against Axis; EP.... 699
- China
  - Desperate situation demands immediate help of United Nations. G. E. Taylor; S. 734
  - Faces greatest peril since 1928. G. E. Taylor; S.......................... 734
  - New phase in. G. Baker; S............ 459
- Chinese-Japanese war
  - All-out effort against China launched; EP 642
  - American volunteer group needs replacements; EP 642
  - Burma victory cuts off outside aid to China. D. W. Mitchell; S.......... 682
  - China must be helped; E............... 560
  - Chinese must pay price for loss of Burma; E.......................... 586
  - Chinese rout Japanese at Changsha; EP 22
  - Closing of Burma road one of great disasters of war. D. W. Mitchell; S... 278
  - Five strong Japanese drives under way; EP 670
  - Has Japan gained economically from its conquests in China? K. Hutchison; S. 36
  - Japanese atrocities at Hongkong revealed by A. Eden; EP.................. 328
  - Japanese beaten back from Changsha; EP 49
  - Lieutenant General Stilwell appointed chief of staff of Chinese armies; E... 356
  - Loss of Burma imperils Chinese position; E. 531
  - Major effort of Japanese to be directed against China. D. W. Mitchell; S.... 682
  - Poison gas used; EP.................. 642
  - Time is on side of Japanese. G. E. Taylor; S.......................... 734
  - Troops of Chiang Kai-shek win further victories; EP 150
  - Will China be next?; E............... 616
- Ching, Cyrus
  - Heads government committee to develop the automobile industry. I. F. Stone; S. 55
- Christen, Toni
  - Bavarian evening; S.................. 88

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Calif.

Christian front
    Carries on activities in Boston with cooperation of Catholic Church and America first committee members. D. Grant; S. 334
    Moran, F. P., gives views on the war; EP 4
    Moran, F. P. pushes sale of Social justice. D. Grant; S. 334
Christians, George W. See civil rights; fascism and nazism.
Christmas. 1941. M. Van Doren; P.......... 490
Church, Roman catholic. See Roman Catholic church
Churchill, Winston. See Great Britain
Civil rights
    Defense of prosecution in war time for seditious utterances. J. N. Rosenberg; S. ....511; see also S........543; C.........555, 611
    Limits of liberty in war time, the. R. Niebuhr; S......86; see also C....... 175
    Oklahoma book trials; C.......... 176
    Proposed removal of enemy aliens on Pacific coast presents problem. R. Bendiner; S..........183; see also EP.......... 206
    Prosecution of G. W. Christians, R. Noble, and E. O. Jones for seditious utterances. J. N. Rosenberg; S....511; see also S.......543; C..........555, 611
    Resettlement of west coast Japanese bungled; EP...643; see also S....649; C. 666, 722
Civil service commission
    Methods of examining government employees ignorant and naive; EP...... 699
Clark, Evans
    Latin American records; S.......... 123
Clark, Walter Van Tilburg
    Letter to the living, a; S.......... 679
Clash by night. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 45
Clodius, Karl. See Germany
Collective bargaining. See National labor relations board Colleges
    Institutions still require their faculties to affirm unshakable belief in the entire Bible. V. Dabney; S.......... 310
    Summer institute at Wellesley. D. P. Hill; C. 556
Colombia
    Lopez, A. elected president; EP........ 559
Commerce. See Business
Committee for the advancement of Negro studies
    Why no Negro college teachers? C...47; see also C.......... 176
Communist party
    Alleged membership of H. Bridges responsible for order for his deportation. I. F. Stone; S..........674; see also S..........646, 702
    Alleged membership of J. Lash, M. Cowley, G. Watson raises opposition by Dies committee; EP.......... 151
    Dies committee alleges New deal is honeycombed with communists; E......... 209
    Mass meeting urges E. Browder's release; EP 355
    Its influence may be increased by Russian victory. R. Bates; S..........60; see also C.......... 124
Concert hall. W. R. Rodgers; P.......... 195
Congress
    Can stop inflation. F. D. Graham; S.... 92
    Committee chairmanships dominated by men from poll tax states; E...... 329; see also C..........408, 471
Congress of industrial organizations
    Denounces J. L. Lewis for hampering war effort. J. A. Wechsler; S....... 684
    Can Lewis wreck the C. I. O.? J. A. Wechsler; S.......... 420
Conscientious objectors. See Selective service
Conscription. See Selective service
Consumers' credit. See Business
Contracts, defense. See Defense, national Copper. See Defense, national Corregidor. See Japanese-American war
Costigan, Howard
    Should enemy aliens be removed from Pacific coast? S.......... 184 see also EP.......... 206
Cot. Pierre
    Analyzes Riom trial; S..........306; see also EP..........327, 354
Coulter, A. B.
    Letter on state department; C....176; see also, 1, 6; EP.......... 2
Cousins, Norman
    Criticizes M. Mayer's article on the Chicago Sun; C..........323; see also..........279, 444
Cowley, Malcolm
    Dies committee opposes his appointment to government job; EP.........151; see also E.......385; S.......... 478
Cripps, Sir (Richard) Stafford. See Great Britain Criticism
    Good critics, rare and common. M. Van Doren; S.......... 95
Crosswaith, Frank R.
    Freedom from want asked for Negro strikers in Nassau; C..........696; see also EP.......... 672
Curran, Edward Lodge
    Speeches in Boston deluge Irish with anti-British and pro-Axis propaganda. D. Grant; S.......... 334
Czechoslovakia
    Attack on R. Heydrich indicates growing resistance against Germany; EP..642; see also EP.......... 698
    Lidice wiped out; EP..........698; see also EP.......... 642

D

Dabney, Virginius
    Discusses colleges which still require their faculties to affirm belief in bible; S... 310
Daladier, Edouard
    His responsibility for fall of France a reflection of responsibility of Pétain. P. Cot; S..........306; see also EP..........327, 354
Dance
    Argentinita. V. Mishnun; S.......... 579
    Ballet theater, the. B. H. Haggin; S..46; see also S.......... 498
    Carmen Amaya. V. Mishnun; S........ 579
    Eugene Loring's dance players. B. H. Haggin; S 609
    Flamenco. V. Mishnun; S.......... 579
    Juan Martínez. V. Mishnun; S....... 579
    Villarino. V. Mishnun; S.......... 579
Daniels, Jonathan
    Farm security administration, elimination of, urged by Senator H. F. Byrd; S.. 66
    Charleston in war time; S.......... 94
    Federal bureaus being transferred from Washington; the case for decentralization of government; S.......... 15
    Freedom of the press and rumors in war time; S.......... 166
    Leaves The Nation for government job; S....221; see also EP...207; C...... 324
    Photographs by R. Stryker give picture of America's strength; S.......... 194
    Too much travel and talk; S.......... 117
    Waging war between week-ends; S...... 38
Darré, Walther. See Germany
Davis, Elmer; heads new office of war information; EP.......... 699
Day, Stephen A., candidate. S. J. Harris; S. 708
Deatherage, George. See Fascism and nazism de Capite, Michael
    Europe's underground press; S......... 592
Defense, national
    Abolishment of revolving fund of Tennessee valley authority strikes blow at war power production. I. F. Stone; S. 563
    Account of Japanese evacuation from west coast. F. B. Duveneck; C....... 556
    American people underestimate war power of Axis; complacency attacked. J. T. Whitaker; S.......... 457
    Anti-labor campaign threat to conduct of war. I. F. Stone; S..........358; see also E..........384; EP........ 411
    Appointments of friends of E. Roosevelt to OCD raise storm of protest in Congress; EP.......... 179
    Are enemy aliens on Pacific coast to be removed? H. Costigan; S.........184; see also S.........183; EP......... 206
    Automobile industry
        Little progress made in plant conversion; manufacturers oppose Reuther plan as plan for labor "control"; EP 51
        Management fears broader labor participation in production boards. I. F. Stone; S.......... 83
        Manufacturers at industry-labor conference unwilling to act on plant conversion plans; Roosevelt must act to speed war production; E.......... 25
        Need for a war footing, the. I. F. Stone; S.......... 55
    Batt, W. L., announces probable copper shortage; E.......... 672
    Big business and concealed profits. H. Strauss; S.....9, 32; see also C..... 104
    Big business continues to dominate war production at expense of labor; EP.. 179
    Board of economic warfare
        Active in post-war planning. M. S. Stewart: S.......... 336
        Perkins, M. fires C. H. Grattan and M. Parmelee. I. F. Stone; S......478; see also E........385; EP........ 411
        Personnel attacked by Dies committee; E......385; see also EP......411; S 478
    Brotherhood of electrical workers votes pay-roll reduction plan for purchase of war bonds. C. Y. Harrison; C.... 611
    Cartel agreements on tetracene and tungsten carbide restrict their use in United States. I. F. Stone; S..........478; see also S.......... 506
    Chart illustrates vast economic resources of United States and Allies; EP..207; see also 212
    Comment on K. Hutchison's article on conserving scrap. F. H. Elwyn; C..76; see also EP.......... 79
    Contracts
        Congress offers plan to limit profits on war contracts; EP.......... 411
        House naval affairs committee investigates war contracts. I. F. Stone; S. 535
        House naval affairs committee reveals that corporations are making huge profits on arms contracts; EP...... 107
        House naval affairs committee reviews contracts of North American aviation, Sperry corporation, Bendix aviation, and Jack and Heintz. I. F. Stone; S. 535
        President appoints price adjustment board to renegotiate army, navy, and maritime commission contracts. I. F. Stone; S. 535
        War production board hampered by fact that contract placing power lies with army-navy procurement officers. I. F. Stone; S.......... 83
    Copper shortage may seriously hamper production of ammunition; E........ 672
    Curb the fascist press! F. Kirchwey; S. ....357; see also EP....412; C......444, 499, 582
    Daniels, J. accepts job in OCD. J. Daniels; S......221; see also EP..... 207
    Davis, E., appointed head of office of war information; EP.......... 699
    Delay in conversion of consumer goods to war production seriously hampers defense. I. F. Stone; S..........331; see also E.....355; S.....393; E..... 476
    Democratic party; O. R. Ewing to head activities. I. F. Stone; S.......... 27 Elimination of Farm security administration urged by Senator H. F. Byrd as economy measure. J. Daniels; S..... 66
    Estimate of synthetic rubber on hand and to come. I. F. Stone; S........619; see also S.......... 647
    Full participation by labor necessary to all-out production program. R. S. Lynd; S.......... 393
    Government publicity services attacked; EP 531
    Greater understanding of war issues needed to win; E.......... 179
    Guthrie, R. R. resigns as chief of War production board's textile and clothing division. I. F. Stone; S........331; see also E.......... 355
    Hobby, Mrs. O. C. to head Women's auxiliary army corps; EP.......... 587
    Housing
        Shelters for a mobile army. C. Willson; C. 47
    How much rubber do we have? I. F. Stone; S. ....619; see also S.......... 647
    How strong is our home front? D. W. Mitchell; S.......... 305
    Industry-labor conference ends with no-strike agreement; E.......... 5
    Joint congressional committee recommends huge cut in progressive social services; EP 3
    Jones, J., appointed to the SPAB. I. F. Stone; S. 27
    Jones, J. defends record before Truman committee. D. MacDonald; S....... 187
    Jones, J. negotiates for rubber and tin supply. D. MacDonald; S.......... 187
    Jones, J. plays vital role as boss of R. F. C. D. MacDonald; S..........157, 187
    Jones, J. testifies on rubber situation. I. F. Stone; S..........619; see also S.......... 647
    Junk coordinator needed to manage rubber and other scrap salvage. I. F. Stone; S..........619; see also S. 647
    Labor and the long view. I. F. Stone; S..........275; see also C.......... 379
    Labor needs more representation on the War production board. I. F. Stone; S..........83; see also.......... 110
    Lack of scrap metal slows steel output; EP 79
    Lag in aircraft production due to poor personnel in War production board and shortage of materials; E.......... 413
    Lend-lease results; E.......... 328
    Magnesium production stifled through contract engineered by J. Jones and patent agreements with I G Farben; E..........448; see also S.......... 506
    Manpower and the draft; E........244; see also C.......... 379

Manufacture of synthetic rubber from grain alcohol feasible; E..........561; see also E.......................... 589
Minority elements in press influence American opinion by undermining war effort; EP 474
Negro workers in Nassau strike in protest against wage discrimination; EP..........672; see also C......... 696
Nelson, D. M. appoints labor-management committees. I. F. Stone; S......331; see also S.......................... 393
Nelson, D. M. fights to suppress Guthrie report, I. F. Stone; S................ 731
New gasoline rationing plan worked out; EP 671
New man-power commission headed by P. V. McNutt to decide on government's basic war policies; EP...... 502
New sources of synthetic rubber available. I. F. Stone; S..............619; see also S. 647
New war budget, the; E................ 53
Our not so precious metals; S......461; see also S.......................... 517
Patent for production of synthetic buna rubber granted Jasco, organized by Standard Oil and I G Farben. I. F. Stone; S.......................... 591
Plant-amortization clause, the. H. Strauss; S..........9, 32; see also C......... 104
President reports to nation on war strategy; EP.......................... 241
Price control. See Business
Production of necessary synthetic rubber in doubt; EP.......................... 299
Public power plants key to aluminum production. R. L. Neuberger; S........ 600
Rationing of gasoline inefficient and ill managed; E.......................588; see also EP.......................... 671
Report of T. Arnold reveals obstruction by private business groups; EP..... 24
Report on Guthrie case key to Allied military setbacks. I. F. Stone; S....... 731
Resettlement of west coast Japanese badly managed; EP....................643; see also S......649; C..........666, 722
Residents of west coast jittery about war and bombings. L. Fischer; S........ 276
Rubber stockpile low. I. F. Stone; S..........619; see also S.......... 647
Scrap-collecting on farms; C........... 176
Secretary Wallace warns farmers that farm program must be maintained; EP 298
Seizure of patents for synthetic quinine demanded; EP.......................... 643
Senators Walsh and Johnson suggest possible recall of fleet to defend coasts; EP........241; see also S.......... 334
Shall we draft women? M. S. Stewart; S. 483
Shipping situation improves through increased production and settlement of wage disputes; EP................ 586
Ships for our offensive. D. W. Mitchell; S. 419
Shortage of transportation necessitates reduction in gasoline deliveries; consumer rationing will follow; EP.......... 355
Small business enterprise not given fair share of defense orders; EP........ 178
Small businesses with war contracts may obtain capital from army, navy, or maritime commission; EP............ 383
SPAB and H. Wallace's shortcomings. I. F. Stone; S...................... 27
Standard oil company dismantles acetylene plant under agreement with Germany; EP 529
State trade barriers hamper war production; president calls conference to eliminate obstacles; EP.............. 503
Survey of J. W. Frazer shows automobile dealers have facilities and tools useful in war production; EP............ 328
Treasury department places greater importance on savings. K. Hutchison; S. 601
Truman committee report reveals lack of planning in the airplane industry; weaknesses of the report; E......... 80
Truth about rubber. I. F. Stone; S..451; see also S.......................... 506
Waging war between week-ends. J. Daniels; S.......................... 38
War manpower commission issues orders covering employment of skilled workers in war industries; EP.............. 643
War production board
  Accuses Carnegie-Illinois and Jones and Laughlin companies of violation of priority regulations; EP.......... 474
  Harbors dollar-a-year men. I. F. Stone; S. 110
  Nelson, D. M. made head; EP....77; see also 83, 110
  Sacrifices expansion of facilities for making materials and arms to immediate need of production quotas; E. 589
  Why tires must be conserved. K. Hutchison; S..........................656; see also EP.......................... 671
  Will to victory indispensable for achieving it. D. W. Mitchell; S........... 623
  With fall of Java only minor sources of rubber available; EP............... 299
  Work week in war industries discussed; E. 412
Democratic party
  Ewing, O. R., to head national defense activities. I. F. Stone; S............ 27
Denmark
  Danish free crops enrolled by Hitler to fight against Russia. J. Joesten; S... 191 see also C.......................... 295
Dennis, Lawrence. See Fascism and nazism
Dennis, Nigel
  Endorses R Bates's article, "What's right with Britain"; C................499; see also S..........388; C........... 582
Department of justice
  Announces investigation of Social justice; EP 474
  Attorney general orders deportation of H. Bridges. F. Kirchwey; S......646; see also S.......................... 674
  Faces conflict with army over enemy aliens on Pacific coast. R. Bendiner; S. ....183; see also EP........ 206
  Federal bureau of investigation exonerates D. I. Walsh of charges against him made by New York Post; E..... 617
Deportation
  Attorney General orders deportation of H. Bridges. F. Kirchwey; S......646; see also S.......................674, 702
Dessoff choirs
  Lassus program. B. H. Haggin; M...... 294
Detroit
  Industrial battle front; the need for war footing in the automobile industry. I. F. Stone; S.......................... 55
DeValera, Eamon. See Ireland
DeWeerd, H. A.
  Outlines plan for Allied invasion of Europe; S.......................... 217
Dies committee
  Appropriation granted for another year; EP 503
  Bombard Dies now! H. J. Jonas; C... 584
  Extended for another year; EP.....328; see also EP.......................... 411
  Federal bureau of investigation reports on its list of subversive government employees; EP.................... 503
  Launches attack on personnel of Board of economic warfare. E......... 385; see also EP.......411; S............ 478
  Opposes appointment to government jobs of M. Cowley, J. Lash, and G. Watson; adds rider to FCC bill forbiding money to be spent on salary for G. Watson; EP....................151; see also E..........385; S........... 478
  Questions for M. Dies. F. Kirchwey; S.. 450
  Prepares to issue "yellow paper"; asks congress for new appropriation; E.... 209
  Statements by M. Dies designed to discredit Soviet Union and help the Axis; I. F. Stone; S...................... 303
Dixie drive on labor. B. Taper; S......... 569
Doomsters, the. M. Van Doren; P.......... 490
Dowding, A. W.
  Congratulates The Nation for its articles on the Free French; C.............. 296
Draft, the. See Selective service
Drama. See Krutch, J. W., Van Doren, M., M. K. C., and M. M. (for reviews)
Dutch East Indies
  Allied victory off Bali does little to lessen danger to Java; EP................ 242
  Battle of Java serious defeat for United nations; EP 325
  Japanese demands on Dutch in 1940; our debt to the Dutch. H. Abend; S..... 111
  Japanese effect landings in Borneo and Celebes; Java seen as next objective; EP 49
  Loss of Java and air bases on New Guinea clear way for Japanese attack on Australia and India; EP........ 297
  United nations attack Japanese convoy off New Guinea; E................ 356
Duveneck, Frank B.
  Gives eye-witness account of evacuation of Japanese from coast; C........... 556

E

East, near. See War, European; names of countries
Eckhardt, Tibor de
  His "Free Hungarian" movement. F. Kirchwey; S...82; see also EP...... 411
Eden, Anthony. See Great Britain
Edman, Irwin
  William James: 1842-1942; S.......... 67
Education
  Why no Negro college teachers? C...47; see also C.......................... 176
Egypt
  New national union government regarded as rebuff to Axis agents; EP......... 178
Ehrlich, Henryk
  Prominent leader of Jewish labor movement in Poland arrested by the Soviet authorities. F. Kingdon; C....104; see also S.......................... 163
Eire. See Ireland
Electric power. See Power and power industry
Elwyn, Francis H.
  Comment on "From scrap to tanks" by K. Hutchison; C.................... 76
Emigrés. See Refugees
End of season. R. P. Warren; P.......... 286
Enemy aliens. See Aliens
England. See Great Britain
Epstein, Henry
  Comments on appointment of C. J. H. Hayes as ambassador to Spain; C....555; see also EP.............. 410
Eumenides, the. L. Kirstein; D............ 405
European war. See War, European Evatt, Herbert. See Japanese-American war
Everybody's business; articles by K. Hutchison....36, 91, 165, 219, 340, 396, 461, 517, 601, 656, 712
Ewing, Oscar R. See Democratic party

F

Farben, I. G. See Defense, national; Monopolies
Farm bureau federation. See Agriculture
Farm relief. See Agriculture
Farming. See Agriculture
Farm security administration
  Byrd, Senator H. F., asks elimination of, as defense measure. J. Daniels; S... 66
Far east. See Japanese-American war; World war
Fascism and nazism
  Advertisement (imaginary) for native Nazis to work on defense jobs; EP... 299
  Allies should counter axis propaganda with active political warfare. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.................. 160
  American agent W. von Clemm sells diamonds to raise funds for nazi propaganda; EP.......................... 151
  Anti-labor campaign reveals native fascist tactics. I. F. Stone; S....358; see also E.......................... 384
  Beekman, G. convicted of operating house of male prostitution; involves D. I. Walsh in testimony; E.............. 617
  Christians, G. W., R. Noble, and E. O. Jones prosecuted for seditious utterances. J. N. Rosenberg; S....511; see also S........543; C........555, 611
  Curb the fascist press! F. Kirchwey; S...357; see also EP...412; C...444, 499, 582
  Material for anti-Axis joke collection wanted; C.......................... 324
  Members of Spanish falange granted citizenship in Puerto Rico; EP...... 475
  Navy department removes G. Deatherage from naval construction project; EP.. 270
  Pelley, W. D., arrested for sedition; EP 412
  Statements by M. Dies designed to discredit Soviet union and help the axis. I. F. Stone; S...................... 303
  Technocrats in uniform. W. Chasan and V. Riesel; S.......................... 395
  Viereck trial reveals working arrangement between H. Fish and G. Viereck; EP 270
  Walsh, D. I. accused of frequenting house of male prostitution and rendezvous of nazi agents; E.............. 617
  War department informs L. Dennis he is entitled to apply for a captain's commission in military police; EP....... 270
Federal bureau of investigation
  Arrests enemy aliens on Pacific coast to prevent sabotage. H. Costigan; S.........184; see also EP......... 206
  Methods of examining government employees ignorant and naive; EP...... 699
Federal power commission
  Warns that power shortage may develop. K. Hutchison; S.................. 164
Feldman, Maurice
  Changes in Finland; S................ 339
Films. See Moving pictures; Bower, A.; Rye, P. H. (for reviews)
Finance, public
  Case against the issue of government bonds. F. D. Graham; S........... 92
  Congressional committee chairmanships dominated by men from poll tax states; E........329; see also C........408, 471
  Congress sabotages treasury's tax program; E 700
  Demand for sales tax grows in Congress; E 700
  Demand for sales tax likely to carry weight in congress; E.............. 302

  Inflation under price control. H. Mager; S..........629; see also S.......... 710
  National income and federal taxes; CH.. 302
  New tax bill needed to combat inflation; E.................................. 208
  New tax proposals increase rates on individual incomes; surtax on corporations to be revised; estate, gift and excise taxes increased; E.............. 302
  New war budget, the; E.............. 53
  Our not so precious metals. K. Hutchison; S........461; see also S........ 517
  Plan for meeting war costs during war. J. C. Sparks; S....654; see also C.... 696
  President announces anti-inflation program; E.......................... 504
  Price ceilings. R. Brindze; S....710; see also S.......................... 629
  Reduction in income-tax exemption recommended by treasury department; EP 558
  Sales tax an unjust distribution of tax burden. D O. Kinsman; C.......... 639
  Sales tax proposal rejected; withholding tax adopted by house ways and means committee; EP 727
  Taxes and prices; E.................. 449
  Tax program of house ways and means committee removes burden from well-to-do; EP.......................... 615
  Treasury department places greater importance on savings. K. Hutchison; S 601
  Wages and inflation; E................ 532
  Wall street's tax program. K. Hutchison; S......340; correction........ 396
Finland
  Conditions go from bad to worse; government a military dictatorship under German control. M. Feldman; S....... 339
  Social democratic party asks end of war against the Soviet union; EP........ 50
Fischer, Louis
  Laval and Roosevelt; S................ 486
  Reports on trip to west coast; S........ 276
Fish, Hamilton
  Viereck trial reveals his working arrangement with G. Viereck; EP..... 270
Flamenco dancers. V Mishnun; S......... 579
Fodor, Laszlo
  Asks for material for anti-axis joke collection; C 324
Foreman, Clark
  Congress forces resignation for refusing to bar Negroes from Detroit defense housing project. A. White; S....... 213
France
  Charges British with attempt to foment civil war; EP....................... 671
  Collaboration with axis in Mediterranean and Atlantic war zones to be within limits of armistice obligations; EP.... 382
  Defeatism of leaders after war began caused fall of France; E............ 180
  Establishment of American consulate at Brazzaville means no weakening in United States policy of appeasing Vichy; EP.......................... 410
  Explanations of Vichy on shipments to North Africa unsatisfactory. I. F. Stone; S........................... 247
  Factories close in order to free employees for jobs in Germany; EP.......... 671
  Gestapo activity in French West Indies attributed to attitude of United States state department; C................ 296
  Hearst editorial applauds Riom trial; E. 272
  Hitler leaves French navy intact. L. Fischer; S........................ 486
  Italy increase agitation for Tunis, Corsica, and Nice; EP................ 613
  Laval, P. returns to power; EP....... 445
  Laval, P. takes over. F. Kirchwey; S.. 477
  Laval, P. takes personal command of national police: EP................ 671
  Laval's cabinet of traitors. H. Torres and H. Lehrman; S................ 515
  Laval disaster, the. P. Markham; C.... 555
  Madagascar will not be turned over to Japan; EP.......................... 327
  May use R. A. F. raids on French industry as pretext for complete collaboration with Hitler; EP.....298; see also 326
  New wave of anti-German unrest; German-controlled press attacks Pétain for lack of cooperation; EP............ 23
  Nouveaux Temps blames United States for P. Laval's return to power; his lack of success due to French people; EP........410; see also EP........ 445
  Paris in the morning. I. Treat........ 63
  Paris under the occupation; C.......... 39
  Riom trial analyzed and explained. P. Cot; S...306; see also EP...243, 327, 354
  Riom trial opens; EP....243; see also S...........306; EP...........327, 354
  Shipments from United States to French North Africa resumed; EP.......... 698
  Underground resistance to Nazis growing; EP.......................... 613
  Vichy blamed for Pearl Harbor and Manila; C.......................... 296
  Vichy cargo ships leave United States despite evidence that supplies reach North Africa. F. Kirchwey; S...... 182
  Vichy rebuffed by state department's direct negotiations with Admiral Robert on Martinique; EP................ 558
  Volunteer legion recruited by Hitler to fight against Russia. J. Joesten; S..........191; see also C.......... 295
Franco, Francisco. See Spain
Franco-American relations
  Agreement of United States to cooperate with Free French in defense of French Pacific islands constitutes a slap at Vichy; EP......................... 271
  Nazi-controlled Paris press and radio accuse Ambassador Leahy of espionage; EP 271
  Personal message from president to Pétain brings assurances that France will remain neutral; EP................ 270
  Pétain uses the French fleet as bait in dealing with our State department. W. L. Root; S........................ 56
  Record of the State department's appeasement of Vichy. W. L. Root; S..... 56
  State department continues appeasement of Vichy; EP.................... 23
Frazer, Joseph W. See Defense, national Free French
  American troops land in New Caledonia; EP 501
  Have no part in occupation of Madagascar; EP 529
  Muselier, Vice-Admiral E., occupies St. Pierre and Miquelon; American State department's protest. I. F. Stone; S....6; see also 1; EP....2; EP 22; EP......50, 56; C......124, 175, 176
  Must be accepted as fighting allies before they sign inter-allied pact. F. Kirchwey; S.......................... 82
  Plan for taking Madagascar thwarted by British action. H. Lehrman; S...564; see also C...................... 640
  Regime in central Africa recognized by State department's establishment of American consulate at Brazzaville; EP 410
  Ships at St. Pierre and Miquelon join Atlantic patrol; EP................ 150
  State department agrees that the United States will cooperate in defense of French Pacific islands; EP......... 271
  State department seeks formula to mollify Vichy and save face in affair of St. Pierre and Miquelon; EP........ 206
  To be accepted as signatories to the Declaration of the united nations; E..........24; see also.......... 82
  Welles, S., grants audience to leader. I. F. Stone; S...................... 247
Free world association
  Conference discusses war and plans for peace. F. Kirchwey; S............ 561
  Wallace, H. A. declares people's revolution is on the march. F. Kirchwey; S 561
Freedom of speech. See Civil rights
Freedom of the press
  Curb the fascist press! F. Kirchwey; S...357; see also EP...412; C...444, 499, 582
  Davis, E., appointed director of office of war information; EP............... 699
  Establishment of committee to investigate cases of censorship urged; E......... 53
  "Merry-go-round" column by R. Allen and D. Pearson critical of the navy reported censored; E.............. 53
  Prevalence of rumors in war time presents problem of maintaining confidence in a free press. J. Daniels; S...... 166
  Prosecutions for seditious utterances in war time defended. J. N. Rosenberg; S....511; see also S....543; C.... 555
  State department plays part in birth of "hush-hush" bill. I. F. Stone; S.... 247
Freeman, Adalbert
  Praises articles by R. Niebuhr on Jews after the war; C.................. 351
Fried, Bernard J.
  Letter on A. Bower's review of best 1941 films; C...................... 103
Friedlander, Gertrude H.
  Letter on state department; C....175; see also 1, 6; EP.................. 2
Fry, Varian
  Our consuls at work; S....507; see also C 640, 695
Fundamentalism
  Colleges still make a fetish of. V. Dabney; S.......................... 310

G

Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand. See India
Gannett, Lewis
  "Cold mornings have been in Bensonhurst" written by B. Pinney; C..... 408
  "The Nation" and Ireland; S.......... 125
Gardner, Lytt
  Letter on Negro college teachers; C 176; see also C.................... 47
Gasoline. See Oil
Gaylord, E. K.
  And associated industries of Oklahoma organize local anti-labor campaign. I. F. Stone; S....358; see also E.... 384
Germans and the nazis, the. R. Neibuhr; S 398
Germany
  American newspaper men in Lisbon report on conditions in; EP....585; see also S............................ 595
  Bavarian evening. T. Christen; S...... 88
  Darré, W.; given leave of absence; EP 614
  Dismal reich, the. Z. Shuster; S...... 614
  Economic status in third year of war. F. Sternberg; S.................... 595
  Estimate of armed strength. R. Bates; S 388
  Executes hostages in Czechoslovakia for attack on R. Heydrich; EP....642; see also EP........................ 698
  Forces Sweden to suppress publications printing stories reflecting on Nazis; EP 327
  Heydrich, R. shot in Czechoslovakia; EP........642; see also EP........ 698
  Hitler blames weather for Russian defeat and demands new sacrifices of his people; EP........................ 327
  Hitler demands legal right to remove from post anyone derelict in duty; E 505
  Hitler faces rising unrest in industrial, church, and army circles led by Dr. K. Clodius, Dr. H. Wohlthat, and General W. Keitel. H. Pol; S....30; see also EP........................ 50
  Hitler moves through Argentine-Spanish trade pact to offset gains of Rio conference. F. Kirchwey; S........... 330
  Hitler recruits "volunteers" from Europe to fight against Russia. J. Joesten; S..........191; see also C.......... 295
  Hitler's plight in Russia. D. W. Mitchell; S........................ 7
  Hitler vows not to set foot in Reich until last Russian army unit is annihilated. R. Armour; P............ 304
  "In future the army will be guided by my intuitions!" Low; Ct........... 284
  Internal political and military situation. L. Lore; S...................... 422
  Labor shortage threatens war machine. H. Soffner; S...................... 539
  Peace with Hitler's generals? L. Lore; S 422
  Proposal by G. Salvemini to hold Nazi officials individually responsible for Nazi crimes; EP.................. 698
  Radio broadcasts emphasize views of American isolationist press; E........ 180
  Reich Marshal Goering hints at breakdown in morale; predicts long war and further deprivations; EP........... 614
  Roman Catholic bishops charge Germany with effort to destroy Christianity; EP 670
  Rosenberg, A., submits draft of new religion for the German people; EP.. 23
  Serious food shortage threatens; EP.... 614
  Several nazi generals reported "ill"; EP 79
  Shortage of manpower weakens war capacity; EP 698
  Spring assignment. Low; Ct.......... 338
  Will Hitler take Ireland? W. L. Shirer; S....132; see also..............134, 137
  Wipes out Lidice; EP....698; see also EP 642
Gibson, Christine M.
  Comments on J. Barzun's review of twin books by I. A. Richards; C......582; see also B........................ 491
Gilder, Rosamond
  Marianne Lorraine; S................ 293
Girl from Leningrad, the. A. Bower; MP.. 19
Glover, Lorna C.
  Disagrees with F. Kirchwey's article "Curb the fascist press!"; C....499; see also S....357; EP....412; C.... 444
Gold rush, the. P. H. Rye; MP........... 553
Gorkin, Julian
  Trailed by OGPU agents in Mexico City. R. Rovere; S........163; see also C.....267; 352
Governmental agencies. See United States
Graham, Frank D.
  Congress can stop inflation; S.......... 92
Grant, Donald
  Boston center of Coughlin propaganda; S 334
Great Britain
  Acland, R. and J. B. Priestley lead new independent movement. T. Wintringham; S................737; see also EP............726; S............. 673

  - Anglo-Irish relations. M. S. Stewart; S......137; see also............141, 145
  - Appointment of Lord Beaverbrook as minister of supply does little to increase confidence in the government; EP 178
  - Casey, R. G., appointed member of British war cabinet and its representative in middle east; EP........ 354
  - Churchill, W., answers Hitler's recent Reichstag speech; EP........ 557
  - Churchill, W. reorganizes the cabinet; E 243
  - Churchill, W., wins vote of confidence; opposition voiced to other members of cabinet. F. Kirchwey; S........ 153
  - Compromise plan reached for meeting coal shortage; EP........ 671
  - Cooperation of empire enabled Britain to hold out. N. Angell; S........ 513
  - Cripps, S. appointed special envoy to India; EP........ 326
  - Cripps, S., joins reorganized cabinet; E 243
  - Cripps, S., pleads for closer association between Russia and western democracies; EP........ 179
  - Death of Colonel Blimp; Ct........ 738
  - Eden, A. and A. Sinclair hint air offensive is prelude to invasion; EP...... 557
  - Eden, A., reports on his conferences in Moscow; EP........ 21
  - Fall of Tobruk foreshadows political crisis; EP......726; see also S...... 737
  - Finds United States too friendly to Vichy but continues its appeasement of Spain. I. F. Stone; S........ 247
  - Independent candidates and parties gaining political strength. T. Wintringham; S....737; see also EP....726; S 673
  - Independent lefts capture three seats in parliament; EP........ 530
  - Its position in world trade. K. Hutchison; S........ 283
  - Labor party conference forecasts changing temper of British people. F. Kirchwey; S...673; see also S...737; EP 726
  - Leads movement for invasion of Europe. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S....618; see also EP........ 614
  - Letter criticizing policy in Palestine and urging recruiting of Jewish army; C.. 379
  - Letter from London. M. Harris; C.... 75
  - London feels the strain. M. H.; C..... 471
  - Lord Beaverbrook appointed minister of war production; EP........ 178
  - Lord Beaverbrook leaves cabinet to work on supply problem in Washington; E.. 243
  - Lord Halifax defends England's share in war effort in reply to attacks of isolationists; EP........ 271
  - Lyttelton, O., joins reorganized cabinet; E 243
  - Morrison, H., threatens to suppress Daily Mirror for questioning government's efficiency; EP....383; see also EP 560
  - Nine-point group issues manifesto on war effort and post-war organization. T. Wintringham; S.............37; see also EP..........726; S........... 673
  - Party truce threatened by independent candidates; EP.........726; see also S.............737; S.............. 673
  - Popular pressure for new front in Europe increases; EP....614; see also S.... 618
  - Realizes that genuine concessions must be made if India is to be saved for the United nations; E....300; see also EP 326
  - Reorganization of cabinet necessary if war is to be won. F. Kirchwey; S...........210; see also........... 323
  - Russia as an ally. M. Harris; C...... 75
  - Should remove appeasers and wage active political warfare. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S 160
  - Signs economic agreement with the United States. K. Hutchison; S........ 283
  - Signs treaty with Soviet union. F. Kirchwey; S........ 701
  - To make a return in kind of lease-lend materials after war must "export or die." K. Hutchison; S........ 283
  - What's right with Britain. R. Bates; S....388; see also C............499, 582
- Great man's lady, the. P. H. Rye; MP.... 553
- Greece
  - Attitude of people toward King George. L. White; S........ 677
- Green, Clarence C.
  - Continued imprisonment of E. Browder shows lack of unity in war effort; C.........472; see also EP......... 355
- Green, Elizabeth Z.
  - Oklahoma book trials; C........ 176
- Greenberg, Clement
  - Work of the abstract painters shown; A. 525
- Guild, newspaper. See Newspapers
- Guthrie, Robert R.
  - Resigns as head of War production board's textile and clothing division. I. F. Stone; S....331; see also E..........355, 476; S............ 731
- Groth, John
  - Who's next? Ct........ 133

H

- H. G. F.
  - Army psychiatrist brands The Nation as pseudo-liberal; C........ 696
- Haggin, B. H.
  - Articles on music:
    - Aitken, W. recital........ 349
    - Ballet theater 498
    - Comments on V. Thomson's discussion of "Radio research 1942"........ 638
    - Dessoff choir's Lassus program....... 294
    - Discusses commentators of opera and Toscanini broadcasts........ 294
    - Eugene Loring's dance players........ 609
    - Fidelity to the printed score........ 322
    - Landowska, W.; recital........ 322
    - Marian Anderson 609
    - Mitropoulos.......20; see also....... 74
    - Museum of modern art concerts...... 102
    - New friends of music concert....266; see also........294, 470
    - Philharmonic Symphony's Beethoven concert 694
    - Thomson, V., music critic and composer 20, 74
    - Toscanini, A. and Philadelphia orchestra; concert 322
    - Toscanini, A., conducts Beethoven symphonies 694
  - Ballet theater, the; S........ 46
  - Music, recorded; S....46, 102, 123, 174, 240, 294, 349, 377, 406, 442, 470, 554, 581, 610, 665
- Halifax, Lord. See Great Britain
- Halprin, Rose L.
  - Jewish will to survive, the; reply to R. Niebuhr's articles on Jews after the war; C........ 352
- Harding, T. Swann
  - Comment on F. H. Elwyn's letter on scrap-collecting; C......176; see also C 76
- Harris, Muriel
  - Letter from London; C........ 75
  - Russia as an ally of Britain; C........ 75
- Harris, Sydney Justin
  - Stephen A. Day of Illinois; S........ 708
- Harrison, Charles Yale
  - Reports plan of international brotherhood of electrical workers for purchase of war bonds; C........ 611
- Haskell, Douglas
  - Description of new "bubble houses"; S 264
- Hayes, Carlton J. H.
  - Appointed American ambassador to Spain; EP......410; see also C...... 555
- Hays, Arthur Garfield
  - Answers J. N. Rosenberg's article on freedom of speech in war time; S....543; see also S....511; C.... 555
- Hearst, William Randolph. See New York Journal-American
- Heart of a city, the. J. W. Krutch; D.... 264
- Hedda Gabler. J. W. Krutch; D........ 202
- Heinemann, M. S.
  - Letter on evacuation of Japanese; C 722; see also S....649; EP....643; C 666
- Heinzen, Karl, material on, for biography, wanted. C. Wittke; C........ 640
- Hellzapoppin. A. Bower; MP........ 19
- Heydrich, Reinhard. See Germany
- Hicks, Arthur C.
  - Mr. Daniels will be missed; C....324; see also........207, 221
- Highet, Gilbert
  - Parody on canto by E. Pound; P....... 228
- Hill, Dorothy P.
  - Announces summer institute at Wellesley college; C........ 556
- Hill, Ruth
  - Comments on attempts of J. L. Lewis to organize dairy farmers; C....379; see also S........ 309
- Hillyer, Mary W.
  - Announces dinner in honor of O. G. Villard; C........ 268
- Hitler, Adolf. See Germany
- H. M. Pulham, Esq. A. Bower; MP...... 19
- Hobby, Oveta Culp. See United States army
- Hodza, Milan
  - Central European federation, a; S 570; see also C........ 668
- Holland. See Netherlands
- Hollywood. See Moving pictures
- Holmes, John Haynes
  - American civil liberties union has taken no action on sedition prosecution instituted by Department of justice; C.....611; see also S.....511, 543; C 555
- Housing
  - Defense housing for Negroes blocked by southern congressmen. A. White; S 213
  - New "bubble houses". D. Haskell; S.... 264
- Hugh-Jones, E. M.
  - Tribute to R. Stein; C........ 204
- Hull, Cordell
  - Absolved of all blame for the Pearl Harbor surprise; EP........ 105
  - Issues statement protesting Free French occupation of St. Pierre and Miquelon. I. F. Stone; S....6; see also 1; EP....2, 22, 50, 56; C....175;.... 176
  - Should resign. F. Kirchwey; S....... 1
  - Statement on St. Pierre and Miquelon disagrees with that of S. Welles; EP 206
  - Warns Finland against aid to Germany. F. Kirchwey; S........ 673
- Humphries, Rolfe
  - Replies to R. Jarrell's article on modernist poetry; S........ 342
  - Winter solstice; P........ 90
  - Writing and publishing of poetry; S 523; 607, 662
- Hungary
  - "Free Hungarian" movement of T. de Eckhardt, the. F. Kirchwey; S....82; see also EP........ 411
  - Germans increase pressure to obtain the Hungarian army for "pacification" of Balkan guerrilla fighters; EP........ 78
  - United States declares war on. F. Kirchwey; S........ 673
  - War threatens with Rumania over Transylvania; EP........ 353
- Hunt, Rockwell D.
  - Letter on evacuation of Japanese; C 722; see also S....649; EP....643; C 666
- Hutcheson, William
  - And J. L Lewis's labor-unity plan; E 108
- Hutchison, Keith
  - Anglo-Irish trade war, the; S........ 145
  - Gold mining and employment in South Africa; S........ 517
  - Have we enough electric power?; S.... 164
  - Industrial stock prices in two wars; S.. 396
  - Inflationary spiral, the; S........ 91
  - Ireland seeks economic self-sufficiency; S 145
  - Our not so precious metals; S......461; see also S........ 517
  - Treasury department places greater importance on savings; S........ 601
  - Wall street's tax program; S......340; correction 396
  - War profits for railroads; S........ 219
  - Why tires must be conserved; S....656; see also EP........ 671
  - Will planes oust trains?; S........ 712
  - World trade after the war; S........ 283
  - Would Japanese conquests in the Pacific strengthen Japan's economic position? S 36

I

- I wake up screaming. A. Bower; MP..... 101
- I. W. W.
  - Former member invites correspondence from old friends. K. C. Maclennan; C 584
- Iglehart, Charles
  - Reports on visit to Japanese evacuation centers; S...649; see also EP...643; C 666, 722
- In the wind....14, 37, 65, 93, 116, 165, 193, 220, 258, 285, 313, 341, 369, 397, 424, 462, 489, 518, 546, 573, 602, 630, 657, 686, 713, 739
- India
  - Aerial attack on Ceylon possible prelude to attack on India; EP........ 409
  - British offer gives greater share in government of country and guarantees dominion status after war; EP...... 381
  - Can it defend itself? D. W. Mitchell; S 453
  - Change in Britain's Indian policy urged as Lord Linlithgow's term as viceroy nears end; EP........ 23
  - Chiang Kai-shek pleads for its full partnership in British empire; opposition of Moslem league; EP........ 242
  - Cripps, S. appointed special envoy to; EP 326
  - Danger to its independence comes from the axis; E....300; see also EP.... 326
  - Evidence of coming Japanese attack grows; EP........ 446
  - Gandhi, M., resigns from leadership of All-India congress; EP........ 23
  - Its proper defense contingent on giving the people a stake in victory; E..300; see also EP........ 326
  - "I wonder if our gallant ally has the right idea." Low; Ct........ 367
  - Japan masses forces for attack on; EP.. 446

  - Leaders demand immediate evacuation of British and recognition of independence; EP 726
  - Leaders oppose acceptance of British offer; EP 381
  - Resolution of congress party decrees invasion to be met by non-violent non-cooperation; EP..... 530
  - Support of war dependent on its freedom. F. Kirchwey; S....210; see also EP.. 326
  - What Cripps faces. K. Shridharani; S.........365; see also EP..... 381
  - What next in; failure of negotiations of S. Cripps; E..... 447
  - Zero hour. F. Kirchwey; S..... 414
- Industry. See Business
- Inflation. See Business
- Ingalls, Laura
  - Convicted for acting as paid agent of the reich; EP..... 206
- In time to come. M.K.C.; D..... 74
- Invaders, the. P. H. Rye; MP..... 320
- Ireland
  - America's role in Irish independence. S. La Follette; S..... 126
  - And The Nation. L. S. Gannett; S.... 125
  - Anglo-Irish relations. M. S. Stewart; S....137; see also.....141, 145
  - De Valera asserts intention to remain neutral, on arrival of American troops; E 152
  - De Valera, Eamon, emancipator. M. Marshall; S....130; see also.125, 126, 129
  - De Valera's neutrality. W. J.M.A. Maloney; S....141; see also....125, 126, 129, 130, 137
  - "Gold bless Eire's neutrality." Low; Ct 139
  - Irish argument. Low; Ct..... 143
  - Its strategic position in the war. D. W. Mitchell; S....134; see also......132, 137
  - Letter by K. Stewart discusses The Nation's Irish issue; C..... 267
  - Seeks economic self-sufficiency. K. Hutchison; S..... 145
  - Who's next. J. Groth; Ct..... 133
  - Will aid the allies in the war. G. W. Norris; S..... 129
  - Will Hitler invade it? W. L. Shirer; S....132; see also.....134, 137
- Irvine, Lyn
  - Suggests North Pole region as best center from which to launch United nations offensive; S..... 363
- Italy
  - American newspaper men in Lisbon report on internal conditions; EP...... 586
  - Concrete statement of United States' program for victory needed to arouse people. C. Sforza; S....537; see also B 716
  - Increases agitation for Tunis, Corsica, and Nice; EP..... 613
  - See also War, Africa; War, European; World war

J

- Jack and Heintz. See Defense, national—contracts
- James, William; 1842-1942. I. Edman; S.. 67
- Japan
  - Its economic gains in China. K. Hutchison; S..... 36
  - Renews Soviet-Japanese fisheries agreement for one year; EP..... 353
  - Would its conquests in the Pacific strengthen Japan's economic position? K. Hutchison; S..... 36
- Japanese-American war
  - After four months Japan has clear advantage. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 510
  - Allied bombs raid Tokyo; EP..... 473
  - All-out offensive in Far east necessary to win war. D. Mitchell; S........85; S.........186; see also E....81; E 271
  - American Pacific fleet damages Japanese bases; General MacArthur continues to hold position; EP......149; 150
  - American troops land in New Caledonia; EP 501
  - Bataan falls; EP..... 445
  - Battle of Coral Sea a decisive victory for United nations; EP..... 558
  - Battle of Midway inflicts heavy losses on Japanese; EP..... 669
  - Close cooperation with Russia by opening a second front in the west and equipping Alaska to support Soviet action necessary if war is to be won; E 271
  - Complete change in strategy of United nations needed before Japan has chance to consolidate its gains; EP.. 297
  - Diversion of shipping to Pacific increases U-boat sinkings in Atlantic; EP..... 326
  - Fall of Manila reveals the need for unified allied strategy in the Far East; E 26
  - General MacArthur given supreme command of allied fores in Pacific; EP 325; see also E..... 356
  - Honolulu blackout; C..... 323
  - Importance of the war in the Pacific; E 81
  - Indirect blame attaches to the State Department for Pearl Harbor disaster; EP 105
  - Japanese embassy in Madrid using Spain as headquarters for propaganda against the United States. F. Kirchwey; S..... 330
  - Japanese occupy Attu on Aleutian islands; EP 697
  - Kimmel, Admiral H. E., and Short, General W. C., found guilty of dereliction of duty in Pearl Harbor disaster; EP 105
  - Land and air superiority needed for successful offensive action against Japan; E..... 356
  - Lieutenant-General Stilwell made commander of Chinese and American forces in Burma; E..... 356
  - Losses and gains after Midway. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 732
  - MacArthur, General D., made commander-in-chief in the southwest Pacific; American bombers raid Philippines; EP..... 473
  - MacArthur's troops continue to immobilize large Japanese forces in Luzon; EP 49
  - Naval and military chiefs anticipate Japanese moves in battle of Midway; EP 669
  - Need for Russian-American collaboration. R. Bates; S......60; see also C 124
  - New Pacific war council to sit in Washington; EP..... 382
  - Only bold offensive action striking at Japan's weakest point by blockade and air attack will ensure victory of United nations; E..... 271
  - Our plan for victory. D. W. Mitchell; S 58
  - Over-confidence in America's strength a factor in the initial American losses. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 28
  - Raids continue on Aleutian islands and west coast; EP..... 725
  - Reverses in the Pacific; General MacArthur holds out in the Philippines; E 4
  - Russia interns American flyer landing there after attack on Tokyo; did he read Nation plan for attacking Japan? EP 502
  - Ships for our offensive. D. W. Mitchell; S 419
  - Shows need for better promotion system in army and navy. D. W. Mitchell; S 155
  - State department agrees to cooperate with Free French in defending French Pacific islands, mainly New Caledonia; EP 271
  - Three routes available to United States for offensive against Japan. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 332
  - Vichy assures United States Madagascar will not be turned over to Japan; EP 327
  - Would Japanese conquests in the Pacific strengthen Japan's economic position? K. Hutchison; S..... 36
- Japanese-Soviet relations. See Russo-German war and World war
- Jarrell, Randall
  - Modernist poetry; S......222; see also S........342; C..... 472
- Jason. J. W. Krutch; D..... 173
- Java. See Dutch East Indies
- Jeffries, Zay
  - Submits unfavorable report on making aluminum from clay. I. F. Stone; S......478; see also S..... 506
- Jehovah's witnesses must pay license tax; E 729
- Jews
  - Jews after the war. R. Niebuhr; S 214; 253; see also C..... 351
  - President's committee on fair employment forbids manufacturers to bar Jews and Negroes from work on war contracts; EP..... 447
  - Refugees from Rumania denied entrance to Palestine lost on Sturma; EP..... 299
- Joesten, Joachim
  - Hitler recruits "volunteers" for foreign legion; S......191; see also C...... 295
- Johnny Eager. P. H. Rye; MP..... 320
- Johnson, Hiram Warren
  - Invites air raids by remarks on "defenseless" coasts; EP..... 241
- Jonas, Harold J.
  - Suggests bombardment of Congress and Dies committee with criticism of Dies's work; C..... 584
- Jones, Ellis O. See Civil rights; Fascism and nazism
- Jones, Jesse. See Defense, national
- Journalism. See Newspapers
- Jugoslavia. See Yugoslavia
- Jungle book. P. H. Rye; MP..... 553

K

- Kahl, Norman A.
  - Letter on state department; C......175; see also 1, 6; EP..... 2
- Kaltenborn, H. V.
  - Anti-labor broadcasts help precipitate all-out campaign against labor. I. F. Stone; S......358; see also E...... 384
- Katz, Otto. See Simone, A.
- Keitel, Marshal Wilhelm
  - Reported to have "suddenly fallen ill"; EP 79
- Kern, Paul. See New York city
- Kimmel, Admiral Husband E.
  - Found guilty of dereliction of duty at Pearl Harbor; EP..... 105
- King, Emory L.
  - Letter on H. Strauss's "Don't plan for collapse"; C....104; see also......9, 32
- King, W. L. MacKenzie. See Canada
- Kingdon, Frank
  - Asks Soviet union to release V. Alter and H. Ehrlich from prison; C..104; see also S..... 163
- King's row. P. H. Rye; MP..... 320
- Kinsman, Delos O.
  - Sales tax an unjust distribution of tax burden; C..... 639
- Kirchwey, Freda
  - Accord between Russia, Britain, and United States; S..... 701
  - Accord reached at Rio conference strengthens pro-axis leaders in Argentina; S....109; see also..... 114
  - Attacked by Chicago Tribune and Washington Times-Herald as communist. F. Kirchwey; S....590; see also S..... 591
  - Axis spring maneuvers; S..... 533
  - Churchill's vote; S..... 153
  - Conference of the American republics on hemisphere defense problems; S...... 52
  - Curb the fascist press!; S....357; see also EP........412; C......444, 499, 582
  - Free and so-called free movements; S.. 82
  - India's zero hour; S..... 414
  - Laval takes over; S..... 477
  - Luce thinking—II; S..... 245
  - New leaders for old; S....210; see also 323
  - People's revolution, the; S..... 561
  - Propaganda efforts of Axis carried on through Spain; S..... 330
  - Questions for M. Dies; S..... 450
  - Scores speech by S. Welles on relations between the United States and Latin America; S..... 273
  - Spain signs trade pact with Argentina; S 330
  - State department still permits Vichy cargo ships to leave United States; S 182
  - Tobruk and the second front; S...... 727
- Kirchwey, George W., death. R. Vambery; S 312
- Kirstein, Lincoln
  - Eumenides, the; D..... 405
- Kiss for Cinderella, a. J. W. Krutch; D.... 348
- Krutch, Joseph Wood
  - Reviews of plays:
    - Café Crown 173
    - Clash by night 45
    - Heart of a city, the..... 264
    - Hedda Gabler 202
    - Jason 173
    - Kiss for Cinderella, a..... 348
    - Papa is all 73
    - Rivals, the 101
    - Solitaire 201
    - Strings, my lord, are false, the...... 637

L

- Labor
  - And its enemies. I. F. Stone; S...... 384
  - And the long view. I. F. Stone; S..275; see also C..... 379
  - Anti-labor campaign has flavor of a civil war. I. F. Stone; S....358; see also E 384
  - Congressional leaders discuss plan for compensating workers displaced by war-production conversion; EP..... 79
  - Demands right of full partner in war effort. R. S. Lynd; S..... 393
  - Dixie drive on. B. Taper; S..... 569
  - Has less voice in industrial production. I. F. Stone; S..... 731
  - Manpower and the draft; E..... 244
  - National shipbuilding stabilization conference fixes basic wage for shipyard mechanics; EP..... 586
  - New wage board needed to act in cases where War labor board lacks power; EP 615
  - Planning to meet post-war unemployment. H. Strauss; S....9, 32; see also C... 104
  - Proposal to abolish forty-hour week, abrogate all union contracts and limit profits worst kind of class legislation; EP......326; see also EP......354; S.............358; EP..... 411

  Roosevelt, F. D. opposes granting voluntary wage increases by air-craft corporations; EP........ 615
  Thomas, R. J., demands equal representation for labor on War production board; EP........ 179
  Supreme court decision in wage-hour law case gives employers loophole to avoid payment of overtime; E........ 729
  Wage earning women in the United States; Ch........ 484
  Wages and inflation; E........ 532
  Wages, prices, profits; E........ 208
  Work week in labor industries discussed; E........ 412
Labor unions
  Association of local 5 with American federation of teachers denied. J. Ligtenberg; C........ 695
  Board of international brotherhood of electrical workers votes pay-roll reduction plan for purchase of war bonds. C. Y. Harrison; C........ 611
  Can Lewis wreck the C. I. O.? J. A. Wechsler; S........ 420
  Decision in Walker-Turner case a decent compromise; EP........ 446
  District 50 of U. M. A. undertakes organization of dairy farmers. W. Chasan and V. Riesel; S........309; see also........ 379
  General Motors accepts War labor board's ruling on continuation of previous contract arrangements; EP........ 558
  House naval affairs committee attacks increased financial gains of unions; EP 107
  Industry-labor conference ends with no-strike agreement; closed shop question left as an arbitrable issue; E........ 5
  Is Lewis licked? J. A. Wechsler; S.... 684
  Labor-unity plan of J. L. Lewis, the; E. 108
  Letter on "Brotherhood except for Negroes," by J. Daniels. E. H. Lott; C.. 76
  Lewis, J L., reported to have conducted unauthorized negotiations for AFL-CIO merger; EP........ 79
  Make many sacrifices in order to help win the war. I. F. Stone; S........ 384
  Murray, P. removed from vice-presidency of miners' union; EP........ 642
  United automobile workers announce victory program; EP........446; see also C........ 528
  Wages and inflation; E........ 533
  War labor board charges United States steel with defying government on maintenance-of-membership clause; EP.502; see also EP........ 559
  War labor board orders Federal shipbuilding and dry dock company to grant maintenance of membership to union; EP........502; see also EP........ 559
  War labor board renders decision in maintenance-of-membership case of International harvester company; EP... 475
La Chambre, Guy
  Trial at Riom a low political maneuver, P. Cot; S........306; see also EP........327, 354
La Follette, Suzanne
  America's role in Irish independence; S.. 126
LaGuardia, Fiorello H.
  Bans burlesque theaters; E........ 385
  Dismisses city civil service commission; EP........ 207
Land, the. P. H. Rye; MP........ 553
Landowska, Wanda; recital. B. H. Haggin; M........ 322
Lash, Joseph P.
  Dies committee opposes his appointment to government job; EP........ 151
Latin America
  Accord reached at Rio conference strengthens pro-axis leaders in Argentina. F. Kirchwey; S........109; see also........114, 273
  Argentina protests to Germany on ship sinking; EP........ 699
  Argentina sabotages the Rio conference on hemisphere unity; Chilean hesitations seen due to Chile's geographic position; EP........78; see also........ 273
  Axis agents carry on propaganda through Spanish embassy. F. Kirchwey; S... 330
  Chile strengthens stand against axis; EP 699
  Conference of the American republics discusses hemisphere defense problems; pro-axis Argentine bloc may hinder unity. F. Kirchwey; S........52; see also........ 273
  Cooperation of United States with democratic groups urged to end Axis threat. F. Kirchwey; S........ 273
  Mexico's entry into war bound to influence Chile and other countries; EP........ 614
  Recorded music. E. Clark; S........ 123
  Why Argentina balked at the conference for continental solidarity. H. F. Artucio; S........114; see also........ 109
Laval, Pierre. See France
Leahy, William D. See United States—State department
Lebrun, Harvey
  All credit to the Farm security administration; C........ 407
Lehrman, Hal
  Free French not consulted about taking of Madagascar; S........564; see also C........ 640
Lehrman, Hal and H. Torres
  Laval's cabinet of traitors; S........ 515
Lend-lease act. See United States—And the war
Leningrad. See Russo-German war
Letter to the living, a. W. V. T. Clark; S........ 679
Levine, Daniel
  Comments on letter by G. L. K. Smith; C....722; see also S....566; C.... 666
Levinthal, Louis E.
  Praises articles by R. Niebuhr on Jews after the war; C........ 351
Lewis, Alfred Baker
  Letter on N. Thomas's leadership of Socialist party; C........203; see also C........124; S........ 60
  States' need for a Pacific charter; C... 695
Lewis, Essington
  His role in the industrialization of Australia. H. Abend; S........12; see also EP........ 3
Lewis, John L.
  Can he wreck the C. I. O.? J. A. Wechsler; S........ 420
  His labor-unity plan; E........ 108
  Is he licked? J. A. Wechsler; S........ 684
  Removes P. Murray as vice-president of United Mine Workers; EP........ 642
  Reported to have conducted unauthorized negotiations for AFL-CIO merger; EP........ 79
  Seeks to become leader of a farm-labor bloc through organization of dairy farmers. W. Chasan and V. Riesel; S........309; see also C........ 379
Liberties, civil. See Civil rights
Libya. See War, African Liebers, Arthur
  Blessed Bahamas; S........ 368
Ligtenberg, John
  Denies association of local 5 with American federation of teachers; C........ 695
Lindbergh, Charles A.
  Offers his services to the army air force; EP........ 23
  Views on "yellow peril" printed in Sweden; EP........ 151
Linlithgow, Lord. See India
Literature
  Good critics, rare and common. M. Van Doren; S........ 95
Litvinov, Maxim. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Lore, Ludwig
  Peace with Hitler's generals?; S........ 422
Loring, Eugene
  Dance players. B. H. Haggin; S........ 609
Lorraine, Marianne. R. Gilder; S........ 293
Lott, Emily H.
  Comment on "Brotherhood except for Negroes" by J. Daniels; C........ 76
Low, cartoons
  Death of Colonel Blimp........ 738
  "God bless Eire's neutrality."........ 139
  "In future the army will be guided by my intuitions"........ 284
  Irish argument........ 143
  It's a lie! We're not retreating........ 113
  "I wonder if our gallant ally has the right idea"........ 367
  Sit down to it, lads........ 161
  Spring assignment........ 338
Luce, Henry
  America alone can provide pattern for future of the world. F. Kirchwey; S. 245
Luzon. See Japanese-American war
Lynd, Robert S.
  Criticizes plan of D. M. Nelson for labor's participation in all-out war production; S........ 393
Lyttelton, Oliver. See Great Britain

M

M. H.
  London feels the strain; C........ 471
M.K.C.
  In time to come; D........ 74
M. M.
  By Jupiter; D........ 693
MacArthur, General Douglas. See Japanese-American war
MacDonald, Dwight
  Jones, J. plays powerful role in national defense; S........ 157
  Replies to R. Rovere's article, "Ogpu at work"; C......352; see also....163, 267
MacLeish, Archibald
  Declares minority elements in press actively influence American opinion by undermining war effort; EP........ 474
Maclennan, Kenneth C.
  Invites correspondence from former members of I. W. W.; C........ 584
Madagascar. See War, African
Magazines. See names of magazines
Mager, Harold
  Inflation under price control; S.... 629; see also S........ 710
Magnesium. See Defense, national Malaya
  Bad colonial administration a help to Japanese. D. W. Mitchell; S........ 682
  Japanese successes there and in Burma greatest threat to United Nations in Asia. D. W. Mitchell; S........ 682
  Land fighting demonstrates superior initiative of Japanese. D. W. Mitchell; S........ 682
Maloney, William J. M. A.
  De Valera's neutrality; S........141; see also........125, 126, 129, 130, 137
Malta
  Faces heavy air attacks in the axis attempt to clear the Mediterranean for troop shipments to Africa; EP...... 78
  Still unconquered. E. Bonici; S........ 541
Manila. See Japanese-American war
Marcus, J. Anthony
  Disagrees with editorial on poll tax; C.....408; see also E.....329; C.... 471
Markham, Peter
  Laval, disaster, the; C........ 555
Marshall, Margaret
  De Valera, Eamon, emancipator; S..130; see also........125, 126, 129
  Stefan Zweig; S........ 314
Martinez, J. R.
  Comments on article by G. A. Borgese, "The pope's neutrality"; C......722; see also S........ 621
Martinez, Juan. V. Mishnun; S........ 579
Mayer, Milton
  Article "The case against the Jew" attacked by PM; EP........ 384
  Chicago Sun; S........279; see also C........323, 444
McNutt, Paul V., heads man-power commission; EP........ 502
Meaney, Thomas F. See New Jersey
Mediterranean sea. See War, European Meeting Mr. Saito. I. Treat; S........ 597
Meighen, Arthur. See Canada
Meigs, Merrill C.
  Record as chief of aircraft division of war production board attacked; E... 413
Metals. See Defense, national Mexico
  Arrests E. Bork, nazi party chief, and other undesirable aliens; EP........ 614
  Award handed down in oil wells controversy; EP........ 475
  Declares war against the Axis; EP.... 614
  OGPU agents trail anti-fascist refugees in Mexico City. R. Rovere; S...163; see also C........267........ 352
  Uncertainty in. H. Block; S........ 250
Milgram, Morris
  Appeals for pardon for A. Panchelly, E. Woodworth, and D. Brown; C.... 380
Military training. See Selective service
Miquelon. See St. Pierre and Miquelon
Mishnun, Virginia
  Flamenco dancers; S........ 579
Mr. V. P. H. Rye; MP........ 320
Mitchell, Donald W.
  Asks for better promotion system in army and navy and more coordination between the services; S........ 155
  Balance sheet of the first two years of war; S........ 28
  Can India defend itself?; S........ 453
  Discusses land strategy of United nations in far east; S........ 682
  Estimates world war situation since entry of United States; S........ 510
  Evaluates position of Japanese and United States after Midway battle; S 732
  Fall of Singapore makes position of United nations most serious since war began; S........ 278
  Hitler's plight in Russia; S........ 7
  How strong is our home front?; S.... 305
  How to lose the war; the need for offensive action on the part of the allies; S........85; see also E........ 81
  If Singapore falls? S........ 186
  Ireland's strategic position in the war; S........134; see also........132, 137
  Long road to victory; S........ 623
  Outlines new strategies for spring offensives; S........ 360
  Ships for our offensive; S........ 419
  Three routes available to United States for offensive against Japan; S........ 332
  U-Boat strategy, the; S........ 248
Mitropoulos. B. H. Haggin; M........20; see also........ 74

- Monopolies
  - Arnold, T., recommends registration of all patent license agreements and of all agreements between American companies and foreign industries; EP...383; see also S.......................... 506
  - General electric and Krupp agreement restricts use of tungsten carbide in United States. I. F. Stone; S.....478; see also S.......................... 506
  - Moratorium on anti-trust prosecutions for period of war proposed; EP..383; S 387, 506
  - New bill designed to prevent use of patents to fix prices and to prevent suppression of; EP.................... 587
  - Patent for production of synthetic buna rubber granted Jasco, organized by Standard Oil and I G Farben. I. F. Stone; S.......................... 591
  - Pyron, W. B., urges suspension of anti-trust laws on behalf of oil companies. I. F. Stone; S.................387; see also S.......................... 506
  - Remington arms company has cartel agreement with I G Farben on tetracene. I. F. Stone; S...........478; see also S.......................... 506
  - Standard oil company makes its synthetic-rubber patents available to Germany but denies them to American and British firms; EP..............383; see also S.......387, 506; EP....... 530
  - Synthetic quinine patents held by Sterling products company on assignment from I G Farben; EP.................... 6;3
  - Truth about rubber. I. F. Stone; S..451; see also S.......................... 506
- Mooney, Tom
  - Dies three years after release from prison; EP.......................... 299
- Moon is down, the. M. Van Doren; D..... 468
- Moontide. P. H. Rye; MP................ 553
- Moore, Ruth E.
  - Letter on M. Mayer's article on Chicago Sun; C.........................444; see also S...........279; C......... 323
- Moran, Francis P. See Christian front
- Moving pictures. See Bower, A., Rye, P. H. (for reviews)
- Muniz, Grandiso
  - Trailed by OGPU agents in Mexico City. R. Rovere; S...................163; see also.........................267, 352
- Murray, Philip. See Congress of industrial organizations
- Muselier, Vice-Admiral Emile. See Free French
- Museum of modern art concerts. B. H. Haggin; M.......................... 102
- Music (articles by B. H. Haggin)
  - Aitken, W., recital.................... 349
  - Anderson, Marian, recital............. 609
  - Ballet theater......................... 498
  - Comments on V. Thomson's discussion of "Radio research 1942"............. 638
  - Dessoff choirs' Lassus program........ 294
  - Discusses commentators of opera and Toscanini broadcasts................ 294
  - Eugene Loring's dance players......... 609
  - Fidelity to the printed score.......... 322
  - Landowska, Wanda; recital............ 322
  - Mitropoulos.........20; see also....... 74
  - Museum of modern art concerts........ 102
  - New friends of music concert..266, 294, 470
  - Philharmonic symphony's Beethoven concert 694
  - Thomson, V., music critic and composer 20, 74
  - Toscanini, A. and Philadelphia orchestra; concert 322
  - Recorded. See Haggin, B. H.; Clark, E.
- Mussolini, Benito. See Italy
- Myrdal, Alva
  - Comment on J. Joesten's article, "Hitler's shanghaied volunteers"; C........295; see also........................... 191

N

- Nation, The
  - And Ireland. L. S. Gannett; S.....125; see also.......................... 107
  - Army psychiatrist brands it as pseudo-liberal. H. G. F.; C................. 696
  - Attacked by Chicago Tribune and Washington Times-Herald for following communist party line. F. Kirchwey; S...........590; see also S......... 591
  - Daniels, J. accepts government job; S....221; see also; EP....207; C.... 324
  - Traditional policy toward Latin America scored by S. Welles. F. Kirchwey; S. 273
  - Valued praise from a private. J. Parsons; C.......................... 668
- National defense. See Defense, national
- National defense mediation board. See Strikes
- National resources planning board
  - Has responsibility for long-range post-war planning. M. S. Stewart; S.... 336
- Native at large (articles by J. Daniels) 15, 38, 66, 94, 117, 166, 194, 221
- Native land. P. H. Rye; MP.............. 609
- Nazism. See Fascism and nazism; Germany
- Near east. See War, European
- Negrin, Juan; service in the allied cause; EP 22
- Negroes
  - City-wide citizens' committee reports on conditions in Harlem; E............ 645
  - Harvard University has Negro on medical school staff; C................. 176; see also C.......................... 47
  - Letter on "Brotherhood except for Negroes" by J. Daniels. E. H. Lott, C 76
  - Navy announces their admission to some regular units; EP.................. 447
  - President's committee on fair employment practice orders manufacturers to stop barring Jews and Negroes from work on war contracts; EP.............. 447
  - Red cross accepts their donations to blood bank only on segregated basis; C.... 296
  - Southern congressmen block appropriations for projects designed to improve their status. A. White; S.......... 213
  - Supreme court asked to review Walfer case; EP.......................587; see also EP...................643, 672
  - Why no Negro college teachers? C...47; see also C.......................... 176
  - Workers in Nassau strike; EP.....672; see also C.......................... 696
- Nehru, Jawaharlal. See India
- Nelson, Donald M.
  - Appoints labor-management production committees. I. F. Stone; S.......331; see also S.......................... 393
  - Formulates plan for raising labor's morale in war effort. R. S. Lynd; S......... 393
  - Heads new war production board. I. F. Stone; S.....83; see also EP.....77; 110
  - See also Defense, national
- Netherlands
  - See also Dutch East Indies
  - Japanese demands on Dutch East Indies in 1940; our debt to the Dutch. H. Abend; S.......................... 111
- Neuberger. Richard L.
  - War and public power; S............. 600
- New Caledonia
  - American troops land in; EP.......... 501
  - French Australia, a. I. Treat; S....... 651
- New friends of music concert. B. H. Haggin; M. 266, 294, 470
- New Jersey
  - Presidential nomination of T. F. Meaney to district court direct sop to Mayor Hague; EP.......................... 615
- New Republic
  - Attacked by Chicago Tribune and Washington Times-Herald for following Communist party line. F. Kirchwey; S..........590; see also S.......... 591
- New year poem. G. Barker; P............ 39
- New York city
  - Ban on burlesque; E................. 385
  - Citizens' committee reports on conditions in Harlem; E...................... 645
  - LaGuardia dismisses civil service commission; EP......................... 207
- New York Herald Tribune
  - Refuses to print advertisement denouncing isolationist press; EP.......... 474
- New York Journal-American
  - Editorial by W. R. Hearst applauds Riom trial and good example it sets; E..... 272
- New York Post
  - Exposes rendezvous of nazi agents and demands senatorial investigation of identification of D. I. Walsh as visitor; EP 617
- New York state
  - Dewey. T. and J. J. Bennett, Jr. probable gubernatorial candidates; EP... 727
- New York Times
  - Attacks decision of War labor board's decision in Walker-Turner case; EP.. 446
- New Yorker fiction. L. Trilling; S........ 425
- Newspapers
  - American newspaper guild:
    - Asks establishment of a committee to investigate cases of censorship; E.. 53
    - Should investigate reported censoring of column by R. Allen and D. Pearson which criticized the navy; E..... 53
  - Chicago Sun. M. Mayer; S........279; see also C....................323, 444
  - Isolationist campaign of Hearst and other newspapers seriously endangers war effort in election year; E........... 180
  - Curb the fascist press. F. Kirchwey; S ....357; see also EP.....412; C.....444, 499, 582
  - Europe's underground press. M. de Capite; S.......................... 592
  - Minority elements influence American opinion by undermining war effort; EP 474
  - See also Freedom of the press
- Niebuhr, Reinhold
  - Germans and the Nazis, the; S........ 398
  - Jews after the war; S........214, 253; see also C.......................... 351
  - Limits of liberty in war time; S.....86; see also C.......................... 175
- Noble, Robert. See Civil rights; Fascism and nazism
- No obligations. I. Treat; S................ 256
- Normandie
  - Precautions against sabotage inadequate; fire due to carelessness; EP......... 206
  - Report reveals lack of coordination and effective organization in the navy; EP 475
- Norris, George W.
  - Ireland will aid the allies in the war; S. 129
- North American aviation. See Defense, national—contracts
- Norway
  - British commandos raid nazi outposts; Germans execute Norse prisoners as reprisal; EP.......................... 21
  - Hitler installs Quisling as premier; EP. 150
  - Hitler recruits Norland regiment to fight against Russia. J. Joesten; S.....191; see also C.......................... 295

O

- OPACS. See Defense, national
- OPM. See Defense, national
- Obituary page in war time. O. Williams; P 195
- Office of price administration and civilian supply. See Defense, national
- Office of production management. See Defense, national
- Oil
  - Gasoline rationing inefficient and ill-managed; E....................588; see also EP.......................... 671
  - Pyron, W. B., urges suspension of anti-trust laws on behalf of oil companies. I. F. Stone; S..................387; see also S.......................... 506
  - Shipments of oil to Spain to be resumed. I. F. Stone; S.................... 247
  - Standard oil company ships oil to axis air lines. I. F. Stone; S.........415; see also EP.......................... 530
- Oklahoma
  - Book trials. E. Z. Green; C........... 176
  - Organizes anti-labor campaign. I. F. Stone; S......358; see also E....... 384

P

- Paintings. See Art
- Papa is all. J. W. Krutch; D.............. 73
- Paris calling. A. Bower; MP............... 101
- Paris in the morning. I. Treat............. 63
- Paris. See France
- Parmelee, Maurice
  - Attacked by Dies committee as author of book on "Nudism in modern life;" E....385; see also EP....411, S.... 478
- Parsons, James
  - Soldier subscribes to The Nation; C..... 668
- Parsons, Marion Randall
  - Forwards letters describing Japanese assembly centers; C..............666; see also EP.........643; S......... 649
- Patents. See Monopolies
- Pearson, Drew
  - "Merry-go-round" column critical of the navy reported censored; E........... 53
- Pelley, William Dudley
  - Arrested for sedition; EP.............. 412
- Pétain, Marshal Henri Philippe. See France
- Petroleum. See Oil
- Philharmonic symphony society
  - Six concert show of Beethoven works. B. H. Haggin; M.................. 694
- Philippine islands. See Japanese-American war
- Phonograph records. See Haggin, B. H.
- Picketing. See Strikes
- Pivert, Marceau
  - Trailed by OGPU agents in Mexico City. R. Rovere; S...................163; see also C...........267............ 352
- Plato's Republic. I. A. Richards; S........ 370
- Plays. See Krutch, J. W. M. Van Doren, M. K. C., and M. M. (for reviews)
- PM
  - Attacks M. Mayer for article, "The case against the Jew"; EP.............. 384
- Poems
  - Christmas, 1941. M. Van Doren........ 490
  - Concert hall. W. R. Rodgers........... 195
  - Doomsters, the. M. Van Doren......... 490
  - End of season. R. P. Warren......... 286
  - Exile. R. Armour..................... 304
  - Homage to Ezra Pound. G. Highet..... 228
  - New year poem. G. Barker............ 39
  - Obituary page in war time. O. Williams. 195
  - Single hero, the. M. Van Doren........ 490
  - Total war. M. Van Doren............. 490
  - White feather, the. J. Berryman....... 574
  - Winter and summer. S. Spender....... 426
  - Winter solstice. R. Humphries......... 90
- Poetry
  - "Cold mornings have been in Bensonhurst," written by B. Pinney. L. Gannett; C.......................... 408
  - Humphries. R., replies to R. Jarrell's article on modernist poetry; S....342; see also........................222, 472

  - Modernist. R. Jarrell; S...........222; see also S..........342; C......... 472
  - Writing and publishing of. R. Humphries; S..................523, 607, 662
- Pol, Heinz
  - Hitler faces rising unrest in German industrial, church, and army circles; S...........30; see also EP......... 50
- Political warfare. See World war
- Poll-tax
  - Congressional committee chairmanships dominated by men from poll-tax states; E........329; see also C........408, 471
- Pope's neutrality, the, G. A. Borgese; S.621; see also C.......................... 722
- Popper, Irene
  - Aliens—friends and enemies; C........ 203
- Pound, Ezra
  - Parody on canto of. G. Highet; P...... 228
- Power and power industry
  - Abolishment of revolving fund of Tennessee valley authority strikes blow at war power production. I. F. Stone; S. 563
  - Contract for power for Camp Gruber awarded private company though government controlled company made smaller bid; EP..................... 447
  - War and public power. R. L. Neuberger; S 600
- Press. See Newspapers
- Press, freedom of. See Freedom of the press
- Prices. See Business
- Priestley, J. B. See Great Britain
- Prinz, Joachim
  - Praises articles by R. Niebuhr on Jews after the war; C.................... 351
- Pro bono publico
  - Letter on proposal to train unemployed automobile workers during transition period; C.......................... 203
- Profits. See Business
- Propaganda
  - Allies should wage active political warfare in neutral and axis countries. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S............... 160
  - Anti-British and pro-axis propaganda deluges Boston Irish. D. Grant; S..... 334
  - Curb the fascist press! F. Kirchwey; S..357; see also EP 412; C..444, 499, 582
  - Ingalls, L., convicted for acting as paid agent of the reich; EP.............. 206
  - Isolationist campaign in newspapers threatens success of war effort; E... 180
  - Italian people need statement of concrete victory program. C. Sforza; S.. 537
  - Japanese embassy in Madrid using Spanish embassy for headquarters for propaganda against the United States; F. Kirchwey; S....................... 330
  - Mexico's entry into war against Axis removes threat of increased agitation by axis agents; EP................ 614
  - Nazi agents in Brazil carry on activities through Spanish embassy. F. Kirchwey; S........................ 330
  - Pro-axis views of C. A. Lindbergh given publicity in Swedish press; article by D. Bess promotes axis campaign; EP 151
  - Townsend R. of Scribner's Commentator charged with distributing Japanese propaganda; EP.................... 151
  - Spanish phalanx working openly in Mexico and United States. F. Kirchwey; S........................... 330
- Public finance. See Finance, public
- Public utilities. See Utilities, public
- Puerto Rico
  - Grants citizenship to members of Spanish falange; EP........................ 475
- Pyron, Walter B. See Oil

Q

- Quinine. See Monopolies
- Quisling, Vidkun. See Norway

R

- Railroads
  - Will planes oust trains? K. Hutchison; S 712
  - War profits for. K. Hutchison; S...... 219
- Reconstruction finance corporation
  - Jones, J., builds up army of personal followers. D. MacDonald; S......... 187
  - Jones, J. plays vital role in national defense. D. MacDonald; S........157, 187
  - Jones, J., succeeds in removing E. Schram. D. MacDonald; S.......... 187
- Recorded music. See Haggin, B. H.
- Red cross
  - Accepts donations to blood bank from Negroes only on segregated basis; C... 296
- Refugees
  - Anti-fascist refugees in Mexico City trailed by OGPU agents. R. Rovere; S........163, see also C........267, 352
  - Friends and enemies; C.............. 203
  - In Australian internment camps anxious to help in war effort. K. Bergel; C.... 640
  - Jews from Rumania denied entrance to Palestine lost on Sturma; EP....... 299
  - No obligations. I. Treat; S........... 256
- Regler, Gustav
  - Trailed by OGPU agents in Mexico City. R. Rovere; S..................163; see also C.......................267, 352
- Reichenau, Field Marshal Walther von
  - Reported to have succumbed to poor health; EP.......................... 79
- Relief, unemployment. See Unemployment relief
- Remember the day. A. Bower; MP......... 19
- Republican party
  - National committee recognizes American responsibility in world post-war reconstruction; E..................... 476
- Reuther, Walter P. See Defense, national—Automobile industry
- Richards, I. A.
  - New republic, The; S.............. 370
- Riesel, Victor and W. Chasan
  - Describes attempts of J. L. Lewis to organize nation's dairy farmers; S..309; see also C.......................... 379
  - Gerald L. K. Smith; S............566; see also C......................666, 722
  - Martin L. Sweeney of Ohio; S........ 626
  - Technocrats in uniform; S............ 395
- Rights, civil. See Civil rights
- Rios, J. R. See Chile.
- Rivals, the. J. W. Krutch; D.............. 101
- Rodgers, W. R.
  - Concert hall; P....................... 195
- Roman catholic church
  - German bishops charge Nazis with effort to destroy Christianity; EP.......... 670
  - Pope's neutrality, the. G. A. Borgese; S.........621; see also C........... 722
  - Sponsors isolationist meetings in Boston. D. Grant; S....................... 334
- Roosevelt, Eleanor. See Defense, national
- Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
  - Administration
    - Anti-inflation program; E............ 504
    - Budget message; E................. 53
    - Problem of America's production effort. I. F. Stone; S................... 27
    - Warns farmers their progress under the New deal may be jeopardized by attempt to take advantage of the war situation; EP.................... 298
  - Reports to nation on allied military strategy; EP....................... 241
- Root, Waverley L.
  - French fleet as Vichy bait for the State department; S...................... 56
- Rosenberg, Alfred. See Germany
- Rosenberg, Anna M.
  - Dual employment by New deal and Rockefeller family exposed. I. F. Stone; S.. 563
- Rosenberg, James N.
  - Defends government prosecutions in war time for seditious utterances; S..511; see also S........543; C........555, 611
- Rosenfeld, Paul
  - Comments on M. Marshall's review of "Memoirs" of S. Anderson; C....611; see also B.......................... 574
- Rovere, Richard
  - OGPU agents trail anti-fascist refugees in Mexico City; S...............163; see also C....................267, 352
- Roxie Hart. P. H. Rye; MP.............. 320
- Rubber. See Defense, national
- Rumania
  - United States declares war on. F. Kirchwey; S.......................... 673
  - War threatens with Hungary over Transylvania; EP....................... 353
- Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Russo-German war
  - Allied victory in the Pacific would release Russia's far eastern army for use against Germany; E................. 81
  - Attack on Sevastopol brings demand for second front; EP.................. 725
  - Armies gather for most terrific attack of war; EP.......................... 409
  - Battle of Staraya Russa may be of decisive importance; new drive against Kharkov launched; EP............ 270
  - Drive prepared against Murmansk and Archangel; EP...................... 671
  - Eastern front campaign may bring about Germany's downfall. D. W. Mitchell; S 28
  - Fate of Russia and world may be decided around oil wells of Azerbaijan. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.............. 618
  - Finnish social democratic party asks end of Finnish participation in the war; EP 50
  - Fresh Nazi troops herald spring offensive?; EP.......................... 382
  - German army still held in reserve; E.. 644
  - German resistance intensified; American and British planes flown by Russia; EP 353
  - Germany prepares for large-scale spring offensive; E........................ 179
  - Hitler blames weather for Russian defeat and demands new sacrifices of his people; EP........................ 327
  - Hitler recruits "volunteers" for his crusade against Bolshevism. J. Joesten; S...........191; see also C......... 295
  - Hitler's plight in Russia. D. W. Mitchell; S 7
  - Hitler visit to Marshal Mannerheim bid for Finnish support in drive on Leningrad; ED....................... 671
  - It's a lie! We're not retreating. Low; Ct 113
  - Nazis recapture Kerch; reserves not used; EP 697
  - Nazi spring offensive invokes demand for second front in Europe. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S...618; see also EP....1, 614
  - Nazi spring offensive may mean defeat of Russia. J. A. del Vayo; S........ 618
  - Perilous position of Russia increases demand for new front in Europe; EP.........614; see also S.......... 614
  - R. A. F. raids slow down Nazi offensive; EP.......................... 382
  - Red army seizes initiative in Kharkov area; EP.......................... 585
  - Russia makes great gains in war; revolutionizes ways of fighting; German army steadily losing ground with heavy casualties; Russian morale increases as German decreases. D. W. Mitchell; S 360
  - Russian counter-offensive gains momentum; situation at Sevastopol and in the Crimea endangers nazi position in the eastern Ukraine; EP................. 50
  - Russian successes around Moscow and in the eastern Crimea; EP.............. 21
  - Sevastopol air attack prelude to drive against Caucasus; EP.............. 671
  - Soviet troops capture Kholm and Toropets; Russian successes in the north may disrupt nazi spring offensive; EP 106
  - Stalin expresses confidence in address to red army on 24th anniversary; Hitler orders German garrisons to hold on; EP 242
  - United States aid to Russia lags; success of war depends on deliveries to Russia; EP 382
- Rye, P. H.
  - Reviews of motion pictures:
    - Captains of the clouds.............. 320
    - Gold rush, the...................... 553
    - Great man's lady, the.............. 553
    - Invaders, the 320
    - Joan of Paris 239
    - Johnny Eager 320
    - Jungle book........................ 553
    - King's row......................... 320
    - Land, the.......................... 553
    - Moontide 553
    - Native land........................ 609
    - Mr. V.............................. 320
    - Roxie Hart......................... 320
    - Saboteur 609
    - This above all..................... 609
    - Woman of the year.................. 239

S

- Saboteur. P. H. Rye; MP................ 609
- St. Pierre and Miquelon
  - Occupied by Free French. I. F. Stone; S.....6; see also 1; EP.....2, 22, 50, 56, 150; C................124, 175, 176
  - State department seeks formula to mollify Vichy and save own face; EP....... 206
- Salaries. See Labor
- Salingue, Edgar
  - Comments on article "Our consuls at work"; C......640; see also S....... 507
- Saturday Evening Post
  - Publishes article by M. Mayer attacking the Jews; EP.................. 384
  - Refutes arguments of G. B. Shaw on position of Eire. N. Angell; S...... 513
- Schram, Emil. See Reconstruction finance corporation
- Scribner's Commentator. See Propaganda.
- Selective service
  - Manpower and the draft; E............ 244
  - Shall we draft women? M. S. Stewart; S 483
  - War department plans army of 3,600,000 men by end of 1942; EP........... 79
- Serge, Victor
  - Trailed by OGPU agents in Mexico City. R. Rovere; S...................163; see also C......................267, 352
- Sforza, Carlo
  - Asks President Roosevelt to state to Italian people concrete victory program; S..........537; see also B.......... 716
- Shanghai gesture, the. A. Bower; MP...... 19
- Shirer, William L.
  - Will Hitler take Ireland? S........132; see also..........................134, 137
- Short, Lieutenant General Walter C.
  - Found guilty of dereliction of duty at Pearl Harbor; EP.................. 105
- Shridharani, Krishnalal
  - What Cripps faces in India; S........ 365

Shuster, Zachariah
    Dismal reich, the; S.... 487
Simone, André
    OGPU agent trails anti-fascist refugees in Mexico City. R. Rovere; S.....163; see also C....267, 352
Singapore
    Anti-axis nations suffer initial defeat in withdrawing to; EP.... 149
    Fall blamed partly on shortcomings of allied war policy; EP.... 205
    Japanese troops land on island proper; EP.... 177
    Loss is imminent; EP.... 49
    Loss may mean defeat of United nations. D. W. Mitchell; S.... 278
    Loss will hinder an allied counter-offensive in the far east; EP.... 49
    New aerial reinforcements help to stabilize defense; EP.... 106
Single hero, the. M. Van Doren; P.... 490
Skinner, Edna
    Letter on State department; C......176; see also 1, 6; EP.... 2
Skou, Hans Kristian
    Comment on J. Joesten's article, "Hitler's shanghaied volunteers"; C...295; see also.... 191
Smith, Gerald L. K.; candidacy for United States senate. W. Chasan and V. Riesel; S.... 566; see also C....666, 722
Social justice
    Coughlinite paper gives views on the war; EP.... 4
    Enjoys wide sale in Boston. D. Grant; S.... 334
    Federal grand jury will investigate; EP 474
    Goes out of business; EP.... 558
Soffner, Heinz
    Labor shortage in Germany threatens war machine; S.... 539
Solitaire. J. W. Krutch; D.... 201
South, the
    Dixie drive on labor. B. Taper; S..... 569
    Southern colleges still require their faculties to affirm belief in bible. V. Dabney; S.... 310
South Africa
    Gold mining and employment. K. Hutchison; S.... 517
South America. See Latin America
Southern Review.... 119
Soviet Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Spahr, Walter E.
    Sends letter to congressmen warning against collectivists in federal government. I. F. Stone; S.... 303
Spain
    American shipments of oil to be resumed; British send mining machinery to Rio Tinto mines. I. F. Stone; S.... 247
    Hitler enrolls "blue division" to fight against Russia. J. Joesten; S.....191; see also C.... 295
    Letter by J. Allen criticizes appeasement policy of State department; C.... 154
    Members of falange granted citizenship in Puerto Rico; EP.... 475
    Serious opposition to Franco regime reported; EP.... 531
    Signs trade pact with Argentina. F. Kirchwey; S.... 330
    Suñer, S. visits Rome; E.... 730
    Three years of Franco. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.... 391
Sparks, John Cunningham
    Outlines plan for meeting war costs during war; S....654; see also C.... 696
Spender, Stephen
    Winter and summer; P.... 426
Sperry corporation. See defense, national—contracts
Stalin, Josef. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Standard oil company
    Dismantles acetylene plant under agreement with Germany; EP.... 529
    Gets patent for production of synthetic buna rubber as organizer of Jasco with I G Farben. I. F. Stone; S.... 591
    Makes its synthetic-rubber patents available to Germany but denies them to American and British firms; action starts demand for registration of all patent license agreements; EP....383; see also S........387, 506; EP...... 530
    Ships oil to axis air lines with apparent consent of State department, I. F. Stone; S......415; see also EP...... 530
    Truth about rubber. I. F. Stone; S..451; see also S.... 506
    See also Defense, national; Monopolies
Steel
    Companies fight plan for expansion of manufacturing facilities; E.... 589
    Output slowed by lack of scrap metal for furnaces; EP.... 79
    War labor board charges United States steel with defying government on maintenance-of-membership clause; EP.........502; see also EP....... 559
    War production board accuses Carnegie-Illinois and Jones and Laughlin companies of violation of priority regulations; EP.... 474
Stein, Rose
    Letter by E. M. Hugh-Jones pays tribute to her memory; C.... 203
Sterling products company. See Monopolies
Sternberg, Fritz
    American manpower; C..........379; see also E.... 244
    Germany's economic status; S.... 595
    Reports shortage in German manpower and reduction in production; EP..... 698
Stewart, Kenneth
    Socialist view of Ireland; C.... 267
Stewart, Maxwell S.
    Headaches in post-war planning; S..... 336
    Shall we draft women?; S.... 483
Stiles, Edward A.
    Letter on the poll tax; C...........471; see also E..........329; C.... 408
Stone, I. F.
    All-out against labor; S...........358; see also E.......384; EP.... 411
    Amendment to independent offices appropriation bill abolishes revolving fund of Tennessee valley authority; S..... 563
    Decision of F. Biddle in case of H. Bridges reveals weaknesses in interpretation of law and facts; S....674; see also S....646, 702
    Dual employment of A. M. Rosenberg; S.... 563
    Exposes cartel agreements restricting use in United States of tetracene, tungsten carbide; S......478; see also S...... 506
    Delay in conversion of consumer goods to war production seriously hampers defense. I. F. Stone; S........331; see also E....355, 476
    Free French and the State department; S....6; see also 1; EP....2, 22, 50, 56
    Labor and its enemies; S.... 384
    Labor and the long view; S.......275; see also C.... 379
    Need for a war footing in the automobile industry; S.... 55
    Our slacker patents; S.... 506
    Pet fascists; S.... 247
    President Roosevelt and the problem of America's production effort; S....... 27
    Resignation of R. R. Guthrie attributed to his fight for conversion of radio industry to war production; incurs enmity of P. D. Reed; S..........331; see also E....355, 476
    Reveals lack of coordination and cooperation in handling rubber situation; S..........619; see also S.......... 647
    Reveals Standard oil company's shipments to axis air lines with apparent approval of State department; S....415; see also EP.... 530
    SPAB politics; H. Wallace's shortcomings; J. Jones appointed to the board; S.... 27
    Truman committee report on Guthrie case reveals interests of big business still paramount in war production; S.. 731
    Truth about rubber, the; S........451; see also S.... 506
    War production board still harbors dollar-a-year men; S.... 110
    Washington notes; S.... 591
Strait of Macassar. See World war
Strauss, Harold
    Will there be a post-war economic collapse? S....9, 32; see also C........ 104
Strikes
    Industry-labor conference ends with no-strike agreement for the duration of the war; E.... 5
    Pardon urged for A. Panchelly, E. Woodworth, and D. Brown now serving sentences for refusing to act as strikebreakers; C.... 380
Stringham, Emerson
    Comments on P. Cot's review of "The France of tomorrow" by A. Guérard and article "Freezing out the Free French" by H. Lehrman; C.... 640
Strings, my lord are false, the. J. W. Krutch; D.... 637
Stryker. Roy. See Agriculture
Stuart, Philip
    Describes his army life; C.... 639
Sturma
    Sunk in Black Sea with loss of 750 Jewish refugees; EP.... 299
Sullivan, Mark
    Accuses New dealers of using present war emergency to slip over their subversive measures; EP.... 300
Sullivan's travels. A. Bower; MP.... 101
Supreme court, United States
    Decides activities of local 807 of the teamsters do not come under the Copland bill against racketeering; E......301
    Decision in wage-hour law case provides loophole to avoid payment of overtime; E.... 729
    Declares administrator of wage-hour law must issue all subpoenas personally; E.... 301
    Grants additional bonuses in decision in the Bethlehem war profits case; E..........245; see also C.... 380
    Justice Frankfurter hands down decision for unanimous court in Wisconsin injunction case; E.... 301
    License tax must be paid by Jehovah's witnesses; E.... 729
    Moves toward the right; E.... 729
    Two liberal patent decisions underscore need for new patents bill; EP...... 587
Sweden
    Heeding Nazi protests will not save it from more serious demands; EP..... 327
    Hitler recruits volunteer corps to fight against Russia. J. Joesten; S....191; see also C.... 295
    Suppresses publications printing stories reflecting on nazis; EP.... 327
Sweeney, Martin L., candidacy. W. Chasan and V. Riesel; S.... 626

T

Taper, Bernard
    Dixie drive on labor; S.... 569
Tarzan's secret treasure. A. Bower; MP.... 19
Taylor, C. Fayette
    Take issue with R. Bates' discussion of Great Britain; C........499; see also S..............388; C.... 582
Taylor, George E.
    Failure of United nations to aid China imperils whole world; S.... 734
Taxation. See Finance, public
Technocrats in uniform. W. Chasan and V. Riesel; S.... 395
Tennessee valley authority
    Amendment abolishes revolving fund. I. F. Stone; S.... 563
Tenor, T. A.
    Comments on atricle "A central European federation" by M. Hodza; C....668; see also S.... 570
    Letter on State department; C....176; see also 1, 6; EP.... 2
Theater
    Ban on burlesque; E.... 385
    See also Krutch, J. W., S. Van Doren, M., M. K. C., M. M. (for reviews)
This above all. P. H. Rye; MP.... 609
Thomas, Norman
    Believes that the defeat of Hitler will deliver Europe to the Soviet union, R. Bates; S.... 60
    Letter by A. B. Lewis discussing his leadership of Socialist party; C..203; see also C.........124; S.... 60
    Letter on "Need we fear Russia?" by R. Bates; C......124; see also...... 60
Thomson, Virgil
    Music critic and composer. B. H. Haggin; M....20, 74
    Views on "Radio research 1941." B. H. Haggin; M.... 638
Toksvig, Signe
    Comments on J. Joesten's article, "Hitler's shanghaied volunteers"; C..295; see also.... 191
Torres, Henry, and H. Lehrman
    Laval's cabinet of traitors; S.... 515
Toscanini, Arturo
    And Philadelphia orchestra. B. H. Haggin; M.... 322
    Beethoven concert. B. H. Haggin; M.. 694
Total war. M. Van Doren; P.... 490
Totalitarian states. See Fascism and nazism
Townsend, Ralph. See Propaganda
Trachtenberg, Joshua
    Urges recruiting of Jewish army in Palestine; C.... 379
Trade. See Business
Treat, Ida
    Meeting Mr. Saito; S.... 597
    New Caledonia; S.... 651
    No obligations; S.... 256
    Paris in the morning.... 63
Trilling, Lionel
    New Yorker, fiction; S.... 425
Truman committee
    Committee report reveals lack of planning in the aviation industry; weaknesses of the report; E.... 80
    Hearings on lag in copper production abandoned; E.... 672
    Henderson, L. reports on rubber situation; EP.... 299
    Investigates lag in aircraft production; E.... 413
    Issues report on rubber situation. I. F. Stone; S......619; see also S....... 647

  - Reports on Guthrie case. I. F. Stone; S 731
  - Reveals Standard oil's shipments to axis air lines with apparent approval of State department. I. F. Stone; S.........415; see also EP........ 530
  - Suggests ways of meeting the rubber crisis. I. F. Stone; S....619; see also S 647
- Turkey
  - Will Germany invade?; EP.......... 382

U

- U. S. S. R. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Unemployment relief
  - Congressional leaders discuss plan for compensating workers displaced by war-production conversion; EP......... 79
  - House shelves bill providing special benefits for training workers to meet war-production program; EP...243 see also
  - Letter by Pro bono publico on proposal to train unemployed automobile workers during transition period; C..... 203
- Union for democratic action
  - Attacked by Chicago Tribune and Washington Times-Herald as communist organization. F. Kirchwey; S......590; see also S........ 591
  - Gains a member. A. B. R.; C....722; see also S........ 561
  - Organization expanded as result of American entry into the war; EP........ 51
  - Organizes action in coming congressional elections. F. Kirchwey; S........... 561
  - State department has file on its activities. F. Kirchwey; S........590; see also S 591
- Union of soviet socialist republics
  - Arrests two leaders of the Jewish labor movement in Poland. F. Kingdon; C..........104; see also S........ 163
  - Japan may attack if German offensive fails; EP........ 409
  - Lease-lend agreement negotiated with United States. F. Kirchwey; S...... 701
  - OGPU agents trail anti-fascist refugees in Mexico City. R. Rovere; S...163; see also C..........267; 352
  - Production reported recovering from effects of the German invasion; EP.... 21
  - Renews Soviet-Japanese fisheries agreement for one year; EP............. 353
  - Russia behind the lines. A. Werth; S 454
  - Signs treaty with Great Britain. F. Kirchwey; S........ 701
  - Stalin gets more space in 1942 edition of "Who's Who". R. Armour; P...... 255
  - See also Russo-German War; War, European
- Unions, labor. See Labor unions
- United automobile workers of America
  - Announces victory program; EP....446; see also C........ 528
  - Fight against "business as usual" in the automobile industry, the. I. F. Stone; S 55
  - Letter by Pro bono publico on proposal to train unemployed workers during transition period; C................ 203
- United States
  - And France
    - President Roosevelt should appeal to French people by radio to offset P. Laval's collaboration with Hitler. L. Fischer; S........ 486
  - And Ireland
    - America's role in Irish independence. S. La Follette; S................ 126
    - American troops given cold welcome by De Valera; Eire asserts its maintenance of neutrality; E........... 152
  - And Japan. See Japanese-American war
  - And Mexico
    - Award in oil wells controversy should strengthen good neighbor relations; EP 475
  - And Spain
    - Attitude of the State department toward Spanish loyalists; EP........ 22
    - Hayes, C. J. H. appointed American ambassador; EP......410; see also C 555
    - Letter by J. Allen criticizes appeasement policy of State department; C 154
    - Members of falange granted citizenship in Puerto Rico; EP.......... 475
    - Spanish propaganda effort for axis works openly in Latin America and United States; appeasement has failed. F. Kirchwey; S............. 330
  - And the Soviet Union
    - Need we fear Russia? R. Bates; S.. 60
  - And the war
    - Freedom of the press and rumors in war time. J. Daniels; S.......... 166
    - New war budget, the; E............ 53
    - Our treatment of aliens from enemy countries; EP 24
    - Possible agreement between F. D. Roosevelt and W. Churchill permits reshipment to Spain of lend-lease material despite prohibition by export-control and lease-lend officials. I. F. Stone; S................. 247
    - Signs lease-lend agreement with Russia. F. Kirchwey; S 701
    - U-boat strategy, the. D. W. Mitchell; S 248
    - World trade after the war. K. Hutchison; S 283
  - Anti-fascist employees dismissed; EP... 699
  - Army
    - Better promotion system needed. D. W. Mitchell; S................ 155
    - Hobby, Mrs. O. C. to head Women's auxiliary army corps; EP........ 587
    - Investigation of industrial section of War department's Public relations bureau being made; EP.......... 504
    - Shelters for a mobile army. C. Willson; C........ 47
    - Soldier discusses army life. P. Stuart; C 639
    - War department plans army of 3,600,000 men by end of 1942; EP..... 79
  - Declares war on Hungary, Rumania, and Bulgaria. F. Kirchwey; S......... 673
  - Employment service; separate offices maintained for Whites and Negroes. A. White; S........ 213
  - Navy
    - Admits Negroes to some regular units; EP 447
    - Better promotion system needed. D. W. Mitchell; S........ 155
    - Should enlist civilian seamen to help combat increased submarine menace in Atlantic; EP................ 615
  - Photographs by R. Stryer give picture of America's strength. J. Daniels; S.... 194
  - Signs economic agreement with Great Britain. K. Hutchison; S.......... 283
  - Signs lease-lend agreements with China and Russia. F. Kirchwey; S........ 673
  - State department
    - Accepts Vichy's assurances of limiting collaboration with axis in Mediterranean and Atlantic war zones to armistice obligations; should demand full list of commitments; EP.. 382
    - Agrees to cooperate with Free French in defending French Pacific islands; EP 271
    - Allen, J. criticizes appeasement policy in Spain; C........ 154
    - Appeasement has led to Laval disaster. P. Markham; C................ 555
    - Attitude of, toward Spanish loyalists; EP 22
    - Believes resumption of shipments to French North Africa will not reach Europe; EP........ 698
    - Comes to defense of Standard oil's shipments of oil to axis air lines. I. F. Stone; S......415; see also EP 530
    - Establishes consulate in Brazzaville recognizing Free French regime there; EP 410
    - Hopes to keep secret information on oil shipments to Spain. I. F. Stone; S 247
    - Indirectly to blame for Pearl Harbor disaster; EP 105
    - Leahy, W. D. defends policy of appeasement; EP 698
    - Memorial day speech of S. Welles offers blueprint for world after war; EP........641; see also S........ 673
    - Muselier, Admiral E., repudiates plan for neutrality of St. Pierre and Miquelon; EP........ 150
    - Negotiates directly with Admiral Robert on neutralization of Martinique; EP 558
    - Our consuls at work. V. Fry; S....507; see also C..........640, 695
    - Permits shipments to French North Africa; EP 271
    - Permits Vichy cargo ships to leave United States despite evidence their supplies reach North Africa. F. Kirchwey; S 182
    - Protests Free French occupation of St. Pierre and Miquelon. I. F. Stone; S....6; see also 1; EP....2, 22, 50, 56; C 124, 175, 176
    - Responsible for gestapo activity in French West Indies; C............ 296
    - Return to power of P. Laval severe setback to appeasement policy; Ambassador Leahy should be recalled; EP 445
    - Seeks formula to mollify Vichy and save face in affair of St. Pierre and Miquelon; EP........ 206
    - Should back Free French to the limit and break off diplomatic relations with Spain. F. Kirchwey; S....... 477
    - Should end allegiance of United States citizens to country of their origin. S. T. Byington; C................ 584
    - Supports British landing in Madagascar; EP 529
    - Will accept adherence to the declaration of the United nations from the Free French, Free Danes, and others; E 24
  - Supreme court. See Supreme court
  - See also World war
- Utilities, public
  - Campaign against labor also directed against rural electrification administration and St. Lawrence waterway. I. F. Stone; S........ 358
  - Serious power shortage may develop if armament program is to be met. K. Hutchison; S 164
  - War and public power. R. Neuberger; S 600

V

- Vambery, Rustem
  - George W. Kirchwey; S............... 312
- Van de Water, John R.
  - Resolution on plans for a lasting peace; C 75
- Van Doren, Mark
  - Christmas, 1941; P........ 490
  - Doomsters, the; P........ 490
  - Good critics, rare and common; S...... 95
  - Reviews of plays:
    - Moon is down, the........ 468
    - Single hero, the; P........ 490
    - Total War; P........ 490
- Vayo, Julio Alvarez. See Alvarez del Vayo
- Vichy. See France
- Villard, Oswald Garrison
  - Seventieth birthday dinner announced in letter by M. W. Hillyer; C.......... 268
- Villarino. V. Mishnun; S................. 579
- Visas. See Refugees
- von Clemm, Werner
  - American agent of German high command indicted for illicit selling of diamonds to raise funds for nazi propaganda; EP 151

W

- WPB. See Defense, national; War production board
- Wages. See Labor
- Wagner, Robert M.
  - Proposes a post-emergency economic commission and an unemployment commission. H. Strauss; S........ 9
- Walker, George R.
  - Comments on J. C. Spark's article, "We must pay as we go"; C............. 696
  - Letter on H. Strauss "Don't plan for collapse"; C.........104; see also 9, 32
- Wallace, Henry Agard. See Defense, national
- Waller, Odell
  - Gets fifth reprieve; President Roosevelt asked to intervene; EP......727; see also EP........587, 643
  - Supreme court asked to review case; EP......587; see also EP.......643, 672
- Wall Street Journal
  - Warns against anti-labor hysteria; EP......354; see also EP......326; S........358; E......384; EP...... 411
- Walsh, Chad
  - Comments on victory program of automobile workers and danger threatening America; C....528; see also EP.... 446
- Walsh, David Ignatius
  - Accused of frequenting house of male prostitution and rendezvous of nazi agents; E 617
  - Suggests recall of fleet to defend coasts; EP.........241; see also S......... 334
- War, African
  - Axis forces surrender in the Halfaya pass; additional axis forces reach North Africa; EP........ 78
  - British land troops in Madgascar; EP.. 529
  - British line holds in Libya; EP....... 642
  - Difficulties in Libya may force Germany to attack through Near East. D. W. Mitchell; S 360
  - Egyptian government breaks off relations with Vichy; EP........ 178
  - Entrance of Japan into war makes defense of Egypt and Middle East more important; E........ 179
  - Evacuation of El Gazala and Bir Hacheim forced by Nazis; EP........ 697
  - Free French plan for taking Madagascar. H. Lehrman; S....564; see also C 640
  - Nazi counter-offensive threatens Bengasi; EP 106
  - Tobruk and the second front. F. Kirchwey; S 727

  - Vichy assures United States Madgascar will not be turned over to Japanese; EP 327
  - Vichy cargo ships leave United States despite evidence their supplies reach North Africa. F. Kirchwey; S...... 182
- War, European (see also names of countries and regions)
  - Air offensive against Germany and invasion coast launched; EP........... 670
  - Allied air attack effects serious damage on axis convoy in the Mediterranean; EP 106
  - Argentine-Spanish trade pact breaches British blockade. F. Kirchwey; S.. 330
  - Axis spring maneuvers. F. Kirchwey; S 534
  - British air offensive prelude to invasion of continent; EP.................... 557
  - British commandos raid nazi outposts in Norway; EP 21
  - Central European federation, a. M. Hodza; S......570; see also C...... 668
  - Children in war time. E. Blue; S...... 545
  - Concrete statement of United States' program for victory needed to arouse Italian people. C. Sforza; S........ 537
  - Control of North pole in hands of four major powers of United nations; northern route offers unique strategic possibilities. L. Irvine; S........... 363
  - Cripps, S., pleads for closer association between Russia and western democracies; EP 178
  - Defeat in Libya makes second front absolutely essential. F. Kirchwey; S.. 727
  - Diversion of shipping to Pacific increases U-boat sinkings in Atlantic; EP........326; see also EP........ 355
  - Early cooperation of independent states would have prevented nazi occupations at no military cost. N. Angell; S... 513
  - Early offensive in west necessary. F. Kirchwey; S....477; see also S.... 480
  - England leads movement for invasion of Europe. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..618; see also EP......................... 614
  - Estimate of British strength and weakness. R. Bates; S......388; see also C 499, 582
  - Estimate of forces necessary for British invasion of Europe. R. Bates; S..388; see also C......................... 499
  - Estimate of last four months of war. D. W. Mitchell; S..................... 510
  - Evidences of unrest in axis countries aimed at creating division among allies. F. Kirchwey; S.................... 534
  - German labor shortage threatens war machine. H. Soffner; S.............. 539
  - German U-boats increase shipping losses in Atlantic; EP...................... 177
  - Germany's economic status. F. Sternberg; S.......................... 595
  - Germany's role in a federated Europe; C 528
  - Ireland's strategic position in the war. D. W. Mitchell; S..............134; see also 132, 137
  - Ireland will aid the allies. G. W. Norris; S 129
  - Laval and Roosevelt. L. Fischer; S.... 486
  - New front may be opened earlier than expected. D. W. Mitchell; S......... 360
  - Our plan for victory. D. W. Mitchell; S 58
  - Perilous position of Russia increases demand for new front in Europe; EP........614; see also S........ 618
  - Plan proposed for allied invasion of Europe; occupants of conquered countries to be armed. H. DeWeerd; S.. 217
  - R. A. F. bombs Cologne; E............ 644
  - R. A. F. raids on French industry accepted by French as first step in their liberation; EP......298; see also.... 326
  - R. A. F. starts drive against Nazi factories in Germany and occupied countries; EP.......326; see also....... 298
  - Rumania and Hungary mass troops on borders as tension over Transylvania increases; EP 353
  - Second front in west must be opened up in 1942 if ever. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S...480; see also E...505; S...618; EP 614
  - Spring assignment. Low; Ct.......... 338
  - Unconquered Malta. E. Bonici; S.... 541
  - Underground press. M. de Capite; S... 592
  - United nations plan second front; E.... 644
  - Vichy agrees to limit collaboration with axis in Mediterranean and Atlantic war zones to armistice obligations; EP 382
  - Will Germany invade Turkey?; EP.... 382
  - Will second front be organized in time to save Russia?; EP................ 725
  - Yugoslav guerrilla army continues to harry the Germans and Italians; EP.. 78
- War labor board
  - Charges United States steel with defying government on maintenance-of-membership clause; EP........502; see also EP 559
  - Decides in International harvester company maintenance-of-membership case; EP 475
  - General Motors accepts board's ruling on continuation of previous contract arrangements; EP 558
  - Orders Federal shipbuilding and dry dock company to grant maintenance of membership to union; EP........502; see also EP....................... 559
  - Walker-Turner case; EP.............. 446
  - Works on plan to keep low wages in line with rising living costs; EP.... 615
- War manpower commission. See Defense, national.
- War production board. See Defense, national
- Warren, Robert Penn
  - End of season; P..................... 286
- Washington Times-Herald
  - Attacks The Nation and New Republic for following communist party line. F. Kirchwey; S....590; see also S..... 591
- Watson, Goodwin
  - Dies committee opposes his appointment to government job; EP.............. 151
  - Remains on Federal communications commission. I. F. Stone; S............ 591
- Wavell, General Sir Archibald. See World war
- Wechsler, James A.
  - Can Lewis wreck the C. I. O.?; S.... 420
  - Is Lewis licked?; S.................. 684
- Weddell, Alexander W.
  - On return from Spain is evasive regarding relations between Spain and the axis; EP 271
- Weintraub, David
  - Endorses The Nation's stand on free speech in war time; C......582; see also S......357; EP......412; C.... 444
- Welles, Sumner
  - Deplores attitude of groups which favor a policy of "revolutionary democracy" in South America. F. Kirchwey; S.. 273
  - Grants audience to leader of Free French. I. F. Stone; S..................... 247
  - Issues new statement on St. Pierre and Miquelon to refute charge he differed from C. Hull; EP.................. 206
  - Memorial day speech offers blueprint for world after war; EP....641; see also S 673
- Wells, Carlton F.
  - Comment on "How to lose the war" by D. W. Mitchell; C....203; see also S 85
- Werth, Alexander
  - Russia behind the lines; S............ 454
- West Indies
  - Blessed Bahamas. A. Liebers; S...... 368
  - Negro workers in Nassau strike; EP........672; see also C.......... 696
- Whitaker, John T.
  - Attacks American complacency in war effort and morale; S................ 457
- White, Leigh
  - Discusses attitude of Greeks toward King George; S.......................... 677
- Williams, Oscar
  - Obituary page in war time; P......... 195
- Willkie, Wendell L.
  - Wins fight in Republican national committee to establish principles for American post-war policy; E.............. 476
- Willson, Corwin
  - Pressure groups still force government to resist change; C.................. 472
  - Shelters for a mobile army; C........ 47
- Winter solstice. R. Humphries; P........ 90
- Wintringham, Tom
  - Britain's new left; S..............737; see also EP....726; S.............. 673
- Wittke, Carl
  - Asks for material for biography of K. Heinzen; C....................... 640
- Wohlthat, Helmuth. See Germany
- World war
  - Active political warfare must be waged by Allies. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.... 160
  - A. E. F. to Siberia. G. A. Borgese; S........416; see also EP.......... 409
  - Allied air and naval forces destroy Japanese ships in the Strait of Macassar; EP 106
  - Allied victory off Bali does little to lessen danger to Java; EP................ 242
  - American ships sunk by German submarines operating along the Atlantic coast; EP........................... 77
  - Anglo-American supply council may be formed to coordinate industrial efforts; E 24
  - Annual military expenditures; Ch...... 596
  - Anti-axis nations suffer initial defeat in withdrawing to Singapore island; EP. 149
  - Anti-British sentiment grows. R. Bates; S 388
  - Arrival of American troops in Ireland evokes reiteration of Eire's neutrality; E 152
  - Australia fears that Pacific war area may be subordinated to other fronts; EP...........3; see also......... 12
  - Axis counts on American complacency and lack of courage. J. T. Whitaker; S 457
  - Balance sheet of allied gains and losses. D. W. Mitchell; S.................. 28
  - Burma falls; E....................... 531
  - Chart illustrates vast economic resources of United nations; EP......207; see also 212
  - Children in war time. E. Blue; S...... 545
  - Control of North pole in hands of four major powers of United nations; northern route offers unique strategic position. L. Irvine; S............. 363
  - Cripps, S., says Russia is anxious to work closely with Great Britain and America now and after war; EP.... 178
  - Declaration of the United nations is implemented by agreement on Far Eastern unified command; E............... 24
  - Desperate situation in Far East may mean long postponement of counteroffensive against Japanese; E........ 179
  - Estimate of last four months of war. D. W. Mitchell; S..................... 510
  - Fall of Manila reveals need for a unified allied strategy; E.................. 26
  - Fall of Singapore blamed partly on shortcomings of allied war policy; EP.... 205
  - Free and so-called free movements. F. Kirchwey; S....82; see also EP.... 411
  - Free French, Free Danes, and others, to be accepted as signatories to the Declaration of the United nations; E........24; see also 82; EP........ 411
  - German submarines attack Aruba; EP.. 205
  - Gold mining and employment in South Africa; K. Hutchison; S............. 517
  - Great understanding of issues at stake needed if war is to be won; E...... 179
  - Headaches in post-war planning. M. S. Stewart; S 336
  - How to lose the war; the need for offensive action by the allies. D. W. Mitchell; S....85; see also E....81; see also E........................... 271
  - Importance of the war in the Pacific; E. 81
  - Increased submarine attacks in Atlantic show need for more vigorous measures; civilian seamen should be used to fight as guerrillas; EP.................. 615
  - Isolationist campaign of Hearst and other newspapers seriously affects public judgment of war strategy; E........ 180
  - Japanese effect landings on islands north of Australia; British retreat in Burma; EP 106
  - Japanese effect landings on Borneo and Celebes; Java seen as next objective; EP 49
  - Japanese successes in Malaya and Burma greatest threat to United nations in Asia. D. W. Mitchell; S......... 682
  - Japanese troops land on Singapore island proper; EP........................ 177
  - Lack of air support and inadequate numbers handicap Chinese on Burma front; EP 501
  - Lack of competent military leadership serious handicap in far east. D. W. Mitchell; S....................... 682
  - Lack of war materials will handicap the allies for another twelve months; EP.. 3
  - Long road to victory. D. W. Mitchell; S 623
  - Lord Halifax defends England's share in war effort in reply to attacks of isolationists; EP...................... 271
  - Loss of Singapore may mean defeat of United Nations. D. W. Mitchell; S 278
  - Loss of Singapore to the Japanese is imminent; EP 49
  - Memorial day speech of S. Welles offers blueprint for world after war; EP........641; see also S.......... 673
  - Mexico's entry a valuable contribution to United Nations; EP.............. 614
  - New aerial reinforcements strengthen Singapore's defenses; EP........... 106
  - New leaders for old. F. Kirchwey; S..........210; see also C.......... 323
  - Our plan for victory. D. W. Mitchell; S 58
  - Pacific charter needed. A. B. Lewis; C.. 695
  - People's revolution, the. F. Kirchwey; S 561
  - Politics of attack; demand for a political offensive. N. Angell; S.............. 513
  - Pope's neutrality, the. G. A. Borgese; S..........621; see also C.......... 722
  - Possible Japanese attack on Russia feared; EP.....409; see also S..... 416

- Post-war reconstruction
  - Central European federation. M. Hodza; S......570; see also C......668; EP............641; S.............. 673
- President reports on Allied military plans; EP 241
- President Roosevelt and C. Hull issue warnings against over-optimism; EP.. 613
- President sums up conferences with Churchill and other allied representatives; allied war command appears probable; EP 3
- Pressure groups make war inevitable by resistance to change. C. Willson; C.. 472
- Raw materials for victory; Ch......... 212
- Resolution on plans for a lasting peace. J. R. Van de Water; C.............. 75
- Second front in west must be opened up in 1942 if ever. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.........480; see also E......... 505
- Senators Walsh and Johnson suggest possible recall of fleet to defend coasts; EP 241
- Shipping resources of United Nations are strained by demands of the battle of Pacific, import needs, and supplies for Russia and Britain; EP............ 177
- Ships for our offensive. D. W. Mitchell; S 419
- Sit down to it, lads. Low; Ct........ 161
- Soviet collaboration in the Atlantic charter should be sought. R. Bates; S..........60; see also C.......... 124
- State department negotiates with Admiral Robert on neutralization of Martinique; EP 558
- Stopping Japan immediate military task if war is to be won. D. Mitchell; S.. 186
- U-boat strategy, the. D. W. Mitchell; S 248
- United nations hold their own in Far Eastern war; EP.................. 149
- United nations strategy adopts revolutionary attitudes. F. Kirchwey; S.... 673
- Vichy cargo ships leave New York harbor without risk. F. Kirchwey; S..... 182
- Wallace, H. A. in speech declares people's revolution is on the march. F. Kirchwey; S 561
- Wavell, General Sir A., named commander-in-chief of united far eastern forces; E 24
- War at sea; 1941 record and 1942 prospects. D. W. Mitchell; S........... 28
- What's right with Britain. R. Bates; S.........388; see also C......... 499
- Will China be next?; E............... 616
- Will there be a post-war economic collapse? H. Strauss; S....9, 32; see also C............................ 104
- Will there be a third? J. Alvarez del Vayo; S........................... 704

Y

- Yugoslavia
  - Mikhailovich, General D., and his guerilla army continue to harry Germans and Italians; EP...................... 78

Z

- Zuckerman, William
  - Zionism a counsel of despair; reply to R. Niebuhr's articles on Jews after the war; C 351
- Zweig, Stefan, death. M. Marshall; S...... 314

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B	Book review
AN	Brief annotation
R	Reviewer

A

- Abend, Hallett
  - Ramparts of the Pacific; B............. 715
- Abend, Hallett; R.....................605, 687
- Adams, Grace; R.........................44, 403
- Admiral of the ocean sea: A life of Christopher Columbus. S. E. Morison; B.... 314
- Agent in Italy. S. K.; B...............716; see also S......................... 537
- Algren, Nelson
  - Never come morning; B............. 466
- Allison, Davis, B. B. Gardner, and M. R. Gardner
  - Deep south; AN...................... 405
- All-out on the road to Smolensk. E. Caldwell; B 315
- America and world mastery. J. MacCormac; B 230
- America in the new Pacific. G. E. Taylor; B 687
- America in world affairs. A. Nevins; B.... 230
- Americans 1942: 18 artists from 9 states. Edited by D. C. Miller; B.......... 259
- American taxation: Its history as a social force in democracy. S. Ratner; B..... 521
- America's own refugees. H. H. Collins, Jr.; B 440
- Amerigo: A comedy of errors in history. S. Zweig; B......................... 230
- Anderson, Nels
  - Desert saints; B..................... 658
- Anti-dictator. The "discours sur la servitude volontaire." E. de la Boétie. Rendered into English by Harry Kurz; B...... 376
- Anton Bruckner: Rustic genius. W. Wolff; B 375
- Anderson, Sherwoood
  - Memoirs; B.....................574; see also C......................... 611
- Archer pilgrim. D. Jackson; AN......... 664
- Arciniegas, Germán
  - Knight of El Dorado, the: The tale of Don Gonzalo Jiménez de Quesada and his conquest of New Granada, now called Colombia; B................. 740
- Armi, Anna Maria
  - Poems; B........................... 97
- Arnold, Elliott
  - Commandos, the; AN................ 664
- Arnold, Thurman
  - Democracy and free enterprise; B..... 660
- Artucio, Hugo Fernandez
  - Nazi underground in South America, the; B 463
- Ashes of gold. H. V. Botsford; AN........ 664
- Athene palace. R. G. Waldeck; B........... 343
- Atlantic system, the: The story of Anglo-American control of the seas. F. Davis; B 345
- Attorneys at law. J. R. Parker; B......... 425
- Awake! and other war time poems. W. R. Rodgers; B........................ 344
- Axis grand strategy, the: Blueprints for the total war. Compiled and edited for the Committee for national morale by L. Farago; B...................... 437

B

- Balkan correspondent. D. Patmore; B...... 198
- Barker, George; R....17, 170, 236, 347, 400; see also C.....................500, 695
- Barnes, Claude T.
  - Mending year, the; B................ 662
- Barrès, Philippe
  - Charles de Gaulle; B................ 17
- Barrett, James Wyman
  - Joseph Pulitzer and his World; B..... 291
- Barton, Clara, biography. B. C. Williams; B 44
- Barzun, Jacques; R.....120, 238, 404, 491; see also C......................... 582
- Basch, Antonin
  - New economic warfare, the; B......... 72
- Bates, Ralph
  - Undiscoverables and other stores, the; B 434
- Bates, Ralph; R........287, 375, 549, 631, 719
- Battle of South America, the. A. E. Carter; B 44
- Be angry at the sun and other poems. R. Jeffers; B......................... 289
- Beebe, William
  - Book of bays; AN.................... 377
- Beecher, John
  - Here I stand; B..................... 662
- Below the Potomac: A book about the new south. V. Dabney; B............... 633
- Bemelmans, Ludwig
  - Hotel Splendide; B.................. 425
- Benardete, M. J.; R...............70, 577, 741
- Bend in the river. J. Valtin; AN......... 497
- Benson, Sally
  - Junior miss; B...................... 425
- Bertrand Russell case, the. Edited by J. Dewey and H. M. Kallen; AN..... 664
- Billinger, Karl; R........................ 741
- Bindweed, B. de Sherbinin; AN........... 497
- Book of bays. W. Beebe; AN.............. 377
- Botsford, Helen Virginia
  - Ashes of gold; AN................... 664
- Bower, Anthony; R...................... 658
- Boyden, Polly
  - Pink egg, the; B................343; see also C......................408, 444
- Boyle, Kay; R.......................490, 604
- Braatoy, Bjarne; R...................... 234
- Bradbrook, M. C.
  - Joseph Conrad; Poland's English genius; AN 320
- Brant, Irving
  - James Madison: The Virginia revolutionist; AN........................ 579
- Breakfast with the Nikolides. R. Godden; AN 201
- Brooks, Howard L.
  - Prisoners of hope: Report on a mission; B 519
- Brown, Harry
  - Poem of Bunker Hill; B.............. 71
- Bruckner, Anton, biography. W. Wolff; B.. 375
- Buck, Pearl
  - Dragon seed; AN.................... 173
- Buck, Philo M., Jr.
  - Directions in contemporary literature; AN 579
- Burt, Alfred Leroy
  - Short history of Canada for Americans, a; B............................. 688
- Butler, Rohan D'O.
  - Roots of national socialism, the; B.... 398
- Byas, Hugh
  - Japanese enemy, the; B.............. 374
- Byron in Italy. P. Quennell; B........... 520
- Bywater, Hector C.
  - Great Pacific war, the; B............ 262

C

- Caldwell, Erskine
  - All-out on the road to Smolensk; B..... 315
- Cant, Gilbert
  - War at sea, the; B.................. 372
- Cant, Gilbert; R......................... 520
- Carlson, Oliver
  - Mirror for Californians, a; AN........ 45
- Carmer, Carl
  - Genesee fever; AN.................. 73
- Carnap, Rudolf
  - Introduction to semantics; B......... 718
- Carter, Albert E.
  - Battle of South America, the; B....... 44
- Charles de Gaulle. P. Barrès; B........... 17
- Chase, Gilbert
  - Music of Spain, the; AN............. 637
- Chase, Stuart
  - Road we are traveling, the, 1914-1942; B 492
- Cheney, Sheldon
  - Story of modern art, the; B........... 259
- Children, the. N. Fedorova; AN.......... 469
- Churchill, Winston, biography. P. Guedalla; B 122
- Clara Barton: Daughter of destiny. B. C. Williams; B........................ 44
- Clark Gifford's body. K. Fearing; AN..... 743
- Collier, John
  - Presenting moonshine; B............. 425
- Collins, Henry Hill, Jr.
  - America's own refugees; B............. 440
- Colossus of Maroussi, the. H. Miller; B.... 17
- Columbus, Christopher, biography. S. E. Morison; B......................... 314
- Commandos, the. E. Arnold; AN.......... 664
- Company she keeps, the. M. McCarthy; B.. 714
- Conflict; The American civil war. G. F. Milton; B............................ 18
- Conrad, Bryan, and H. J. Eckenrode
  - George B. McClellan; AN............. 441
- Conrad, Joseph, biography. M. C. Bradbrook; AN 320
- Constitutional government and democracy. C. J. Friedrich; B.................... 317
- Coole, W. W., and M. F. Potter
  - Thus speaks Germany; AN........... 173
- Copland, Aaron
  - Our new music; B...............202; see also M........................ 377
- Copper pot, the. O. La Farge; AN......... 720
- Corey, Lewis
  - Unfinished task, the: Economic reconstruction for democracy; B......... 690
- Cortes, Hernan, a biography. S. de Madariaga; B........................... 172
- Cot, Pierre; R....432, 574; see also C..... 640
- Courant, Richard and H. Robbins
  - What is mathematics: An elementary approach to its ideas and methods; AN.. 441
- Cowley, Malcolm
  - Dry season, the; B.................. 523
- Cross creek. M. K. Rawlings; B.......... 346
- Culbertson, Ely
  - Letter on R. Reyher's review of "Two-way passage" by L. Adamic; C...... 75
- Cunningham, Charles E.
  - Timothy Dwight: a biography; B....... 235
- Cuppy, Will
  - How to become extinct. Illustrated by W. Steig; B....................... 42

D

- Dabney, Virginius
  - Below the Potomac; A book about the new South; B..................... 633
- Dakar: Outpost of two hemispheres. E. Lengyel; AN......................... 73
- Dargan, Olive Tilford
  - From my highest hill; AN........... 637
- Davies, Joseph E.
  - Mission to Moscow; B................ 118
- Davis, Forrest
  - Atlantic System, the: The story of Anglo-American control of the seas; B...... 345
- Dawn of victory. L. Fischer; B........... 287
- Deadline. P. Lazareff; B................. 432
- Dearly beloved. H. Sylvester; AN........ 348
- Death at the purple rim. H. Plutzik; B.... 662
- Deep south. A. Davis, B. B. Gardner, and M. R. Gardner; AN................ 405
- Defense will not win the war. W. F. Kernan; B 549
- de Ford, Miriam Allen
  - They were San Franciscans; AN....... 45

de la Boétie, Etienne
  Anti-dictator. The "discours sur la servitude volontaire." Rendered into English by Harry Kurz; B............ 376
de Lizardi, José Joaquin Fernández
  Itching parrot, the. Translated from the Spanish and with an introduction by K. A. Porter; B................ 373
de Madariaga, Salvador
  Hernan Cortes; B.................. 172
Democracy and free enterprise. T. Arnold; B 660 Democracy or anarchy? A study of proportional representation. F. A. Hermens. Introduction by C. J. Friedrich; B. 100
de Saint Exupéry, Antoine Flight to Arras; B.................. 286
de Sales, Raoul de Roussy
  Making of tomorrow, the; B......464; see also S........................ 398 Desert saints. N. Anderson; B........... 658 de Seversky, Alexander P.
  Victory through air power; B.......... 603
de Sherbinin, Betty
  Bindweed; AN...................... 497
Design for power. F. L. Schuman. Maps by G. D. Brodsky; B..............42; see also C........................ 103
Destiny of western man, the. W. T. Stace; B 290
Deuel, Wallace R.
  People under Hitler; B.............. 196
Deutsch, Babette
  Rogue's legacy; AN.................. 320
Dickens world, the. H. House; B.......... 434
Directions in contemporary literature. P. M. Buck, Jr.; AN..................... 579
Don Pedro and the devil. E. Mass; AN..... 497
Dragon seed. P. Buck; AN.............. 173
Dragon's teeth. U. Sinclair; AN.......... 73
Dry season, the. M. Cowley; B........... 523
Duranty, Walter
  Kremlin and the people, the; B......... 98
Dwight, Timothy, a biography. C. E. Cunningham; B....................... 235

E

Early Chirico, the. J. T. Soby; B......... 259
Eckenrode, H. J. and Conrad, B.
  George B. McClellan; AN............ 441
Edge of the sword, the. V. Pozner; B..... 604
Edman, Irwin; R........................ 290
Einstein, Alfred
  Greatness in music; B................ 526
Escape from freedom. E. Fromm; B...317; see also C........................ 407
Etruscan sculpture; B................... 259
Europe and the German question. F. Foerster; B 398

F

Falling through space. R. Hillary; B...... 287
Farrell, James T.
  $1,000 a week, and other stories; B... 716
Fast, Howard
  Unvanquished, the; AN.............. 693
Fatigue of workers: Its relation to industrial production. Committee on work in industry of the national research council; AN 720
Faulkner, William
  Go down, Moses, and other stories; B.. 632
Fearing, Kenneth
  Clark Gifford's body; AN............ 743
Fedorova, Nina
  Children, the; AN................... 469
Fergusson, Erna
  Our Hawaii; AN.................... 525
Filler, Louis; R......................... 291
Fire in summer. R. Ramsey; B............ 261
Fischer, Louis
  Dawn of victory; B.................. 287
Fischer, Markoosha; R.................. 315
Fitts, Dudley
  More poems from the Palatine Anthology in English paraphrase; B............ 523
Five young American poets; B........... 607
Fleisher, Wilfrid
  Our enemy Japan; B................. 548
Flight to Arras. A. de Saint Exupéry; B.... 286
Foerster, Friedrich
  Europe and the German question; B... 398
Forgotson, E. S.; R...................... 716
Foster, O'Kane
  In the night did I sing; AN.......... 405
Four years in paradise. O. Johnson; AN..... 45
France of tomorrow, the. A. Guérard; B 574; see also C.......................... 640
Frank, Waldo
  Virgin Spain; The drama of a great people; B......................... 577
Frazier, E. Franklin; R..............195; see also C.......................... 640
Friedrich, Carl J.
  Constitutional government and democracy; B 317
Friends of the people, the. A. Neumann; AN 720
Fromm, Erich
  Escape from freedom; B.........317; see also C......................... 407
From my highest hill. O. T. Dargan; AN.. 637
From the land of silent people. R. St. John; B 169

G

Gardner, Burleigh B., A. Davis, and M. R. Gardner
  Deep south; AN 405
Gardner, Mary R., A. Davis, and B. B. Gardner
  Deep south; AN 405
Garnet, M. N.
  October bread; B.................... 662
Gates of Aulis, the. G. Schmitt; B........ 547
Gaulle, Charles de, biography, P. Barrès; B 17
Gelber, Lionel
  Peace by power; B.................... 495
Genesee fever. C. Carmer; AN............ 73
George B. McClellan. H. J. Eckenrode and B. Conrad; AN..................... 441
Germans, the: Double history of a nation. E. Ludwig; B....................... 398
Gessler, Clifford
  Pattern of Mexico; AN.............. 497
Gluck, Elsie; R.......................... 742
Godden, Rumer
  Breakfast with the Nikolides; AN..... 201
Go down, Moses, and other stories. W. Faulkner; B........................ 632
Gold, William Jay; R.................... 633
Goldman, George S.
  Letter on K. Menninger's review of "Escape from freedom" by E. Fromm; C 407
Goodbye Japan. J. Newman; B........... 548
Goodman, Ezra
  Twenty-five poems; B................ 662
Goodman, Paul
  Grand piano, the; AN................ 720
Grand piano, the. P. Goodman; AN......... 720
Grattan, C. Hartley
  Introducing Australia; B............. 69
Gray, James T.; R...................376, 688
Greatness in music. A. Einstein; B....... 526
Great Pacific war, the. H. C. Bywater; B... 262
Greek political experience, the: Studies in honor of William Kelly Prentice; An 579
Greenberg, Clement; R..................71, 289
Guedalla, Phillip
  Mr. Churchill; B.................... 122
Guérard, Albert
  France of tomorrow, the; B........574; see also C......................... 640
Guérard, Albert; R....................... 464
Guérard, Albert, Jr.
  Robert Bridges: A study of traditionalism in poetry; B...............400; see also C.....................500, 695
Guide to recorded music, a. I. Kolodin; B... 120

H

H. M. Pulham, Esquire. J. P. Marquand. Parody on. G. Highet; S............ 167
Hagen, Paul
  Will Germany crack? A factual report on Germany from within; B.......... 740
Haggin, B. H.; R...202, 526, 609, 638, 721, 743
Hahn, Emily
  Mr. Pan; AN......................... 743
Haitian people, the. J. G. Leyburn; B...... 719
Hamilton, Charles Granville
  Mississippi, I love you; B............ 662
Hamilton, Patrick
  Hangover square; AN................ 320
Hanc, Josef
  Tornado across eastern Europe; B..... 661
Hangover Square. P. Hamilton: AN...... 320
Harbage, Alfred
  Shakespeare's audience; B............ 233
Hauser, Heinrich
  Time was: Death of a Junker; B...... 236
Hayakawa, S. I.
  Language in action: A guide to accurate thinking; B......................... 16
Hayden, Joseph Ralston
  Philippines, the: A study in national development; B....................... 197
Hellen naechte, die: Gedichte aus Frankreich. H. Sahl; AN...................... 497
Henrietta Szold: Life and letters. M. Lowenthal; B.......................... 742
Here I stand. J. Beecher; B.............. 662
Hermens, F. A.
  Democracy or anarchy? A study of proportional representation. Introduction by C. J. Friedrich; B................ 100
Hernan Cortés. S. de Madariaga; B......... 172
Herrick, Robert
  Some poems of Robert Herrick; B..... 523
Herskovits, Melville J.
  Myth of the Negro past, the; B....195; see also C.......................... 640
Hicks, Granville
  Only one storm; B.................... 404
Higgins, Stanley Polk
  Liebestraum and other poems; B...... 662
Highet, Gilbert
  Parody on "H. M. Pulham, Esquire" by Marquand; S....................... 167
Hillary, Richard
  Falling through space; B............. 286
Hindus, Maurice
  Hitler cannot conquer Russia; B....... 98
  Russia and Japan; B................ 605
Hitler cannot conquer Russia. M. Hindus; B 98
Hitler's counterfeit reich. K. Robert; B.... 72
Hofstadter, Albert; R.................... 718
Hook, Sidney; R......................16, 401
Horace Walpole's correspondence with George Montagu. Edited by W. S. Lewis and R. S. Brown. Two volumes; B...... 96
Hotel Splendide. L. Bemelmans; B......... 425
House, Humphry
  Dickens world, the; B................ 434
Houses of old Richmond. M. W. Scott; B.. 403
Housman, 1897-1936. G. Richards. With an introduction by Mrs. E. W. Symons and appendices by G. B. A. Fletcher and others; B...................... 550
How Japan plans to win. K. Matsuo; B... 548
How to become extinct. W. Cuppy. Illustrated by W. Steig; B.................. 42
How to read a page. I. A. Richards; B..491; see also C......................... 582
Huie, William Bradford
  Mud on the stars; AN............... 693
Humphries, Rolfe
  Out of the jewel; B.................. 438
Humphries, Rolfe; R....97, 523, 550, 607, 662
Hurricane caye. M. Shedd; AN........... 664
Hutchison, Betsy; R..................... 236
Hutchison, Bruce
  Unknown country, the; Canada and her people; B......................... 376
Hutchison, Keith; R...................... 169

I

I had a country. P. Morand; B........... 662
I remember Christine. O. Lewis; AN...... 525
Ill fares the land. C. McWilliams; B...... 440
In the night did I sing. O'K. Foster; AN.. 405
Intimate Virginiana: A century of Maury travels by land and sea. Edited by A. F. Maury; AN...................... 579
Introducing Australia. C. H. Grattan; B... 69
Introduction to semantics. R. Carnap; B..... 718
Isherwood, Christopher; R................ 714
Itching parrot. J. J. F. de Lizardi. Translated from the Spanish and with an introduction by K. A. Porter; B......... 373

J

Jackson, Don
  Archer pilgrim; AN.................. 664
James Joyce: A critical introduction. H. Levin; B.......................... 236
James Madison: The Virginia revolutionist. I. Brant; AN...................... 579
Janis, Sidney
  They taught themselves: American primitive painters of the 20th century. Foreword by A. H. Barr, Jr.; B........ 259
Japan: A world problem. H. J. Timperley; B 548
Japanese enemy, the. H. Byas; B......... 374
Japan's dream of empire: The Tanaka memorial. Edited with an introduction by Carl Crow; B.................. 288
Japan's industrial strength. K. L. Mitchell; B 374
Jazz record book, the. C. E. Smith, F. Ramsey, Jr., W. Russell, and C. P. Rogers; B 609
Jeffers, Robinson
  Be angry at the sun and other poems; B 289
Jefferson. S. K. Padover; B............... 692
Jews in a gentile world. Edited by I. Graeber and S. H. Britt; B................ 659
Joesten, Joachim; R...................... 98
Johnson, Osa
  Four years in paradise; AN.......... 45
Joseph Conrad: Poland's English genius. M. C. Bradbrook; AN................ 320
Joseph Pulitzer and his World. J. W. Barrett; B............................ 291
Joyce, James, biography. H. Levin; B..... 236
Junior miss. S. Benson: B................ 425

K

Kagan, George
  Comments on R. Niebuhr's review of "Strategy for democracy" by J. D. Kingsley and D. N. Petegorsky; C..... 528
Kaverin, Benjamin
  Two captains; AN................... 441
Kernan, W. F.
  Defense will not win the war; B..... 549
Kingdon, Frank; R....................... 519
Kings and desperate men: Life in eighteenth-century England. L. Kronenberger; B 427
Kingsley, J. Donald, and D. N. Petegorsky
  Strategy for democracy; B........428; see also C......................... 528
Kiralfy, Alexander
  Victory in the Pacific: How we must defeat Japan; B.................... 520
Kiralfy, Alexander; R.................... 345

- Knight of El Dorado, the: The tale of Don Gonzalo Jimenez de Quesada and his conquest of New Granada, now called Colombia. G. A. Arciniegas; B...... 740
- Kober, Arthur
  - My dear Bella; B.................... 425
- Kohn, Hans; R.......................... 493
- Kolodin, Irving
  - Guide to recorded music, a; B......... 120
- Kremlin and the people, the. W. Duranty; B 98
- Kronenberger, Louis
  - Kings and desperate men: Life in eighteenth-century England; B....... 427
- Kronenberger, Louis; R..............434, 575
- Krutch, Joseph Wood; R........42, 96, 233, 427

L

- La Farge, Oliver
  - Cooper pot, the; AN.................. 720
- Language in action: A guide to accurate thinking. S. I. Hayakawa; B........ 16
- Last time I saw Paris, the. E. Paul; B... 490
- Latin America. W. L. Schurz; AN....... 201
- Lazareff, Pierre
  - Deadline; B.......................... 432
- Lazarus, H. P.; R....................97, 548
- Lea, Homer
  - Valor of ignorance, the; B............ 374
- Leaf in the storm, a. Lin Yutang; B...... 97
- Lee, Dwight E.
  - Ten years: The world on the way to war; B.......................... 493
- Lehrman, Hal; R........................ 17
- Lengyel, Emil
  - Dakar: Outpost of two hemispheres; AN 73
- Lerner, Max
  - Comments on J. Chamberlain's review of his book, "Ideas for the ice age"; C 48
- Levin, Harry
  - James Joyce: A critical introduction; B 236
- Lewis, Oscar
  - I remember Christine; AN........... 525
- Leyburn, James G.
  - Haitian people, the; B............... 719
- Liebestraum and other poems. S. P. Higgins; B.......................... 662
- Lin Yutang
  - Leaf in the storm, a; B.............. 97
- Little lower than the angels, a. V. Sorensen; B.......................... 576
- Loewenstein, Karl; R.................... 44
- Lord, Russell; R....................... 440
- Lowenthal, Marvin
  - Henrietta Szold; Life and letters; B... 742
- Ludwig, Emil
  - Germans, the: Double history of a nation; B.......................... 398
- Lynd, Robert S; R...................... 170

M

- Maas, Edgar
  - Don Pedro and the devil; AN........ 497
- Macartney. C. A.
  - Problems of the Danube basin; B...... 661
- MacCormac, John
  - America and world mastery; B...... 230
- Madison, James, biography. I. Brant; AN.. 579
- Making of tomorrow, the. R. de R. de Sales; B..........464; see also S.......... 398
- Maritime history of New York, a. Compiled by workers of the Writers' project of the WPA for the city of New York; AN 405
- Marquand, John P.
  - Parody on his "H. M. Pulham, Esquire." G. Highet; S....................... 167
- Marshall, Margaret; R...118, 168, 286, 574, 658; see also C.................... 611
- Matsuo, Kinoaki
  - How Japan plans to win; B........... 548
- McCarthy, Mary
  - Company she keeps, the; B........... 714
- McClellan, George B., biography; AN...... 441
- McFee, William; R...................... 314
- McGuire, Paul
  - Westward the course; The new world of Oceania; AN...................... 441
- McInnis, Edgar
  - War, second year, the; AN............ 45
- McWilliams, Carey
  - Ill fares the land; B.................. 440
- McWilliams, Carey; R.................. 634
- Mediterranean front, a. Moorehead; B.... 578
- Memoirs of Sherwood Anderson; B........ 574
- Mending year, the. C. T. Barnes; B........ 662
- Menéndez, Miguel Angel
  - Nayar. Translated by A. Flores; B..... 70
- Menninger, Karl
  - Letter on G. Adams' review of "A history of medical psychology" by G. Zilboorg; C........................ 75
- Menninger, Karl; R...................317; see also C........................ 407
- Merriam, Charles E.
  - On the agenda of democracy; B........ 347
- Metapolitiks. P. Viereck; B............... 398
- Milano, Paolo; R....................318, 376
- Miller, Henry
  - Colossus of Maroussi, the; B.......... 17
- Milton, George Fort
  - Conflict: The American civil war; B... 18
- Mind of the maker, the. D. Sayers; B..... 238
- Mind's geography, the. G. Zabriskie; B..... 71
- Mirror for Californians, a. O. Carlson; AN.. 45
- Mission to Moscow. J. E. Davies; B........ 118
- Mississippi, I love you. C. G. Hamilton; B.. 662
- Mitchell, Donald W; R...262, 372, 494, 552, 603
- Mitchell, Kate L.
  - Japan's industrial strength; B......... 374
- Modern battle. P. W. Thompson; AN...... 348
- Moon is down, the. J. Steinbeck; B........ 286
- Moorehead, Alan
  - Mediterranean front; B................ 578
- Morand, Phelps
  - I had a country; B................... 662
- More poems from the Palatine anthology in English paraphrase. D. Fitts; B...... 523
- Morison, Samuel Eliot
  - Admiral of the ocean sea: A Life of Christopher Columbus; B............ 314
- Morison, Samuel Eliot; R................ 230
- Morris, Wright
  - My uncle Dudley; AN................ 405
- Moscow war diary. A. Werth; B.......... 631
- Mr. Churchill. P. Guedalla; B............ 122
- Mr. Pan. E. Hahn; AN.................. 743
- Mud on the stars. W. B. Huie; AN........ 693
- Munich playground. E. R. Pope; B........ 172
- Munz, Charles Curtis; R........18, 40, 172, 200
- Music of Spain, the. G. Chase; AN........ 637
- My musical life. N. A. Rimsky-Korsakov; B.........721; see also B........... 743
- Myrdal, Alva
  - Nation and family. The Swedish experiment in democratic family and population policy; B.......................... 170
- Myth of the Negro past, the. M. J. Herskovits; B......195; see also C...... 640
- My dear Bella. A. Kober; B............... 425
- My uncle Dudley. W. Morris; AN.......... 405

N

- Nabokov, Vladimir
  - Real life of Sebastian Knight, the; B.. 168
- Napoleon's invasion of Russia, 1812. E. Tarlé; B.......................... 467
- Nation and family: The Swedish experiment in democratic family and population policy. A. Myrdal; B............... 170
- Nayar. M. A. Menéndez. Translated by A. Flores; B.......................... 70
- Nazi underground in South America, the H. F. Artucio; B..................... 463
- Negro caravan, the: Writings by American Negroes; B.......................... 548
- Neumann, Alfred
  - Friends of the people, the; AN........ 720
- Never come morning. N. Algren; B........ 466
- Nevins, Allan
  - America in world affairs; B........... 230
- New day, the. J. Romains; B.............. 464
- New directions in prose and poetry, 1941. Edited by J. Laughlin; B........... 347
- New economic warfare, the. A. Basch; B.... 72
- New England earth. D. Stanford; B....... 607
- Newman, James R.
  - Tools of war, the; B................. 552
- Newman, Joseph
  - Goodbye Japan; B.................... 548
- Newman, Joseph; R..................... 715
- New poems: 1942. An anthology of British and American verse. Edited by O. Williams; B.......................... 688
- New poets; B............................ 607
- Niebuhr, Reinhold; R......42, 122, 230, 317, 347, 398, 428, 464, 495, 659, see also C..........................103, 528
- Norden, Ruth; R......................... 196
- Northbridge rectory. A. Thirkell; AN...... 201
- Noyes, Charles E.; R.................... 521
- Nuhn, Ferner
  - Wind blew from the east, the: A study in the orientation of American culture; B.......................... 689

O

- O'Brien, Justin; R....................... 495
- October bread. M. N. Garnet; B........... 662
- On the agenda of democracy. C. E. Merriam; B 347
- One thousand dollars a week, and other stories. J. T. Farrell; B............. 716
- Only one storm. G. Hicks; B.............. 404
- Orrick, James; R........................ 692
- Our enemy Japan. W. Fleisher; B......... 548
- Our Hawaii. E. Fergusson; AN........... 525
- Our landed heritage: The public domain 1776-1936. R. M. Robbins; B............ 634
- Our new music. A. Copland; B.........202; see also M........................ 377
- Out of the jewel. R. Humphries; B......... 438
- Ozark country. O. E. Rayburn; B.......... 200

P

- Padelford, Norman J.
  - Panama canal in war and peace, the; AN 320
- Padover, Saul K.
  - Jefferson; B........................ 692
- Panama canal in war and peace, the. N. J. Padelford; AN...................... 320
- Parker, James Reid
  - Attorneys at law; B.................. 425
- Patmore, Derek
  - Balkan correspondent; B.............. 198
- Pattern of Mexico. C. Gessler; AN........ 497
- Paul, Elliot
  - Last time I saw Paris, the; B.......... 490
- Peace by power. L. Gelber; B.............. 495
- Pentad
  - Remaking of Italy, the; B........... 318
- People under Hitler. W. R. Deuel; B...... 196
- Petegorsky, David N. and J. D. Kingsley
  - Strategy for democracy; B.........428; see also C......................... 528
- Philippines, the: A study in national development. J. R. Hayden; B............. 197
- Philosophy of Alfred North Whitehead, the. Volume III of the Library of living philosophers. Edited by P. A. Schilpp; B 401
- Pink egg, the. P. Boyden; B..........343; see also C......................408, 444
- Plutzik, Hyam
  - Death at the purple rim; B........... 662
- Poem of Bunker hill. H. Brown; B........ 71
- Poems. A. M. Armi; B.................... 97
- Poems. F. T. Prince; B.................. 523
- Poems from the book of hours. R. M. Rilke; B 523
- Pope, Ernest R.
  - Munich playground; B................ 172
- Porter, Catherine; R.................... 197
- Porter, Katherine Anne; R...........343; see also C......................408, 444
- Possony, Stefan T.; R.................. 437
- Potter, M. F., and W. W. Coole
  - Thus speaks Germany; AN........... 173
- Pozner, Vladimir
  - Edge of the sword, the; B............ 604
- Presenting moonshine. J. Collier; B........ 425
- Prince, F. T.
  - Poems; B........................... 523
- Prisoners of hope: Report on a mission. H. L. Brooks; B..................... 519
- Private reader, the: Selected articles and reviews. M. Van Doren; B........... 575
- Problems of the Danube basin. C. A. Macartney; B............................ 661
- Public papers and addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the. Compiled and collated by S. I. Rosenman. Volumes for 1937, 1938, 1939, and 1940; B............. 40
- Pulitzer, Joseph, biography. J. W. Barrett; B 291
- Put out more flags. E. Waugh; B........ 658

Q

- Quaderni Italiani; B..................... 318
- Quennell, Peter
  - Byron in Italy; B.................... 520

R

- Radio research 1941. Edited by P. F. Lazarsfeld and F. Stanton; B............. 638
- Rahv, Philip; R....................466, 689
- Ramparts of the Pacific. H. Abend; B...... 715
- Ramsey, Frederic, Jr., and C. E. Smith, W. Russell, and C. P. Rogers
  - Jazz record book, the; B............. 609
- Ramsey, Robert
  - Fire in summer; B.................... 261
- Randau, Carl, and L. Zugsmith
  - Setting sun of Japan; the; B......... 374
- Ratcliffe, S. K.; R...................... 69
- Ratner, Sidney
  - American taxation: Its history as a social force in democracy; B.............. 521
- Rawlings, Marjorie Kinnan
  - Cross creek; B....................... 346
- Rayburn, Otto Ernest
  - Ozark country; B.................... 200
- Real life of Sebastian Knight, the. V. Nabokov; B........................ 168
- Remaking of Italy, the. Pentad; B......... 318
- Republic of Plato, the: A new version founded on basic English. I. A. Richards; B........491; see also C.......... 582
- Return to the future. S. Undset; B........ 234
- Reveille, Thomas; R..................... 72
- Reves, Emery
  - Comments on F. Hoellering's review of "I paid Hitler" by F. Thyssen; C.... 48
- Richards, Grant
  - Housman, 1897-1936. With an introduction by Mrs. E. W. Symons and appendices by G. B. A. Fletcher and others; B.......................... 550
- Richards, I. A.
  - How to read a page; B........491; see also C.......................... 582
  - Republic of Plato, the: A new version founded on basic English; B......491; see also C......................... 582
- Riess, Curt
  - Underground Europe; B............... 519

Rilke, Rainer Maria
Poems from the book of hours; B..... 523
Rimsky-Korsakov, Nikolay Andreyevich
My musical life; B........721; see also B 743
Rippy, J. Fred
South American and hemisphere defense; B 44
Road we are traveling, the, 1914-1942. S. Chase; B........................ 492
Robbins, Herbert and R. Courant
What is mathematics: An elementary approach to its ideas and methods; AN 441
Robbins, Roy M.
Our landed heritage: The public domain 1776-1936; B........................ 634
Robert Bridges: A study of traditionalism in poetry. A. Guérard, Jr.; B......400; see also C........................500, 695
Robert, Karl
Hitler's counterfeit reich; B.......... 72
Rodgers, W. R.
Awake! and other war time poems; B... 344
Rogers, Charles Payne, and C. E. Smith, F. Ramsey, Jr., and W. Russell
Jazz record book, the; B.............. 609
Rogue's legacy. B. Deutsch; AN.......... 320
Romains, Jules
New day, the; B........................ 464
Salsette discovers America; B......... 495
Roosevelt, Franklin D., public papers and addresses
Compiled and collated by S. I. Rosenman. Volumes for 1937, 1938, 1939, and 1940; B........................ 40
Roots of national socialism, the. R. D'O. Butler; B........................ 398
Russell, William, and C. E. Smith, F. Ramsey, Jr., and C. P. Rogers
Jazz record book, the; B.............. 609
Russia and Japan. M. Hindus; B.......... 605
Russia's economic front for war and peace: An appraisal of the three five-year plans. A. Yugow; B........................ 715

S

S. K.
Agent in Italy; B........716; see also S 537
Sahl, Hans
Hellen naechte, die: Gedichte aus Frankreich; AN........................ 497
St. John, Robert
From the land of silent people; B...... 169
Salomon, Louis B.; R.............346, 404, 576
Salsette discovers America. J. Romains; B.. 495
Salvemini, Gaetano; R...........100, 716; see also S........................ 537
Sayers, Dorothy L.
Mind of the maker, the; B............ 238
Schmitt, Gladys
Gates of Aulis, the; B................ 547
Schubert, Paul
Sea power in conflict; B............. 494
Schuman, Frederick L.
Design for power. Maps by G. D. Brodsky; B........42; see also C........ 103
Schurz, William Lytle
Latin America; AN.................... 201
Scott, Mary Wingfield
Houses of old Richmond; B............ 403
Scott, Winfield Townley
Wind the clock; B.................... 607
Sea power in conflict. P. Schubert; B...... 494
Season, the. D. Walden; AN.............. 664
Setting sun of Japan, the. C. Randau and L. Zugsmith; B........................ 374
Seven tempest. V. Wilkins; AN.......... 201
Shakespeare's audience. A. Harbage; B.... 233
Shakespeare without tears. M. Webster; AN 348
Shaw, Archer H.
Plain dealer, the: 1842-1942; AN.... 469
Shedd, Margaret
Hurricane caye; AN.................. 664
Shepard, Odell; R........................ 235
Shirer, William L; R.................... 463
Short grass country. S. Vestal; B......... 200
Short history of Canada for Americans, A. A. L. Burt; B........................ 688
Short stories from the New Yorker; B..... 425
Sinclair, Upton
Dragon's teeth; AN.................. 73
Sixth column, the; Inside the nazi-occupied countries; B........................ 519
Slater, Eleanor
Why hold the hound; B.............. 662
Smith, Charles Edward, and F. Ramsey, Jr., W. Russell, and C. P. Rogers
Jazz record book, the; B.............. 609
Smith, Richard Austin
Sun dial, the; AN.................... 664
Soby, James Thrall
Early Chirico, the; B................. 259
Some historians of modern Europe. Edited by B. E. Schmitt; B................. 404
Some poems of Robert Herrick; B.......... 523
Song of Bernadette, the. F. Werfel; B..... 635
Sorensen, Virginia
Little lower than the angels, a; B...... 576
Soule, George
Strength of nations, the: A social survey; B 690
South America and hemisphere defense. J. F. Rippy; B........................ 44
Southworth, James Granville
Vauxhall gardens. A chapter in the socal history of England; AN........ 525
Spender, Stephen; R...................... 344
Spingarn, Jerome H.; R.................. 237
Stace, W. T.
Destiny of western man, the; B........ 290
Stanford, Don
New England earth; B................ 607
Steinbeck, John
Moon is down, the; B................ 286
Stevens, Peter; R........................ 578
Stevie. B. Thielen; B.................... 425
Stewart, Maxwell S.; R....199, 288, 374, 548, 715
Stolper, Gustav
This age of fable; B................. 68
Story of modern art, the. S. Cheney; B.... 259
Strategy for democracy. J. D. Kingsley and D. N. Petegorsky; B......428; see also C........................ 528
Strauss, Harold; R.....................492, 690
Strength of nations, the: A social survey. G. Soule; B........................ 690
Structure of the nazi economy, the. M. Y. Sweezy; B........................ 72
Success in court. F. Wellman; B.......... 237
Sun dial, the. R. A. Smth; AN............ 664
Sweezy, Maxine Y.
Structure of the nazi economy, the; B.. 72
Swing, Raymond Gram; R................ 68
Sylvester, Harry
Dearly beloved; AN.................. 348
Szold, Henrietta; biography, M. Lowenthal; B 742

T

Tabouis, Geneviève
They called me Cassandra; B........... 432
Taper, Bernard; R........................ 660
Tarlé, Eugene
Napoleon's invasion of Russia, 1812; B.. 467
Tate, Allen; R........................... 688
Taylor, George E.
America in the new Pacific; B......... 687
Ten years: The world on the way to war, 1930-1940. D. E. Lee; B............ 493
Thailand: The new Siam. V. Thompson; B 199
They called me Cassandra. G. Tabouis; B.. 432
They taught themselves: American primitive painters of the 20th century. S. Janis. Foreword by A. H. Barr, Jr.; B.... 259
They were San Franciscans, M. A. de Ford; AN 45
Thielen, Benedict
Stevie; B........................ 425
Thirkell, Angela
Northbridge rectory; AN.............. 201
This age of fable. G. Stolper; B......... 68
Thomas, Elbert D.
Thomas Jefferson: World citizen; B.... 692
Thomas Jefferson: World citizen. E. D. Thomas; B........................ 692
Thompson, Paul W.
Modern battle; AN.................. 348
Thompson, Virginia
Thailand: The new Siam; B........... 199
Thus speaks Germany; W. W. Coole and M. F. Potter; AN.................. 173
Time was: Death of a junker. H. Hauser; B 236
Timothy Dwight: A biography. C. E. Cunningham; B 235
Timperley, H. J.
Japan, A world problem; B........... 548
Tools of war, the; J. R. Newman; B...... 552
Tornado across eastern Europe. J. Hanc; B 661
Treat, Ida; R........................... 172
Trilling, Diana; R....................... 742
Trilling, Lionel; R......373, 425, 520, 547, 632
Twenty-five poems. E. Goodman; B....... 662
Two captains. B. Kaverin; AN............ 441

U

Underground Europe. C. Riess; B.......... 519
Undiscoverables and other stories, the. R. Bates; B........................ 434
Undset, Sigrid
Return to the future; B.............. 234
Unfinished task, the: Economic reconstruction for democracy. L. Corey; B......... 690
Unknown country, the: Canada and her people. B. Hutchison; B............... 376
Unvanquished, the. H. Fast; AN.......... 693

V

Valor of ignorance, the. H. Lea; B........ 374
Valtin, Jan
Bend in the river; AN................ 497
Vambery, Rustem; R.........198, 343, 467, 661
Van Doren, Mark
Private reader, the; Selected articles and reviews; B........................ 575
Vauxhall gardens. A chapter in the social history of England. J. G. Southworth; AN 525
Verdi: The man in his letters. Edited with a preface by F. Werfel; B.......... 606
Vertical. Edited by E. Jolas; B........170; see also C........................ 324
Vestal, Stanley
Short grass country; B.............. 200
Victory in the Pacific: How we must defeat Japan. A. Kiralfy; B.............. 520 Victory through air power. A. P. de Seversky; B 603
Viereck, Peter
Metapolitiks; B. 398
Virgin Spain: The drama of a great people. W. Frank; B. 577
Voice of fighting Russia, the. Edited by L. Zackaroff. Preface by H. Johnson, dean of Canterbury; B.............. 315

W

Waldeck, R. G.
Athene palace; B..................... 343
Walden, David
Season, the; AN..................... 664
War at sea, the. G. Cant; B............ 372
Warren, Robert Penn; R......... 261, 438, 635
War, second year, the. E. McInnis; AN.... 45
Waugh, Evelyn
Put out more flags; B................ 658
Webster, Margaret
Shakespeare without tears; AN........ 348
Wellman, Francis L.
Success in court; B.................. 237
Wells, H. G.
You can't be too careful; B............ 742
Werfel, Franz
Song of Bernadette, the; B............ 635
Werth, Alexander
Moscow war diary; B................ 631
Westward the course! The new world of Oceania. P. McGuire; AN.......... 441
What is mathematics? An elementary approach to its ideas and methods. R. Courant and H. Robbins; AN................ 441
When peoples meet: A study in race and culture contacts. Edited by A. Locke and B. J. Stern; AN................ 441
Why hold the hound. E. Slater; B........ 662
Wilkins, Vaughan
Seven tempest; AN.................. 201
Will Germany crack? A factual report on Germany from within. P. Hagen; B.. 740
Williams, Blanche Colton
Clara Barton: Daughter of destiny; B.. 44
Wind blew from the east, the: A study in the orientation of American culture. F. Nuhn; B........................ 689
Wind the clock. W. T. Scott; B.......... 607
Wolff, Werner
Anton Bruckner: Rustic genius; B...... 375

Y

You can't be too careful. H. G. Wells; B... 742
Yugow, A.
Russia's economic front for war and peace: An appraisal of the three five-year plans; B........................ 715

Z

Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R.............259, 434
Zabriskie, George
Mind's geography, the; B............. 71
Zugsmith, Leane, and C. Randau
Setting sun of Japan, the; B.......... 374
Zweig, Stefan
Amerigo: A comedy of errors in history; B 230

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Calif.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 154 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 3, 1942 NUMBER 1

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS

Mr. Hull Should Resign by Freda Kirchwey 1
The Shape of Things 3
Reverses in the Pacific 4
The No-Strike Agreement 5

ARTICLES

Aid and Comfort to the Enemy by I. F. Stone 6
Hitler's Plight in Russia by Donald W. Mitchell 7
Don't Plan for Collapse by Harold Strauss 9
How Australia Built for War by Hallett Abend 12
In the Wind 14
A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels 15

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Salvation by Semantics by Sidney Hook 16
General de Gaulle by Hal Lehrman 17
Henry Miller, Revivalist by George Barker 17
War Leaders of the Confederacy by Charles Curtis Munz 18
Films by Anthony Bower 19
Music by B. H. Haggin 20

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor RICHARD H. ROVERE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 8, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

Mr. Hull Should Resign

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

DID the President know in advance about the State Department's shocking attack on the Free French forces which liberated the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon from Vichy's dictatorship? If he did, the United States today stands disgraced before freedom-loving men and women everywhere. Already the incredulous surprise with which the news was received in Free French territories, in Latin America, in democratic circles here at home, is beginning to change into anger and bitter cynicism. If the President knew, then the very principle of freedom has been betrayed by its most respected and powerful defender.

But certainly the President did not know. His long toleration of State Department tactics is not to be excused, but at worst it has never gone to the length of permitting an open insult, coupled with a direct threat, to an Allied force engaged in advancing the Allied cause. Of such blundering stupidity the President is incapable. The evidence cited by Mr. Stone indicates that the State Department acted on its own, pursuing with imbecile consistency its fixed policy of yielding to Vichy, snubbing the Free French, and ignoring the contrary advice of Britain. Having guaranteed Martinique to Hitler's French "utensils" it was doubtless as clear as daylight to the State Department's mind that St. Pierre and Miquelon must be restored to Vichy rule—by force if necessary. Perhaps these two strategic islands were sold out in the same deal; the Axis radio is telling the islanders they were. If so, it is all too easy to believe that the State Department issued its pronouncement without consulting anyone—just as part of the day's appeasement. The technique is an old one and has been successful before.

The President could not have known in advance. And so the situation can still be saved by quick, uncompromising action. He can still prove that our brave talk about democracy is not all hokum designed to trap the unwary and mislead the innocent. But he must move fast or it will be too late.

If the State Department, without consultation with the President or the Cabinet, has plunged the nation into its present humiliating position, its officials should be called to account as promptly as were the military leaders at Pearl Harbor. Without the least delay the President should demand the resignation of the officials who on their own say-so betrayed the cause to which this country has been pledged not only by the terms of the Atlantic Charter but in many pronouncements by the President.

After these officials, including the Secretary of State, have duly resigned, the President should institute an investigation to fix responsibility for this unsanctioned act. The inquiry should be broad enough to explore the whole twilight cult of appeasement, of which the repudiation of the Free French at St. Pierre and Miquelon is only the most startling and recent symbol. Throughout the years, in one instance after the other, this policy has proved both its danger and its futility. Why should men who have demonstrated their failure with such undeviating success be permitted to direct the policy of a great power committed to a life-and-death struggle?

Specifically the President should inquire into the immediate antecedents of our moral disaster at St. Pierre and Miquelon. He should find out, first, whether the State Department had in fact promised to hold for Vichy the French possessions in this hemisphere. If such a shameless commitment was made, he should find out quickly what it implied in terms of action. As these words are written hasty consultations are going on behind the closed doors of the State Department where officials are trying to save their guilty faces while at the same time fulfilling their pledges to their dictator-friends at Vichy. Vice Admiral Muselier with the whole population of the islands behind him still stands firm at St. Pierre and Miquelon. And the Canadian government, which clearly was neither surprised nor horrified when the islands came over to the Allied side, is showing no eagerness to do the State Department's dirty work. A compromise may be in the making which will high-light the contradictions of American policy by ousting the Free French and then establishing some sort of Allied control of the St. Pierre radio station to prevent the Vichy officials we shall have restored to power from using the station to give information to Nazi submarines and raiders preying on Allied shipping.

But no compromise will either save the honor of the United States or absolve the President from the necessity of finding out just what Mr. Hull promised Admiral Robert. Did he promise the aid of the American fleet in holding the French islands for Vichy? Or did he, rashly it would seem, offer the services of the Canadian forces? Or did he perhaps tell the General that in case of trouble with unruly pro-Ally subjects he could take the interned French ships out of the harbor at Martinique? These are questions which events may answer. But events have a way of blotting out past promises and before that happens the President should discover just what commitments Vichy's agents in the State Department made in the name of the United States.

The President can hardly accept the State Department myth that the French fleet is preserved from Hitler's control only by the blackmail paid to Vichy by the United States. The only important check on the Pétain collaborationists—and on Hitler himself—is the spirit of resistance that still exists in the fleet and among the French people, a spirit which the State Department's behavior last week was calculated to damage beyond repair. This is the simple fact and the President knows it. He should know, too, that the behavior of the State Department can no more be passed over than it can be explained away. The episode of the French islands was dismissed as a "teapot tempest" by the New York Herald Tribune in its first editorial after the State Department's intervention. But tempests always start in small areas. This one is not subsiding. It is gathering force with every hour; it is sweeping across seas and continents carrying to all adherents of freedom the news that the United States has thrown its tremendous power against self-government and the will of a small group of Frenchmen to join in the fight to end tyranny.

This news is worth many capital ships and many divisions of men to the Axis powers. Who will risk his life President fails to act, the dictators will have gained one democracy sells freedom at so cheap a price? If the for even his own freedom when the world's greatest of the decisive victories of the war.

A Message from St. Pierre

The editors of The Nation, shocked by the action of the State Department in protesting against the Free French occupation of St. Pierre and Miquelon, sent the following telegram to Vice-Admiral Emile Muselier:

> YOU AND THE FREE FRENCH FORCES AND THE PEOPLE OF ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON HAVE THE UNQUALIFIED SUPPORT OF ALL PATRIOTIC AMERICANS WHO FEEL NOTHING BUT SHAME AT THEIR GOVERNMENT'S BETRAYAL OF OUR COMMON CAUSE. HOLD FAST. DESTINY HAS PUT THE DEFENSE OF FREEDOM IN YOUR HANDS AND YOU CANNOT AFFORD TO YIELD OR COMPROMISE.

Vice-Admiral Muselier replied immediately as follows:

> THE ADMIRAL-IN-CHIEF COMMANDING THE FREE FRENCH NAVAL FORCES, THE MARINE VOLUNTEERS, THE IMMENSE MAJORITY OF THE POPULATION OF ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON THANK YOU WITH ALL THEIR HEARTS FOR YOUR TELEGRAM. I KNEW IT WAS NOT POSSIBLE THAT THE NOBLE AMERICAN NATION WOULD NOT BE WHOLEHEARTEDLY WITH US IN THE CAUSE OF LIBERTY AND IN THE SACRED RIGHT OF PEOPLES TO SELF DETERMINATION. WHATEVER HAPPENS WE WILL HOLD ON UNTIL THE END. FOR ALL DEMOCRACIES OF THE WORLD ST. PIERRE, LIKE YOUR STATUE OF LIBERTY, IS A SYMBOL.
>
> (Signed) ADMIRAL MUSELIER

The Shape of Things

SUMMING UP THE SERIES OF CONFERENCES with Winston Churchill and other Allied representatives in which he had been constantly engaged for over a week, the President declared: "The present over-all objective is the marshaling of all resources, military and economic, of the world-wide front opposing the Axis. Excellent progress along these lines is being made." We shall probably have to be content with this very general statement for some time, and it would be over-optimistic to expect perfect coordination of all the varied forces now opposing the Axis. But the first essential step is a real will to cooperate, and this seems to have been demonstrated not only in Washington but in Moscow and Chungking. The conference in China's war capital between Chiang Kai-shek, Major-General George H. Brett, Chief of the United States Army Air Corps, and General Wavell, Britain's commander in India, may lead to an important military counter-offensive against Japan. In making their widely dispersed attacks on the fringes of the South China Sea the Japanese have left partially exposed their right flank, which in effect extends from the northern Manchoukuoan border to Bangkok, a distance of some two thousand miles. They cannot find troops to cover such a line adequately, and it ought to be possible for both the Chinese and the British—operating from Burma—to find weak spots to attack. Even if such attacks could not be developed into a real offensive, at least until the supply situation improves, they might well serve to relieve Japanese pressure in other directions.

*

AS WINSTON CHURCHILL INDICATED IN HIS masterly address before Congress, lack of war material of all kinds is likely to handicap the anti-Axis front for at least another twelve months. Now that the United States is in the war, the potential resources of the Allies are greatly superior to those of the totalitarian powers, but that potential has yet to be translated into actual planes, tanks, and guns ready for action. Eventually we may achieve an overwhelming abundance, but until we do the problem of distributing limited supplies between a number of competing theaters of war will involve many ticklish decisions. Both Britain and Russia seem to have feared that America might become so absorbed in the Pacific war that the urgent needs of the European fronts might be overlooked. London and Moscow agree in viewing Hitler's Germany as the cornerstone of the Axis conspiracy and the primary objective of Allied strategy. The British delegation in Washington has apparently been reassured at finding there substantial appreciation of this undoubtedly valid perspective. This does not mean, however, that the Pacific can be safely neglected. We may be able to afford to wait for the final counterblow against Japan until Germany is definitely headed toward collapse, but we must buttress the defenses of the East Indies against the Japanese offensive or risk a long lag in our supply time-table. A Washington dispatch in the New York Times reports that Mr. Churchill "is apparently satisfied that Singapore can hold out, even if it gets very little more help, for at least nine months." On the basis of the present known facts this forecast, if it really does represent the Premier's views, seems to us more than a little optimistic.

*

IN AUSTRALIA OFFICIAL AND UNOFFICIAL statements suggest considerable anxiety lest the Pacific arena be neglected in favor of other fronts. That large but sparsely inhabited dominion has from the beginning contributed heavily to Britain's war effort, as an article by Hallett Abend on page 12 shows. It has been moved to do so not merely by sentiment but by an intelligent anticipation that Axis triumphs in Europe would eventually lead to Japanese aggression in the Pacific. But now that aggression has come, Australia is more keenly aware of its vulnerability to invasion should Japan break through the Singapore barrier than of the indivisibility of the world battle. The unimpressive showing of the British imperial forces in Malaya has evoked sharp criticisms. Sir Keith Murdoch, influential publisher of the Melbourne Herald, has written a dispatch from London accusing Mr. Churchill of being too "Atlantic-minded" and urging greater participation by the dominions in the formation of war policy. The Australian Premier, John Curtin, has indicated the uneasiness of his country even more plainly in an article written for the same paper. "I make it clear," he writes, "that Australia looks to America, free from any pangs about our traditional links of friendship to Britain. We refuse to accept the dictum that the Pacific struggle is a subordinate segment of the general conflict. The government regards the Pacific struggle as primarily one in which the United States and Australia should have the fullest say in the direction of the fighting plan." The sharp tone of this statement makes manifest an anxiety with which it is easy to sympathize. But the parochial outlook which it betrays illustrates once again the necessity for the broadest possible war strategy.

*

CUTS OF $1,717,000,000 IN NON-DEFENSE government expenditures have been recommended to Congress by the joint committee headed by Senator Byrd. As might be expected of any committee headed by the Virginia Senator, the cuts it proposes would affect chiefly the more progressive of the government's social services. The committee would abolish the Farm Security Administration, the Farm Tenant Program, the Civilian Conservation Corps, and the peace-time activities of the National Youth Administration; it would greatly curtail the Works Progress Administration. Some of these cuts are, of course, justified. The army will absorb a large part of the personnel and at least part of the functions of the CCC and NYA. It is fair to assume that unemployment will be reduced drastically as the arms program is expanded. Agricultural conditions have already improved substantially. But although some reduction in social-service outlays can be defended on the ground of the changed situation and the necessity for holding public expenditures to a minimum in order to check inflation, the outright abolition of no one of these agencies can be defended. The farm-tenant problem, for example, is a permanent one which can only be dealt with by long-range social planning, and youth requires suitable training in war time fully as much as in peace. Savings must be made, but we suspect that more can be saved by cutting the dead wood out of the regular departments than by depriving tenant farmers and underprivileged young men and women of hope for a decent living.

*

THE BLASTS THAT SHOOK PEARL HARBOR scared most of our native fascists back into the wall. Most, but not all. The Coughlin species is still scurrying about, and while its activities are less noisy than hitherto, they are if possible more virulent. Social Justice gives its readers the considered opinion that Japan's surprise raid represented "only a fair job in copying the 'sneak' tactics of Great Britain." A better imitation would have involved first signing "an alliance with Uncle Sam at least." No hint that the gang that blitzed a dozen countries of Europe might have been the model. But, then, Germany, Italy, and Japan are still presented to the Father's flock as the "have-nots" in a war "against the have-nations" precipitated by "the bungling diplomats and politicians . . . here and abroad." In any case, the main task now is not the banishing of Hitlerism, but "liquidating the causes" of Hitlerism, namely, Marxism, Leninism, the Rothschilds, the Bank of England, and "the pack of usurers who transubstantiated a vice into a virtue in the sixteenth century." That is the public line. In the privacy of the United States mails anything goes. In thousands of letters mailed on December 19 Francis P. Moran, director of the Christian Front of America, found President Roosevelt "guilty of murder." By refusing "to grant to the Orient the same right of self-determination that we ourselves have demanded in our Monroe Doctrine" the President provoked Japan into making war when it would otherwise "have had no incentive to attack us."

Reverses in the Pacific

THE news from the Far East continues to be bad. Wake Island, Hongkong, and Sarawak in northern Borneo were Christmas presents from the Japanese army to the Emperor. Further advances have been made against Singapore. American and Filipino troops continue to be forced back in the Philippines. Manila, though declared an open city, has been subjected to devastating raids.

There is a tendency in many quarters to dismiss these early reverses as inevitable. Many commentators are stressing the fact that the American and British outposts in the Pacific are difficult to defend because they are so much closer to the main Japanese bases than to ours or those of Great Britain. They point out that the war is not likely to be settled by the conquest of a few islands in the early weeks of the struggle and that in the long run our superior resources should give us an immense advantage. Statements such as these, while undeniably true, savor of the defensive psychology which has sapped the vitality of the democracies throughout the world in the past few years. There was nothing "inevitable" about the Japanese victories in the Far East. The Japanese won at Pearl Harbor because they had made careful plans for the maximum use of their inferior resources—and because the American military and naval authorities were admittedly asleep. They took Wake, despite a gallant defense by a handful of American marines, partly because Congress had failed to fortify it, partly because the navy was not prepared quickly to reinforce its garrison. Their successes in the Philippines may be attributed to our failure to provide underground shelters for our few fighter and bomber planes. For months the American public has been lulled into a feeling of false security by reports of the dispatch of large numbers of long-distance bombers and fighters to the Philippines, Singapore, and the Dutch East Indies. It now appears that very few planes were sent, and inadequate plans were made for the protection of those that were.

It should go without saying that no satisfying appraisal of American strategy is possible at this stage. Many factors, such as the disposition of our fleet, the dispatch of reinforcements, and plans for repairing air losses, are military secrets. The fact that the main battle fleet of the navy is unreported does not mean that it is idle. But we do know that the brave defenders of Wake were not relieved in a siege lasting more than a fortnight although the island is closer to Honolulu than to Tokyo. And while we have been at war for more than three weeks, there have been no reports of American reinforcements reaching either the Philippines or Singapore. Reinforcing these outposts undoubtedly involves great difficulties, but if adequate plans had been laid in advance, some assistance could have reached the beleaguered areas from Hawaii, if not from the mainland, by this time. So far the only reinforcements known to have reached their destination were landed at Hawaii. Such a diversion of our energies was undoubtedly one of the major strategic objectives of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor.

All of this fits in with the belief which was generally held by our military leaders a few years ago—that the Philippines could not be defended in a war with Japan. This belief was based, however, on the situation to be expected in a war which involved only the United States and Japan. It did not take into account Singapore or the existence of hostilities between China and Japan. Under present conditions the Philippines are virtually indispensable to the Allied defenses in the Pacific. A sustained, large-scale attack on Singapore and the Dutch East Indies, which if successful would probably prolong the war for many years, cannot succeed as long as American submarines and American bombers have the use of bases on Luzon. Moreover, the possession of Singapore and the Dutch naval bases—to say nothing of continued Chinese resistance—greatly facilitates the task of defending the islands.

Our troops have fought magnificently, and there is reason to believe that General MacArthur can hold out if he is given planes, tanks, and even a moderate number of reinforcements. Whether this assistance will arrive in time, only the staff officers in Washington can say. But to date our military leadership contrasts sadly with the competence and heroism shown by our men in the field.

The No-Strike Agreement

THE President cut short the Industry-Labor Conference, which was threatening to drag on interminably, by accepting the three-point formula on which agreement had been reached: no strikes or lockouts, settlement of all disputes by peaceful means, institution by the President of a War Labor Board to handle disputes. By this move Mr. Roosevelt quietly relegated the problem of the closed shop to the status of an arbitrable issue. Having agreed to abide by the President's decision, the management group at the conference had to accept the formula, but it made no secret of its disappointment and annoyance at the absence of any provision for placing the closed-shop question in cold storage for the duration of the war.

The employers' arguments on this point have naturally been picked up and developed by the conservative press. Thus the New York Times tells the government that it must immediately "declare, as the War Labor Board did in 1917, that any demand from either side for a change in the status of a closed or open shop shall not be considered a proper grievance for submission to a war labor board or to arbitration. This is the only possible basis for maintaining industrial peace on this issue during the war." To us, on the contrary, such action would seem a sure way to undermine the industrial truce by destroying its spirit. The trade unions, although far more strongly organized than in 1917, have surrendered their weapon of last resort and agreed to submit all disputes which prove unamenable to settlement by negotiation to the decision of an arbitration board. Are they now to be told that, on demand of the other party, a whole class of disputes about which they feel deeply is to be ruled out of court altogether?

The analogy with the position in 1917 is far from perfect. Then, as a correspondent of the Times has pointed out, organized labor was weak, and the principle of collective bargaining had not won general recognition. The War Labor Board ruled that employers had to accept this principle, and in return for this tremendous gain organized labor could afford to forgo demands for the closed shop. Today the freezing of this issue would mean a one-sided concession by labor with no corresponding sacrifice by the employers, who have no expectation of eliminating the closed shop where it is already in operation. More than that, it would open the way to an actual deterioration in labor's bargaining position.

Let us consider the position in a large industrial plant now 90 per cent union organized and ripe for a closed-shop contract. War orders lead to a 100 per cent expansion in the working force, and many of the recruits, attracted from non-industrial pursuits, fail to see the connection between the good wages they enjoy and the previous efforts of the union. At the end of the war, if the union had managed to hold its original membership, it would have only 50 per cent of the total employees, and the management would be in a fine position not merely to resist any demand for a closed shop but perhaps to break the union altogether.

The question whether the closed shop has any place in a democracy is a debatable one, and so is the question of the private ownership of natural monopolies. But both these institutions have been accepted in certain industries for many years and have legal status. If the extension of the former is to be limited by administrative fiat or legislation, are the proponents of this step willing to have their arguments applied to the case of the latter, which is very similar in principle? We doubt it.

There have been suggestions both in the press and in Congressional circles that industry should be given its way in the matter of the closed shop by a revival of the Smith bill or some similar measure. We hope our legislators are awake to the reckless folly of this proposal. Labor has responded magnificently to the national danger and is showing in a hundred ways that it intends to "remember Pearl Harbor." Nothing would so much disturb morale as the insistence on punitive legislation by Congressmen unable to forget John L. Lewis.

Aid and Comfort to the Enemy

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, December 28

SO FAR as I can learn, the liberation of St. Pierre and Miquelon from Vichy rule by Free French forces was carried out with the knowledge and consent, if not the cooperation, of the British and Canadian governments. Vice-Admiral Emile Muselier spent several weeks on Canadian soil preparing for the occupation. In both London and Ottawa it was felt that the islands, at the mouth of the St. Lawrence, were too important to the defense of the Dominion and the security of transatlantic trade routes to be left to the mercy of our State Department's incorrigible determination to play pat-a-cake with Vichy. The State Department did not consult Ottawa and London before making its agreement to protect Vichy control in Martinique, and Ottawa and London did not consult the State Department before permitting the Free French to restore free government and an anti-Axis regime in St. Pierre and Miquelon. The Free French did not consult the State Department because the State Department had not consulted the Free French, whom it still does not recognize. And it was well understood all around that the State Department, if consulted, would have objected because it does not intend to stop trying to appease Pétain until that aged puppet has outgrown his usefulness to Hitler and the Nazis take over France.

When news of the occupation reached the State Department, it instructed Ambassador Winant to file a protest with the British Foreign Office. Winant, who is no appeaser, assumed that the White House had approved the idea and made the protest. In Washington Samuel Reber, the State Department official in charge of French affairs and an appeaser from way back, went in person to protest at the British embassy. He was told that the British knew nothing about the occupation and didn't intend to do anything about it. In the meantime the Foreign Office, through Malcolm MacDonald, jumped the traces of protocol and reached Beaverbrook at the White House. The word which went back to London, after Beaverbrook had inquired, was that the State Department had ordered the protest without first clearing the matter at the White House. The British were informed that the President called in Hull and took the Secretary of State down a peg. Their feeling was that the State Department would be forced to back down on this matter. I am not so sure.

Whatever the outcome, the St. Pierre-Miquelon affair serves notice on the world that the American State Department is now the last stronghold of appeasement. It must also give the impression that our foreign policy is being run in the halfwit fashion that led so many of the Western democracies cheerfully to their doom. On November 24 the Free French delegation in New York released a letter written by the President on November 11 to Lease-Lend Administrator Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., declaring the defense of any Free French territory "vital to the defense of the United States." The invocation of that statutory formula placed lease-lend aid at the disposal of the Free French, and they opened an office in Washington to make arrangements for obtaining materials of war. On December 8, the day after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, the Free French National Committee in London declared war on Japan. This was no empty gesture. In New Caledonia, the New Hebrides, and Tahiti the Free French control South Pacific islands that are now our only remaining stepping-stones to the Far East. Had we backed the Free French, they might have made French Indo-China our base against Japan, instead of leaving it to become Vichy's gift to Japan as a base against the Philippines and Thailand. The Free French are our allies. Vichy is the tool of our enemies. Yet on Christmas Day Cordell Hull, with a stupidity that calls for his removal from office, had the State Department issue a statement sneering at the "so-called Free French navy" and demanding restoration of St. Pierre and Miquelon to Vichy.

I have spent most of the day talking with representatives of the Free French, and I want to report that the Secretary of State's reference rankles. The State Department could not have chosen a better way to undermine the confidence of oppressed peoples everywhere than by its slur, and I think some way should be found to let the world know in decisive fashion that the undemocratic little clique of decayed pseudo-aristocrats and backsliding liberals who dominate the State Department do not speak for the American people. The people of St. Pierre and Miquelon have been dismissing Axis radio reports that we would force return of the islands to Vichy as typical Nazi lies. But to our own "Propaganda Ministry," Colonel Donovan's office for the coordination of information, has fallen the unhappy task of broadcasting to the French people and the French colonies in the past few days the fact that the democratic United States stands squarely behind the traitors who are Hitler's tools in France. How Donovan's division can hope to make effective pro-democratic propaganda in Europe after those broadcasts is a question the White House had better ponder. In North Africa native leaders have already been saying to the Free French, "Why should we take a chance on supporting you when the United States supports Vichy?"

The usual State Department secrecy surrounds this affair, but in the murk one can make out a few main figures. At the top is Cordell Hull with his capacity for yielding one democratic position after another behind the smoke screen of nebulous moral homilies. Too many young lives are at stake for us to be tender any longer with a Secretary of State who favored the sale to Japan of the oil and scrap iron which made possible the bombardment of Manila he now deplores. Lower down, in the bowels of the bureaucracy, is a figure like Reber, in charge of French affairs at the department. Reber received his training at our embassy in Rome under Breckinridge Long and William Phillips, socialite diplomats with strong leanings toward fascism. The rationalizations put forward for our attempts to appease Vichy are much the same as those that Long, Phillips, and Reber propounded for supplying Il Duce with scrap iron and oil for six months after the war began. Behind these figures and their picayune and transparent Machiavellianisms lie forces unsympathetic to democracy and uncomfortable when confronted with popular aspiration. There is also a dangerous under-cover animosity toward the British. In the picture, too, is the State Department's fondness for the Vatican and the Vatican's fondness for Vichy, and the Vatican's old hatred—a hatred it shares with the Fascists—for 1789. The atmosphere is one in which it is much easier to figure out reasons for further appeasement than for forthright and democratic action.

It may be that we must suffer some great and resounding defeat before we cleanse the State Department of the undemocratic bureaucracy which runs it, before we recognize that we cannot hope to muster the peoples of the world in a democratic crusade as long as our foreign policy is in the hands of men whose talk of democracy is made a sham by their actions. If the State Department proves strong enough—to our eternal shame—to force the return of St. Pierre and Miquelon to Vichy, perhaps this betrayal of democracy may at least wake us up enough to force a return of the control of our foreign policy to men more representative of the American people.

Hitler's Plight in Russia

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE most important news of the war at present comes from Russia. American and British losses in the Far East in the early stages of a Pacific war were written off in advance by all the experts. In view of British control of the Mediterranean and the large extent of American aid in the Near East, Axis defeats in the struggle for Libya were probable. But the German setbacks in Russia were definitely not foreseen, either by the Germans themselves or by the majority of neutral observers.

When in June, 1941, Hitler made one of his usual treacherous attacks, this time upon the Soviet Union, few observers believed the Russians had much chance of a successful resistance. The unwillingness of Soviet leaders to boast of their military progress to the outside world, plus the sorry showing made by half-trained reservists in the Finnish war, had led most military experts to rate Red Army troops rather low. During the first few months of the war, when the Germans, profiting by the impetus of their surprise attack, won smashing victories in the Battle of the Frontiers, general expectations seemed on their way to realization.

But the Russians failed to behave like Hitler's previous victims. They fought with more than mere courage. They were well-equipped for the newer type of war, and they resisted with an imaginative intelligence and utter disregard for life new in Nazi experience. Troops that were outmaneuvered and surrounded did not recognize their hopeless tactical position and surrender, but fought until all were killed, thereby inflicting heavy losses on the Germans, or else broke up into guerrilla bands and played havoc with transportation and communication. Retreating troops and civilians destroyed everything of value, planted thousands of land mines, poisoned wells and streams, and attempted to make all German advance profitless. Russian casualties were obviously enormous, but so were those of the Germans; and Russia had 180,000,000 to draw from as against 80,000,000 Germans. The Nazi communiqués, which in earlier campaigns had been models of terse accuracy, became more and more vague and imaginative. The Russian air force was repeatedly destroyed in communiqués, but in actual warfare seemed to possess the lives of a cat.

As the fall months passed, the Germans made immense gains of ground. The Baltic coast was taken, and besieging armies pressed close on Leningrad. On the central front the Reichswehr gained steadily. Disaster overtook the Russians in the Ukraine as Odessa, Kiev, Kharkov, and finally Rostov were reduced. The rich iron-mining region of Krivoy Rog, the valuable hydroelectric plants on the Dnieper, and at last the very heart of Russian industry in the Donetz Basin fell into enemy hands. But these captures netted the Germans surprisingly little immediate gain, since the "scorched earth" policy of the Chinese was applied successfully in a new sphere and the Russians repaired their huge losses from a seemingly endless supply of fresh men and material. Meanwhile the cardinal objective of German strategy, destruction of the Russian field armies, remained unachieved. A last great offensive before Moscow on the central front failed amid intense cold.

No sector of the war has been so consistently hard to analyze as the eastern front, for in no other area of combat are the unknown factors so numerous and important. The Russians have refused to allow even their allies to know what was actually taking place. Hence many persons have been puzzled by the recent German retreat, and some newspapermen have even accepted at face value the Germans' assurance that their retirement was a strategic one, made for the purpose of shortening their lines. This explanation has now lost all validity. Even if the forced retirement of high officers of the German army and Hitler's assumption of personal command did not signify a situation well out of hand, the uneasy tone of Goebbels's releases and his assurances that the war will be long and hard would do so. The German retreat has been accompanied by large losses of both men and material. For days at a time the Luftwaffe has been relatively inactive, leaving to the Russians the command of the air. Only out of dire necessity would the brilliant German High Command engage in so costly a "strategic retreat."

On the basis of known facts and reasonable deductions from those facts three explanations present themselves. In the first place, German lines of communication have become long and difficult beyond any previously known in modern war. All kinds of supplies have to come from Germany, for the Russians have destroyed everything they could. Russian railroads, even in the few cases where they have not been demolished, are valueless because of the difference in gauge. The construction of transportation lines is in itself a task requiring the services of hundreds of thousands of men. And their protection against swarms of saboteurs and guerrillas operating behind the German lines is all but impossible. This constant drain on men and material, increasing with distance, has taken much of the snap and punch out of German offensives.

Much more important is the fact that German troops are obviously in poor condition. They are less used to sub-zero weather than their Russian opponents and, thanks partly to the British blockade, are less well equipped for it. The Russians have shelters and facilities for recreation back of their lines, while the Germans would need weeks of uninterrupted effort back of stable lines to construct any that would be adequate. Constant campaigning has left the German troops physically exhausted. Sanitation under the circumstances is obviously difficult, and typhus, which preys on lice-covered, run-down soldiers, has already made its appearance. Such conditions have a bad effect, and the morale of even the hardened Germans is probably a matter of serious concern to the army leaders. In brief, the traditional defenses of Russia—severe winters and interminable distances—are actively aiding the Red Army.

Finally, Germany may very possibly be feeling a severe pinch in raw materials, especially in oil. An article by C. L. Sulzberger that appeared in the New York Times early in December cited Russian reasons for believing that the German oil supply was being expended faster than it could be replaced, and that Hitler at the time had reserves sufficient for only three to four months of extremely active conflict. While it is unsafe to assume that Germany has reached the point of economic exhaustion, the recent declines in submarine sinkings, the comparative inactivity of the Luftwaffe, and the enormous number of vehicles captured with engines worn out from using low-grade oils may indicate that Germany is nearing the bottom of its oil barrel.

Obviously Hitler, as personal commander of the German armies, is now on the spot. He must either deliver or be discredited. If the Germans are extremely short of raw materials, an offensive under present weather conditions might well spell their complete exhaustion before the Caucasian oil wells could be reached and utilized. With intense unrest and in some cases active rebellion in the remainder of Europe, it would probably be unsafe to reduce German garrisons in order to strengthen weakened lines in the Soviet Union. Meanwhile difficulties of transport and climate will continue to be grave.

On the other hand, the obvious face-saving expedient of withdrawing to easily held lines and starting a campaign elsewhere offers no easy solution. The plains of Eastern Europe are singularly flat and devoid of natural obstacles. In so vast a theater warfare must be active rather than passive, and any fixed position is subject to being outflanked and rendered worthless. If, as is implied, the Germans are seeking better positions, they will have a long retreat over hard-won ground before they find any relatively secure line of defense.

Further, Hitler would encounter stiff opposition anywhere except on a push through Spain and Portugal. The British position in the Near East, last summer so weak that a German attack through Turkey would certainly have succeeded, is now very much stronger. With Russia on his hands it is open to question whether Hitler could spare enough troops to achieve victory in the Near East—especially in view of the added transportation troubles such an effort would entail.

Don't Plan for Collapse

BY HAROLD STRAUSS

A GREAT deal of hokum is being talked about the inevitability of a post-war economic collapse. If the Cassandras were merely wrong, their indictment could be left to time. If they were merely prodding us to constructive action, their excessive zeal could be accepted. But actually they are fostering an almost pathological fear of the future which is inhibiting every useful effort to make that future a better one. We not only approach post-war problems in a mood of helpless resignation, but we allow ourselves to be heavily hampered in the war effort itself.

Pessimism about the future fires the determination of pressure groups to "get theirs" now. It makes industry refuse to expand. It drives labor to press its advantage. It causes forward-looking programs such as the Wagner-Voorhis resolution for the establishment of an anti-slump economic general staff to languish in committee. It undermines the work of determined expansionists like Leon Henderson. It was, according to Life, the common pretext for isolationism in the Middle West. It nourishes the plans of the corporate money managers for a severe deflation. It sidetracked the Reuther plan and vitiates the subcontracting program.

A few farsighted men have already denounced the inhibiting effect of our fear of the future. Sidney Blumenthal, chairman of a large textile concern, has said:

> We encounter apprehension everywhere as to the collapse when defense activity may be sharply curtailed. That fear drags on our utmost effort. That fear can be largely reduced once we convince the nation of its responsibility to continue large-scale production after the termination of the war. . . . As a part of our defense effort now, therefore, we need a plan for shifting over the full measure of our productive forces to peace-time needs.

And James B. Carey, secretary of the C. I. O., has made the statesman-like proposal that "we must lay down a guaranty of post-war production levels, assuring full employment and maximum use of facilities, to remove the chief fear blocking the present defense effort—fear of the future."

I suggest that with a moderate degree of sound planning, with more vigorous progressive leadership, and above all with general determination to make the avoidance of a post-war collapse an objective second only to winning the war, our fear of the future can be proved empty. Leon Henderson on several occasions has referred not only to the adverse effects of pessimism but to its groundlessness. On July 15 he delivered an address before the New York Housewares Manufacturers' Association in which a stirring vision of what Americans can make of their future glowed between the lines. The New York Times reported:

> Mr. Henderson expressed a belief that the expansion of over-all production caused by the defense program did not entail as great a danger of overexpansion as many business men thought.
>
> "There has been far too much concern within industry over the dangers of expansion, too much willingness to accept shortages of raw materials, of plant capacity, of power and freight cars as an inevitable concomitant of all-out production in this country," he said. "We have been too prone to think of vested interests, of friends in industry who might be embarrassed when the emergency is over by more plant capacity than it was thought could be used on the basis of past experience. Literally interpreted, this philosophy means that its proponents believe the country is done. . . . It assumes that because we have had unemployment in the past we can never achieve and maintain something approaching full employment. That philosophy is false, and will be proved so in the future. This armament program is going to teach the people one thing—that it is possible to have jobs, to earn high wages, to produce goods if the demand is there."

Mr. Henderson sees that the present demand has not come from the market-place but from an aroused community which insists on the production of certain kinds of goods regardless of profit and marketability. His statement is part of the modern revolt against purely financial control of production, and expresses the constructive belief that men, materials, and machines are assets that need only be organized in productive units in an orderly and balanced fashion to enhance the real wealth of the community. The London Economist made the same point in different words:

> The world is showing an unmistakable tendency to argue that if a thing is physically possible, whether it be fighting a war or removing unemployment, it must not be stopped by considerations of "sound finance" alone. In war, finance is manifestly a mere camp-follower, and the tendency is to reduce it to a dependent status in peace as well.

That this is not understood indicates a failure of progressive thought and progressive leadership. The greatest contribution to the immediate war effort that progressives could make would be a declaration that, come hell or high water, we will keep the workers in the factories and the farmers in the fields, producing the things that the world will never cease to need. It is useless to expect such a declaration to come from the conservative proponents of scarcity. And it has not yet come from progressives because progressive opinion today is factionalized and fragmented. Individual progressives are to be found in odd corners, grinding their private axes and nursing their private wounds. They content themselves with the consideration of symptoms and labor over the problems of the past—wages, hours, and the closed shop. One has only to go to almost any trade-union meeting to hear all the old slogans mouthed meaninglessly in a new context. Enlightened labor unions would not concern themselves with how little they can work now, or with how they can enlarge their share of the national income now. Instead, they would use their powerful strategic position to exact post-war maintenance of production, plant conversion, and retraining guaranties. Trade unions might thus become the practical apostles of full production and regain the social leadership they have forfeited to the dollar-a-year men by their regressive policies.

LEGISLATION AGAINST FEAR

Politically the focal point of progressive effort should be the joint resolution introduced by Senator Wagner on January 9, 1941, calling for the establishment of a post-emergency economic advisory commission and a national unemployment commission. Senator Wagner's concern with the continued production of the things we shall never cease to need was indicated when he said: "Most emphatically I do not have in mind merely another relief program on a gigantic scale. What I look forward to is a fully efficient and vigorous system of free enterprise moving progressively toward higher standards of life for ever-widening groups of people." The Wall Street Journal, sensing an attack on the artificially induced scarcities so dear to bankers, first tried to identify Wagner's program with "the familiar stop-gap spending programs of the past"; then, forced to backtrack, it suggested that the resolution was a measure "to forestall other investigations of the defense program." The progressives gave the resolution a shockingly apathetic reception. Only Richard L. Strout of the quasi-progressive Christian Science Monitor grasped its importance. In a front-page article published a few days later he stressed the close connection of Emergency Number One with Emergency Number Two, as he called the prospective post-war collapse, and showed why we must address some part of our attention to the second in the very midst of the first. For the shape of the post-war emergency is determined by our present decisions, and our war drive is hampered by fears of future collapse.

Every organization with a war job to do—and that includes government, industry, and labor—has to solve unprecedented financial and labor problems. Every procurement order signed, every tax bill passed, every agreement reached by collective bargaining involves fundamental assumptions concerning economic rights, duties, and privileges. These assumptions are valid only if they fit into a broad vision of the kind of world in which we, the people of America, wish to live. Pleas for the maintenance of the status quo are merely evasive; physical change must be met with institutional change. This is not to press opportunism upon labor; labor has come of age and must accept new responsibilities along with new privileges. Nor can we derive easy formulas from the solutions of the past. The past offers, for instance, no ethical grounds for determining a just entrepreneur's wage for a no-risk-taking capitalist who operates a munitions plant financed by the government. The past offers no simple rule for a fair adjustment of wage rates to rising living costs. The past cannot tell us how the power inherent in the union shop will be used by labor in war and peace. In the long run these are moral questions, having to do with the way we want to live together and the way we want to reward specific services to the community. And the value of various services to the community is constantly changing. To deny this is to create parasitic groups of rentiers and pensioners.

Although such questions call for long-range judgments, we are obliged to phrase tentative answers every day. The present and the future, the parts and the whole, the individual and the group, the group and society are separable only in the inner sanctum of the mind—as the French now know only too well. What part of the defense program is to be financed by taxation as against borrowing? To what extent shall we stimulate marginal factors of production by allowing price increases, as against commandeering factories and mines? The answers to such questions have little to do directly with national defense; they might make little difference in net arms output during the war. But they will determine the kind of society in which we shall live after the war. With the best will in the world we cannot, even temporarily, put social controversy on ice. Indeed, in time of war there is an acceleration of institutional change impossible in time of peace; the changes effected now will be conserved by the relative inertia of peace. That is how the shape of the future emergency is being determined now.

The only just reason for pessimism is our failure to address ourselves seriously to the problem of the future. You cannot arouse the élan that accomplishes miracles by telling people that they cannot do business with Hitler. The very word defense was an evasion and a political expedient. We now shall hear it no more. It was in essence a conservative concept; it implied defense of the status quo. And it was natural that conservatives should lead a conservative movement. The dollar-a-year men have not wormed their way into Washington or been smuggled there as a part of Roosevelt's betrayal of labor, as John L. Lewis would have it; they have ridden in on the flood tide of conservatism. The conservatives have used their advantage to sell the country the idea of a fearsome post-war collapse. I do not deny that this is a possibility, but to shape our policies upon the certainty of its advent is absolute folly. It is allowing the shape of our present emergency to be determined by fear of the coming one. I said above that net arms output might not be affected by the financial and labor policies adopted, but in practice it is often the threat or the promise of such policies that arouses the determination of pressure groups to "get theirs now."

Financial policy is now being dictated by business, which is instinctively reactionary in its philosophy and unable to think in terms bigger than itself. The crisis is being met by the world's most timorous men. Already much has been done to make the banker's dream world come true after the war, more than we can readily undo. And even if we can rectify conditions in the future, we can never undo the harm already done to our war effort —the present lack of aluminum, of power, of steel, and of a hundred other things, lacks that are the direct result of conservative policy and of the acceptance of a post-war collapse as inevitable. The conservatives know that hitherto they have prospered most under conditions of the greatest scarcity, and act accordingly. It is not too much to say that they are planning a post-war collapse. The consequences of dollar-a-year control are the increased cost of defense, retarded production, and deliberate planning for deflation.

HOW BUSINESS HAS BEEN BRIBED

Not much is being said about the costs of defense. Actually, they have soared scandalously. Though the public has been trained to look for war profiteers, by and large it has failed to find them because with the connivance of federal statutes the profits are concealed. Business obtained this connivance by insisting upon the inevitability of post-war collapse and the dangers of plant expansion. The business man admits that he is making a fair profit now but argues that he cannot have his profits taxed because he must accumulate liquid resources against the evil day. He has seized the initiative politically, though in his financial dealings he has found that reluctance and timidity pay; the greater the reluctance, the bigger the bribe. Business has expanded, but at a price so vast and so concealed that it can only be called bribery.

The first bribe was the five-year plant-amortization clause, which for tax purposes allows defense industries to charge 20 per cent of the cost of certified new plant construction each year to operating costs. It was originally intended that the 20 per cent amortization should be allowed only in tax returns and not in cost accounting under cost-plus-fixed-fee defense contracts (the commonest sort). For a while the Treasury tried to enforce this by insisting that certification for special amortization privileges be withheld until applicants proved that they were not "otherwise reimbursed." Now all Treasury control over certification has been removed, under the guileful plea of speed. The result is that the five-year-amortization clause offers much more than a tax remission; it allows business to eat its cake and have it too—to use up its factories, as far as tax liability is concerned, and still keep them running. For of course the paper rate of depreciation allowed by a benevolent government does not make the factories themselves wear out any quicker. Furthermore, it is not generally understood that since amortization charges are accrued in the form of cash reserves over a period of time, and since technological improvement is continuous, the amortization of a past investment usually provides funds for a much greater future investment in terms of productive capacity. This was fully developed in a TNEC investigation which showed why most great corporations no longer have to seek new money for expansion. What was not brought out by the TNEC was that the value of all cash reserves would show a staggering increase should prices fall drastically in a period of deflation. That is a major reason why business is planning for a collapse. It is possible for a corporation to have built a new plant in 1940; to have the cash that it cost returned by 1945, quite apart from profits and immune from taxes; to have the use of this plant for the remainder of its physical life, possibly fifteen or more years; to have the means of building a new and far more efficient plant; and, if costs have dropped after the war, to have a fat cash balance in hand. Thus a corporation may come out of the war with two or three times the productive capacity of its 1940 investment without having made any further investment.

The second bribe has come from the Defense Plant Corporation, which in various ways relieves reluctant business men of responsibilities. It seems obvious that the community should exact some major compensation for eliminating risk from enterprise, for it has thereby countered the traditional moral claim of business to a profit. It is not possible to calculate just how big a bribe is inherent in the Defense Plant scheme, for the final disposition of the factories built under it has not yet been settled. It is possible, however, that a future Administration favorable to business may donate or virtually donate the plants to the leasing corporations, under the smoke screen of some slogan about a return to "normalcy." The plants have cost the corporations nothing.

The third bribe is the ridiculous excess-profits tax, in both its 1940 and 1941 versions, under which defense industries, such as aircraft, steel, copper, and transportation, reap bonanzas over and above an indubitably large tax bill, while consumers'-goods and service industries, such as tobacco, merchandising, food, and utilities, pay the piper.

These are the new bribes, but there are also some of long standing. There are the scandalous depletion allowances of extractive industries. And there are the loopholes which allow corporations to conceal profits, a tendency so marked that the TNEC's Monograph XII on "Profits, Productive Activities, and New Investment" takes into statistical account what it politely calls "understatement of profits." It is interesting to speculate on the savings, in dollars and cents, which might have been the fruit of a vigorous and articulate progressive approach to long-range economic problems. Meanwhile the community, having let itself be persuaded that business needs protection against the perils of an "inevitable" collapse, is paying the price.

The increased cost of defense is only one result of the planned timorousness of dollar-a-year control; the second, the refusal of both big business and labor—as in the widespread enforcement of "featherbed" working rules—to expand production, is too familiar to need discussion. Regarding the third consequence, planned post-war collapse, it is clear that the motives are present, for the owners of hoarded cash have a vested interest in deflation, which will give their cash greater purchasing power. It is important to remember that going businesses are accumulating hoards of untaxed dollars in the guise of reserves of all kinds. These reserves are immediate deflationary offsets to government spending, a factor too little considered by those who are alarmed about inflation. Only recently Ganson Purcell of the SEC gave his official blessing to the intensive retirement of outstanding debt, out of fear of the terrible future. It is clear that all groups—business, labor, and government—are preparing to place a perversely high valuation on money as against goods. This invariably results in an accumulation of cash or bank deposits, the complete breakdown of new investment, a fall in prices, progressive unemployment, and all the other oppressive manifestations summed up in the phrase "idle men, idle money, idle machines."

After Emergency Number One has passed, business will be able to decrease production rapidly and once more effectively simulate scarcity. Provided its reserves are adequate, business can contemplate with satisfaction a period of low production, low prices, and low costs. Even the traditional penalty that has hitherto been exacted from business, inventory depreciation, has been greatly mitigated by the new practice of "last in, first out" accounting. Capital is able to provide for the lean years ahead, but labor eats up most of its income every day. Labor has a stake in full production, in an economy of abundance. It is labor, then, which must challenge the defeatism, the unimaginativeness, the conservatism of capital. Our job is to understand just what are the mechanisms whereby we are moving toward full production in war time, and to seek the means of carrying these mechanisms over into peace. Only in this fashion can we give substance to our determination to keep the workers in the factories and the farmers in the fields, and to lay the specter of fear.

[In a second article Mr. Strauss will discuss how the mechanisms of full war production can be redirected to meet the needs of peace.]

How Australia Built for War

BY HALLETT ABEND

AUSTRALIA'S strength or weakness has suddenly become a matter of vital concern to the United States, for we are now fighting shoulder to shoulder with it against an enemy both have profoundly mistrusted for decades. And it is strength, not weakness. Just returned from "down under," I am still stunned by the spectacle of a country which has genuinely gone "all out." Australia's war effort is prodigious.

It has a half-million men in uniform, eager volunteers; 120,000 of them are already overseas, and newspapers carry columns of casualty lists day after day. But the willing man-power of Australia would be of scant use to the empire if its troops, its airmen, and its navy looked to Britain for arms, munitions, and supplies.

They do not. This remote island continent, important a few years ago mostly for its vast flocks of sheep and its boundless fields of wheat, today is turning out planes, tanks, guns, ships, munitions, and the thousand miscellaneous articles that modern war demands. And these are produced in such quantity that Australia not only arms and supplies its own forces but also furnishes munitions to the British in Singapore, Malaya, India, the Near East, and Egypt. It has even helped supply New Zealand and the Dutch East Indies.

Peak employment in Australian munitions factories during the First World War was 4,000. This time it is 56,000. If persons employed in shipyards, airplane factories, and all the other war industries are reckoned in, 600,000 Australian men and women have war jobs.

Thus of Australia's 7,500,000 population—about equal to New York City's, spread incredibly thin over an area as great as the United States—1,100,000 are in the war, in uniform or out of it. That is one adult in every five. Even the city streets show the drain of men, but it is more noticeable in the back country. Hundreds of thousands of sheep went unshorn last year; much wheat could not be harvested or threshed. The men are at grimmer business.

The crowded places are new centers, without names, their location unadvertised. Flying over the lonely land, over hillsides golden with wattle and gorse, you suddenly come upon a sprawling town like those which have mushroomed near our own war plants. Lonely ranches—"stations" is the Australian word—have become vast explosives factories, deep inland to be safe from the guns of coastal raiders. Where sheep stations touched on a deep bay with an almost uninhabited hinterland, now are great shipyards. Twenty munitions towns have sprung up within two years. "It is sheer romance of production," a visiting British official said in wonderment. And this rapid transformation of an agricultural land into an industrial nation has been made possible solely by the foresight and organizing ability of one man, Essington Lewis.

He is Director General of Munitions. Against indifference and even opposition he laid the foundations for Australia's war industry when nobody believed there would be war. Now he directs 600,000 workers who have brought the commonwealth's war output close to the highest peak it can possibly reach considering the limits of its population, available machinery, and supply of raw materials.

Lewis, Australian-born mining engineer, managing director of the great Broken Hill properties (silver and lead mines, steel mills, and shipyards), went on a holiday trip in 1936. That was what he pretended it was. Actually he was uneasy over world events and set out to investigate for himself. He went to Singapore, China, Japan, the Dutch East Indies. After spending two months in Europe he arrived in New York. By that time his vague presentiments of evil had become firm conviction. He invited directors of the Bethlehem Steel Company to dinner and for two hours tried to convince them that Germany was getting ready to start another colossal war. He urged them to prepare for war production. "I am sure they thought that I was a bit cracked," he recalls ruefully.

He had no better success at home. The Prime Minister and the Cabinet were unimpressed, said bluntly they "couldn't start war talk," and in view of the humor the voters were then in, could make no appropriations for defense. Long afterward it developed that the Cabinet had inquired of the British government, in code, about the outlook and was told that Lewis was an alarmist. Lewis tried to start a press campaign; it fell flat.

But after Japan invaded China he got a more thoughtful hearing. In 1938, $5,000,000 was set aside to lay the groundwork for defense industries. To this Lewis added an undivulged sum of his own money. Attracting as little attention as possible, he directed the building of twenty-seven annexes to various industrial plants, with detailed plans for quick switchover to war production when the emergency should arise.

Seldom has foresight been more completely justified. The twenty-seven annexes quickly produced precision work that no inexperienced plant could turn out. Predictors for anti-aircraft guns, for example. One part that can be held in the palm of the hand is machined in a series of blended curves in three dimensions, and at 800 separate points it must be accurate within one-ten-thousandth of an inch. Without these predictors, anti-aircraft guns are useless; given them, it is comparatively easy to turn out the guns.

And so Australia is producing all the anti-aircraft guns it needs; indeed, is exporting them. More than fifty Australian firms are making anti-tank guns. They also made the guns which armed 200 merchant ships.

Speaking of ships, when the war began, Australia had one shipyard; now it has seven, building destroyers, corvettes, small naval craft, and freighters up to 9,000 tons. When I was there fifty corvettes were on the ways.

Behind the ships, of course, is steel. Lewis individually gets the credit for increasing Australia's steel-making capacity from 1,000,000 tons in 1939 to 1,800,000 tons for 1942. In fact, it was he who built Australia's first steel plant, the big Newcastle works, out of profits from Broken Hill mines.

Most spectacular achievement, perhaps, is the creation of an airplane industry. Until midsummer of 1939 Australia had no such thing. Now the country produces all its own training planes, from primary to advanced, and has a surplus to supply other empire pilots. It has just begun to turn out bombers and soon will be producing pursuit ships.

Deep in the center of the state of Victoria a thousand buildings spread over several square miles of what was open farm land a year ago should have begun, by the time this is published, the production of guncotton. The plant cost $28,000,000 and is to employ 11,000 men and women. Another such plant is being built in Queensland; a third is to be in Tasmania. Four factories which in peace time produced such diverse things as railway cars, illuminating gas, and automobiles are now turning out Bren-gun carriers, armored vehicles which have stood up well in action in North Africa and Syria. They are built with a special bullet-proof steel, the secret of whose manufacture was recently turned over to Britain and America by Lewis's plant at Newcastle.

Australian factories are likewise making a vast range of accessories and necessities—tank periscopes, telescopic gun sights, precision lenses, range finders, pontoon bridges, radio equipment, gas masks, parachutes. If the United States is turning itself into an arsenal for the democracies, Australia has already accomplished the gigantic task of turning itself into an arsenal for Britain's forces in the Far East.

Meanwhile, Britain clamors for beef and mutton, butter and cheese, wheat and wool, leather and canned fruits, which are being shipped in immense quantities. At the time of my visit Australian factories had in two months got orders for 3,000,000 blankets, 7,000,000 pairs of wool socks, 7,200,000 suits of underwear, 3,000,000 pullovers and jackets, 1,000,000 pairs of army boots, and other supplies on the same scale.

These are figures I got from Lewis one cold, rainy day, in his unpretentious Melbourne office. It looks like a real-estate man's office in any American town. Lewis himself—sixty, graying, a little heavy—might pass at a Rotary Club luncheon for a small-town business man. He puts on no side. He has, say the Australians, a way with men and a marvelous acquaintanceship. A notable memory for names and faces springs from his genuine interest in people.

He discussed Australia's war effort earnestly and freely, but his job saddens him. "After 1918 I sincerely hoped I should never live to see another war," he said. "But here we are, and we must get on with it."

He dropped into silences when he seemed to brood upon the baleful past and the uncertain future, while his gaze strayed to the rain-streaked window panes. He broke one of these short silences with a surprising statement: "Whatever happens, we owe a debt of eternal gratitude to the United States," he said. "America has kept nothing back from us. Anything we needed was always given freely and cheerfully—formulas, blueprints, detailed new methods. American aid did not begin with the lend-lease business. It has always been ours for the asking, and we'll never forget."

Correction

In our last issue an error occurred on page 666 in the article entitled "Warning from South America." The correct version is as follows: "Dr. Osvaldo Aranha, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Brazil, will act together with his colleague, the Minister of the Interior, Dr. Francisco de Campos, totalitarian technician of the Brazilian government. Besides these two officials, delegates to the consultative conference will also meet with General Eurico Dutra, chief of the General Staff of the Army, and with General Goes Monteiro, public apologists of a German victory. Propaganda will be in the hands of Lourival Fontes, Minister of Propaganda, whose methods have always resembled Goebbels's. The guaranties of the delegates will be enforced by the Chief of Police, the Brazilian-born German Nazi, Filinto Mueller."

In the Wind

WHEN IT WAS ANNOUNCED that Japanese submarines were off the coast of California, four members of the state House of Representatives submitted this resolution:

> House Resolution No. 37—Relative to asking the Emperor of Japan to defer action for a few weeks—Whereas, it is essential that the State Legislature calmly and deliberately consider what action should be taken by the State of California in its part in the present war and what steps be taken to guard the lives and property of citizens of the State of California; now, therefore, be it Resolved by the Assembly of the State of California, That we hereby request the Emperor of Japan not to take any action or to do anything drastic until after January 12, 1942, within which time the Legislature may make up its collective mind; and be it further Resolved, That we hereby further request the Emperor of Japan not to attempt to emulate in California the action of Germany in going through Holland and Belgium until at least after January 12, 1942.

DIXIANA: Uncle Remus Avenue in Atlanta recently became Lawton Place. "Proponents of the change," said the Constitution, "argued that most people thought they lived on a 'Negro street since Uncle Remus was the Negro character of the stories.' " . . . From a pamphlet issued by the Industrial Development Committee, Rockwood, Tennessee: "There is an abundance of common and semi-skilled labor in and around Rockwood. It is made up of the purest Anglo-Saxon population outside of a few well-behaved Negroes, there being no aliens. . . . There is almost unbelievable freedom from violence, radicalism, and unrest."

ALLEN ZOLL, sponsor of several organizations in the Coughlinite front, was in the pay of the Japanese government before the war, according to the New York Coordinating Committee for Democratic Action. The committee has revealed documents now in its possession which outline Zoll's plans for anti-Semitic pro-Japanese propaganda in this country. One letter from Zoll to a high Japanese official reads in part:

> Here our activities would be to discredit the opposition to your institution [Japan]. Just as an adroit lawyer wins cases through discrediting the opposition's witnesses, just so can the public mind be influenced by discrediting your attackers. . . . One of the most effective methods . . . is to show that a certain minority group in America, which is very unpopular here, are the ones who are opposed to you. . . . I mentioned this group in our previous conversations but for obvious reasons prefer not to put it in writing.

STATE REPRESENTATIVE CLAUDE BILBO, a relative of the Mississippi Senator, is being sued by the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union. Bilbo is also personnel director of the Jackson County Woolen Mills, and some of his employees recently knifed and beat two women organizers.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Bureaus on the Move

TEN thousand government employees moving out of Washington make comparatively little noise beside the thunder of the greater thousands moving in to bulge the hotels, the boarding-houses, and any spare beds anywhere. The movement of bureaus attracts little attention beside the movements of armed forces in the middle of a war. Even now, however, the transfer from the capital of a dozen federal agencies to make office space for more thousands of new office workers in war time may be as significant as a battle in shaping the future pattern of government in the United States.

Before the first fear of war Big Government in America had become necessary as bigger and bigger powers grew outside government, sometimes outside the control of any government, national or local. But sometime before the war government seemed to have swallowed the octopus itself. Not only was government big; also, so far as millions of Americans were concerned, it was absentee. It not only possessed new powers, but it sometimes seemed as far from the people as the controls exercised from a real or mythical Wall Street had once seemed to be.

Not even the anti-New Dealers have succeeded in giving the country an adequate conception of the size, measured in people, of the government which has been expanding along the Potomac shore. The expansion did not begin with the New Deal. The government was probably growing when its entire staff of 126 clerks moved with John Adams from Philadelphia to the empty river bottom George Washington had picked for our capital. Economical Calvin never got the number of his clerks in Washington down at all close to the level of those which worked for Woodrow Wilson before the first war. And when Germany invaded Poland, there were more government employees in Washington than were working there when the Armistice ended the First World War, which crowded Washington in its time. Since this war began, according to figures published by the Washington Post, something like 70,000 more have been added; and 40,000 more are expected. No wonder space is at a premium. Obviously the President acted wisely in sending peace-time agencies scurrying to other cities. I only hope it is the beginning of a migration—and not only for war time.

Probably nothing less than war could have pried these agencies out of the District of Columbia. A centripetal force brings more clerks where clerks are, even when the very forces of transportation and communication which have made more government necessary have made a less concentrated government possible. Indeed, even in the midst of war Murray Latimer, head of the Railroad Retirement Board, told a Congressional committee that if his agency were moved to Chicago half its employees would quit. It is on its way there all the same. And others are moving to other big cities, East and West. The rooms these peace-time agencies leave behind will make space for men and women necessary in the war effort. That is the important thing now. But also important is the fact that the moving will mean a crack in the concentration of big government in one place at a distance from millions of the people.

War, of course, is going to mean even bigger government, and government able to act quickly everywhere. Total war must bring a total country under one command. What that will mean, beyond war, is anybody's guess. It will certainly not mean less federal power. Even greater, then, in a victorious democracy, will be the necessity of getting government closer to the people than it can possibly be in one dropsical district a few miles from one coast of a continental country.

Of course, Chicago is no more American than Washington. Philadelphia and St. Louis are no closer to some parts of the United States than Washington is. But in their variety and separateness they are places where the governed predominate, and not the governors and their clerks. No one of them would be better than Washington, but the division of great government in cities across the whole land might help in the so far insoluble problem of bringing the government into closer contact with the people themselves—where they are, in shops and on farms, in cities and villages, on the roads. If the war does that, if it brings the peace-time functions of big government closer to the sprawling country, we can count it one gain. We can look forward to a democracy of great powers which governs in terms of people and not of statistics and reports—reports which now make it necessary to employ more people to keep our archives than the whole company of office-holders who first came to Washington to help make our history.

In bigness may be a power necessary to us now and in the future. But democracy must somehow find and keep closeness to the people, and not merely concentrated power far above them, far from them, all in one complex and overwhelming place.

Salvation by Semantics

LANGUAGE IN ACTION: A GUIDE TO ACCURATE THINKING. By S. I. Hayakawa. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

ACCORDING to the author this book has been inspired by Korzybski's system of general semantics. It reads like a popularization of Stuart Chase's "The Tyranny of Words." Were it presented as a textbook in rhetoric on the high-school level, its naive and crude approach to the problems of language might be held excusable on pedagogical grounds. But it is offered to all and sundry as the wisdom "of the twentieth century's newest science, semantics," as an indispensable safeguard against superstition, propaganda, and inaccurate thinking. And like everything else on the market today, stress is placed on its important but rather vague implications for democracy. There is reason to believe that the claims of the author and publisher will find wide acceptance among the fad-hungry reading public.

"Citizens of a modern society," writes Mr. Hayakawa, "need to be scientifically aware of the mechanisms of interpretation if they are to guard themselves against being driven mad by the welter of words with which they are now faced." By "mad" the author means, quite literally, insane. Failure to achieve semantic health causes not only insanity but a whole series of evils, from unemployment to marital incompatibility. Like his master, Korzybski, but not in so extreme a form, Mr. Hayakawa fails to distinguish between two very different sorts of things: linguistic confusions which may be eliminated by analysis, thus clearing the way for a fruitful approach to problems, and the causes of problems and their solutions, which are outside the scope of semantics. The notion that bad linguistic habits are at the root of our social evils and that good linguistic habits will abolish them is just as much a form of belief in verbal magic as the primitive's faith that his enemy can be slain by an incantation.

Running through the entire book is a series of fundamental confusions. There is the confusion expressed in the statement that "no word ever has exactly the same meaning twice." This is obviously false. Consider, for example, any two sentences like these about the number series: "One is less than two"; "Two is less than three." The words "two" and "less than" have exactly the same meaning in both sentences. Hayakawa, like Korzybski, systematically confuses things, no two of which are exactly the same, with relations, into which different things may enter. As things, twenty copper pennies are different from two silver dimes. But their currency value is exactly the same. As things, every copper piece differs from every other; but as pennies their value is identical.

There is a whole cluster of confusions about "two-valued orientation." This is the belief, according to the author, that every question has only two sides. Not satisfied with pointing out that the belief is not always true, he suggests that it is never true except for purposes of conflict. "The two-valued orientation produces [!] the combative spirit, but nothing else." The language of everyday life, in contradistinction, shows only "multiple-valued" orientation, while that of science is "infinite-valued." This is the sheerest poppycock. The language of both everyday life and science recognizes that many questions allow only two mutually exclusive and exhaustive alternatives: for example, Shall I get married or not? Is any trace of arsenic observable or not?

There is the confusion about "intensional orientation." This concerns itself with the meanings or connotations of terms as contrasted with "extensional orientation," which takes account of the facts or "realities" noted. The first approach leads to day-dreaming, circular thinking, sometimes to insanity. Only the second is scientific. Mr. Hayakawa forgets that before we can go to the facts we must be able to deduce something from the connotation of our hypothesis about the facts. There is no recognition on his part of the role of logical implications in making explicit what we must expect to observe about facts when we entertain a hypothesis. The experiment or its reading is the end term of a process of which the manipulation of symbols, according to certain rules of inference, is an integral part. A "fact" doesn't prove or establish anything unless it confirms or refutes a prediction that validly follows from the connotation of the hypothesis. Despite its subtitle, this book tells us nothing about the criteria of accurate thinking. It doesn't even distinguish between logical validity and material truth.

Finally, there is the confusion on which the book culminates. The reader is asked to paste in his hat at least one basic and general rule which is a sure-fire guide for proper "extensional" orientation. The rule is: "COW_1 is not COW_2, COW_2 is not COW_3, . . ." The word "cow" (for which any term can be substituted) tells us what this cow has in common with other cows. The index number reminds us that this one is different. If only we can remember this, we will never identify an abstraction with a thing. Something, however, must be wrong with the rule. For if we apply Mr Hayakawa's previous rule to it—namely, "no word ever has exactly the same meaning twice"—there must be more than three cows here, since COW_2 is not COW_2. But we may let this pass; since, according to this school, consistency is important only as a symptom or cause of mental disorder. What is glaring about the error of Messrs. Korzybski and Hayakawa in this connection is their failure to observe that if, in a specific context, my attitude to cows is actually and justifiably based upon what they all have in common, the index number of any particular cow is irrelevant. In science as in common sense, it is sometimes just as important to grasp identities as differences.

The semantical rule about cows is soberly recommended for use whenever signs of mental disorder are apparent. Here is a typical situation, word for word as given by the author, in which the rule is invoked. "'I love her. . . . I love her. . . . Oh, if I could only forget that she is a waitress! . . . What will my friends think if I marry a waitress? . . . But I love her. . . . If only she weren't a waitress.' But waitress_1 is not waitress_2." There are other passages like this in the book.

SIDNEY HOOK

General de Gaulle

CHARLES DE GAULLE. By Philippe Barrès. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

THE legend is already full grown in Africa that there once was a French corporal, a giant called De Gaulle, long dead and in his grave. One day the boots of another corporal, an upstart named Hitler in a tin-pot helmet, defiled the streets of Paris. Out leaped De Gaulle from his tomb and roared in fury, "I'm a general now and I'll show you something!"

Charles de Gaulle might just as well have been buried during the years when fools and traitors were digging a sepulcher for France. He put it all down, in books and General Staff memoranda—that the next war was going to roll on caterpillar treads, that the Maginot Line stopped where France's peril began, that the Nazis would pour over Belgium, divide, and conquer. He even named the exact gates of invasion, each town and river valley.

Nobody listened—except the Germans. De Gaulle invented the Germany army. It was von Ribbentrop and Hühnlein, of the Kraftwagen Korps, who gave M. Barrès his first tip on Guderian's "great French colleague, your specialist in mechanization." Pétain picked De Gaulle as aide-de-camp; Weygand cited him as "remarkable, bold, resourceful": but the brass hats went into battle thumbing the rules of 1914. Even Reynaud rejected his advice to withdraw to Brittany from Tours, to North Africa from Bordeaux.

Well, De Gaulle is really "a general now," and certainly showing Berlin and Vichy "something." This book, by the one-time chief editor of Le Matin and foreign editor of Paris-Soir, is badly needed. The Free French leader has no ball-of-fire personality. American newsreel audiences see more of the nose and the man's excessive, nearly freakish height than of his inner genius. The Dakar fiasco, over which M. Barrès drops a cautious curtain of "unpublishable military secrets," and the General's brash offer of African bases to Washington, which landed him in Churchill's doghouse for weeks, have encouraged the notion that De Gaulle is just another skull-bound soldier.

The author, who watched the débâcle as a captain at the Gamelin-Weygand G. H. Q. and has no illusions about frenzied futility among high commanders, sets things right. He quotes page after page of De Gaulle's writings and speeches—some of the clearest prose in modern military literature—and you see for yourself that the General was always right: not only in his warnings, but in his white-hot decisions as well; in his defiance of Vichy; in the restraint of his sorrow for the lost French fleet at Oran; in his scorn for Pétain's armistice: "We didn't need you, Marshal, to obtain such conditions of slavery. We didn't need the Conqueror of Verdun. Anybody would have done as well."

Commander at Laon and Abbeville—the only two engagements of the Battle of France which the Germans lost—De Gaulle proved how the tanks he had pleaded for six years earlier might have rewritten history. And from defeat he restored, in modest but symbolically vital measure, an army, a navy, an empire to his ally—and hope to his fatherland.

Is De Gaulle enough of a liberal and a democrat? Probably not. He is certainly a nationalist, of the type which has always regarded only dead Germans as good ones and had much to do with making Hitler possible. In the best of worlds we should like to have De Gaulle different. But the point is that Free France is at war. De Gaulle's officers and men, like all Frenchmen that have ever been or are yet to come, are divided in their philosophies. The one thing which unites them is their religion of France. Even if he were as progressive as could be wished, the General would have to stand on neutral ground politically to hold his troops' allegiance. After all, it is they who are fighting and dying. Roosevelt has accepted Churchill; Churchill, Beaverbrook; and Beaverbrook, Stalin. As De Gaulle himself told M. Barrès: "Some say I am in league with the Communists; others that I want to establish a monarchy, imperialism, or personal dictatorship. All these are forgetting one fact: France has been invaded. I am not a politician. I am a simple patriot who wants to liberate France." And he added the pledge that when the victory is won, "France herself through her popular assemblies, freely chosen, will decide the form of her government."

Hitler stands between the author and the sources necessary to a complete portrait. M. Barrès has produced less a biography than a chronicle of crisis and rededication. It tells a new story of the Republic's last days; how Churchill, at the final desperate conference, had "tears in his eyes"; how an officer barred the De Portes woman from Reynaud's door: "No, madame. If France must die, she will die decently." It salutes the Free French troops in Britain, in Africa, in Asia, and the Free French troops at home—the men, the women, the children, praying behind locked doors to the Cross of Lorraine.

M. Barrès, it must regretfully be added, has been betrayed by his translator and editor. Slovenly is the word for the English version. Gallicisms run riot in a translation monumental for its ineptitude. The rightist "Xaxier" (Xavier) Vallat, Spanish Ambassador "Leguerica" (Lequerica), the Nazi purge of "June 13" (30), 1934, are a few of the typesetting blunders. The stylistic inconsistencies, the tendency of "de" in the General's name to hop from lower to upper case, the weird misuse of italics, subheads, and footnotes, would horrify the proofreader of the humblest country weekly. Poor M. Barrès is a prime candidate for a Society of Mistreated Foreign Authors.

HAL LEHRMAN

Henry Miller, Revivalist

THE COLOSSUS OF MAROUSSI. By Henry Miller. The Colt Press. $3.50.

SOMEWHERE in the wilderness of contemporary American letters there is a man strolling around in a sheepskin with a notice-board that reads: "Don't look now but I'm pursuing God." I may have seen the notice slightly sideways and the last word may have two o's, but in the long run it's much the same thing. The point is that when Miller issues a book he uses his typewriter as a kind of papal throne from which to promulgate ex cathedra pronouncements; and to subject these pronouncements to the literary examination rather than the religious examination is silly. Miller does not write books; he makes acts of confession via the dictionary.

And the difference between his confessions and those of a dozen intelligent and tasteful individuals who also make confessions is that Henry Miller really has something to confess. Personally I find the spectacle of Miller flying off the transcendental handle at once tremendously exhilarating and incompletely comprehensible. I have the same sensation when I go, or rather, if I go to revivalist congregations. It whips up my optimism and I wonder why.

There are several categories of the mystic: Aldous Huxley, for instance, belongs to the aristocratic category that receives its revelations via historical interpretations; he is an academic mystic. Then there is the category of the inspired artisan such as John Bunyan or Henry Miller or D. H. Lawrence; and then there is the category of the natural saint such as Rilke. The characteristic of the inspired artisan, as I see it, is that he has no time for the academic mystic or the natural saint. Miller finds intolerable all those spiritual camels that have been taken through the eyes of needles by established grace. He has a camel of his own, and his books record the efforts he has made to take it through the eye of his intellect. I say all this because to me Miller is one of the few writers of the time who really preach toleration, which I take to be the negative aspect of love; but his own practice of toleration stops short when it comes up against any one of half a dozen bêtes noires. These include poetry, established grace, "effeminate young men from Oxford or Cambridge," Civilization, the English, decadence, etc.

For at heart the inspired artisan is simply the militant Protestant. Miller, for instance, embraces passionately the heresy that at the pinch all men are nice and good and capable of happiness. Therefore established authority is unnecessary and, what is more, immoral. This conviction leads to the most beautifully spurious bohemianism of belief, in which the individual venerates a phenomenon known officially as the Inner Light. I seem to remember someone saying that the characteristic of the Inner Light is that it leads you astray. It brings about the intolerable arrogance of minor messiahs, the private telephone conversations of hot-gospellers with God Almighty, the anarchy of minorities doing their damnedest to become majorities, and the suspicion among artists that each one of them is God. To this heresy Miller is St. John the Baptist, preaching in the deserts of Paris and London and New York that happiness is possible. He commits the magnificent crime of being an optimist. I only hope that when his optimism begins to bleed at the center, he will find something, somewhere, with which to staunch it.

Technically this book would go into the case marked Travel, but in fact it should be entered as a supplement to Miller's preceding books, and these go in the highly suspect corner marked Mysticism. Miller is not a writer any more than Pope Pius is a poet; he uses words because, as is said in Sweeney Agonistes, "I gotta use words when I talk to you." Miller's rather too deliberate exhibitions of illiteracy (he refers to The Phoenix and the Turtle as "one of the most mysterious sonnets Shakespeare wrote" and remarks, "My book knowledge is nil") seem to be intended to impress upon us his unconcern about his medium, but anyone who can make up titles as good as this particular title knows more about words than an illiterate. But he exploits only one aspect of the business, and this is the aspect where the writer adopts the toga and the histrionic pose to make melodramatic condemnations or felicitations all in prose, where the noun is abstract and the verb exaggeratedly violent. For example:

> During all the years that I have been writing I have steeled myself to the idea that I would not really be accepted, at least by my own countrymen, until after my death.

Or:

> For Durrell and myself reality lay wholly beyond the reach of their puny instruments, which in themselves were nothing more than clumsy reflections of their circumscribed imaginations locked forever in the hypothetical prison of logic. [This is about astronomers.]

But then for me Henry Miller is not a writer; he is a man going around with a notice-board about God.

GEORGE BARKER

War Leaders of the Confederacy

CONFLICT: THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR. By George Fort Milton. Coward-McCann. $3.50.

THE South has long needed a book by one of its own people that would show clearly how blindly the arrogant slave-holding aristocrats plunged the whole section into the suicidal folly of the Civil War, and how completely foreign that war was to the interests of all the people except a few thousand at the top of the social heap. George Fort Milton is a man who could write such a book, and in some of his earlier work, notably "The Eve of Conflict," he was within striking distance of the goal. This new book, however, rather veers off in a different direction. Although Mr. Milton is realistic and even critical in his attitude toward Southern leaders, including Lee, the tone of the book is pretty much on the conventional side.

The author lays considerable emphasis on the theory that the South, with better leadership, on several occasions might have won the war. For example, better use might have been made of Joseph E. Johnston. It is true that Jefferson Davis's lack of confidence in Johnston hampered the latter's work in the field, and even deprived him of command at important junctures of the war, but Johnston was reticent to the point of rudeness, and a better man than Jefferson Davis would have been hard put to get along with him. Again, Mr. Milton suggests that Lee was in error when he invaded the North in the campaign that ended in Gettysburg. Longstreet wanted to use a small force to contain the federal Army of Virginia, which had been battered at Chancellorsville, and move the bulk of Lee's army to the West. It seems plain now that Longstreet's plan was much better than Lee's. Moreover, the Confederate troops were badly handled at Gettysburg, whether the fault lay with Lee or with Longstreet. But even if the North had been defeated in the West, or at Gettysburg, it would probably have raised new armies and continued the war to victory.

Mr. Milton's exploration of all the military might-have-beens makes an absorbing story, and his one-volume account of four years of war will keep the reader interested all the way, even if it does not add much to our perspective of the Civil War.

CHARLES CURTIS MUNZ

The Movies

THE year 1941 will, let us hope, be remembered as one of the worst in the history of the motion-picture industry. The public, on the verge of war, has apparently been unable to make up its mind what it wanted in the way of entertainment, and the industry has reflected this indecision by remaking old films, some of which should never have been made in the first place, and relying on the tritest of film formulas for the rest of its output. There have, of course, been several notable exceptions; "Citizen Kane," "Philadelphia Story," "How Green Was My Valley," and "The Lady Eve" here, each in its way, first-rate pictures. On the other hand, it is doubtful if any other year has seen such a batch of major horrors—in fact, there should really be a special set of academy awards; for mawkish sentimentality, "Blossoms in the Dust"; for phony social realism, "Tobacco Road"; for whimsy, "My Life with Caroline"; for bad taste, "Honky Tonk"; and for sheer nonsense, "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde."

The holiday films are just about what one would expect from the year's record. The most pretentious offering is "H. M. Pulham, Esq.," adapted from J. P. Marquand's novel. The chief quality of the book was a gentle but caustic irony which has emerged on the screen as rather heavy-handed humor; moreover, the picture doesn't seem to be about Boston more than any other city, and as everyone knows Boston is what Mr. Marquand writes about. Hedy Lamarr, through some strange quirk of the casting director, plays a brisk American business girl; an occasional ripple of motion plays over those statuesquely beautiful features, and everyone will be pleased to hear that she is getting on very well with her English.

"The Shanghai Gesture" was in its original form a somewhat daring melodrama with a good deal of gusto, but the film version has had to make such vast concessions to the Hays office that nothing much remains but silly dialogue and unintelligible situations. Mother Goddam has become Mother Gin Sling, and her establishment is now devoted to gambling; Sir Guy Charteris, the wicked Englishman, has also been cleaned up in the interests of Anglo-American solidarity, and his daughter is only permitted to drink and hiccup her way to doom. Josef von Sternberg, who directed the picture, has used a technique reminiscent of barnstorming days, and Gene Tierney contributes a performance which adds up to make this probably the worst, and unconsciously the funniest, picture of the year.

"How does a girl of your obvious background and culture happen to live in this strange jungle paradise?" (or something to that effect) asks the aging Professor of Maureen O'Sullivan in "Tarzan's Secret Treasure." Miss O'Sullivan's answer may satisfy the professor but certainly not the audience. However, Johnny Weismuller is as good a Tarzan as ever, and masses of crocodiles, elephants, monkeys, and natives on the warpath fill the screen. Children as well as adults in attendance will probably enjoy this.

The best picture showing at the moment is a Russian film, "The Girl from Leningrad," which up to a few months ago could not have been shown in this country. The action takes place during the Russo-Finnish War and tells a simple story of a nurse who goes to the front, thinks her fiancé is dead, is wounded, herself, recovers, and finds he is not dead after all—certainly not much of a plot. What makes the picture so moving is the simplicity, humor, and lack of bravado with which it is treated; moreover, it is free from the self-consciousness which pervades most Russian films made for foreign consumption, and in addition it should correct the impression that Russian women are homely, for in this case the star is a girl of great charm and appeal.

Also on Broadway at the moment are "Hellzapoppin" and "Remember the Day." For those who can stand a good deal of noise the first may be enjoyable; the second is strictly for the very sentimental, being concerned with the unhappy reminiscences of a schoolteacher whose lover was killed in the last war. Miss Colbert gives a nice performance, but even that doesn't make up for the fact that the film isn't exactly happy Christmas fare.

ANTHONY BOWER

HUMANISM vs. CHRISTIANITY

CHRISTIANITY CROSS-EXAMINED . $2.00
(Recommended by Harry Elmer Barnes, B. W. Huebsch, Charles Francis Potter, Lewis Browne, Mary Ware Dennett, et al.)
THE MISTAKES OF JESUS 1.00
AN EVOLUTIONARY PHILOSOPHY . .10
TRUTH AND DEMOCRACY 10
THE ARBITRATOR, monthly . 60 cents a year

ARBITRATOR PRESS, 114 E. 31st St., N. Y. C.

AMUSEMENTS

CARNEGIE HALL — TUESDAY EVE., JANUARY 13
S. HUROK presents
CARMEN AMAYA
and her Troupe of Gypsy Dancers and Musicians
with ANTONIO TRIANA
TICKETS NOW AT BOX OFFICE — $1.10, $1.65, $2.20, $2.75

"The one memorable play of the new season." — Richard Lockridge, Sun
THE THEATRE GUILD and THE PLAYWRIGHTS' Company present
HELEN HAYES
Maxwell Anderson's CANDLE IN THE WIND
SHUBERT THEA. W. 44 St. Eves. 8:35. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:35. Ci 6-5990

"Buoyant, Giddy and Funny . . . Ought to make everyone very happy." -Atkinson, Times

Max Gordon presents
JUNIOR MISS
A New Comedy by Jerome Chodorov and Joseph Fields
Based on the stories by Sally Benson — Directed by Moss Hart
LYCEUM Theatre, 45th St. E. of B'way. CH. 4-4256
Evenings, 8:40; Matinees, WEDNESDAY & SATURDAY, 2:40

"A GALE OF LAUGHTER."—Atkinson, Times.
MY SISTER EILEEN
THE RIOTOUS LAUGH HIT
BILTMORE THEATRE, 47th St. W. of B'way—Circle 6-9353
Eves., 8:40 — Mats.: Wednesday and Saturday, 2:40

PUBLISHED THIS WEEK

From Relief to Social Security. The Development of the New Public Welfare Services and Their Administration. By Grace Abbott. Chicago. $2.50.

Mission to Moscow. By Joseph E. Davies. Simon and Schuster. $3.

Introducing Australia. By C. Hartley Grattan. John Day. $3.

Radio Research 1941. Edited by Paul F. Lazarsfeld and Frank N. Stanton. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.

When Peoples Meet. A Study in Race and Culture Contacts. Edited by Alain Locke and Bernhard J. Stern. Progressive Education Association. $3.50.

Democracy: The Threatened Foundations. By Reginald Lennard. Macmillan. $1.25.

Aircraft Spotter. Aircraft Identification for Army, Navy, and Civilians. By Lester Ott. Harcourt, Brace. $1.

Design for Power. The Struggle for the World. Maps by George D. Brodsky. Narrative by Frederick L. Schuman. Knopf. $3.50.

The Philosophy of Alfred North Whitehead. Edited by Paul Arthur Schlipp. Northwestern. $4.

This Age of Fable. The Political and Economic World We Live in. By Gustav Stolper. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

The Foundations and the Future of International Law. By P. H. Winfield. Macmillan. $1.25.

Collective Bargaining Contracts. Techniques of Negotiation and Administration with Topical Classification of Clauses. The Bureau of National Affairs. $7.50.

MUSIC

A YEAR ago, rejoicing over the coming of Virgil Thomson to the New York Herald Tribune, I said that I expected to be irritated by his perversity as often as delighted by his penetration. Today I can speak not of expectation but of fact—of the writing Mr. Thomson has done, some of which has been wonderful and some terrible. Discussing Large Questions like a five-year plan for the New York Philharmonic, or mere pet ideas like the wow technique of Toscanini, Mr. Thomson has occasionally been terrible; but about pieces of music and performances he has often been wonderful. And one example is good and important enough to quote from here.

"Dimitri Mitropoulos has taken over the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts like an occupying army," he began the other day. "To the outward ear all is discipline, machine finish, tension, and power. To the inner one that listens less to music than for it, there were slim pickings yesterday afternoon." One of the works performed by Mitropoulos was David Diamond's Symphony No. 1; and speaking correctly of Diamond's "constant employment of hubbub as a substitute for interesting complexity," and later of the absence in the music of "American ways and means" except "a substratum . . . of steady short-beat rhythm that, if it isn't wholly of this hemisphere, is certainly local in its origins," Mr. Thomson went on to say: "Mr. Mitropoulos seemed to misunderstand this rhythmic substratum, to take it as the deliberate effort on Mr. Diamond's part to depict nervousness. Now David Diamond has a healthy, though not always interesting, musical mind. His thought is often imprecise and quite regularly self-indulgent. But jittery it certainly is not. Jittery and musically unsure are what I suspect Mr. Mitropoulos of being, underneath all the panoply of his technical command. He makes every piece I have ever heard him conduct sound nervous and violent"; and summed this up with a reference to Mitropoulos's "Panzer division tactics."

This review is important because it was only after Mr. Thomson had spoken out about Barbirolli last year that some of his colleagues spoke too; and only under this pressure that the Philharmonic-Symphony directors acted—but then only to be ready to capitulate to the Mitropoulos blitz tactics. Now that Mr. Thomson has said his say on Mitropoulos some of his colleagues may follow his lead again; the directors may follow the lead of the press; and we may be saved from Mitropoulos as chief conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony.

More and more I prefer to listen to music at home from records and broadcasts. They don't give me the sound of a great orchestra playing under a great conductor in Carnegie Hall; but on the infrequent occasions when a great orchestra and conductor are in Carnegie Hall—when, for example, Beecham conducts the Philadelphia Orchestra in superb performances of Haydn and Mozart—I can go, and do. And on other occasions listening at home offers priceless advantages: I was, for example, able to shut off the radio when I had heard as much as I cared to hear of the Diamond Symphony; whereas at a concert of the National Orchestral Association I had to endure William Schuman's Cantata "This Is Our Time" to the end. And even at the Beecham-Philadelphia Orchestra concert I had to sit through all of Virgil Thomson's Symphony No. 2, when at home I would have stopped after one movement. As a composer too Mr. Thomson can be very good and very bad; and as a composer too he is, apparently, bad when he is concerned with pet ideas—in this symphony his pet hates of "the static rhetorical symmetry of thematic returns and recapitulations" that "depersonalize the expression," and other "structural continuity devices" of classical sonata form that distract listeners' attention "from whatever direct and personal communication the music may have to offer them." But it is my impression that all these devices were part of an ordered use of the medium for the purpose of ordered "direct and personal communication"; and while a composer who doesn't like these particular devices may use any others that suit him better, the principle of free association which Mr. Thomson seems to have used made incoherent a "personal communication" that impressed me as inconsequential.

B. H. HAGGIN

Literary Agent
DAVID DAVIDSON
Plays Novels
Non-fiction
475 Fifth Ave., New York
MUrray Hill 3-6657
•
RIO DE JANEIRO
HOLLYWOOD
LONDON

CONTRIBUTORS

HAROLD STRAUSS is an associate editor of the publishing firm of Alfred A. Knopf, Inc.

HALLETT ABEND, until recently correspondent of the New York Times in China and Japan, has been investigating the war effort of Australia.

SIDNEY HOOK is chairman of the Department of Philosophy of Washington Square College, New York University.

HAL LEHRMAN has worked in France for the Associated Press and in America for the French news agency Havas. He is now attached to the Office for Coordination of Commercial and Cultural Relations Between the American Republics.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

[illegible]
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 154 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 10, 1942 NUMBER 2

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 21

EDITORIALS
- Hanging Together 24
- Roosevelt Must Act 25
- Manila Falls 26

ARTICLES
- Production Politics by I. F. Stone 27
- Balance Sheet of the War by Donald W. Mitchell 28
- Hitler's Restless Reich by Heinz Pol 30
- Don't Plan for Collapse—II by Harold Strauss 32
- Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 36
- In the Wind 37
- A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels 38

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
- New Year Poem by George Barker 39
- A Letter from Paris 39
- Roosevelt's State Papers by Charles Curtis Munz 40
- Bedtime Stories by Joseph Wood Krutch 42
- The Problem of Power by Reinhold Niebuhr 42
- More About South America by Karl Loewenstein 44
- Clara Barton by Grace Adams 44
- In Brief 45
- Drama: The Unbeautiful People by Joseph Wood Krutch 45
- Records by B. H. Haggin 46

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 47

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor RICHARD H. ROVERE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL · JONATHAN DANIELS · LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR · J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

MR. EDEN, BRITISH FOREIGN SECRETARY, WAS able to give a very cheerful report on his return from Moscow, where he had spent two weeks in conferences with Stalin and other Russian leaders. The British and Russians now seem to be working together in genuine harmony and to have banished the suspicions which poisoned relations even after Hitler began his eastern offensive. Mr. Eden declared: "When our communiqué states our identity of views on all questions relating to the conduct of the war, those words are not mere diplomatic jargon; they tell the literal and absolute truth." The Foreign Secretary had been able to see for himself the effects of the relentless pressure against the Nazi lines. And he was able to announce that although Soviet production had suffered heavily in the invasion, industry was making a come-back and output had begun to climb again. In the past week the Red Army has made significant progress in more than one area. On the Moscow front it has driven new wedges into the German line and has succeeded in practically surrounding the strongly fortified town of Mozhaisk, which is the kingpin of the Nazi position. In the south the recapture of Kerch and Feodosiya in the eastern Crimea promises to bring relief to the garrison of Sevastopol, which has stoutly beaten off every Nazi assault for three months. And if this should prove possible, German evacuation of the whole peninsula and a retreat of the Nazi forces still clinging to the edge of the Donetz basin are likely to follow.

*

THE DESCENT OF THE BRITISH COMMANDOS on two widely separated Nazi outposts in Norway not only provided thrilling holiday reading but produced significant results. Nine or more German ships were sunk, a considerable number of prisoners taken, installations destroyed, a hundred Norwegian volunteers brought back to England, and German shipping interrupted all along the coast. The combined land, air, and sea operations seem to have proceeded like clockwork, and casualties were very light apart from the loss of eleven planes covering the more extensive of the two raids, that on the islands of Vägsoe and Mäloy. The value of attacks of this nature is not to be measured by the immediate dividends. The intangible profits are harder to assess but probably still more important. There is good evidence, borne out by the raids themselves, that the Nazi forces in Norway have been reduced both in quality and quantity. After all, seasoned winter warriors are badly needed in Russia. The knowledge that the British can swoop down with blazing tommy-guns is not going to improve the nerves of the German garrison, while the High Command is going to be concerned lest these forays prove the prelude to a full-scale invasion. Nazi fury sought a futile outlet by the slaughter of eleven Norse prisoners at Stavanger. Such tactics cannot expunge the lift given to Norwegian spirits by the raids; they can only strengthen Norwegian hatred and determination. We hope it may prove possible for the British to carry out such raids with increasing frequency not only on Norway but at many different points on the long Nazi-held coastline, which has hitherto been an Axis asset owing to the facilities it offered for carrying out air and submarine raids. Since it is far too extensive to be fully guarded, it can be turned into a liability as Allied strength grows.

*

JAPAN'S DEFEAT AT CHANGSHA AT THE hands of the Chinese comes as a welcome relief after the succession of Japanese triumphs elsewhere in the Pacific. The attack was the fourth attempt the Japanese have made to capture this important city, and the setback appears to have been even more serious than those ending the previous attempts. Both the Japanese and the Chinese tactics seem to have paralleled closely those employed in the October drive. On both occasions the Japanese closed the Milo River and marched down the Hankow-Canton railway virtually unopposed by the Chinese forces. But as the Japanese neared the city, the Chinese attacked from both flanks and the rear, trapping the invader and inflicting tremendous losses. In striking contrast to reports from the Philippines, there is no mention of the use of Japanese planes in support of the ground forces. This suggests a very definite limit to Japanese air resources which must ultimately become apparent on other fronts. But the fact that Japan was unable to use planes in no sense detracts from the victory of the Chinese, who have increasingly demonstrated their ability to deal with whatever mode of attack the Japanese choose to employ.

*

THE STATE DEPARTMENT DOESN'T LIKE "free" movements. It has said so. It has advised "free" Americans to steer clear of them. It has called the De Gaullists "so-called Free French," as if to suggest that the authentic Free French are the functionaries who sit at Vichy with a Nazi noose around their necks. To justify its outrageous attempt to oust the forces of Admiral Muselier from St. Pierre and Miquelon, the department has gone so far as to imply that the Free French are not even French. Through its "utensil"—to use Winston Churchill's happy epithet—Arthur Krock, the State Department has put out a curious apologia for its behavior: it pretends that its opposition to De Gaullist control of the islands was necessary under the provision of the Havana convention which held that no non-American state should be permitted to attempt, directly or indirectly, "to replace another non-American state in the sovereignty . . . which it exercised over any territory located in the Americas." The absurdity of classifying the Free French coup, even if it had not been indorsed by the almost unanimous vote of the population, as a change of sovereignty is obvious to any but a State Department mind. The argument has certainly made no visible impression on the public, which continues in letters to the press and to public officials to express its distaste for our government's violation of the principles of freedom for which the war presumably is being fought. (The State Department is said to have received many protests addressed to the "so-called State Department.") Meanwhile Admiral Muselier remains in St. Pierre, and the French fleet has not yet been turned over to Hitler.

*

FREE SPANIARDS ARE EVEN LESS POPULAR than Free Frenchmen with the reactionaries in the State Department. Republican or Socialist, worker or minister, all Spanish Loyalists look alike to the Berles and Longs: they all look like reds. It must be embarrassing to these officials to observe the recent behavior of Dr. Negrín, last Premier of Free Spain. Dr. Negrín, whose followers are shut out of a country to which representatives of Franco and Pétain have easy access, has performed a service for the Allied cause which even a State Department official might recognize as patriotic and courageous. As one of twenty scientists he volunteered to help Dr. J. B. S. Haldane test the effects on the body of various gases under high pressure, with the object of making escape from submarines less hazardous. A news dispatch describes one of the experiments in these words:

> For hours Dr. Negrín and the other volunteers have been cramped into a small steel chamber. They have undergone convulsions as severe as those in an extreme epileptic fit. They have had almost unendurable headaches. They have been in frequent danger of death from air embolisms.

Here we have an act of gallantry which is beyond praise. When one recalls the not too distant past and the treatment of Dr. Negrín's country in its blackest hour by the British government then in power, the magnanimity of his service stands out in bold relief. The explanation is, of course, simple. Dr. Negrín is one of those suspect cases—a man who is willing to risk death for freedom.

A NEW WAVE OF UNREST IS SWEEPING OVER France. In Brest a "serious incident," the nature of which has not yet been disclosed, has led to suspension of the city council. In Paris there have been bombings of Germans, riots suppressed by machine-guns, and the execution of an unknown number of hostages. Not only Nazis but French collaborationists are feeling the sharp edge of popular anger. Yves Paringaux, who is believed to have been murdered, was a fascist of long standing and the chief assistant of Pierre Pucheu, who owed to Nazi support his appointment to the key position of Minister of the Interior in the Vichy government. Simultaneously with this outbreak of violence the German-controlled Paris press has opened a new campaign against Pétain, who is accused of lack of zeal in collaboration, and German sources have been hinting at growing strain between Vichy and Berlin. We suspect that this effort to depict the Marshal as stiffening in his opposition to Germany should not be taken at its face value. The maintenance of the Pétain myth is important to the Nazis, for while the ancient Marshal still commands some popular respect, no open revolt against Vichy is likely. Moreover, it makes it easier for our State Department to keep up its appeasement policy, for which the only possible justification is the theory that Pétain still has some freedom of action. Any indication that belief in this theory is waning is always a signal for the kept Paris press to assail Vichy for being too pro-American. We must not be misled by such maneuvers. We must not forget that the only obstacle to Nazi insistence on full collaboration is the determined opposition of the mass of the French people. We shall only confuse and weaken that opposition by continuing to appease Vichy.

* * *

THE RESIGNATION OF GANDHI FROM THE leadership of the All-India Congress Party and the tentative gesture of cooperation with Britain made by the party's executive committee provide the British government with a new and favorable opportunity to enlist the whole-hearted support of the Indian people in the war effort. In order to achieve this end it will be necessary for London to give India forthright pledges of self-determination after the war and meanwhile to admit Indian leaders to a real partnership in the government. These are, in effect, the proposals made by a group of fifteen distinguished Indian moderates in a cabled appeal to Mr. Churchill to act while there is yet time. The expiration of the term of Lord Linlithgow, the present Viceroy, makes possible a change in policy which could be dramatized either by the appointment to this office of some Englishman known to India as a genuine friend or better still by naming an Indian commanding the respect of all parties. Gandhi resigned because personally he felt compelled to continue the civil-disobedience movement for freedom of speech against all wars, while the majority of the Congress executives believed that this attitude was no longer realistic now that the war was approaching the gates of India. Its resolution indicating a shift toward collaboration with the British made it clear that this move was dictated by sympathy with the victims of aggression rather than by a feeling that Britain itself deserved support. "Only a free and independent India," it declared, "can be in a position to undertake the defense of the country on a national basis and be of help in furtherance of the larger causes that are emerging from the storm of war." The next step is plainly up to the British government.

* * *

IF ST. ADOLF OF BERCHTESGADEN AGREES TO the plan for a new Ersatz religion worked out by Apostle Rosenberg, the German people are in for some of the grimmest hilarity since the Saint's misbegotten beer-cellar putsch. The budding Faith has thirty articles, the first of which is to grab all the property, including the churches and chapels, belonging to existing religions. This is not as harsh as it may seem because these other religions "will not be tolerated in Germany by the National Reich Church" (Article Four) and therefore will have no use for places of worship anyway. Mr. Rosenberg, with a sense of delicacy rare for a prophet, insists that "these living monuments of German culture" will be subjected to "no structural alterations" whatever (Article Six); far from intending any such desecration, the new faith will simply "remove from the altars of all churches the Bible, the cross, and religious objects" (Article Eighteen), in place of which "will be set that which must be venerated by the German people and therefore is by God, our most saintly book, 'Mein Kampf,' and to the left of that a sword" (Article Nineteen). For "the Christian cross" will be substituted "the symbol of invincible Germany—the swastika" (Article Thirty). Nothing sacrilegious is intended by these provisions; they will merely implement the National Reich Church's "one objective: to destroy that Christian belief imported into Germany in the unfortunate year 800" (Article Five). As a matter of fact, the good Nazis who file into church on Saturday nights ("with festive illumination") will be instructed to "recognize God and his eternal work" (Article Nine), though of course "there will be no kneeling . . . as this action is undignified to a German" (Article Twenty-six).

* * *

CHARLES LINDBERGH'S OFFER TO SERVE IN the army air force was inevitable, and perhaps some who opposed his conduct during the past two years think he should be given a chance to redeem himself. We are all for unity and as much sweetness and light as the traffic will bear, but to give Mr. Lindbergh any important role in the war effort or even to accept his advice at face value would seem to us to go considerably beyond the limits of safety. What might be a sporting gesture in the annual Rose Bowl game would come close to criminal irresponsibility in a war in which every decent tradition of the United States is at stake. What would be the spirit of men sent into battle by an officer who thinks that "this war was lost by England and France even before it was declared"; who was certain that Germany's air force could beat any coalition that might oppose it; who asserted that "we cannot win this war for England regardless of how much assistance we send" and warned us against fighting a war at the side of that country lest it betray us just as it "turned against France"; who declared publicly, "It would not be best to see Germany defeated; I would prefer to see neither side win"? For that matter, what could be the morale of the ex-Colonel himself in serving a government whose right to office he has repeatedly questioned? And as for his "advice," which Secretary of War Stimson politely announced "will be gratefully received and carefully considered," wasn't it scuttled at Pearl Harbor by an enemy that could never attack across a span of three thousand miles of water? Or was it perhaps beaten to a pulp by a Red Army that couldn't fight?

*

THE EXTENT TO WHICH PRIVATE BUSINESS groups have hampered the defense effort out of fear that their control over industry would be endangered by increased production is stressed by Assistant Attorney General Thurman Arnold in his annual report to Congress. Mr. Arnold asserts that "there is not an organized basic industry in the United States which has not been restricting production by some device or other." This will not be news to readers of The Nation who have been following I. F. Stone's analyses of the shortcomings of the defense effort, but it is none the less a powerful indictment of organized business and the responsible government officials who have permitted this situation to exist in a period of national emergency. The recent ban on the production of automobiles and tires indicates that the government's policies are changing under the duress of war. But as Mr. Arnold points out, the problem is not confined to a few industries. We face a fundamental conflict of interest when we seek to get maximum production through the instrumentality of men who must, as part of their jobs, take into account the post-war capital value of the industries they control.

*

EVERY AVAILABLE PIECE OF EVIDENCE indicates that the government is strictly living up to the high standards it has set for itself in the treatment of aliens from enemy countries. It has so far attempted no general reclassification of such aliens, and perhaps that is just as well, although refugees from Hitler's terror naturally dislike finding themselves in the category of "enemies." But a general separation of the sheep from the goats would prove an enormous job and might easily lead to abuses in quarters where prejudice runs strong. The Department of Justice has adopted the sensible attitude that most aliens are doubtless pro-American and are neither to be discriminated against by the government nor bullied by misguided citizens. Certain minor restrictions have been uniformly imposed on all aliens technically rated as "enemy." They have been ordered to turn in to the police short-wave radios, cameras, and firearms and to give a week's notice before taking trips. Such inconveniences will be accepted without complaint by refugees, who are only too glad to feel that their Nazi or Fascist compatriots are under surveillance and restraint. At the same time civilian boards are being set up in every city to pass on cases of aliens charged with acts of disloyalty. While not all of them are satisfactory as to personnel, the system promises a generally unbiased consideration of each case on its merits. We have every reason to hope that under the enlightened guidance of Attorney General Biddle the alien problem will be handled with tolerance and wisdom as well as firmness.

Hanging Together

THE Declaration of the United Nations, like the Declaration of Independence, is a recognition of Benjamin Franklin's horse sense, for "we must indeed hang together, or, assuredly, we shall all hang separately." It has taken a long time for this simple idea to be accepted, but now the United States, in common with many other of the signatories, has felt the hot breath of the executioner on its neck, and we acknowledge that the price of survival is to fight together, work together, and stick together. At Washington twenty-six nations have mutually pledged to each other their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. They have agreed to employ their full resources, military and economic, in the fight against the Axis powers, to cooperate with one another, and to make no separate armistice or peace. This is a solemn oath, and if it is to be honored in the spirit as in the letter the signatory nations must be prepared to make more than a material contribution; they must also endeavor to overcome their jealousies and sink their prejudices.

A good start has been made in giving practical effect to the Declaration of the United Nations by the agreement reached in Washington for unified command in the Far East. We hope there will be no heart-burnings in the American services at the appointment of a British commander-in-chief. General Wavell has made a great record already in this war. He has won his victories against heavy odds, and his defeats have been in the face of even heavier odds. The decision to place him in charge of all the Allied forces, land, sea, and air, in the southwest Pacific is a very wise one; the course of the war has proved that victory demands the complete coordination of all arms. The first Libyan campaign was won because Wavell secured perfect cooperation among the British army, navy, and air force. And in so doing he proved his tact, for on that occasion his authority extended only to the army. It is a quality likely to be often needed in carrying out his new task with the aid of colleagues from half a dozen allied nations.

Unified command cannot be confined to the Far East, and it is probable that before this issue of The Nation appears the Washington conferees will have reached agreement in regard to other theaters. A most pressing need is for a single commander-in-chief for the Atlantic, where we must be prepared for a new and furious offensive in the next few months. Even more urgent is the case for the creation of a joint General Staff to work on problems of total strategy and supply. There is little point in setting up unified command in the Far East or elsewhere if decisions as to what reinforcements and supplies shall be sent there are to be taken separately in Washington and London. Presumably President Roosevelt and Premier Churchill have reached an agreement as to the distribution between the different fronts of men and material now available or soon to be available. But new arrangements will have to be made as the fortunes of war change and sway, and in deciding how to dispose of our pooled production to the best advantage we must also provide for a pool of brains and information.

Hints have come from Washington of some kind of Anglo-American supply council which would coordinate the industrial efforts of the two countries. Some progress in the standardization of weapons is believed to have been made since the Lend-Lease Act was passed, but it is probable that a great deal of duplication of effort could be avoided by a closer gearing of supply services. Some kind of continuous joint supervision over the allocation of raw materials would also make for greater efficiency. We must make as certain as possible that excess stocks of commodities urgently needed in one country are not allowed to pile up in another. A further need—and one which may be well on the way to satisfaction—is for a pool of shipping. Among them the United Nations control a vast merchant fleet, but the demands on it are enormous. We must try to streamline its operation so that the turn-around of ships in harbor is expedited and sailings in ballast are avoided whenever possible. Cooperation between the British Minister of Shipping, the United States Commission, and the shipping authorities of Norway, Holland, and other allies with extensive fleets cannot be too close. In fact, it might be wise to put all Allied vessels under one supreme control.

The first point of the Declaration of the United Nations is a pledge to pool material resources; the second is a promise to follow a common political policy, for without that the agreement not to make a separate peace can hardly be fully effective. The declaration is clear enough on the subject of what we are fighting against, but on the question of what we are fighting for it has been content with the rather blurred outline provided by the Atlantic Charter. But even this may serve provisionally as a basis of foreign policies provided that the signatory nations agree on an interpretation which honors the spirit more than the text. Concretely this means a coordinated propaganda which appeals to the democratic elements in both neutral and conquered lands. It means a common policy in regard to such non-belligerent collaborators of the Axis as Vichy France and Franco Spain, and this policy must turn its back on appeasement. For the United Nations cannot remain united if some of them insist on dickering with friends of the enemy. That is the way to breed fatal suspicions. One other point. We welcome the announcement of the State Department that it will receive statements of adherence to the declaration from "appropriate authorities which are not governments"; this gives the Free French, the Free Danes, and other democratic groups an opportunity to align themselves with the signatories. But we should welcome still more recognition of the Free French as a fighting associate in their own right. We should also like to suggest that the decision as to who is an "appropriate authority" ought not to be left to the State Department but should be the task of a representative committee of the United Nations. Otherwise we may find semi-recognition being conferred on such spurious democrats as Tibor de Eckhardt or even on hopeful royal exiles such as Otto of Austria or Carol of Rumania.

Roosevelt Must Act

IN OCTOBER, 1940, the nation's leading automobile manufacturers met in New York City and adopted a resolution pledging themselves to "subordinate work on automotive model changes to the necessities of the defense program and specifically to aviation procurement." They called on the president of the Automobile Manufacturers' Association to appoint a committee "to cooperate with all those in the automotive industry, the aviation industry, the tool-and-die makers, and automotive body shops in determining and listing all available facilities adaptable to airplane-parts production." The action was hailed at the time as a great contribution to the defense program, but little ever came of it. The industry went ahead on the second greatest production year in its history, consuming huge quantities of steel and other strategic materials while important armament work was slowed up for lack of the same supplies. Had the industry produced only 1,000 planes instead of the 5,000,000 cars it built last year, MacArthur might have been able to keep the Japanese out of the Philippines.

We believe that the results of the automobile-industry conference being held in Washington as we go to press will be equally disappointing if too much reliance is placed on the industry's promises. At the end of the first day's meeting the industry's representatives had given no indication of any willingness to pool their facilities or to convert them to defense on a large scale. On the contrary, automobile manufacturers on the eve of the conference had inserted a full-page advertisement in the country's leading newspapers accusing the "men who ran the sitdown strikes" of attempting to take over the automotive industry. At the conference itself they sat ominously silent, neither accepting nor disputing the proposals put forward by labor. The only industry representative to speak, C. E. Wilson, president of General Motors, indicated no change in the characteristic and unpatriotic greediness of automobile makers. He asked for further production of automobiles in February and for more liberal treatment of the industry on taxes and arms contracts. The conference adjourned without going on record for conversion or pooling, leaving behind it a ten-man labor-management advisory committee to palaver in Washington and in Detroit and report to Knudsen and Hillman as heads of the OPM. The committee has no power to force large-scale conversion of the automobile industry; and while Knudsen lacks the desire to compel conversion, Hillman lacks the personal force and fighting ability to put it over.

In our opinion the automobile industry has no intention of embarking on large-scale conversion of its facilities to war production unless it is forced to do so. Its strategy is to deceive the public about the results of this conference, to keep labor as far as possible from participation in management, and to go its own sweet way on the basis most profitable to it. This means obtaining as much truck work as it can, since trucks require the least change in automotive machinery, and leaving as much other armament work as possible to be done in new plane and tank plants now beginning to operate.

After more than a year and a half of Knudsen and Knudsenism the defense of our country is still being subordinated to the profits of the automobile industry. After all these months no survey has yet been made of the industry's capacity to move into war production. We think it is time the President acted. Under Section 9 of the Selective Service Act he has full power to place compulsory war orders in industry. Under this section he can establish a joint labor-government-management board to pool the automobile industry's facilities, to allocate orders on the most effective basis among these facilities, and to order the necessary conversion. We believe it is Mr. Roosevelt's duty to cut through the fog of false reports and industrial malingering and draft the automobile industry for war. The responsibility is his, and his failure to act will cost us heavily in lives lost and strategic positions abandoned for lack of the arms which the automobile industry could produce if properly organized.

Manila Falls

THE New Year started about as inauspiciously as possible for American arms. Within its first few hours Manila, capital of the Philippines, and Cavite, our great naval base in Manila Bay, were captured by the Japanese. With a lack of candor which seems inevitable in war time, the press has generally sought to minimize the loss of these two vital points. Much emphasis is being given to the fact that Manila Bay is largely useless to the invader as long as the American flag flies over the island fortress of Corregidor. This type of manufactured optimism is, to our way of thinking, most unfortunate. The truth, as most of the military experts will readily admit, is that the Philippines have been all but lost. The isolated garrison at Corregidor may hold out for days, or even weeks, but barring a substantial American counter-offensive it cannot hope to prolong its resistance indefinitely. Since no reinforcements whatever reached the Philippines during the first month of the war, it is hardly likely that our military authorities have prepared the way for an effective counterstroke at this stage.

Although it is true that the Philippine Islands are not in themselves of paramount strategic importance, their loss greatly increases the difficulty of defending Singapore and the Netherlands East Indies. It also complicates the problem of striking effectively against the main Japanese bases. It is for these reasons that the Japanese threw all their resources into the attack on the islands. Having achieved their primary purpose, they will doubtless divert a large part of their forces to the even more important job of reducing Singapore. If Manila had been able to hold out for another month, the Allies might have been able to mobilize enough strength to insure the safety of Britain's great naval base. But the early collapse of our defenses in the Philippines raises a real doubt that Singapore—and with it the East Indies—can be held.

Responsibility for the defeat at Manila rests almost entirely with the army planners in Washington, who seem never really to have thought in terms of a joint Singapore-East Indies-Philippines defense. As an isolated outpost, Manila was helpless. As one of the essential elements in the joint defense of Anglo-Dutch-American possessions, it could have been saved. Even as it was, the Japanese had real difficulty overcoming the gallant little Philippine army under General MacArthur. Had MacArthur had effective naval and air support and some hope of reinforcements, he could have doubtless held Manila much longer. But the tiny Asiatic fleet under Admiral Hart was helpless against the superior Japanese, and air support was almost non-existent.

What was needed long ago, of course, was a program of unified strategy in the Far East such as now seems to be evolving with the appointment of General Wavell to the Supreme Allied Command. Several weeks before the attack on Pearl Harbor we were given to believe that such a plan for joint defense had been worked out. It now appears that if any plan existed, it was of a most rudimentary type. Nothing that has happened in the past month would suggest that plans had been laid for moving the American battle fleet to Singapore or the Australian bases, or that a program had been worked out for rushing American air and ground reinforcements from Hawaii to threatened points in the Pacific. Nor do preparations seem to have been made for moving Indian or Australian forces to aid the Philippine defense.

Although seriously belated, the working out of a program of unified strategy as a result of the Washington conference between Prime Minister Churchill and President Roosevelt should prove of inestimable value. There is no sector of the war where a Supreme Command is more essential than in the Pacific. Without it, the Americans and British, and to a lesser extent the Dutch and Chinese, have tended to conduct their defenses as if they were fighting alone. It is now possible to think in terms of the larger strategic opportunities presented through a pooling of men and resources. It is only unfortunate that this should have come after the loss of Hongkong, Manila, Guam, Wake, northern Borneo, and northern Malaya—most of which will have to be retaken before offensive operations against Japan can begin.

Production Politics

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 4

WHAT does the President really think? I pass on two stories, from equally reliable sources. The first is that after an all-night session with Beaverbrook the President told a Cabinet meeting that he was ashamed of America's production effort. The second is that at the first SPAB meeting after Pearl Harbor the President slapped Knudsen on the knee and said, "Bill, I want you to know that I think you have done a wonderful job, but we've got to do even better now." The first story comes from a source which believes a drastic shake-up of defense is impending, the second from a source which thinks Mr. Roosevelt is still a long way from recognizing how badly this country has been betrayed by its big business men.

The Problem of the Vice-President. One of the problems in reorganizing the defense effort is how to "save face"—so Oriental are we becoming—for the Vice-President. Mr. Wallace now heads both the SPAB and the Economic Warfare Board, and if he were energetic enough he could, indeed, be an assistant President, as the publicity releases after the election said he would be. Unfortunately the Vice-President's courage has never been the equal of his vision. As Secretary of Agriculture he did many good things but in a showdown knuckled under to the packers and the milk trust and the big agricultural interests. Neither at SPAB nor in Economic Warfare has he yet shown capacity for the kind of leadership needed. Generally speaking, big business still dominates the former and the State Department the latter. Some progress has been made by both agencies, but not enough to matter. If Wallace were a fighter, he might have used these two agencies in a way that would have reformed both the production effort and our foreign policy.

One can hardly "fire" the Vice-President, and it is difficult to promote some ordinary mortal over his head. I have heard that Judge Samuel M. Rosenman was warned of these complications when he drew the blueprints for the SPAB. It is now hoped that the creation of an Inter-Allied Council will offer a way out, and that the executive secretary of this council can in effect become the one-man boss of the American war-production effort, exercising control over both the mobilization of industry and economic warfare. This is the job for which a great undercover struggle is being waged, led by Tom Corcoran on one side and Harry Hopkins on the other. What will the President do about all this? One of his favorite devices, when beset with contending factions, is to make a move that can be made to appear a victory for either side. In such cases the action taken by the President may, indeed, become a victory for either. For, in effect, while appearing to resolve a conflict the President will merely have transferred it to a new plane.

"Undermining" Jesse Jones Again. A good example is the President's appointment of Jesse Jones to the SPAB, which has felt that Jones was being much too slow in expanding production of basic materials. This new move may subordinate Jones to the SPAB or it may subordinate the board to Jones. The latter is the more likely, for three reasons. None of the liberals on the SPAB, including Donald Nelson, have shown any real fighting power. Jones is a stronger character than any man on the board except Knudsen, and they are two of a kind and will work together. While Jones was given a place on the SPAB, the board was given no power over the RFC or its subsidiary Defense Plant Corporation. Thus the SPAB has no authority to tell Jones what to do about plant expansion. This appointment to the SPAB is the latest of a series of attempts to "undermine" Jones's power by extending it.

Can the SPAB Succeed Where F. D. R. Fails? The President himself seems unable to control Jones. The story of the Puget Sound Power and Light negotiations is typical. In August, 1940, Emil Schram, then head of the RFC, promised to lend Washington public-power authorities the money they needed to buy out the Puget Sound Company. The promise was made in writing, but after Schram left the RFC Jones refused to keep the promise. The President himself intervened last July and named Jones, Ickes, and Chairman Eicher of the SEC a special committee to work out all details of the acquisition. Jones is still giving the public-power people from Washington a run-around. The state of Washington, which produces lumber, metals, aircraft, ships, and chemicals for defense, now has more than a billion dollars in contracts. The territory served by the Puget Sound Company is already suffering from a power shortage, and defense orders are expected to double the load within the next year. The company is too heavily overcapitalized to expand its facilities. Important areas of arms output are endangered, but the delay continues though the President has personally heard the story from visiting Washington delegations and has shown his sympathy with them.

"Marie Antoinette" Jones. Until the President musters the will to get rid of Jones, Knudsen, and others like them, we shall not hit our production stride, and we shall have a succession of Pearl Harbors and Manilas. In this connection I want to tell a story I heard yesterday about Jones. I know the source well and I know where he got it, and I am sure that it is literally, as well as symbolically, true. I think the story will some day rank with Marie Antoinette's "Let them eat cake." It has to do with the disastrous fire which destroyed 20,000 tons of rubber recently at the Firestone plant in Fall River, Massachusetts. Everybody knows by now that while the Japanese are well supplied—thanks to Hull and appeasement—with American oil and scrap, we are very poorly supplied with Malay and Dutch East Indian tin and rubber. For this we have to thank Jesse Jones. A subordinate came to Jones wringing his hands over the 20,000 tons of rubber lost in the fire. Jones couldn't understand why this man was so upset. "The rubber," Jones said, "was fully insured."

Footnote. Chairman Edward J. Flynn of the Democratic National Committee has just designated Oscar R. Ewing, assistant chairman, to take charge "of the party organization's activities in furtherance of the national defense program." Ewing is counsel and Washington lobbyist for the Aluminum Company of America.

Balance Sheet of the War

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

AS WE enter a new year, the third year of World War II, it might be well to pause and consider our failures and successes, our position and its possibilities. The outstanding feature of the present war up to the point of active American naval aid in the summer of 1941 was the fact that it had gone overwhelmingly in favor of the Axis. Brilliant victories on the continent of Europe had left Hitler master of vast resources of labor and materials. British successes at the expense of the Italians were secondary, and the only real accomplishment of the Allies was the R. A. F.'s defeat of the Luftwaffe in its attack on England preliminary to an intended invasion. The victory saved Great Britain but did not bring the defeat of Hitler any nearer.

In the spring of 1941 Germany launched an attack on the Balkans for the purpose of getting raw materials and destroying the British position in the Near East. The extremely well-managed campaign in Yugoslavia and Greece and against Crete proved that bravery of opponents and difficulty of terrain could not stop the German army. The British suffered large losses, and their position was further compromised when Rommel pushed the weakened North African forces back into Egypt. Even Britain's hitherto loyal ally, Turkey, betrayed Axis leanings.

When the final history of the present war is written, the failure of Hitler to follow up his victories in Europe by an attack through Turkey against Egypt, Iran, Iraq, and India will doubtless prove one of his greatest blunders. The greatly weakened British were then in no condition to resist successfully. But after preliminary gestures in Iraq and Iran which were promptly countered by the British and Russians, Hitler turned toward Russia, and the British were given valuable months for the reorganization and reinforcement of their entire position in the Near East. The great bulk of American equipment went there rather than to England. In the meantime attempts by the Axis to reinforce Libya, necessarily a secondary operation, led to a series of defeats accompanied with heavy losses administered by the British Mediterranean fleet.

Continued Allied victories on this front seem likely. However, their limited significance must be kept in mind. Save as a base for attack, Libya is quite worthless to the Axis. The British have successfully maintained a position which is of great importance to themselves but which, aside from prestige, means little to Germany. However, Hitler is sensitive to loss of prestige, and if he does not soon attempt to retrieve the Libyan campaign, possibly through the use of Tunis, it will probably be because he is unable to do so.

In early 1941 by far the most important front was in the North Atlantic. Sinkings by submarines and planes rose to such high levels—with ship losses reaching a figure a third of a million tons greater than replacements—that Britain was threatened with starvation in late 1941 or 1942.

President Roosevelt, however, proved to be keenly alert to England's danger. By midsummer the United States, at the cost of seriously reducing its strength in the Pacific, had transferred enough ships to provide adequate escort for convoys. Many merchant ships were handed over, and the earlier entirely inadequate American shipbuilding program was greatly augmented. The wolf packs continue to operate, but they are claiming fewer victims. Replacements are now at least even with losses and before the end of 1942 should go markedly ahead. The turning of German energies to the east, coincident with American aid, has enormously diminished the submarine's chance of success.

But this triumph in the North Atlantic cannot alone defeat Germany; it merely prevents it from giving the British Empire a knockout blow. It remained for Hitler himself to open a front against an opponent whose strength on land may ultimately bring about Germany's downfall. Aside from the counterfeit crusade against communism, the German objectives in the war against Russia have been defined as (1) destruction of the Red Army as an effective force, (2) acquisition of sufficient raw materials to make Germany blockade proof. Neither objective has been attained. Instead, after vast but largely profitless gains on land, the German army itself is being defeated by the powerful Red Army, aided by the enormous distances and by the Arctic cold, which in early January has not yet reached its greatest intensity. The really large gains of industrially valuable territory have been rendered temporarily worthless; their exploitation will require time and uninterrupted effort, and neither of these seems likely to be granted to the Germans by the Red Army, which instead promises to regain a large share of the hard-won German conquests of 1941. Since the Russian campaign has necessitated huge expenditures of those very raw materials whose lack caused Hitler to attack Russia, it is entirely reasonable to assume that the Germans are now beginning to experience critical shortages of materials. Of the European theaters of war, the Russian is by all odds the most important.

On the home fronts the greatest gains of 1941 have accrued to the Allies. Bombings of cities have proved unprofitable. In territories conquered by the Axis as well as in Italy cooperation with Germany has been reduced to the minimum as Russian successes have given a promise of ultimate deliverance. Internal differences of long standing have recently been aggravated in Germany, but it is doubtful that they will interfere seriously with the prosecution of the war.

By far the greatest gain on the home front has been registered in our own country. With the outbreak of war the United States experienced the greatest upsurge of war-time unity in our history. Difficult labor troubles, inadequate planning to achieve success, the slogans of "defense" and "aid short of war," and even worse military rubbish were quickly dumped overboard. For the first time since September, 1939, the nation faced facts and tossed aside wishful thinking.

Early defeats in a war with Japan were made inevitable by geography. The loss of Hongkong, Guam, and other points does not constitute ground for valid criticism of the military services. But there are other causes for dissatisfaction. The whole United States was far too confident of the outcome of a war with Japan, and it is obvious that the services shared this feeling to a point of being far too complacent. Despite preliminary warnings by Secretary Hull, they did not take those precautions which would have made a surprise at Pearl Harbor militarily impossible. A serious error of administration was the failure to provide sufficient air power in the Philippines to make such projects as the landing at Lingayen Gulf enormously costly. A further fault of the American public is the tendency to assume that in the Far East time at least is on the side of the Allies. If Japanese aggression is sufficiently successful and Japan is able to consolidate its gains, it will possess most of the raw materials it now lacks, and the economic weapon will lose most of its force.

In short, 1941 has been the first year of the war not dominated completely by the Axis. In the Near East and at sea Great Britain with our aid has held its own but has not regained lost ground. America has shaken off the shackles of "defense" for a tremendous all-out-effort; beyond that, our greatest hope lies in Russian resistance. With Hitler distracted for another year, ships can be safely tranferred from the Atlantic to the Pacific and time will be gained for the organization of an expeditionary force.

Hitler's Restless Reich

BY HEINZ POL

THE removal of General von Brauchitsch and a number of other high officers in the German army, the taking over of the Supreme Command by Hitler personally and his bombastic and ridiculous proclamation accompanying that action, Goebbels's call for warm clothing for the soldiers fighting in Russia—all point to more than a German military defeat on the eastern front; they substantiate reports of a critical situation within the borders of the Reich. This situation has been latent for months, but it came to a head only with the realization on the part of several groups extremely important to the Nazi regime that at best the war could not be won within a period of time even approximating what Hitler had promised. When it became apparent late in the fall that the Russian campaign was lost, the crisis entered an acute phase which was still further intensified by the declaration of war against the United States.

What is the nature of this crisis and what are the groups involved? First, a steadily growing circle of important German industrialists and business men has seriously begun to ponder the possibility of liquidating the Nazi Party, and even Hitler, in order to obtain a compromise peace. They are prepared to make territorial and political concessions in return for substantial freedom of action to German industry and commerce in Europe. Second, the Russian campaign was undertaken against the better judgment of a number of officers associated with the General Staff, and thus an opposition trend has developed even among the brass hats. At present it is confined to a small group, but that group is extraordinarily powerful. It is much more radical in its conclusions than the industrial group, and takes an even more pessimistic view of the chances for German victory. Since the army will not act on its own, the leaders of the military opposition group have approached the leaders of the industrial opposition group with the purpose of discovering whether there are men ready to take over the government if the Nazi regime is overthrown. Naturally they would have to be to the taste of the army and of the conservative, non-Nazi elements of the population. Also, to negotiate a peace successfully, they would have to be acceptable to Britain and the United States.

There are cogent reasons why such plans are being mooted. German industry is in the middle of a process of consolidation. In recent months crucial industries in France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, and the Danubian and Balkan countries have been combined into great iron, coal, steel, and dye trusts, under German corporate control. Thus the promised harvest from the seed Hitler has sown is slowly being garnered. German industry in the Ruhr and Saar regions has merged with French and Belgian heavy industry. The I. G. Farbenindustrie, the famous German dye trust, is now associated with the Kuhlmann Works in France. The German potash industry has acquired the last remaining non-German potash deposits in Europe, those in Poland and Alsace-Lorraine, thus assuring an air-tight monopoly. The firm of Wolff is reorganizing Polish industry; and the recently formed French Trans-African Company, financed by the Deutsche Bank, bids fair to assume economic control of the French colonial empire. An ever-growing number of German industrialists and bankers are asking whether these fertile developments are to be wrecked by a protraction of the war. As long as the war continues, the resources of occupied territories cannot be properly exploited. That was proved in the First World War, and the situation is no different today, even though much more territory has been occupied. In a word, the time has come to cash in the chips.

But can the war be ended with Hitler in the saddle, or must he be removed? That is the great problem facing the industrialists in the opposition camp. One group, composed chiefly of men whose interests are concentrated in France and the Balkans, believes that a new Europe can be organized with Hitler at its head. This would require the complete destruction of Soviet Russia, a clean sweep in Europe, and a compromise peace with Britain—a peace that would be very close to a dictated peace. A second group, led by men whose interests far transcend Europe, takes a much more pessimistic view of Germany's economic situation and regards anything resembling peace as out of the question so long as the Hitler regime is in power. This is the more active group. It works with people who officially represent the Nazi regime even though they are not party members, and its reasoning runs along the following lines: The only obstacle to the conclusion of peace is Hitler; the war aims of Churchill, Roosevelt, and all the other enemies of Germany start with the removal of the Nazis; quite apart from the question of whether Germany can continue to wage war without Hitler, it is clear that the moment Hitler is displaced Germany's enemies will lose all their moral reasons for continuing the war. The group believes that those enemies would become reconciled to any other government in Germany.

It is reported that the leaders of this group include numerous Catholic industrialists in the Rhineland (especially the firm of Klöckner), as well as representatives of the dye trust and, more recently, of the Krupp Works. Mr. Iselin, the dye trust's Swiss dummy who was forced to cool his heels in Lisbon from October to December, 1940, apparently unable to continue his trip to New York, had not only been charged with the task of straightening out certain matters in connection with the American dye trust, but was supposed to put out peace feelers on behalf of certain industrialists—indeed, to make certain offers. In Lisbon Iselin seemed to be certain that war between Germany and the United States was only a remote possibility, though he endeavored to explain that "something" had to be done immediately to keep Hitler from committing another act of insanity. In certain German industrial circles the act of insanity committed since then has undoubtedly created a profound shock. It must at the same time have substantially strengthened opposition sentiment.

The phalanx of dissatisfied industry has found strong support in recent months in the German Ministry of Economics. Dr. Clodius, who has concluded nearly all of Germany's foreign commercial treaties, is one of the white hopes of the "Second Front" now in the process of formation behind the back of Adolf Hitler. Clodius, a man of great energy, is under the jurisdiction of the Economics Division of the German Foreign Office rather than directly under the Ministry of Economics. He is, moreover, a diplomat rather than an economic expert, even though his diplomatic manners are somewhat crude. When his mask of courtesy fails to meet with instant success, he gets tough, and his outbursts of fury during the negotiations in Vienna, Bucharest, and Ankara have become famous. He has never been a Nazi but is a cold opportunist who has always been able to jump off the train in time.

Another whose name must be mentioned is Dr. Helmuth Wohlthat, an outspoken non-Nazi who has managed to advance his career in the industrial bureaucracy of the Third Reich with amazing speed. After the First World War Wohlthat spent many years in the United States, where he was active in the oil industry, among other things, and often visited Mexico. Today he is the Third Reich's great oil expert, the founder of the Continental Oil Company. Related to Schacht by marriage, he is Schacht's confidant as well as disciple. As for Schacht himself, officially his activities are circumscribed, but he continues to be very busy behind the scenes—not entirely along orthodox Nazi lines. Wohlthat works closely with representatives of the General Staff in the Ministry of Economics, and these generals, headed by Thomas, form the core of the dissatisfied brass hats. Their first aim, already achieved to a surprising degree, was to free industry from party interference.

The circle around Wohlthat is extremely powerful and has at its disposal numerous underground channels that lead abroad. For some months these channels have been used to establish contact with circles that favor a compromise peace, to be concluded once Hitler has been removed. But Hitler's removal, to say nothing of breaking the Nazi Party's influence, is impossible without direct intervention by the army. No one knows this better than Hitler himself. Up to the outbreak of the war Hitler's relations with the army were governed by a number of compromises which gave him the chance to place party tools in key positions. His success—from the Rhineland occupation to the invasion of Crete—so strengthened his position that even none too friendly army circles had to keep quiet. But in the Russian campaign Hitler and his Blitzkrieg strategists miscalculated, and the first who had to go was the Nazi Brauchitsch. There are indications that Brauchitsch disappeared because the generals who had objected to the Russian campaign from the outset—Thomas, chief of the Economic General Staff, and Halder, chief of the General Staff—were clamoring for his head. Generals von Bock, von Rundstedt, Ritter von Leeb, and Guderian, all of whom are now reported to have been discharged, are officers who not only enthusiastically promoted Hitler's Blitzkrieg strategy but have records as party members that antedate 1933. If it turns out that Halder too has been shelved, it is likely that this eminently capable General Staff officer, who loathes the Führer and is hated by him in return, has withdrawn voluntarily. It is known that he offered his resignation at the beginning of the Russian campaign and that it was not accepted.

Among the more important generals still retaining Hitler's confidence because of their political attitude is Keitel, chief of the High Command. Keitel is not a friend of the Nazi Party, but he still regards Hitler's personal prestige as great enough to be equal to any situation. In recent months quiet has descended on the circle around fashionable General von Reichenau, who in 1938 unsuccessfully attempted to Nazify the army. Generals Jodl and Varlimont, of Hitler's personal staff, are reported to be more expert as toadies than as strategists.

Hitler's assumption of the Supreme Command may have been an emergency solution to which he was forced to resort because there was no one with brains on the General Staff willing to assume further responsibility. If Guderian's last general order as published by the Russians is authentic ("Maintain iron discipline. Everyone must remain in his unit"), it shows clearly that the morale of the troops is at zero level, and that the generals are face to face with the specter of 1918.

But let us beware of miscalculations: there has been no revolt of the generals. What does exist is a crisis that becomes accentuated from day to day. On the one hand this crisis forces Hitler to make increasingly rash decisions both at home and on the battlefield; on the other it gives the conservative officers a chance to strengthen their influence, especially over and against the party.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

The handling of the hostage problem in France is a good example of this continued clash. Hitler's decree of October, 1940, suspending the mass shootings of hostages in France was the result of an outright ultimatum by the General Staff. A highly personal role has been played in this particular tug-of-war by General Otto von Stülpnagel, commander of the German occupation troops in France. As a major in the First World War he had the task in northern France of arresting hostages and ordering them shot, as well as of sending many Frenchmen as labor slaves to Germany. After the war the French pilloried him as a "war criminal" and demanded his extradition. He in turn created a "Commission of Inquiry" which proved that not he but the Allies had committed atrocities. From that time on Stülpnagel developed an anti-French complex, and he swore that in the Second World War he would actually do what he claimed the Germans had falsely been accused of in the First World War. The future treatment of the hostage problem, that is, whether the wishes of the Gestapo or the army prevail—will be a good indication of the strength or weakness of the "Second Front."

On the battlefield the army has scored a partial victory over the party. The armed force of the S. S., which has always been the backbone of the party, numbers some 400,000 to 500,000 men, equipped with the best and most modern weapons and including Panzer divisions and bombing squadrons. This force has been decimated daily on the Russian front. One version has it that it was Hitler himself who, expecting swift victory on the eastern front, ordered large-scale participation by the S. S. In another version it was the General Staff that threw the S. S. into the front line—to fill gaps and perhaps for other reasons. Whatever the reason may be, the Elite Guards are being bled white.

In addition to the opposition from business and army circles, the church too has come to the fore again. Catholic bishops, for example, have bitterly complained against certain measures taken by the Gestapo and other party organizations. Protestant bishops act in concert with their Catholic fellows. Dr. Wurm, Bishop of Württemberg, has openly attacked the Nazi system and spoken of a shattered home front, and the few chaplains admitted to the front have been known to hint more or less openly to the soldiers that the Nazis can never win, let alone attain an acceptable peace. In this sphere of opposition the "Second Front" reaches the people themselves. Many industrialists, generals, and even high clergymen are haunted by the fear that each passing month of the war will serve to arouse the generally stolid masses. They would prefer to liquidate the Nazi system "from above," to avoid both military defeat and the threat of revolution. But how much time is left? That is the decisive question. Can Hitler achieve during the coming year what he failed to achieve in 1941? If not, can the "Second Front" close the gap by means of a "negotiated peace without the Nazis" before the inevitable collapse?

Don't Plan for Collapse

BY HAROLD STRAUSS

II. Program for a Peace Economy

SECOND only to military victory as a major problem of American society is the transformation of full war production to full peace production when the struggle is over. If we can put our finger on the force that is now making our gigantic industrial mechanism tick, if we can discover the true initiative, the propulsive agent behind our armament drive, we might be able to housebreak this force to the uses of peace. The impetus toward industrial expansion is not now coming from within business; it comes from an aroused community. Something is happening now which is striking the shackles of financial control from production. We are making certain kinds of goods now regardless of their marketability and regardless of profit. It happens that they are war goods; they might just as well be peace goods.

The theorists of the thirties, wrestling with the problems of the Long Depression, almost always came face to face with the question of new investment. Every student predicted that a resumption of new investment in adequate volume would banish the depression, for it had been amply shown that full employment and full production are dependent upon the rate of new investment, at least in a society in which there exists an irresistible inclination to save. The great problem then became: how was new investment to be initiated?

Traditionally, business was supposed to initiate new investment automatically, in response to the lure of profits. But in the middle thirties the lure was there—to no avail. Although profits were large, there was no substantial new investment, no real dent in the number of unemployed. The business man attributed this to lack of confidence in the New Deal, which was equivalent to admitting that there were factors other than profits, such as his power and prestige in the community, which controlled the business man's actions. Slowly everyone began to see that new investment was only to a slight degree an automatic economic response. Business men became quite mystical on the subject. They said, kick out the New Deal and we will give you new investment. Whereupon the Temporary National Economic Committee, in one of its most useful projects, undertook to bring the discussion back to the realm of economics. TNEC Monograph Number Twelve, "Prices, Profits, and New Investment," shows exhaustively and conclusively that in general new investment is much more responsive to the ratio of capacity to current output, and to technological advances, than to the rate of profit or business "confidence." This simply means that business will usually fill orders, and that it will use the best available processes. It will do this regardless of its frame of mind, for the plea of "no confidence" is a political smoke screen.

The TNEC analysis is shrewd enough in terms of academic economics, but it falls short of the mark in two respects. It is strictly quantitative; and it is merely descriptive of what happens in a society that allows itself to succumb to cyclical depressions. For continuous new investment restricted to going industries tends to raise capacity in relation to output. And technological advances are necessarily irregular and uncontrollable. That is why depressions have invariably succeeded periods of new investment. Therefore, even if we can attain a rapid rate of new investment after the war in order to transform war industries into peace industries, there nevertheless remains the prospect of subsequent collapse; that is, even if there is a boom immediately after the end of the war, the inevitable outstripping of market demand by new productive capacity in going industries will subsequently precipitate a collapse.

So runs the argument of even the most optimistic. Fortunately, however, the nature of "demand" is not adequately apprehended by economists who take this purely mechanistic approach. They fail at this point because they are economists, and not politicians or moralists; they take no note of the possibility of the continuous mobilization of demand by means that have not hitherto played a part in the economic structure except during time of war. They simply make an unimaginative audit of past experience. This accounting approach is trustworthy only in a static economy. It is not likely that it will be useful in the face of the vast change now taking place in our economic structure—the huge expansion in its physical base. The accountants say we shall be poorer after the war; but of course in terms of our ability to produce the things men need, we shall be much richer.

"LEAKAGE": THE FUTILITY OF RELIEF SPENDING

But will this new plant be "excess capacity," or can it be put to fairly continuous use? There are some who say that it can if we enlarge the government spending program of the thirties, if we simply subsidize consumption on a vaster scale. They are wrong. There is an essential qualitative difference between relief spending and war spending. A government deficit in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1941, of 5.1 billion dollars has so stimulated the economy that we are in fear of an inflation based on real shortages; but a 1936-37 government deficit of not so very much less—4.6 billions—resulted only in piddling inventory speculation and early collapse.

The difference between war spending and relief spending brings us close to the central economic problem of our century. Relief spending left the economy flaccid, while war spending has galvanized it. The difference is that the war boom has induced investment, while relief expenditures simply put money into the hands of consumers who purchased goods for the production of which there was ample plant. Relief kept people from starving, but it did not increase our real income sufficiently because of what is now referred to as leakage. When money is put directly into the hands of consumers and they spend the entire amount, as would be the case with relief funds, only about two-thirds of it passes on from the vendors of consumers' goods to a new set of potential consumers in the form of wages and material-purchases. The other third is accumulated in the form of profits, depreciation and other reserves, and debt retirement. These are in effect savings; and to these savings by business must be added the savings of individuals. If we could be certain that these savings would find an outlet in real investment, they need not be deplored. But we know that we cannot count on their finding such an outlet. When they do not, savings are leakages. And the leakages persist in every round of expenditure by consumers, until ultimately the entire amount of money that has been paid out as relief by the government has been retired to idleness.

In the arms program not only does the government invest directly in new capacity and induce private investment in new capacity, but beyond that these investments are in themselves investment-inducing. That is, the new plants put up by or on behalf of the government are not only real assets capable of increasing our real income; but they induce investment on the part of the suppliers of the new plants, and on the part of the suppliers of the suppliers. To put it simply, the demand is for a kind of goods for which there are inadequate productive facilities. A single investment in a new aviation plant may induce expansion of steel mills, metallurgical industries, power plants, and much else. This is statistically confirmed by the huge current expansion in commercial loans, and by the employment of large, hitherto idle, cash balances by industry.

Such a situation requires a new interpretation of economic demand. The use of the word demand by classical economists was static, and referred to the actual possibilities of selling anything at a given moment. It was synonymous with marketability. Thus the Ricardian analysis assumed that consumption is always equal to output, and made allowances for neither expansion nor contraction of the whole economy. Modern economists have improved upon Ricardo by concerning themselves with changes in the volume of production originating within the economic structure. But a truly progressive analysis of demand will go beyond the mechanics of the market-place and put great stress, not only on cyclical change, but also upon those changes imposed on the economic system from without, by mobilized demand. The most striking of such changes have hitherto been imposed by war. The classical economists always had a lot of trouble with war, because they were trained to think of demand as something automatic. The progressive economist thinks of demand as something human, something originating within the community, something that can be planned.

WE CAN AFFORD "WASTE"

Demand is obviously present now—the demand for arms; but one thing stands in the way of an objective perception of its economic function. That one thing is humanitarian sentimentality. The view is widespread that arms production is pure waste. In an economic sense that view is wrong. The fact that munitions are destined to go up in smoke has no more economic significance than the "waste" of gasoline spent for joy-riding or the "waste" of fabrics lavished on women's silly hats, which, even if they do not, should likewise go up in smoke. Nor does the fact that bombs are used to kill people alter this proposition. Our dislike for the way a particular article is used does not entitle us to deny that it is consumed. Any such denial would dismiss all activity not productive of sheer animal necessities as waste. It is the triumph of our technology that we can afford "waste" of this kind. In fact, the fundamental pattern of our lives, of our industrial society, of the way we live together in cities and work in factories is the result of our determination to afford just such "waste."

The error that stigmatizes battleships as unproductive is not a new one. There was a time when the Physiocrats denounced all manufacture as waste, and insisted that manufacturers and their employees were parasites preying upon the true producers—the agriculturists. Adam Smith exploded this fallacy by showing that agriculture enriched itself when it became able to support manufacture by its surpluses. The enrichment was not the money it obtained by selling its produce but the goods it obtained in exchange. Adam Smith in turn was unable to see the whole picture. His peculiar materialism, as Alvin H. Hansen points out, forced him to argue that only those who produce material goods were productive, thus excluding "churchmen, lawyers, physicians, men of letters of all kinds, players, buffoons, musicians, opera singers, opera dancers, etc." This of course was pure prejudice, for we can now see that any activity that satisfies human wants is productive. All such activities cannot at once be "economized" or drawn within the economic system; but economic progress consists essentially in the ability of existing factors of production to accumulate surpluses by greater efficiency and by technological advance, so that there may be a continuous withdrawal of factors of production from present activities, and a devotion of these factors to new activities. Surpluses are the real assets of civilization. In a transition period, surpluses reflect themselves in unemployment. This simply means that hitherto we have been intolerably slow in recognizing our assets and in using them. We sin constantly, as Smith sinned in his time, when we fail to see that the work of his list of non-material producers not only satisfies human wants but can also be "afforded" by industry and agriculture as soon as these are able to produce a surplus.

Adam Smith's error has been largely rectified. But some who see that he was wrong in respect to buffoons and men of letters repeat his mistake in respect to government expenditures. They assert that public investment in parks, roads, schools, and hospitals is unproductive, while private expenditures are generally productive. But this view will not withstand careful analysis, for it is only the device of payment that differs. We pay for a pleasure car directly and individually, but we pay for the roads on which we drive that car indirectly and collectively, through taxation. The distinction has some moral significance, because there is an element of compulsion in taxation, but it has only slight economic significance. It is clear that a well-built road performs a service which we enjoy and for which one way or another we must pay.

Clearly, physical security against an armed enemy is a human want as genuine as the desire for fluff and feathers. This want is served by tanks and warplanes and battleships. We may deplore on moral grounds that our productivity must now be channeled toward the manufacture of instruments of death; but on economic grounds we should rejoice that we are impressively able to afford the undertaking. We as a community, by extra-economic processes, have conceived the need for arms. We have imposed this new demand upon the productive plant of the nation. Once we have understood the nature of this conceptual act, or, if you will, of this imaginative act, we can see how we might adapt it to the purposes of peace. We can see that the core of the job is the continuous formulation of new demands for necessary, useful, or enjoyable products, and the deliberate imposition of these demands upon the productive plant of the nation.

Some may fear that this process can loose such a flood of goods that man will drown in it. In answer it is necessary only to say that the formula does not deal only with material things; it envisions the production of nonmaterial services, and of the things of the mind and the spirit. The process cannot be too rapid in any case, since there is available at any one time only a finite surplus of current production. The rate at which new demands are formulated must clearly be governed by the availability of man-power, materials, and machinery. But the fact that at this point in our argument we must seek a limit to new demand is proof that, in the words of Henderson, "the philosophy that we can never achieve and maintain something approaching full employment . . . is false."

I shall not discuss here the kinds of new demand that can be formulated after the war. Any forward-looking, imaginative person can supply a list. The making of lists of this kind has long been a progressive pastime. The important matter is not the kind of goods that are in question, but the precise fashion in which new demand can be imposed upon the economic system.

FORCED PRODUCTION: A PEACE-TIME PROGRAM

Let us now suppose that the need for arms abates, so that we come face to face with the much-heralded post-war collapse. In terms of the marketability of goods, to content ourselves for the moment with so repugnant a criterion, there quite clearly will be some impairment of the economy. There will be a simultaneous release of munitions workers from employment and conscripts from the army—and neither will have a prospect of reemployment in a private industry confessedly devoid of the intention of new expansion, and already making plans for the drastic reduction of output. But if progressives come to understand the real nature of surpluses and how they enable society to afford new undertakings, post-war disemployment should be welcomed rather than deplored. For available (unemployed) man-power and surpluses are but two aspects of the same phenomenon, and surpluses are an asset. Our responsibility, of course, is to use this asset as rapidly, as efficiently, and as constructively as possible.

There is a likelihood that the war effort will have materially reduced consumption for a time. There may then be a sudden increase in the demand for consumers' goods, notwithstanding widespread unemployment. But an increased production of consumers' goods alone, as we learned in 1937, is not sufficient to float our economy, particularly if the lid is removed from prices. When peace comes, we shall be able to make automobiles and refrigerators and radios without much new investment. The output of consumers' goods can be vastly expanded without requiring new factors of production. The regular depreciation of machinery and its replacement by machinery that is more efficient are alone sufficient to expand the output of consumers' goods steadily—without new investment, and therefore without absorbing the newly disemployed. It must be remembered that the cost of replacing worn-out machinery is not new investment, for depreciation charges are a part of current operating costs. The only hope of avoiding a situation similar to the unpleasant one of 1936-37, when there was a high volume of output of consumers' goods concurrently with widespread unemployment, lies in a systematic, balanced, and coordinated expansion of the entire economic system: that is, in the demand terminology which I have stressed, the only hope lies in the imposition of new demands by extra-economic processes.

We can do this with the same techniques we use to obtain war production. We can authorize government agencies to prompt expansion; and if prompting fails, to command expansion; and if commanding fails, to undertake expansion directly. (By prompting I mean the use of such devices as tax remission and subsidy. Some of these devices, such as the five-year amortization of new defense plants and the Defense Plant Corporation loans, are being used now to obtain war production. In my last article I denounced them as bribes to business. They are bribes because they are secret. But certainly if they are used in an open and honest fashion for the constructive purposes of peace, they can be more readily accepted as a useful mechanism.) The sequence of the three methods, prompting, commanding, undertaking, is important, and offers a concept now much more useful than the old concepts of socialism and capitalism and their various modifications of state socialism and state capitalism. In the mixed economies of Great Britain and the United States there are some fields in which production is governed by marketability and private initiative, some in which production is prompted, a few in which it is commanded, and one or two in which it is undertaken directly by the government. In Germany the first form has practically vanished, and production is largely prompted or commanded. In the Soviet Union it is, of course, undertaken directly. It seems clear that the form adopted should be chosen not for ideological but rather for pragmatic reasons, in accordance with the availability of surplus man-power and the workability of the more traditional methods.

This view rests upon one cardinal principle, clearly demonstrated by the arms effort: the people, at any time, are able to conceive new demands, and to impose them on the economic system. More specifically, the people, acting collectively, can open up many new channels of production not of themselves inviting to private capital. Where the sine qua non is not profit but rather the satisfaction of human wants by an increased flow of useful or enjoyable goods and services, there are staggering possibilities for the organization of production. The forms of organization are many and flexible: we have had experience with public agencies such as the TVA; with semi-public agencies, such as the Port of New York Authority; with private organizations operating under government subsidy, such as the merchant marine and air lines. The significant thing is not whether an agency is public or private; the significant thing is that the initiative that brought the agency into being has passed from private hands to the government, which is to say, to the people acting collectively.

This is a production program. It has nothing to do with the spending program of the thirties, with their confusions, their fumblings, their social tensions, and, above all, their continued unemployment. Unemployment is a storm signal, the sign that we must initiate new enterprises. The government's efforts must be directed toward keeping the workers in the factories and the farmers in the fields, and toward increasing our capacity to produce new types of goods and services. It must charge itself with the responsibility of imposing new demands upon the economic system. This requires a program of government investment, or a program of investment induction, or, better still, a combination of the two.

It is not possible to expect conservatives to support a program such as has been outlined here. They will rely on institutional inertia to bobble back into the groove of scarcity, of limited production, of inequitable fluctuations in prices, of idle men, money, and machines. That means an enormous deflation, falling commodity prices, and an increase in the value of the dollar. That in turn means that those with an accumulation of dollars will be able to increase the concentration of ownership of the means of production, while those dependent upon the velocity of the turnover of dollars, chiefly labor and small independent enterprisers, will be in for a period of suffering that will make 1932 look like a honeymoon.

If democracy means anything, it means that the people of America can and will find a way to avoid such a collapse. The meek acceptance of the inevitability of collapse is erroneous and stupid. More than that, it is immoral. Our way of life is largely governed by our disposal for factory production and bulk distribution. Unless we achieve the objectives of production and distribution with reasonable success, we should dispose ourselves differently. Not to do so is, in Darwinian terms, the fundamental immorality. It may, of course, be merely an American mannerism to talk of the "inevitability" of post-war collapse, and then to set about avoiding it with ingenuity, determination, and a good chance of success. But it is about time that ingenuity and determination be summoned; success will take care of itself.

[The first of Mr. Strauss's two articles on the expected post-war collapse was published last week.]

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Can Japan Exploit Its Gains?

SUPPOSING the worst happens in the Far East in the next few months and Japan overruns the Philippines, Malaya, the East Indies. Obviously the strategic consequences would be serious in the extreme, for we would have to fight from bases far removed from the ultimate objective, and that would mean the prolongation of the war, perhaps by years. But it is not my task to discuss military affairs. The question I wish to pose is this: Would Japan's conquest of these countries so increase its economic strength as to offset its fundamentally unsound economic position? Certainly we should suffer by the loss of raw-material assets of the first importance, but would Japan secure an equivalent profit? Would it, like Germany, succeed in exploiting the resources of the lands it occupied and thus be able to furnish the needs of its war machine for an indefinite period?

Japan's economic deficiencies are well known. It can barely feed itself under favorable conditions, and it lacks almost all the basic raw materials. It has insufficient coal, iron, and other metals and practically no oil. Except for silk it does not even produce the raw materials for its great textile industries. Nor is its industrial equipment equal to the demands of modern warfare, and on this point I quote the cold assessment of its Nazi allies. The 1938 edition of the Kriegswirtschaftliche Jahresberichte, that final authority on the peculiarly German science of war economics, passes the following verdict: "In the event of war with one or more big industrial powers, Japan's present industrial capacity is not great enough to supply its needs, particularly with regard to iron and steel, the production of which, in addition, is largely dependent on foreign raw materials." Another leading German publication, Der Deutsche Volkswirt, supplements this finding with some interesting statistics:

> A total of 2,369,277 workers are employed in 85,174 factories employing a minimum of 5 workers, that is, an average of about 27 workers per factory. In view of the fact that in 1914 there was an average of 29 workers per factory employed in 31,717 establishments, it becomes astonishingly clear that, despite a very considerable extension of its productive machinery, Japan retains its original organization of production in small and even minute units. . . . The backwardness of the Japanese engineering industry . . . and the very narrow basis of iron and steel production, despite all the efforts of the state to develop heavy industries, represent two of Japan's main weaknesses.

The countries now threatened by Japan's drive into the western Pacific are all rich in raw materials. The Philippines produce large quantities of hemp, sugar, and cocoanut oil and possess extensive though only partially developed mineral resources, including gold, lead, zinc, copper, iron ore, coal, chrome, and manganese. Malaya is the world's largest producer of both tin and rubber, but Japan has already adequate quantities of these commodities at its disposal in Indo-China and Thailand. As far as tin is concerned, however, Japan must still solve the problem of smelting the ore, for the two great smelters of the Far East are at Penang and Singapore. The former has already been destroyed, and undoubtedly the latter would be also before Singapore was surrendered. Has Japan the material and technical resources to rebuild them rapidly?

The same question arises in regard to the oil fields of the Netherlands Indies, which, if captured intact, would supply the conqueror with lavish supplies of oil. But the Dutch have long been prepared to apply scorched-earth methods to their coveted wealth, and there is no reason to believe they would hesitate to pull the switches if the fatal moment came. Could the Japanese produce the steel, the drilling equipment, the machinery, and above all the engineering skill which would be required to restore these fields before their own oil reserves were exhausted?

In attempting to answer such questions it is most illuminating to turn to the Japanese record in China. Ten years ago Japan took over Manchoukuo as a going concern by a sudden coup. It is a fertile land which has been called "the granary of Eastern Asia," and it is rich in minerals. The Japanese have set up there a complicated economic organization which has succeeded in increasing production of coal, iron, and other industrial goods. But this result has been achieved at the cost of heavy investments of capital which Japan could not really afford. Its balance of trade with Manchoukuo has been consistently "favorable," which means that in order to build and maintain its various projects Japan has had to export there far more goods than it has received in return. Moreover, it has had to send capital goods of the kind with which it is insufficiently supplied at home. The situation is the exact opposite of that resulting from Germany's conquests. Hitler's victims have mostly been fairly advanced industrial states from which he has been able to force the export of billions of dollars' worth of goods, financed either by "occupation charges" or by German I. O. U.'s.

China proper has yielded Japan even smaller economic benefits than has Manchoukuo. The invaders have instituted an impressive paper organization of half-public, half-private development companies with strings of subsidiary corporations for the promotion of such industries as coal, cotton, tobacco, and furs. The actual results seem much less impressive. Cotton was one of the commodities which the Japanese hoped to get out of China and so relieve their dependence on the United States and India. Fortune of September, 1941, reports that in 1937, before the China "incident" started, Japan imported 53,000,000 pounds of cotton from China. The next year the figure jumped to 191,000,000 thanks to the looting of warehouse stocks, but in 1939 there was a slump to only 8,500,000 pounds. Influenced both by patriotism and the Japanese policy of paying low fixed prices, the Chinese peasant cotton-growers had undertaken a most successful sitdown strike. Apart from a minor increase in coal exports from China, Japan's attempted exploitation of other raw materials has been equally disappointing.

Japan's only hope of rendering its Chinese conquests profitable lay in conciliation of the peasants and workers. But the "honorary Asiatic Aryans" are as arrogant as their Nazi brothers, and their regime of terror, corruption, and avarice has thoroughly convinced the Chinese that they are being asked to cooperate in their own enslavement. There is no reason to suppose that the Japanese would handle Filipinos or Malays any more intelligently even if they were able to find solutions for the innumerable technical problems which they will encounter in making economic use of their conquests.

In the Wind

BUNDLES FOR BRITAIN now occupies one of the old New York offices of the America First Committee. . . . The Yorkville Casino, which showed German films prior to America's entry into the war, closed on December 8. It has reopened and now shows Russian motion pictures.

ALTHOUGH HE HAS VOLUNTEERED for service against the Japanese, Colonel Lindbergh still holds, in addition to his Nazi decorations, a medal from the Order of Merit of the Rising Sun.

THE LATEST PLAN to speed up defense work is the "Bridges plan" for shipping, sponsored by Harry Bridges's friends in the West Coast maritime unions.

THE NEW NAME of the Keep America Out of War Congress, which fought the interventionists largely on the ground that war would inevitably put an end to democracy, is the Provisional Committee Toward a Democratic Peace. Many of the former isolationists who worked with the K. A. O. W. C. will not cooperate with the new committee.

RUDOLPH HESS'S last New Year's greeting to Hitler is recalled by the British Press Service: "My Führer! The whole German nation accompanies you with ardent wishes into the New Year which will bring the final victory."

A BRITISH AIR-RAID WARDEN recently wrote this parody of the first verse of Gray's "Elegy":

> The sirens sound the knell of parting day,
> The bombing planes drone loudly overhead,
> The warden outward plods his weary way,
> And warns the town it's time to leave its bed.

AN ATTEMPT to organize a debate on state medicine was made by a faculty-student group at St. Bartholomew's, one of London's largest hospitals and medical colleges. The debate could not be held because no student would speak against socialized medicine.

FROM AN ARTICLE about Russia in Illustrated, a British picture magazine: "Owing to the revolution, the question of officering the navy has been a difficult one. This is illustrated by the fact that both Vice-Admirals Tributs and Oktiabrsky, who have now respectively commanded the Baltic and Black Sea fleets for over two years, began their naval careers as lower deck-ratings in 1919."

[The $5 prize for the best item received in December goes to S. R. of New York City for his story on tank production, published December 27.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Waging War Between Week-Ends

IF Mrs. Roosevelt is anything like my wife, that descent of unexpected guests on the White House just before Christmas helped make no holiday. I know that Mrs. Roosevelt did not have to run to the store and buy an extra turkey for Mr. Churchill and his companions who appeared out of secrecy. Without her help over the mixing bowl, there was enough plum pudding to go round. She had a job in the house all the same on that Christmas which the President and the Prime Minister filled with conferences. But on Friday morning, as she has stated in her capacity as reporter, she was back at her job in the Office of Civilian Defense. Her staff had arrived before her. But, she wrote in telling America about her day after Christmas, "so many people left Washington for the week-end that there was comparatively little to do."

Mrs. Roosevelt may have intended no rebuke in that sentence, but the sound of it ought to be still cracking in Washington like a whip lash out of the White House. Obviously, under the circumstances, when she wrote in the Office of Civilian Defense nineteen days after Pearl Harbor that "there was comparatively little to do," she meant that comparatively little could be done. And it could not be done because so many of those in the national government charged at this hour with important duties took not only Christmas Day off but the long week-end after it as well.

Already there has been plenty of talk about longer hours for labor. An admiral and a general have already been put out of their places because of the general suspicion, supported by Secretary Knox, that they did not have their men on the alert on that Sunday morning, which they thought was a Sunday in peace time, in Hawaii. Still, on the published testimony of the best possible witness in America it is clear that in the third week of a war which had produced nothing but bad news a great many officials in Washington had not yet learned that we can't win this war between week-ends.

There seems to be something peculiarly symbolic about week-ends in the weaknesses of the English-speaking peoples. Maybe, as Lady Astor has said, the Cliveden set was never anything but a cliché in a political mythology. The world was told anyhow that on long week-ends at Cliveden the languidness of appeasement grew with the leisure of fine talk by elegant people. Even since the war began, some Englishmen have charged that other Englishmen at home and in embattled colonies could not get along without their week-ends. Even in Washington some of our defense chiefs have had their splendid places and their excellent parties over the week-ends in the hills of Virginia. Outside Washington in other American cities the people far below the plutocrats have packed the Friday, Saturday, and Sunday roads with their escape from serious concerns. It certainly has been nice. It still is pleasant. But the spectacle of so many officials in Washington going off to enjoy themselves that the wife of the President in her capacity as one of the war's working women couldn't get work done looks more damaging to me than anything the Japanese have got.

Every American knows that straight through Christmas as well as the week-end that followed it many men in Washington, including the President and many anonymous Americans, worked night and day on the war effort, just as men in the Pacific fought straight through a holiday marked by death and not rejoicing. From Cabinet ministers to messenger boys there was no need to take down the sign "Men at Work." But as Mrs. Roosevelt herself tells us, many others were not at work. Their telephones did not answer. While the country was being asked to "Remember Pearl Harbor," they apparently didn't even remember there was a war. As far as they were concerned, Christmas ran from Wednesday to Monday. And during that time the war could wait.

Maybe I'm unduly indignant. It is easy to exaggerate the importance of some officials merely because they are in Washington. In spite of the fact that Mrs. Roosevelt could not get them when she tried to get them, maybe if they had stayed at their desks they would not have added much push toward victory. Everybody knows that there are plenty of week-enders who are more useful on a week-end than at any other time. There are probably some such in Washington. But if we are really serious about this war, they ought not to be there long. As long as they are there, they may do more damage than use up space in a crowded town. They can dampen enthusiasm in a hard-pressed America. They can confuse the quality of all leadership. Not only did their action constitute a sort of self-indulgent walk-out on a desperate war. Also, it provided—and might provide again—an example in complacency which might make a plant builder or a ship worker slow, if it did not make him, as a citizen, sick both at his heart and at his stomach. We cannot have the work we need to win this war and long week-ends in Washington at the same time.

BOOKS and the ARTS

New Year Poem

Love, and do what you will.—St. Augustine

BY GEORGE BARKER

Rise from my hand like the martyr from fire
Aspiring to prove that nevertheless it is love.
So like the criminal liberated from prison
The lesson is taught: otherwise we cannot live.
Too little time is left now, too little time.

Pretty my pretty who curl your hair with love
This is not it, the crush and rub in the prison
Of the double clutch that makes the time take fire.
For all this, for which too much we live,
Too little time is left now, too little time.

From hand to hand the human in their prison
Pass love like cigarettes. Thus love, like fire,
Keeps us all warm no matter where we live:
The ashes in the mouth speak best of love.
Too little time is left now, too little time.

The saint is happy in the forgiven fire.
Its liberated kiss, whereby he shall live,
Proves that the Evil is what is not loved
Loathing itself in its so lonely prison.
Too little time is left now, too little time.

And now, unless we love, no one will live
To see all creatures rise kissing from the fire
Like liberated birds from that luxurious prison
Where they have everything excepting love.
Too little time is left now, too little time.

A Letter from Paris

[The following report was recently received in New York. For obvious reasons the name of the writer cannot be given. —EDITORS THE NATION.]

IN THE cinema the other night there was a film showing German soldiers goose-stepping up the Champs Elysées toward the Arc de Triomphe. As French people have been forbidden to whistle, many of them began to cough in an unmistakable way. The film was stopped. Lights were turned on. An officer from the Kommandatur demanded who had started the disgraceful noise. For ten minutes the German officer shouted threats. Finally, an old gentleman with a white beard stood up. "It was not me, Monsieur," he said. "It was the Unknown Soldier."

Of course, after the cinema one must take the Métro—or walk. Naturally, the Métro was crammed. In our car one couldn't even bow to one's friends. But everyone knew, somehow, that there was a German officer among us. After the second stop I saw—and I think everyone else realized—that someone had pinned a gigantic paper V to the officer's back. At the next stop everyone in the car got out. None of us wanted to be shot. I saw an old lady rush into the car. She sat down and looked about wonderingly. She saw the officer's back. She ran to the door. She was trembling so much that it took her some time to open it. When the train was starting she jumped out. If I hadn't been there she would have fallen.

A few days before this a workingman had stabbed a German officer in the Métro station of the Bastille. Everyone on the platform and on the train was arrested. A certain number of them were allowed to see their families. They were optimistic and said they would be home soon. They were executed the next day.

Paris looks sad. The swastika flies above every public monument, and now Paris is called "La ville sans regard." Since the war against Russia many German soldiers have disappeared, but they have been replaced by Frauen in Uniform. All night clubs are open and filled with Germans and their collaborationist friends. Life is very gay, and champagne flows like water—but French people (if there are any) must leave at 11:30 or stay until the curfew ends at five in the morning. The Bœuf sur le Toit has been forced to move four times, each time having to remove its enormous and famous cellar. The reason given was that Jews and odd intellectuals frequented the place. The "Bœuf" still exists, thanks to the intervention of Jean Cocteau, who is an active collaborationist.

Theaters begin at 7:30 because the last Métro is at 11:15, and every person must be home by midnight. German officers and soldiers and collaborationists (in evening dress) are predominant at the opera. Very few French people go and then in ordinary dress, as a sign of mourning. Serge Lifar's ballets had an enormous success last winter, and he himself is now resting in Venice. Pablo Picasso has been released from prison and is now working at a big statue which he hides jealously even from his admirers. Derain and Dufy are also working in Paris and keeping very much to themselves. On the other hand, Sacha Guitry collaborates actively with the Germans. Jean Giono, who recently wrote "Le Bout de la Route," invited General von Stülpnagel, head of the Kommandatur, to the première.

The most popular book in the occupied zone is the "Journal" of André Gide, now unobtainable. The Germans asked Gide to make a new cheap edition in which he should omit the "offensive" passages. Gide answered No. He has also handed in his resignation to the Nouvelle Revue Française, which is now divided into two camps. I suppose everyone knows that L'Illustration has become practically a German magazine—in fact, one of Hitler's favorites. Match (the French Life) no longer exists, but has been replaced by the German picture magazine Signal. Parisians no longer read newspapers—which is the same as saying Americans no longer chew gum. But the edition which announced the attempt on Laval's life was sold out within two minutes.

Marcel Bataillon, a professor at the Sorbonne and a specialist on American questions, has been arrested because of his "spirit of rebellion." In university circles professors as well as students are against collaboration. In spite of the danger, one often sees students demonstrating in the streets.

In the Louvre there are only empty rooms; many chefs-d'œuvre have been put in the provinces—the provinces of "the other France" as it is ironically called in the occupied zone. All Jewish collections—given or lent to the state—have been taken by the Germans, not only from the Louvre, but from other museums also. All Jewish property has been requisitioned, and that's only a little finger of what they do to the Jews. Hostages?

Food and cigarettes scarcely exist, though the tobacco crop is much larger than normal. Nevertheless, a man in France is allowed two packages of ordinary cigarettes every ten days. Women are not allowed to buy tobacco in any form. Each person in France is allowed one egg each month. Wine—ordinary red wine—is so closely rationed that a workingman can have but one bottle a week. I thought that at least the lack of wine—which grows in France and which France exports—could not be blamed on the English blockade. But yes. The newspapers say that the lack of wine is caused by the fact that the African colonies can no longer ship as much as usual to the mother-country.

However, the black market exists. And at the Cafe Weber one can have an omelette (two eggs) for sixty francs. Prices are so astronomical that money hasn't a normal value. Everyone tries to buy something solid—land, pictures, diamonds.

All the pigeons of Paris are dead. Some have been eaten, which is natural, but most of them have been condemned to death because they carry messages.

Roosevelt's State Papers

THE PUBLIC PAPERS AND ADDRESSES OF FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT. Compiled and Collated by Samuel I. Rosenman. Volumes for 1937, 1938, 1939, and 1940. The Macmillan Company. $30.

DID any other President of the United States ever have so keen a consciousness of history as has Franklin D. Roosevelt? He has not only established the library at Hyde Park, where eventually all his papers will be collected, but he has also taken care to publish the more important of them along with notes that seem designed, consciously or unconsciously, to clothe many of his public acts in their most pleasing dress. The four volumes under review cover the second administration, and are thus a continuation of the five similar volumes published in 1938, which covered Mr. Roosevelt's first administration and his two terms as Governor of New York.

Books like these, of course, are intended first of all for reference, but there is much in them of high and immediate interest. This statement applies not only to the introduction which Mr. Roosevelt has written for each volume and to the notes which he has appended to some of the documents but also to many of the messages and speeches and, above all, to the reports of the press conferences. It is in them that Mr. Roosevelt's love for life and for his high office bubbles forth in all its amazing gusto. He teases the reporters, he lectures them, and he laughs with them and at them. He even laughs at himself. The humor will perhaps not split your sides, but it will serve; and can you imagine it happening anywhere else in the world during this period? Historians may find it significant that in their great day of trouble the democracies were led by a man who could laugh.

Three of the conferences were with special groups, and one on April 21, 1938, with the American Society of Newspaper Editors, is worthy of special mention. The President was in high fettle. Earlier on that same day he had spoken to the Daughters of the American Revolution, and he had told them: "Remember, remember always, that all of us, and you and I especially, are descended from immigrants and revolutionists." The Daughters had not liked it much, and the newspaper editors were not too pleased when the President said he was putting them in the same category with the D. A. R. He gave them a lecture of straight, hard facts. Nor were these editors stooges: they asked questions that were just as sharp as his answers. The conference was a long one, for it covers thirty-five printed pages, and at the end the President said: "I enjoyed all the shafts, and I think I returned them with interest, so it is all right [applause]."

Another occasion when the President was in good form was on December 18, 1940, when he vetoed the Walter-Logan bill to regulate administrative agencies. Without wasting a word Mr. Roosevelt tears the bill to shreds. First he declares that in our times the administrative tribunal is a necessity for cheapening, expediting, and simplifying the judicial process. Then he shows that the bill was intended, not to improve the administrative process, as was claimed for it, but to hamstring New Deal reforms. Finally he finishes off the bill with the assertion that it was so sloppily drawn as to be unworkable. It is worth recalling that the veto was sustained. This veto message is Mr. Roosevelt at his best, and it is a model of what a state paper ought to be.

The President is not always so felicitous. In the introduction to the 1938 volume he refers to the so-called "purge" of that year and makes what seems to me the unassailable point that as leader of his party he had the right to express his choice in the primaries. But Mr. Roosevelt neglects to mention the not unimportant fact that the "purge" was generally unsuccessful, nor does he adduce any reason for this lack of success. Some people have suggested that the "purge" failed because the President's prestige as President is so great that when he opposes a candidate the people are inclined to support that candidate through their natural sympathy for the under-dog. A more important reason in 1938, I think, was that wherever the President failed, the state or district party organization was in the hands of his enemies. It will scarcely be disputed that the party organizations, especially in the South, and to a lesser degree in the Northern cities and states, are still in the hands of the reactionaries, who are biding their time to take over. Does this throw some doubt on Mr. Roosevelt's foresight as a politician? He has been acclaimed as the master-politician of his time, but he is not without weaknesses, especially with regard to building the party for the future.

Mr. Roosevelt deals more candidly with the Supreme Court fight. His position, as he outlines it in the introduction to the 1937 volume, is that there is nothing wrong with the Supreme Court as an institution. The fault lay, he writes, with the reactionary members of the court, who he charges were determined to remain on the bench as long as life continued—"for the sole purpose of blocking any program of reform." After reading this strong indictment, it is surprising to discover that no such charge is made in the message sent to Congress on February 5, 1937. Here the emphasis is on insufficient personnel, aged judges, and crowded dockets. Mr. Roosevelt now acknowledges that this was a major mistake. He writes: "I did not place enough emphasis on the real mischief." However, Mr. Roosevelt regards the real battle as having been won when the Supreme Court suddenly began to reverse itself after March 29, 1937.

But will Mr. Roosevelt be remembered as the architect of the New Deal or as a war leader? It was Woodrow Wilson's fate to have the New Freedom washed out in war, and such may be the fate of Mr. Roosevelt's New Deal. About the first foretaste of war occurs in the 1937 volume, May 1, when the Spanish arms embargo was proclaimed. In an appended note the President still appears inclined to defend the American policy in the Spanish war. He declares, first, that a vast majority of Americans then believed in complete isolation in so far as sale of military supplies was concerned, and, second, that Franco controlled more shipping than did the Loyalists, and would thus have benefited more than they from arms shipments. Will either point bear expert examination?

The next foretaste of war is in the famous "quarantine" address, delivered at Chicago on October 5, 1937. The speech seems rather vague now, but it was a warning of what has come to pass, and if attention had been paid to it, the war might have been averted. By the time of the Munich crisis it was probably too late. The President's message to the powers on September 26, 1938, and his appeal to Hitler on September 27 are presented here without comment. They make strange reading. They seem so utterly detached from the realities of the gathering conflict that one wonders why it was considered worth the tolls to cable them abroad.

Now it grows very late. It was on January 3, 1939, that the President said to Congress: "There are many methods short of war but stronger and more effective than mere words . . ." of coping with the aggressors. Oh, how late this was: in nine months Europe would be at war. How perfectly clear it is now that the short-of-war policy was not announced until long after war was inevitable. Even so, American complacency remained unshaken until the fall of France was imminent, and it was not until May 16, 1940, that Mr. Roosevelt asked Congress for $896,000,000 in additional funds for defense. On June 10, the day that Italy attacked France, Mr. Roosevelt pledged the material resources of the United States to the Allies, and a few days later he repeated the pledge to Premier Paul Reynaud of France. The pledge to Reynaud was straightforward and emphatic, and there appears to be no basis, so far as the text of the message is concerned, for the oft-repeated charge that Mr. Roosevelt's reply to Reynaud was ambiguous and no pledge at all.

After the message to Reynaud, however, there is a lull, for this was an election year. The American people were

"He is one of the deepest thinkers of all times."—ETIENNE GILSON

A Milestone in Modern Thought

Jacques Maritain's

Ransoming The Time

The universal ideas that Maritain discusses in this monumental new work are those that have become today's crucial issues—such warring ideas as "Human Equality" and "Anti-Christian Philosophy of Enslavement."

Ranging over a rich variety of topics—among them, "The Political Ideas of Pascal," "The Metaphysics of Bergson," "The Cooperation of Men of Different Creeds," "The Mystery of Israel"—Maritain unites the resources of thought, faith and concrete experience in a broad, timely, brilliantly-developed philosophy for today's crisis. $3.00

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS • NEW YORK

To keep abreast of
HISTORY in the MAKING
FILL OUT AND MAIL THIS Order Form

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVE. • NEW YORK

In order for me to keep abreast of history in the making, please enter my subscription to The Nation for the period indicated below. I inclose $..................

☐ One year $5
☐ Two Years $8
☐ Three Years $11

Special Introductory Offer

☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name..

Address..

.... 1-10-42

Foreign and Canadian postage $1 a year comforting themselves back into complacency as neither candidate faced the war issue squarely. Mr. Roosevelt's five campaign speeches are printed here, and the great speech at Cleveland is worth reading again. It was an extremely serious speech for a campaign (as it is printed there are no indications of laughter), and it reads just as nobly as it sounded. Mr. Roosevelt that night stood on a mountain top.

Many people expected that immediately after his reelection the President would act strongly on our relation to the war, and they were disappointed when nothing happened. But on December 17, at a press conference, when Mr. Roosevelt outlined his lend-lease plan, it was apparent that he had been thinking to good effect. What a perfectly brilliant plan this was, how reasonable, and yet how inevitably it would, if vigorously carried out, force the Nazi powers into defeat or oblige them to accept the onus of shooting first. This was the war of nerves stretched almost beyond endurance, and it would be the Nazis' nerves that broke, not Mr. Roosevelt's. If it is true that under great stress Hitler chews the carpet, he must have eaten a wide swatch of it that day.

The four volumes are now almost at an end. There are three more documents worthy of mention. On December 29, the President gave a fireside chat in which he promised that the United States would be "the arsenal of democracy." On January 6, 1941, he outlined to Congress the lend-lease plan and formally presented the "four freedoms." And finally, on January 16, the President asked Congress for $300,000,000 for emergency cargo vessels. That is the last item. But it is clear now that all that came afterward had to be. The American people did not know it, and whether the President knew it or not is for history to answer, but we were inevitably on our way to our "rendezvous with destiny" at Pearl Harbor. CHARLES CURTIS MUNZ

Bedtime Stories

HOW TO BECOME EXTINCT. By Will Cuppy. Illustrated by William Steig. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

DO YOU know all you really should about the habits of the viviparous Blenny? If not, please consult Mr. Cuppy, who is at the top of his form and up to his old trick of making natural history—to say nothing of natural historians—look foolish. Most of his facts are derived from the best sources, and he is right up to date when it comes to disputed points, but the man who first thought "sober" the correct adjective to go with "truth" was probably not a biologist. One famous geneticist known to the present reviewer rereads Mr. Cuppy's previous treatise "How to Tell Your Friends from the Apes" once a year, and "How to Become Extinct" belongs on the same shelf. What advice could possibly be sounder than "When you hunt rattlesnakes, be sure to take along some high shoes, a pair of leather puttees, and, if possible, Dr. Ditmars"? And how can one be redeemed from a vulgar error more pleasantly than by reading the following passage:

> I'm sorry, but Chameleons do not turn the color of their surroundings as they certainly should. Their color changes are caused by light, temperature, and mood, and not by what they are on at the time. Professors who watch Chameleons to find out these things are called Chameleon watchers. They watch Chameleons for hours at a stretch and often change their colors much more than Chameleons do. In bright sunlight a green Chameleon turns brown with lighter blotches. The professor turns purple with reddish spots. Little is known of the Chameleon's private life, and that is always a bad sign.

Mr. Cuppy is evidently sound on the subject of evolution but plainly has some doubt concerning its direction. Or so at least I deduce from such footnotes as that on the brain development of the Stegosaurus ("The animal mind was not perfected until the Pleistocene period, when it developed the ability to worry") or the one in the fish section which reads: "Much of the Minnow's sexual behavior may be ascribed to reflex or involuntary actions. Voluntary actions are the result of thought. That is why they seem so foolish." The plain implication seems to be that the Dodo had the right idea.

Since one of the chief rewards of reviewing is the occasional opportunity to shame one's betters in print, I should like to point out that Mr. Cuppy is seriously in error in implying that the Tetras and the Danios are viviparous, when, as a matter of fact, they lay eggs more profusely than the most extravagant hen that ever figured in a how-to-get-rich-on-poultry-farming ad. Perhaps this will teach him to show a little more sympathy for Aristotle and even to wonder whether or not anyone will ever put him in a poem as "the master of those who know." If not, I will add: "The book has, unfortunately, no index."

It does, however, have a lot of very fine drawings by William Steig, which suggests the old story about the marine painter who remarked when over-persuaded to do a friend's portrait: "All right. I'll paint your portrait. But I warn you it's going to look sort of like a ship." Mr. Steig's sticklebacks and garter snakes bear a strong family resemblance to those little boys and girls of his who always look as though they knew more than they should—and about the wrong things. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Problem of Power

DESIGN FOR POWER. By Frederick L. Schuman. Maps by George D. Brodsky. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

ALL but the final twenty pages of this book represent a history of the Second World War, right up to the moment when it became a world war in fact. There may be some question about the value of such a work, lacking, as it must, any new sources of information not available to the careful reader of the daily newspaper and the wider historical perspective without which a historical catastrophe of the kind in which we are involved cannot be fully comprehended. Such a history cannot be much more than journalism. It is, in fact, somewhat similar to the afternoon newspaper which contains only the score of the first half of the football game.

Nevertheless, Professor Schuman is amply justified in what he has done. For his journalism has a purpose. He intends to give us as comprehensive a picture as possible of the stupidity, the evasions, and the incredible blindness of the various anti-Nazi forces as they met, or failed to meet, the threat and the reality of Nazi aggression. While all the facts are familiar enough, there is value in having them strung as beads upon this tragic historical rosary so that we can "tell them over one by one."

The basic purpose of this survey is fully revealed in the final chapter of the book, which is devoted to an impassioned plea for a democratic federation of the world, as the only possibility of salvation for our civilization. We cannot suffer the tyrannical unification of the world which the Nazis propose, but neither can we survive under the anarchy which must inevitably be the consequence of the extension or the merely minor modification of the policies which the democracies have thus far pursued. "Anarchy in world politics," declares the author, is "incompatible with unity and order in world business and world civilization. One or the other must go."

The tremendous sense of urgency in this final chapter is justified by the urgency of the problem which it confronts. We must find political instruments of world organization, compatible with the necessities of economic interdependence on a world scale, or perish. The difficulty with the chapter is that its arguments are more impassioned than discriminating. We are told that "the next instalment of the price [of redemption from anarchy] is the abolition of the 'sovereignty' and 'independence' of states." Quite obviously the author is thinking in terms, not of the limitation, but of the total abrogation, of national sovereignties, which means that he wants a world super-state. But he does not discuss either the political feasibility or the desirability of such a proposal. Where will the locus of this state be? How will the international impartiality of its armies be guaranteed? In what sense will it be democratic?

One cannot be at all certain that the author is thinking of a democratic world order. He speaks of a "new élite" supplying its "political leadership." He compares it with the Roman Empire and holds out the hope that it will abolish "international conflict and class conflict" as "did the empire of ancient Rome." (The idea that the Roman Empire abolished class conflict is rather breath-taking.) Where will the hegemony in this world federation be rooted? The author suggests an Anglo-Saxon hegemony in the words: "[The world] will be federated either by the triple alliance and its vassals or by a dynamic Anglo-America, supported by Latin America, by Russia, and by free India and China." It is realistic to assume that the victorious nations will in fact have a hegemony in a new world federation. But the important point is to provide constitutional instruments to prevent such a hegemony from being nothing more than Anglo-Saxon imperialism in a new guise.

The whole problem of power is dealt with as inexactly as is that of the relation of central authority in a super-state to the constitutional forms which must prevent the central authority from becoming tyrannical. We are told that "power politics" must go. Yet there is no other kind of politics than power politics, in the sense that the problem of government is to organize, harmonize, and arbitrate the conflicting vitalities and powers of life on every level and in every breadth of human existence. What Professor Schuman really means is that the anarchy of conflicting power must go. He would bring harmony out of chaos by the imposition of an imperial

AMUSEMENTS

CARNEGIE HALL — TUESDAY EVE., JANUARY 13
S. HUROK presents
CARMEN AMAYA
and her Troupe of Gypsy Dancers and Musicians
with ANTONIO TRIANA
TICKETS NOW AT BOX OFFICE — $1.10, $1.65, $2.20, $2.75

"The one memorable play of the new season." — Richard Lockridge, Sun
THE THEATRE GUILD and THE PLAYWRIGHTS' Company present
HELEN HAYES
Maxwell Anderson's CANDLE IN THE WIND
SHUBERT THEA. W. 44 St. Eves. 8:35. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:35. CI 6-5[illegible]

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents
PAPA IS ALL
PATTERSON GREENE'S Riotous Comedy with JESSIE ROYCE LANDIS
CARL BENTON REID
GUILD THEA.
52nd St., W. of Bway.
EVES. 8:35. MATS.
Thurs. & Sat. at 2:35.

"Buoyant, Giddy and Funny . . . Ought to make everyone very happy."
-Atkinson, Times

Max Gordon presents
JUNIOR MISS
A New Comedy by Jerome Chodorov and Joseph Fields
Based on the stories by Sally Benson — Directed by Moss Hart
LYCEUM Theatre, 45th St. E. of B'way. CH. 4-4256
Evenings, 8:40; Matinees, WEDNESDAY & SATURDAY, 2:40

"A GALE OF LAUGHTER."—Atkinson, Times.
MY SISTER EILEEN
THE RIOTOUS LAUGH HIT
BILTMORE THEATRE, 47th St. W. of B'way—CIrcle 6-[illegible]
Eves., 8:40 — Mats.: Wednesday and Saturday, 2:40

Order your BOOKS
from THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

●

Please address your orders to
THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
The Nation ▪ 55 Fifth Avenue ▪ New York

power, which is certainly "power politics." But he leaves the important question unanswered: how the imposition of imperial power can be so modified by democratic techniques on a world scale that it will not degenerate into tyrannical power. It is certainly better to approach the problem from his end than from that of those utopians who dream of a world federation without asking where power and authority are going to reside. They would not get much farther than present anarchy. But if Professor Schuman has gone beyond imperialism in his projected rule of the élite (as he undoubtedly has in his mind) he has not specified it in his program.

Every major and minor prophet in the land is talking world federation now. The desperate necessity of this new advance in world organization cannot be denied. The prophets could be left to supply the fervor if the political scientists would give us precise specifications on how this stupendous task of world organization is to be achieved.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

More About South America

THE BATTLE OF SOUTH AMERICA. By Albert E. Carter. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.75.

SOUTH AMERICA AND HEMISPHERE DEFENSE. By J. Fred Rippy. Louisiana State University Press. $1.50.

PARADOXICALLY speaking, Hitler has become a Columbus in reverse; he has rediscovered South America for us. The plain truth is that our sudden interest is motivated by fear of Nazi control over the lands south of the Panama Canal. Much to our dismay we realize how deeply the Nazis have intrenched themselves in countries which we had neglected for generations. One of the by-products of this situation is that the market is swamped by books on South America. A host of cruise travelers feel the irresistible urge to record their impressions, mainly based on official tourist folders, reference books, enlightenment derived from English-speaking hotel clerks and sympathetic night-club entertainers. On a higher level than these irritatingly false travelogues are the summarizing reports, covering in streamlined fashion all republics, by economists, journalists, and writers. The trouble with such otherwise valuable accounts is that the visitors are often after the same information, see the same places, talk to the same newspapermen, politicians, professors, and that, consequently, they arrive at the same conclusions. John Gunther's "Inside Latin America" is the most successful example of this type of political reportage. Relatively rare, however, are serious studies either on special problems concerning all states or dealing thoroughly with one country only—the South American states are as different from one another as states in Europe. Only such studies, based on a more than superficial knowledge, are of real value.

Mr. Carter's book is a report by an observant newspaperman who had studied the general subject before he went "on location." He knows the tricks of his trade and has the ability to size up complicated political situations neatly and intelligently. The book lacks the brilliance of Gunther's presentation in spite of many verbal flashes; it avoids also Gunther's crude mistakes. But it suffers from the superficiality of hurriedly gathered information in too many countries. Its main merit is that it offers a reliable guide through the maze of internal politics in each state. Naturally enough, like any recent visitor, the author is struck by the extent of Axis influence, but he seems to overestimate the beneficial results of our Good Neighbor policy, notable as has been its success in alleviating apprehensions about the "Colossus of the North." Many of the governments are purely opportunistic; only the masses are democratic and pro-Ally. The recent outburst of hemisphere solidarity should not be mistaken for a genuine change of mind on the part of the fence-sitters, many of whom have been driven to our side by sheer fear of the Axis. If a third front is opened against the United States, the invader is likely to find his Quislings and bandwagon-climbers not only in the well-organized German-Japanese fifth column but also among the governing classes which now protest their solidarity with us.

Professor Rippy's book cannot be exactly fitted into any of the categories mentioned before. Certainly it is not a travelogue. But the form which one of the best experts in Hispanic history and politics has chosen militates against comprehensiveness and density of presentation. The book is made up of four lectures given at Louisiana State University, two of them dealing with South American history and politics, two with economics and finance. Replete with facts, admirably objective, it offers to the serious reader more reliable information than many more voluminous and pretentious books on the subject.

KARL LOEWENSTEIN

Clara Barton

CLARA BARTON: DAUGHTER OF DESTINY. By Blanche Colton Williams. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.50.

CLARA BARTON, five feet high and forty years old, was a clerk in the Patent Office in Washington when the Civil War broke out. "This conflict is one thing I've been waiting for," she said. "If I can't be a soldier, I'll help soldiers." It was characteristic of her that she did not join the Sanitary Commission or the nurses organized by Dorothea Dix, but got her supplies direct from the Quartermaster, rode with them to the front, and distributed them to the men with her own hands, while cannon shot fell around her. She went about overcoming the popular apathy and official opposition to the Treaty of Geneva in the same direct way and naturally grew to think of the American Red Cross as her own baby.

When at the age of eighty she was deprived of her personal control of the organization, she was indignant, hurt, and bewildered. It was at this time that she secreted the diaries and documents that Dr. Williams discovered and now makes public. The rows within the Red Cross have of course lost their interest, but Clara's own record of her frenzied activities "in the field"—during the Franco-Prussian War, at the Johnstown flood, and in Cuba—is fresh and revealing and justifies the subtitle of Dr. Williams's book. Destiny not only thrust Clara Barton into cataclysmic situations; it gave her the belligerency, the tenacity, and the amazing self-confidence to make the most of her opportunities.

GRACE ADAMS

IN BRIEF

THE WAR, SECOND YEAR. By Edgar McInnis. Oxford University Press. $2.

Although written by a Canadian professor of history, this narrative of the current war is certainly no history, for many events are known only in so far as the belligerents wanted to reveal them. But it is not propaganda either, or rather it is excellent propaganda since one cannot help being impressed by the author's cool objectivity. It covers the occurrences from the Battle of Britain to the Battle of the Ukraine and finishes appositely by reviewing "the gyrations of Japanese policy." Because of the interest focused on the rushing scenery of the world drama this fortunate blend of journalism and scholarship is a useful reference book now, and because it is so meticulous it may prove helpful to the historian after the war. The author, in spite of his British viewpoint, is not only a reliable guide in the jungle of dazzling facts; he does not refrain from criticism, and he warns us particularly against unwarranted optimism. The book is written in a lively style and should be read by everybody who wishes to obtain an over-all view of the bewildering events of our time.

A MIRROR FOR CALIFORNIANS. By Oliver Carlson. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

THEY WERE SAN FRANCISCANS. By Miriam Allen de Ford. The Caxton Printers. $3.50.

Written in a pleasantly journalistic style and a spirit of tolerant observation, the first of these two books is accurately described by its title. Those who know California will recognize its image while remembering that a mirror reflects only the surface. Cynics among them may be inclined to believe that a deeper examination might not produce very much more; but in his analysis of recent social and political trends Mr. Carlson reveals California as something more than an exhibit. No generalizations about California apply to San Francisco, which, Mr. Carlson agrees with Frank Norris, is, with New York and New Orleans, one of America's three "story cities." Miriam Allen de Ford's gossipy and readable stories of some of San Francisco's "characters," famous and not so famous, are flavorful samples of the city's teeming history.

FOUR YEARS IN PARADISE. By Osa Johnson. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.50.

Readers of "I Married Adventure" will remember Mrs. Johnson's brief account of the lost lake which she and her husband rediscovered and christened Lake Paradise. Her new book describes the four years they spent photographing animals there, and it ends with a letter from an English lieutenant whose company camped next to their old house late in 1940. Like its predecessors, "Four Years in Paradise" owes its appeal to its pleasant simplicity rather than to any really sensational adventures or any literary quality. The writing is simple almost to the point of naivete, but it does manage somehow to communicate the fact that the Johnsons were very likable people happily doing exactly what they wanted to do. No wonder that it makes very pleasant reading indeed. As usual there are some fine photographs and dozens of agreeable little anecdotes about animals, about native servants and helpers, about everyday life in a community of several hundred persons living far from the remotest outpost of civilization. Like "The Swiss Family Robinson," Mrs. Johnson's books are, whether she knows it or not, part of the eternally rewritten legend of the Golden Age.

PUBLISHED THIS WEEK

Canton Captain. By James B. Connolly. Doubleday, Doran. $3.

Remaking America. By Jay Franklin. Houghton Mifflin. $3.

The Southern Negro and the Public Library. By Eliza Atkins Gleason. Chicago. $2.50.

Time Was: Death of a Junker. By Heinrich Hauser. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

Brazil in Capitals. By Vera Kelsey. Harper. $3.50.

Twelve Decisive Battles of the Mind. The Story of Propaganda During the Christian Era with Abridged Versions of Texts That Have Shaped History. By Gorham Munson. Greystone. $3.50.

The Entertainment of a Nation. By George Jean Nathan. Knopf. $2.50.

The United States and Civilization. By John U. Nef. Chicago. $3.

Swift and Defoe. A Study in Relationship. By John F. Ross. California. $1.50.

A Wavering Friendship: Russia and Austria, 1876-1878. By George Hoover Rupp. Harvard. $5.

From the Land of Silent People. By Robert St. John. Doubleday, Doran. $3.

The Plain Dealer: One Hundred Years in Cleveland. By Archer H. Shaw. Knopf. $4.

Arms and the Aftermath. By Perrin Stryker. Houghton Mifflin. $1.75.

The Creation of Purchasing Power. A Study in the Problem of Economic Stabilization. By David McCord Wright. Harvard. $3.

DRAMA

The Unbeautiful People

WITH almost perfect unanimity the critics turned thumbs down on Clifford Odets's new play "Clash by Night" (Belasco Theater). The tone of the reviews was, indeed, one which seems reserved almost exclusively for dealing with works by new authors previously greeted with wild enthusiasm, and it is difficult not to feel that the reviewers, in the process of cooling off, frequently do somewhat less than justice to those they are afraid of having praised too much. Nearly every fault found in "Clash by Night" is, to be sure, really there. Certain scenes, for example, are unquestionably over-long, and the catastrophe, like that in most of the author's other plays, seems weak or at least less imaginative than the opening passages lead one to hope. But Mr. Odets, being a good writer, cannot be adequately described as the sum of his defects, and to me it seems positively monstrous to treat him as though he could. Whatever its faults, the new play has originality and power, and I am willing to wager that its severest critics will remember it long after they have forgotten other pieces successfully launched on the wave of their enthusiasm.

In subject matter and tone "Clash by Night" belongs in the category with "Rocket to the Moon." The setting is equally drab, the persons equally unbeautiful, and the story deliberately banal in much the same way. But like "Rocket to the Moon" all this is both more interesting and less painful than it seems to have any right to be because Odets has qualities very few of his contemporaries possess in anything like an equal degree. He had them from the very beginning, and they were responsible for the impression which "Awake and Sing" was able to produce, but they have become clearer and clearer as he has abandoned the preaching of a doctrine and left the plays to stand or fall by their imaginative force.

The first of these qualities is one of the most mysterious and most nearly unanalyzable in the whole repertory of artistic magic—namely, the power of making things seem real. This has, of course, no necessary connection with what is called realism, and it is, on the other hand, identical with what ought to be the primary meaning of the word "imagination," or the power of creating imitations of reality which seem like reality itself. One recognizes it when one finds oneself accepting personages and actions directly and on their own terms rather than as typical characters or situations, when they remind one of nothing except themselves and not of either fiction or, even, experience. The quality is not incompatible, as in this case, with the fact that both the characters and the situations can be crudely described as banal or, as in the case of Shakespeare, with the fact that they can equally well be described as directly in an established convention. They are merely so completely realized that their existence is independent of either the actuality or the convention with which it is possible intellectually to connect them.

This power Mr. Odets has to a degree unequaled by any of his American contemporaries except Erskine Caldwell and Eugene O'Neill. In addition he has the power of communicating a special sort of compassion peculiarly his own. The preacher takes us down into the lower depths to arouse our indignation, the sentimentalist in order that we may discover there impossible virtues, and the decadent merely that we may wallow with him in congenial mud. Mr. Odets has been occasionally a preacher, but never a sentimentalist or a decadent, and at his best he is none of these. His people are certainly not beautiful people, and in "Clash by Night" there is not a single character "sympathetic" in the ordinary sense of the word. Yet there is not one with whom one does not sympathize, not one who is not pitiable, not one whom the spectator does not understand.

In his earlier plays Mr. Odets had a villain, "the social system." His best characters are still persons to whom lack of money is recurrently the dominant fact in life, but he has grown less and less interested in demonstrating this fact as a fact, more and more interested in picturing from the inside the tragedy of men and women who are victims of passion no less than of economics. Many of them have, like Odets himself, the gift of compassion, but suffering and frustration generate an egotism which overrides even compassion, and the result is a kind of tragedy which his plays define more and more clearly—the tragedy of those who hurt others not in blindness or malice but only because they are themselves in agony.

None of this could mean much if Mr. Odets did not have the power of imagining his people with extraordinary solidity. But since that power has been given him, he is already one of the most impressive dramatists of our generation, and about "Clash by Night" I should like to make a prediction. If it is not too precipitately removed from the boards it will find a rewarding audience.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

FURTHER December releases from Victor include "Great Songs of Faith" (Set 850, $3.50): the beautiful "He Shall Feed His Flock" from Handel's "Messiah" (18324), with "He Was Despised and Rejected" on the reverse side; the deeply affecting "Es ist vollbracht" from Bach's St. John Passion (18326); and the less consequential "O Rest in the Lord" from Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and "But the Lord Is Mindful of His Own" from his "St. Paul" (18325). These are sung by Marian Anderson with an orchestra conducted by Charles O'Connell. Reports that Anderson has been singing with less constriction and forcing and less consequent tremolo are confirmed by these records: never in recent years have I heard her sing with such freely flowing luscious beauty of voice—and also such beauty of phrasing—as in "He Shall Feed His Flock"; and the improvement can be heard in lesser degree in the other pieces. Least satisfactory is "Es ist vollbracht," where possibly she is hampered by a rhythmically amorphous accompaniment that has one groping for the structural outlines of the piece. In my review set grit is heard with the sound near the centers of the records.

The sets of Glière's "Ilya Mourometz" Symphony and Fauré's Requiem have not yet arrived; and that leaves E. Power Biggs's single disc (18292, $1) with simple but satisfying performances on the organ of Bach's beautiful Chorale "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring" and Brahms's surprisingly unpretentious and engaging Chorale-Prelude "Es ist ein' Ros' entsprungen," which is here recorded for the first time. Personally I prefer to hear Bach's chorale in its original form for chorus and orchestra, as it is recorded on Columbia DB-507.

From Columbia there is Dvorak's Quartet Op. 51, one of his best works, well played by the Busch Quartet (Set 480, $4.50); but I prefer the Lener Quartet performance in Columbia Set 369 for its greater tonal beauty. My copy of the new set has several noisily defective surfaces. Columbia also gives us Chabrier's Trois Valses romantiques for two pianos, played by Robert and Gaby Casadesus (Set X-209, $2). Nos. 1 and 2 are moderately good; No. 3 I know to be hauntingly beautiful from the way Balanchine uses it in the most affecting episode of "Cotillon"; but I would not know it from the way it is rattled off on this record. My copy of this set also has defective surfaces.

You would do better to choose Beecham's performance of the Hungarian March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" rather than that of Barlow with the Columbia Broadcasting Symphony on a Columbia single (71287-D, $1), with the Coronation March from Meyerbeer's "Prophète" on the reverse side. And Toch's "Pinocchio," subtitled "A Merry Overture," and well enough performed by Stock with the Chicago Symphony (11665-D, $1), can be neglected.

In addition to the ballets discussed by Virginia Mishnun the Ballet Theater gave "Giselle," with Markova's performance which some day will be as legendary as the dancing of Taglioni, whom she impersonated enchantingly in the performance of "Pas de Quatre." And though Markova did not bring to the part of the young bride in "Lilac Garden" the youthfully romantic warmth it asks for and usually has, her cool classical distinction made the performance exciting in an unusual way. "Princess Aurora" offered Baronova in feats of virtuosity that were increasingly difficult and increasingly boring, with an agonizing climax in circus-style even to the accompanying snare-drum-roll. Its Blue Bird variation required of Ian Gibson only his breath-taking air-turns and other technical feats; but in "The Specter of the Rose" he proved unable to create the continuous line of movement in which such turns and leaps are important points. His dancing, in other words, was largely raw technique—without maturity, without style; whereas maturity and style were striking in Yura Lazowsky's brilliantly virile dancing, and contributed largely to making him—even in the small things he was given to do—the company's outstanding male dancer.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Why No Negro College Teachers?

Dear Sirs: Cynicism about democracy is tragically widespread in this critical hour, and nowhere is it more in evidence than among the Negro citizens of our country. On every hand one can hear Negroes saying, "Is it worth our while to die to defend a system that doesn't let us live?"

The government, recognizing the basic economic causes of the disillusionment of Negroes, has taken some steps toward correcting the condition. The President's recent order forbidding any form of discrimination in civil-service employment is one such step.

We wish to direct attention to another area, not as important perhaps in point of numbers affected but extremely significant in its implications, where restriction of employment opportunities for Negro workers has done great spiritual and physical damage. We refer to the field of college teaching.

The facts are clear. There is not a single Negro professor in any one of the four free colleges of New York City. The sole Negro ever permitted to teach in the City College was the well-known Dr. Yergan, the popularity of whose courses increased steadily over a four-year period; but in spite of the obvious ability of the man and the growing attendance at his lectures, his status was never above that of special lecturer. Last spring the authorities took advantage of a general hysteria to dismiss him. It is true that Dr. Reddick, another Negro scholar, has been appointed in place of Dr. Yergan, but interested committees report their belief that the City College has little interest in the continuation of the course or in engaging other Negro instructors.

The four free colleges of New York City employ more than a thousand instructors of various ranks. Why should there not be a proper proportion of Negroes on faculties which serve a city one-tenth of whose citizens are Negro? If the principle of proportional employment were carried out, there would be close to one hundred Negroes in the four colleges instead of the one at present so precariously on the pay roll.

The situation throughout the country is no better than in New York City. Only in Negro colleges, such as Howard and Tuskegee, are any large number of Negro intellectuals employed as teachers. For example, of seventy-five Negroes who obtained Ph.D.'s between 1931 and 1941 and who are teaching in colleges, only one is employed in other than a Negro college.

The excuse has been advanced by some persons, including some college presidents, that no Negroes are qualified to teach in our colleges. Is this true or merely another reflection of the Jim Crow attitude which leads the United States navy, for example, to find no Negroes competent to serve as gunners, machinists, radio operators, or in any other capacity than that of mess boys and lavatory attendants?

The Committee for the Advancement of Negro Studies in the Colleges has been provoked by this challenge to attempt some research. Its findings, even after a superficial study, are conclusive and startling. In the ten-year period from 1931 to 1941 more than 170 Negroes earned Ph.D.'s at colleges and universities of the highest standing in the United States, exclusive of Negro universities and honorary degrees. This should be a sufficient answer to the cry that there are no Negroes qualified to teach in our colleges. It must be pointed out that many teachers at present employed in our colleges do not have the Ph.D. degree. Many are given the opportunity to acquire it while earning and learning at the college itself. Surely most persons qualified to study for a Ph.D. degree should be qualified to teach, especially in the college which grants the degree. But only one of these 171 Negro Ph.D.'s from non-Negro colleges has been allowed to teach. For example, the University of Pennsylvania, the University of Michigan, Ohio State, Harvard, the University of Chicago, Cornell, and Columbia have each given thirteen or more degrees to Negro scholars between 1931 and 1941. But only the University of Chicago has given a teaching job to one of these qualified Negro American intellectuals. If these scholars still have faith in democratic processes, is it not a miracle?

What are the present occupations of these Negro Ph.D.'s? As far as could be ascertained, they are grouped as follows: seventy-five are teaching in colleges (seventy-four in Negro colleges, one in a "white" college); six are teaching in elementary and high schools; six are in other professions; and the occupations of eighty-four are unknown.

The obvious conclusion to be drawn from this research is that a situation exists in American intellectual life that is a gross mockery of the ideals of democracy. What steps must be taken to change it? First, the free colleges must lead the way by employing Negro instructors in ever-increasing numbers until a condition of proportional parity has been reached. Suitable instructors are immediately available, if nowhere else, on the staffs of the so-called "Negro" universities, which can be relied upon to employ more Negro scholars than the other institutions for some time. In the meantime the President's stand against discrimination must be adopted as a basic principle by such groups as the Board of Higher Education of New York City. Second, governmental agencies, backed by people's committees and organizations, must demand the employment of Negro teachers in the privately endowed colleges and universities. Third, the colleges, public and private, must take up the serious task of equipping an ever-growing number of young Negro scholars, supplying the aid, financial and other, that will enable them to succeed in obtaining degrees and college teaching posts. And, finally, there must be promoted a program of studies in Negro history and culture that will inspire Negro and white students, and college authorities as well, with proper respect for the contribution of the Negro to the development of our American heritage.

Committee for the Advancement of Negro Studies

New York, January 2

Shelter for a Mobile Army

Dear Sirs: With every industrial nation concentrating on the production of bombers aimed at maximum property damage, you might think we would begin to adapt the targets to the changed conditions. We are told what single bomb hits already have done to huge hangars at Hickam Field, to super-barracks at Wheeler Field, and to super-battleships at Pearl Harbor—all from putting as many eggs in one basket as if the bomber did not exist. Meanwhile, we go right on designing ships, barracks, hangars, storage depots, hospitals, and super-housing projects in the identical pre-bomber mode, as if the chief considerations were the pleasure of the pet contractors, labor unions, and materials purveyors on the receiving end. Army and navy egoes continue to be gratified, apparently, at American ability to pay for elephantiasis and extravagance without thought that they are creating bomb targets no enemy with a glass eye can miss. Otherwise, why since the last World War has there been no progress in the design of military shelter forms?

Obviously such forms have lagged a generation behind (a) the swiftly growing mobility of military science; (b) the growing range and destructiveness of the bomber; (c) the world scale of military actions; (d) the danger of waiting till after an enemy threatens from some unexpected point before sending tradition-minded contractors, technicians, and craftsmen and traditionally handicraft tools and raw materials to build targets that can't possibly house our forces until months subsequently—if they aren't all captured in the meantime, as at Wake Island.

No army can be any more mobile than its shelter. How are we to surprise the enemy if forced to advertise a year beforehand for bids to build the base the attack is to be launched from? Just as we are in the midst of spending a billion dollars to fortify a dozen foreign bases, the enemy attacks us elsewhere. Shall we spread ourselves so thin over the globe as to be strong nowhere, or shall we begin to realize that the day of defensive bases has gone with the bomber, that attack is the only defense, and that for attack our troops need small, insulated, prefinished, demountable shelter units they can carry compactly with them and erect and dismantle themselves in minutes—when and where they attack?

Prefabrication of a somewhat saner type than army engineers have evolved could meet this problem except for the unwillingness of military men to accept civilian advice, plus the resistance of those who profit from keeping shelter complicated, expensive, handicraft, conservative, and monumentally built for display or permanence. Must we, for the sake of those who fought Representative Engel's attempt to reduce the cost of military shelter and for the sake of those who pulled the behind-the-scenes wires against the Currier contract for prefabricated houses in the Detroit area, delay housing suitable to our army's mobility, thereby frustrating its ability to launch a surprise attack where the enemy is vulnerable at the time of its own choosing? Shall we dissipate our energies on fixed bases, none of which can be particularly strong, and tie our forces down by their coat-tails to defensive positions?

What shall we pay in blood, defeat, and destruction for the hindsighted inertia of those who, living in an era of mobility and property destruction, persist in thinking of military shelter in terms of giantism, immobility, and cost-plus swank permanence? Either we shall crawl out of ruts beloved by those who profit from such grandfatherly ineptitude or we shall be blown out. Immediately, unless we itch for a licking, we should put fewer military eggs in one basket, reduce target area, diffuse the targets at each camp, cease all construction for conspicuous display, and provide light, low-cost, insulative, demountable shelter units adequate for any climate, and thus make our army irresistibly mobile in attack.

CORWIN WILLSON

New York, January 5

Lerner vs. Chamberlain

Dear Sirs: Except for the fact that it had very little to do with the book, John Chamberlain's review of "Ideas for the Ice Age" in your issue of December 6 was first-rate reading. It had some good quips, it said some nice things about my style, and it carried on a long-standing debate in which John and I have been indulging ourselves on the possibilities of economic planning and democratic socialism. But this review might better have been written of any of my previous books, since what I have written about planning and socialism is found chiefly in them. I had flattered myself that there are ideas in my new book which I had not developed to the same extent in earlier books. But since Chamberlain never so much as mentions them, perhaps I am wrong. Maybe book reviewing is supposed to be a form of public debate, and maybe Chamberlain was right to address his review primarily to a chapter in my book which had originally been written as a review of his "American Stakes."

He challenges me at the end of his article to a debate with either him or Willi Schlamm. I would be glad to take part in one with either or both of them, on any topic, including economic planning, democratic socialism, methods of winning the war, or the nature of a post-war world. I will do it orally or in writing or in any other sign or symbol language they may choose. But I would still like to know sometime what Chamberlain thinks of my book.

MAX LERNER

New York, December 22

Reves, British Journalist

Dear Sir: In your issue of December 6 Franz Hoellering in his review entitled Thyssen Explains refers to me as "the Hungarian journalist, Emery Reves." It is true that I was born in Hungary, but I am a naturalized British subject and am very proud of it. At the moment when Great Britain, which is my country and to which I owe all my allegiance, is at war with Hungary, I resent being referred to as a Hungarian and shall be grateful if you will publish this rectification

EMERY REVES

New York, December 10

CONTRIBUTORS

HEINZ POL, a German émigré journalist, is the author of "Suicide of a Democracy."

HAROLD STRAUSS is an associate editor of the publishing firm of Alfred A. Knopf.

GEORGE BARKER is an English poet now living in this country. A volume of his "Selected Poems" has just been published.

CHARLES CURTIS MUNZ has written extensively on the economic and political problems of the United States. He is the author of "Land Without Moses."

KARL LOEWENSTEIN is professor of political science at Amherst College.

GRACE ADAMS is the author of several books on psychology and of a sociological study entitled "Workers on Relief."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 154 · NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 17, 1942 · NUMBER 3

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 49

EDITORIALS

Political War in Rio by Freda Kirchwey 52

A Job for the Guild 53

The War Budget 53

ARTICLES

On Industry's Battle Front by I. F. Stone 55

Vichy Bait for Washington by Waverley L. Root 56

Our Plan for Victory by Donald W. Mitchell 58

Need We Fear Russia? by Ralph Bates 60

Paris in the Morning by Ida Treat 63

In the Wind 65

A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels 66

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

William James: 1842-1942 by Irwin Edman 67

Debunking the Debunkers by Raymond Gram Swing 68

The Fifth Continent by S. K. Ratcliffe 69

Novel of Mexico by M. J. Benardete 70

America, America! by Clement Greenberg 71

Nazi Economics by Thomas Reveille 72

In Brief 73

Drama: Old Man of the Tribe by Joseph Wood Krutch 73

Music by B. H. Haggin 74

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 75

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER · Washington Editor I. F. STONE · Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON · MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor RICHARD H. ROVERE · Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN · Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL · JONATHAN DANIELS · LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR · J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX · Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

THE SITUATION IN THE FAR EASTERN WAR remains grave, with the Japanese retaining the initiative everywhere except in China. There they have suffered a striking defeat which they have endeavored to minimize by reporting withdrawal from Changsha after "having accomplished our objectives." Actually it seems that they never succeeded in entering the city but were forced to beat a hasty retreat from the suburbs when the Chinese counter-attacked. Chiang Kai-shek's forces have followed up this victory with harassing movements against Canton and other important centers held by the invaders, and reports from Chungking speak of plans for a general offensive in China which, should it prove practicable at this time, might have very important effects in relieving pressure on other fronts. Meanwhile, however, the Japanese offensive in the western Pacific is developing with increasing power. In Luzon General MacArthur's small army is holding out against heavy odds. Its battle is in the nature of a forlorn hope, but it is immobilizing a considerable enemy force and inflicting heavy losses on it. Moreover, Manila Bay remains useless to the Japanese so long as our flag flies from Corregidor. By their capture of Davao at the southern end of Mindanao the Japanese secured an air and naval base which they are now using for attacks against Dutch Borneo and Celebes. Landings have been made at several points on these islands, and the oil center of Tarakan has been captured, but only after the destruction of its wells and installations. Oil, however, is only one objective of this new Japanese invasion; a more important consideration, probably, is to secure bases from which the sea routes connecting Australia with Java and Singapore can be attacked. Such moves are dangerous to us, but they are also risky for the Japanese, who with the wide dispersal of their forces have greatly lengthened their lines of communication.

* * *

SHOULD SINGAPORE FALL, JAPAN'S PROBLEM of communications would be greatly simplified, and we should be faced with immense difficulties in staging any kind of counter-offensive. The loss of the great British base would not mean the loss of the war, but it could mean that victory would be postponed for several years.

That is why the reinforcement of Singapore has become a strategic necessity. By the capture of Kuala Lumpur, the second city of Malaya, the Japanese have advanced a long way toward their objective. In numbers, in equipment, and apparently in tactics they have a marked superiority over the imperial defenders. Even so their rate of progress suggests serious mistakes on the part of the British command. Could not the island of Penang have been turned into a Tobruk? And if its evacuation was necessary, could not steps have been taken to destroy the small vessels there which the Japanese have since found so handy for landing troops behind British lines? And could not more have been done to check these coastal expeditions, especially as the Japanese have no naval forces in the Straits of Malacca? A great deal of ground has been lost in Malaya, and a great deal of material, but there are some indications of an improvement in the situation. As they withdraw toward the narrower southern end of the peninsula, the British have a shorter front to cover and shorter lines of supply. They appear to have received air reinforcements and are now able to attack Japanese airfields and other objectives more aggressively. At the same time the R. A. F. and the American volunteers in Burma have successfully beaten off a number of raids and have begun to blast enemy-held bases in Thailand. This may presage a land invasion of that Asiatic Rumania by combined British Indian and Chinese forces which could force the Japanese to retreat from Malaya even more rapidly than they have advanced.

*

WE MUST NOT ALLOW ANXIETY ABOUT THE Far East to distort our perspective on the war as a whole. Russia's recent successes, which have been a tonic to all the United Nations, might not have been possible if British troops and American supplies had been diverted to the Far East before Japan struck. Defending British policy, Sir Archibald Sinclair, Minister of Air, asserted that the concentration of resources on the Russian and African fronts had brought results commensurate with the risks involved and stressed the assistance given to the Soviets by R. A. F. activities that "compelled the German air force to keep more than half its fighter squadrons stretched along the coast from Norway to France." As a result, the Russians were able to regain that ascendancy in the air which proved invaluable in turning back the Nazis. Their counter-offensive now seems to be gaining momentum all along the line. On the central front the Russian wedges driven into the German lines are being steadily enlarged, and the relief of Sevastopol and the development of the campaign for recapture of the Crimea are endangering the whole Nazi position in the eastern Ukraine. In the far north a new counter-offensive is pressing the Germans and Finns back from the neighborhood of Murmansk. Finnish war weariness is evidently growing rapidly as doubts about the effectiveness of German aid increase and the food position grows more and more desperate. The Social Democratic Party is openly talking about stopping the war, although the latest official pronouncement from Helsinki continues to demand not merely the territories lost in 1940 but "favorable strategic frontiers." There are signs that an early opportunity may be afforded for wise Soviet diplomacy to harvest the gains of Russian arms.

*

LAST WEEK WE PRINTED AN ARTICLE BY Heinz Pol on Hitler's Restless Reich. The theme of the piece was the growing preoccupation of certain German industrial and military circles with the happy thought of liquidating their Führer in order to obtain a compromise peace. Since then scarcely a day has passed without some additional rumor of unrest in Germany, and even before Mr. Pol's article reached our readers a representative of one of the United Nations had filed with the American War Department a detailed report of disease, hunger, and dissension in the German forces. One need not be a Pollyanna to believe that the successive losses of the Battle of England, the Battle of the Atlantic, the Battle of Russia, and the Battle of Libya have jolted the Herrenvolk, but the over-all situation of the Axis forces is still so favorable and their reserves in men and material so formidable that it would be dangerous foolishness to dream of victory before we have begun to fight. Without minimizing the importance of such unrest as there appears to be in Germany, we suspect that Dr. Goebbels, making the best of a major Nazi defeat, is not averse to having it bruited about that the great Aryan barrier to Bolshevism is beginning to give way and all Europe is in danger. This is the stuff appeasement is made of. Certainly one is warranted in sniffing dubiously when Goebbels lends substance to rumors of revolt by rousing foreign correspondents from their beds to hear the official denial. In evaluating reports of the feverish fortifying of Germany's eastern boundary and of machine-gun nests on the roofs of Berlin it is well to note that pro-Nazi propaganda here and elsewhere is sounding the theme that only a compromise peace can save Europe from red revolution.

*

ADMIRAL MUSELIER CONTINUES TO SHOW A lack of consideration for the American State Department, and its delicate affair with Vichy, that warms the cockles of our heart. On January 9 it was reported confidently from Washington that "Free French leaders will withdraw their forces from the French islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon soon and announce their adherence to the twenty-six-power pact. . . . The chief problem now is getting [the Free French] off the islands with the least embarrassment to all concerned. . . ." This formula was obviously designed, not to make sense, even as English composition, but only to save the faces of the gentlemen in the State Department. On January 10, Admiral Muselier, refusing to take the hint, issued a statement in which he said:

> I am not looking for any opportunity to withdraw from this position under circumstances that will save us from embarrassment. . . . If the Free French naval forces should be driven out, then I suggest that the Normandie be sent here to take off the civilian anti-Vichyites. No smaller vessel would be sufficient. . . . But the embarrassment in that case . . . would belong properly to those who say they are fighting for democracy elsewhere, but who have placed themselves indelibly on record here as against it.

The Admiral's lèse majesté, coupled with a rising volume of protests at home, appears to have unmanned the State Department completely. In a statement that recalls nothing so much as the verbal jiu-jitsu of pre-war Tokyo Secretary Hull asserts that the department's phrase "so-called Free French ships" was not intended as a slur at all; the "so-called" referred to the ships and not to the Free French. Unless it turns out that the Admiral and his crew approached the islands on surf boards, this quaint explanation will save very little face; and that is as it should be.

*

THE PRICE-CONTROL BILL WHICH FINALLY passed the Senate turned out to be worse than the highly unsatisfactory House version. Although some improvements were made, such as the substitution of one-man control for a five-man board and the setting up of a licensing system, the last-minute amendments forced through by the farm bloc killed any hope of effectively regulating the prices of agricultural commodities. The Senate not only voted to give Secretary Wickard veto power over any ceilings on farm crops but wrote a new definition of "parity" which would prevent any curb on farm prices until they have risen approximately 25 per cent above their present level. In actuality this would prevent any type of price control, since industrial prices cannot be restricted if the prices of food and agricultural raw materials are unrestricted. And since any compensatory rise in industrial prices permits a further increase in farm prices under the "parity" concept, there is no point at which the vicious spiral of inflation can be checked. It is probable that the Senate-House conference committee will seek to revise the bill so as to make it of some value, but with the farm bloc in control in both houses, there seems little chance of salvaging real price control. Barring a political miracle, the door to inflation will be left wide open. In the last war we suffered from inflation because we had not yet learned the technique of controlling our fiscal system. Today that knowledge is available, but a powerful minority stands in the way of our making use of it.

OPTIMISTIC REPORTS ON THE CONVERSION of the automobile industry to war purposes continue to fill the columns of the daily press, but actual progress is somewhat disappointing. The ten-man committee set up last week by the automobile-industry conference was quickly scrapped because the employers objected to giving labor any managerial authority. It has been replaced by a seven-man committee, including three labor representatives, which is to be mainly advisory. Although the industry has accepted all-out conversion "in principle," it continues to oppose the Reuther plan on the ground that it would place labor in a position of "control." This attitude has been reflected by conservative papers throughout the country. Barron's admits that the union leaders believe that they are acting in the best interests of the nation, but declares that "their proposals, if successful, could substitute union management of that huge industry for its present form of management." This is a surprisingly frank confession of lack of faith in the present system from one of the country's leading financial journals. For such a development would only be possible if management failed utterly in carrying out the conversion program. Admittedly management has lacked and still lacks vision regarding the necessity for an all-out effort, but, given the will, one cannot doubt its ability.

*

IN THE YEAR THAT PRECEDED OUR ENTRY into the war the issue of "intervention" versus "isolation" cut across all party lines, produced bedfellow combinations painful to recall, and in general tended to blur political distinctions of the first importance. During those days the Union for Democratic Action, limited in resources and membership, struggled to keep before American progressives the demands of a two-front fight: for all aid to the forces combating fascism abroad and for the extension of democracy at home. Many honest liberals felt that the approach was too complex, that the crying need was to rouse the country to the dangers that faced it from across the seas, and that only a front that ranged leftward from Carter Glass could serve the purpose. What the straight interventionist committees were unable to accomplish in a year was done in an afternoon by a few hundred gentlemen of Japan. The committees have not dissolved, but it was natural that with the turn in events their more liberal members should turn to the Union for Democratic Action as the logical instrument for their political purposes. As a result of two full-day conferences, the U. D. A. has now expanded into what promises soon to be a mass organization "left of center." It is no disparagement of the Administration to point out the necessity of concerted pressure from this direction. The U. D. A. may well serve as the democratic conscience of a country at war and the inspiration of the peace to come.

Political War in Rio

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

AN INTERNATIONAL conference is a time-honored device for concealing international realities. There the lowest common denominator reigns supreme, and courage and clarity seem a form of indecent exposure. There the diplomatic confidence-man faces stiff competition in the old game of deceiving the innocent and trapping the unwary.

This week at Rio the Foreign Ministers of all the American republics meet to discuss problems arising out of the state of war between the United States and the Axis. Seated together in the elegant Palacio Itamarati will be a group of delegates representing dictatorships and democracies, powerful states and virtual colonies, governments that support the Allied nations and governments that expect or hope for an Axis victory. The men themselves will vary as widely as the governments they represent. Members of Hitler's fifth column in America will face outspoken anti-fascists. And every delegate will of necessity adopt the diplomatic pretense that his fellows are all good democrats, devoted to the cause of pan-American unity. On this basis the game will begin.

How it will end can safely be predicted. It will end in a compromise dressed up in the language of hemispheric solidarity and defense. The United States will emerge from the conference without either the material or the moral backing of several important South American states. The recalcitrance of the Argentine government, elaborated by its Foreign Minister, Dr. Ruiz Guiñazú, in terms of "neutrality" and a deep devotion to the convention of Havana, will be indorsed by at least two nations under Argentine influence. This bloc will be opposed by the United States and its neighboring satellites, together with Uruguay and some of the other smaller republics. Brazil, tied to the United States both by tradition and heavy economic bonds, but drawn toward the Axis by the fascist sympathies of many of its officials as well as by its desire to play safe in case of a Nazi victory, may well act as "moderator." Its delegates will probably be charged with the responsibility of discovering the happy formula which will at once bridge differences, conceal truths, save faces, and present to the world an appearance of unanimity.

The United States will get a formula of unity. But it will not get unity.

It will not get unity because no sound basis for unity exists. Effective unity, rooted in a common democratic attitude, has been impaired by our curious diplomatic strategy of supporting our enemies and alienating our friends. Several governments in Latin America either expect or desire an Axis victory and have no wish to throw in their fortunes with the anti-Axis powers. The test of the sincerity of those governments is their willingness to end their relations with the Axis—in fact as well as formally. Hitler doesn't expect the Argentine to declare war on the United States. All he asks of any Latin American state is neutrality.

The United States has one strong card to play—its huge economic power. Undoubtedly Mr. Welles hopes to buy with American dollars what he cannot win by other means. The Latin American countries are acutely in need of markets. We need the raw materials they can no longer sell in Europe; and we need other resources which can be developed in the Americas and which we can no longer get from the East—rubber, above all; quinine, kapok, tin, and many other indispensable minerals. On the solid basis of mutual advantage we have much to offer the Latin American countries, including the Argentine. It is assumed by our policy-makers in Washington that even governments with pro-Axis leanings will hesitate to antagonize the one great remaining market for their surplus goods. This assumption is the one that has lain at the heart of our whole disastrous policy of appeasement. It has been proved wrong over and over. Today a war is being waged on issues that brutally cut across the simple concepts of old-fashioned imperialist diplomacy. Today national policies are determined by political and ideological alignments even more than by economic advantages. A man like Acting President Castillo of the Argentine plots his politics not along the curve of his country's economic interests, which are undoubtedly tied up with the United States and Great Britain, but along the line of his own-pro-fascist inclinations.

Mr. Welles may bring home an excellent trade agreement, and our war program may be strengthened by the resources of the Latin American countries. But in the end democracy and the security of the Western Hemisphere will be advanced very little if they depend upon purchases of wheat and wool from nations governed by pro-Axis reactionaries. In the hour of decision it will be the political aims and sympathies of those governments that count. Our generous contributions of oil and iron did not prevent Japan from striking when the chosen day came. And our continued support of Franco has not dissuaded his agents in America from working for a Nazi world order. Feeding American dollars to fascist politicians has never yet turned them into democrats.

The economic power of the United States is a good card, but we have played it stupidly according to rules that have become meaningless in the course of the fascist struggle for power. The other day the New York Times, discussing the difficulties facing Mr. Welles at Rio, remarked virtuously: "The United States has no desire to coerce Argentina. We can only hope that her people will come to see that their own best interests . . . lie in willing cooperation with the anti-Axis powers." In those words lurk almost all the futile, vacuous, idiotic fallacies that have brought the democratic nations to their present desperate crisis. The Argentine government is not "Argentina." The people are already overwhelmingly "with the anti-Axis powers." They are living under a state of siege declared by a pro-Axis Acting President and are not permitted to express their opinions or demonstrate their feelings. Their government meanwhile follows a policy designed to preserve the fiction of inter-American unity while refusing all genuine collaboration. Is this government not to be "coerced"? A war is being waged —a political as well as a military war—and its front is in every country where Nazi agents and pro-Nazi officials plot against democratic victory. Are we to go on forever using our economic power to hold in office men and interests that are fighting on the other side, hoping that somehow, sometime, in defiance of all experience, we can buy them into our camp? Today we fight for the freedom of the world, and in this fight we find our battle lines drawn in strange places and new weapons in our hands. Even a pro-Axis dictatorship could not long survive if the price of its policy were the loss of its North American markets. Mr. Welles goes to Brazil armed with some of the most important weapons in the arsenal of political warfare. If he hesitates to use them he, and democracy itself, will face defeat.

A Job for the Guild

WE HOPE the American Newspaper Guild will investigate the report that pressure from certain Administration officials recently forced Robert S. Allen and Drew Pearson to withdraw from publication a "Merry-Go-Round" column critical of the navy. We think it important for a group of newspapermen to find out whether there was any material in that column properly subject to criticism as military-naval information valuable to the enemy. In this category we do not include information on the long and hilarious week-ends spent by some high naval officers. We think it important to learn how these officials obtained advance copies of the column, and what methods were used to force Allen and Pearson to withdraw it. Their independence of mind is sufficiently well known to warrant the inference that the means used must have been of no gentle character. Was a threat made to withdraw their White House correspondents' privileges? What part was played in this affair by Stephen Early, the President's secretary in charge of press relations? Was he approached by naval officials to do the job? Did he consult with Mr. Roosevelt before he had Allen and Pearson "on the carpet"?

Inquiries made by The Nation cast doubt on the version of the story being spread by Early, and we think the whole affair ought to be brought into the open. There is no need to argue the case for a limited censorship in war time. It is freely admitted. It is equally necessary to recognize the inevitable bureaucratic tendency to use the excuse of "military secrets" to suppress criticism of officials in office and to suppress facts which would provoke criticism. It is not always easy to determine whether publication of a given fact would be more useful to the enemy than to ourselves by enabling us to get rid of incompetents and to correct dangerous defects. The doubt is best resolved in favor of publicity. A free press is never more necessary than in war time when a country's safety depends on the efficiency of its government; and newspapermen, who hold their trusteeship from a free people, must jealously guard their privileges.

We understand that the American Newspaper Guild in a letter to the President has suggested the setting up of a kind of "industry committee" before which cases like that of Pearson and Allen may be aired. We add only the suggestion that a committee of this kind should represent working newspapermen and women rather than their publishers, many of whom are "newspapermen" only in the sense that they happen to have enough money to own a newspaper. And we suggest that left and liberal opinion be well represented on that committee. The fact that the Administration has picked an Associated Press executive as censor is not encouraging, for the Associated Press has been only too willing to exercise upon itself a voluntary censorship in peace time in behalf of the vested interests of our society. If the standards of the censorship are to be those of the A. P., we shall not have a very free press. The choice of censor makes it all the more important to set up a committee that can speak for newspapermen against the brass hats of the profession as well as those of army and navy.

The War Budget

THE response given to President Roosevelt's budget message has been almost entirely favorable. Newspaper editorial writers and Congressmen who begrudged the spending of a billion or two to prevent starvation or to rehabilitate the unemployed have accepted the outlay of $53,000,000,000 for the war effort during the next fiscal year without question. This, of course, is highly encouraging. It would be impossible to mobilize our full resources against the Axis if Congress were to wrangle over every dollar spent as it has so frequently done in the past. We cannot allow the outworn concepts of orthodox finance to obstruct a truly "all-out" effort.

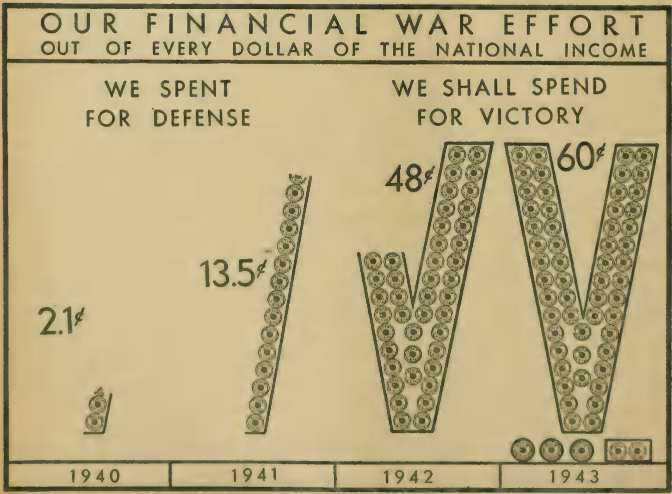
But though the unanimity of opinion on this point is heartening, there is a less encouraging aspect of the situation. Real danger exists that the staggering sums mentioned by the President and the urgency of the need may result in our adopting unsound fiscal policies which would normally be rejected. While it is true that the money for the war effort must be found regardless of sacrifices, it does not follow that it makes no difference how the money is obtained. On the contrary, the policies adopted for financing our $59,000,000,000 budget for 1942-43 are of far more crucial importance than the methods used for financing our "normal" pre-war budgets of approximately $13,000,000,000. The decisions which are made in the next few weeks with regard to our war-time fiscal policy will determine, to a large extent, the type of our post-war society.

In this connection the President's message is not wholly reassuring, while the reports of preliminary discussions in Congress are alarming. We will concede that the President's request for $9,000,000,000 in new taxation is about all that may reasonably be expected of Congress. It is not, however, enough. The estimated increase of $35,000,000,000 in our national debt during the 1943 fiscal year is bound not only to lead to serious fiscal disarrangements but to place a disproportionate share of the war burden on the low-income groups. If money can be borrowed, it can be obtained in taxation. And the Administration's decision to borrow the bulk of the money required for the war effort reflects a different attitude toward capital from that shown toward manpower in the Selective Service Act. Capital is to be enticed into patriotism; men are given no choice. This applies, of course, only to sums borrowed from individuals and private institutions. The bulk of the money will probably be borrowed from banks and will represent an inflationary expansion of credit. Inflation may be regarded as a concealed form of taxation, but it is of a type which falls chiefly on the wage-and-salary-earning portion of the population.

No decisions have as yet been reached as to how the $9,000,000,000 in new taxes is to be raised. But the President indicated that $2,000,000,000 might be obtained by increased social-security taxes. This represents a complete reversal of the Administration's previous tax policy. The social-security taxes are highly regressive. They fall almost entirely on wage-earners and only on the first $3,000 in personal income. Such a tax would inevitably curtail the living standards of the lowest-income groups without materially affecting the moderately well-to-do.

The Treasury Department would offset this tax on the poor by raising most of the remaining $7,000,000,000 from the well-to-do by increases in the income, estate, corporation-excess-profits, and "selective excise" levies. But Senator George, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and other Congressional leaders have gone on record as opposing any strengthening of the present flabby excess-profits tax. Sentiment for a general sales tax—which again places the burden squarely on the lower-income groups—seems stronger than ever before. The President reiterated his opposition to a general sales tax, but he largely nullified the effectiveness of his stand by suggesting that it might be necessary to reopen the question later. His indorsement of "selective excise" taxes is also being quoted in support of the principle of the sales tax. Such an interpretation is, of course, wholly unjustified. An excise tax on luxuries and semi-luxuries tends to fall on high rather than low-income groups, and is particularly useful in war time for reducing consumer demand for non-essentials.

Taken as a whole, the President's program is realistic and deserves support. Its shortcomings are minor in comparison to the positive dangers in the reactionary program being shaped in Congress. We cannot, of course, expect Congress to be any more enlightened in its fiscal policies in time of war than in time of peace. Nor can we expect any relaxation in the activities of pressure groups and business lobbies. This places a heavy responsibility on progressive citizens throughout the country. Although their efforts must be concentrated on winning the war, they should not allow the magnitude of that task to divert their attention from basic social policies at a time when far-reaching decisions are being made. Vigilance was never more necessary.



Graphic by Pick-S

On Industry's Battle Front

BY I. F. STONE

Detroit, January 11

THE fate of the world will be decided in America's factories, and I am on a bird's-eye-view tour of the industrial battlefield. My ears are full of the din: hammers two stories high beating like giant steel tom-toms in the grimy forges of Detroit; small machine-shop owners in Racine complaining that they cannot get war orders; union organizers in Chicago with fiercely accusing figures on idle equipment which might be turning out guns; a small automobile manufacturer in South Bend resentful of the suggestion that labor help share the war responsibilities of management; all the clang and uproar of a nation's smithy reorganizing to beat plowshares into swords.

Before I took the late night plane Wednesday in Washington for Detroit, I had heard the stupendous figures set by the President for this and next year's war output. And sitting with other newspapermen outside the room at the OPM where eager automobile unionists and reluctant executives argued about the industry's conversion to war production, I had heard angry voices and pleading voices trickle through the ventilator. There were no open covenants openly arrived at in the automobile-conversion conference. We waited until 9 p.m. for the meager and carefully worded announcement that ended the meeting, and it was to see for myself the problems of conversion that I left Washington.

Over the Alleghanies snow was falling, and the plane rocked like a ship in an angry sea. Later the skies cleared, and we could look down and see ice floes like gray clouds in the black waters of Lake Erie. It was 6 degrees below zero on the airport thermometer at 3 a.m. in Detroit, but I found rising temperatures that day at the famous West Side local of the U. A. W.–C. I. O. Nobody knew quite what the final formula adopted at the automobile conference meant, but everyone agreed that it was a long way from joint labor-management-government pooling of the automobile industry. A joint committee was to "assist in the development of the best method for the utilization of labor, tools, machinery facilities, etc., for the most expeditious conversion of the automobile industry for the production of war materials." This vaguely outlined task, only a shade better than advisory, was itself to be "subject to the determination of the Office of Production Management," and this in turn meant William S. Knudsen, General Motors' Greek gift to the defense program.

The mood of the automobile workers is, nevertheless, far from one of discouragement. They are tough and tenacious, and accustomed to scaling citadels by toeholds. The men who made Detroit a union town are confident that they can make the automotive industry an industrial democracy for "the duration." The men who fought their way to the kingships at the top are worried, and—from what I gathered in their offices—came to Washington under the impression that they would not even have to sit down in the same room with a labor committee to discuss conversion. Their glum silence at the one big joint meeting held in Washington was broken only by the revealing plea of C. E. Wilson, president of General Motors, for new tax and contract privileges. I have no doubt that in the long run labor not only can win a place on the industry's board of directors but can prove the value of its advice to the magnates themselves, as the unions have already proved that collective bargaining increases efficiency. The danger lies in the time that may be lost if the President permits the industry to wage a long rear-guard action against the pooling of its machines for war and against their conversion under joint labor-management-government auspices. Not to act soon is to permit 60,000 planes and 45,000 tanks this year to remain a White House daydream.

As I write this in my hotel room, a call from New York brings word that Cyrus Ching has been named chairman of the committee to "assist in the developing," etc., of the automobile industry. The choice seems a good one, for the rubber-company executive is well regarded by both the companies and the union leaders in the industry. He made a good impression on labor during his service on the Mediation Board, and to judge from an "off the record" conversation with an automobile manufacturer yesterday, Ching's name seems to have been submitted to both sides in advance and accepted by them. Under the Selective Service Act the President has power to place compulsory orders and to commandeer idle machines. If he delegates these powers to the committee, there is hope of quick and adequate action. If he delays, there will be more Manilas.

No one can spend a few days talking with the men who manage and the men who work in automotives without seeing how easy, in many ways, and how necessary, in every way, is the task before Ching's joint committee. The industry is already a great cluster of parts factories and assembly plants around the rim of the Great Lakes from Buffalo to Milwaukee. Its normal method of procedure is precisely that applied by Beaverbrook in Britain and suggested here by Reuther for the making of planes and tanks. The blueprint of the automobile is broken down into a multitude of parts, and these are farmed out every season among thousands of subcontractors. The rivulets of parts merge into a mighty flood on the assembly lines of the big companies and the small. From a production point of view, the automotive industry, behind its many-sided corporate façade, is one great integrated machine for the making of automobiles. Pooling and farming out are normal processes of the industry which it is proposed to apply on a new level to arms production.

The farther one gets from the industry's dollar-a-year men in Washington and the closer one gets to the production men and the tool engineers in the factories the more one's respect grows for the men who built the business. An auto-factory machine shop, with its overhead drives, its interlaced belts, its rows of strangely gnarled machines, is a grimy enchanted forest in which one is amazed at the miracle of mass production. But it is when one gets right down to the details of finding war purposes for these machines that one understands the crucial necessity for over-all pooling and direction in their use. An automobile factory is a giant special-purpose tool designed to do a specific job. Dismantled, it has infinite possibilities, and we enter an area where ingenuity and imagination determine results.

Unless the many problems arising are separated and allocated, no plant's little hierarchy of engineers can apply the concentration required to make new war tools from old machines. The machines themselves must be brought into new productive patterns, and an over-all board is needed to find in the stray idle machine at one plant the "missing link" needed in the new production line at another. Otherwise the management of each plant with a limited number of tools, must stand harassed and bewildered before an endless number of possible armament products. Without central aid and direction, the tendency will be to pick the easiest job and the one least disturbing to "business as usual."

Vichy Bait for Washington

BY WAVERLEY L. ROOT

WHEN the news that France had signed an armistice with Germany reached Syria in June, 1940, Governor General Puaux handed an envelope to a member of the French consular staff at Cairo then in Beirut but expecting to return to Cairo in two days. The envelope was addressed to the British military authorities in Egypt. It announced that Syria did not consider itself bound by the terms of the armistice, and that the important Near East army organized by General Weygand would continue to fight side by side with the British. Before Puaux's messenger had left, the United States indicated its intention to continue diplomatic relations with the French government. Puaux took his letter back. "I thought I understood what had happened," he said, "but if the United States approves of the Vichy government, I must have been mistaken."

That was the first act of the State Department in support of Vichy. As a result the British had to fight the Syrian campaign to acquire a strategically valuable territory which would have been with the Allies from the beginning if Washington had taken a different course.

American relations with France again occupied the spotlight when, against British opposition, the United States insisted on delivering supplies, including oil, to French North Africa. The theory of the State Department was that General Weygand's position was strengthened by these deliveries, and that General Weygand could be counted upon to keep the Germans out of North Africa. The fact that the supplies from the United States were helpful in the hurried building of the Trans-Saharan railroad from the Mediterranean to Dakar—a line of no conceivable immediate importance to the French, but of obvious strategic value to the Axis—did not seem important to the State Department.

Then the Germans decided that Weygand was an obstacle to their plans and ordered his removal. Vichy complied. At last the State Department, having apparently seen the light, stopped shipments of supplies to North Africa. American observers who had seen the evil effects of appeasement diplomacy on Europe breathed more easily. The State Department, it seemed, had learned its lesson. Washington moved nearer to recognition of De Gaulle. A sort of semi-official legation, the Delegation of the Free French Forces, was established in this country to obtain supplies under the Lease-Lend Act. It was a great shock, therefore, when the seizure of the French islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon by the De Gaulle forces, at the request of the population, was promptly disavowed by the State Department. It seemed grotesque for the United States to demand the return of the islands from an unrecognized but de facto ally to a government under the domination of a declared enemy.

Behind this incident is a State Department policy directly in the appeasement tradition of Neville Chamberlain. The futility of the whole appeasement theory was summed up brilliantly by the British cartoonist David Low in a drawing made some time before the outbreak of war. It showed Chamberlain, Daladier, Eden, and other European statesmen huddled fearfully in the corner of a room in the center of which stood Hitler, arms akimbo, glaring balefully at them. The caption read: "What will you fellows give me not to give you another kick in the pants?" The kick in the pants which Pétain has been threatening to deliver to the State Department is the handing over of the French fleet and empire to the Axis. It is an imaginary threat. Pétain is prevented from taking such action by the pressure of public opinion. He is unable to deliver the fleet because its crews would scuttle their ships first. He is unable to deliver the empire because the native populations would revolt. Indeed, for three indecisive days after Weygand's recall it was none too certain that North Africa would not react by going over to De Gaulle. Governor General Noguès, son-in-law of Delcassé, creator of the Anglo-French Entente Cordiale, and an appointee of Léon Blum, was on the verge of taking this step, but lacked the courage.

The destiny of the French fleet and the French empire is beyond the control of any one man or small group of men—including the American State Department. But the threat of their transfer is useful to Pétain. Through it he has succeeded in committing the State Department to his support. And that support is unconditional. The State Department does not say, "Send your ships to neutral ports, allow neutral control commissions to be placed in your colonies, and we will support you." It gives the support without demanding any change in the situation. Pétain can therefore continue to use the situation as a bludgeon with which to demand further support.

Pétain's motives need not be examined on the basis of surmise. His closest collaborators—Lucien Romier, Minister of State; Dr. Menétrier, his personal physician and confidential private secretary; Henri du Moulin de la Barthète, his chef de cabinet—have explained them. Pétain believes the war will end with a compromise peace between the exhausted enemies. France, because it got out of the war earlier with small losses, will be relatively strong—in a position to dominate the peace conference and recover its status as a great power. But if the war should end with an Allied advantage, it might be De Gaulle, not Pétain, who would represent France—an insupportable prospect. Pétain is therefore striving to keep the United States on his side in order to freeze out De Gaulle. He is also preparing for the possibility that Germany may dominate the peace conference by telling Berlin that only his influence with the people is keeping the fleet and colonies from joining the Allies.

The State Department has taken the bait. The Nazis apparently have not. As this article is written, they are preparing to bring pressure upon Pétain for greater collaboration by threatening to set up a new French government in Paris.

The steps by which the State Department became committed to Pétain's support are as follows: Marshal Pétain informed American representatives that if Darlan were pushed too far by the Germans, Pétain would resign, after ordering the fleet and the colonies to defend themselves against all comers. But, he pointed out, the colonies lacked the supplies necessary for their self-defense. The United States, he suggested, could make it possible for them to defend themselves by providing the supplies. It was not too practical, however, especially after we entered the war, for the United States to deal with German-controlled Vichy concerning the defense of French possessions against Germany, and so it was arranged that the State Department should deal with each French colony directly, and their governors were given carte blanche to carry on such negotiations.

In its direct dealings with General Weygand the State Department had negotiated with two special emissaries sent by Weygand to the French embassy in Washington—MM. Marschal and Guérin. When Weygand was removed, these two gentlemen assumed that their mission was ended. To their astonishment the State Department appeared to think otherwise. The reason behind this became apparent later when the department, in accordance with the understanding with Pétain, prepared to resume sending supplies to Morocco. This was after it had discussed the "neutralization" of Dakar—from which no ship or plane clears without German authorization—with General Barraud and Admiral Colligny.

Now an almost comic situation developed—one in which the falsity of the department's position was exposed with cruel clarity. The principle of resuming oil shipments had been established. But, the State Department asked, what guaranty could it receive that its tankers would not be torpedoed on the way? The French embassy in Washington asked Vichy. Vichy referred the matter to the Wiesbaden Armistice Commission. Wiesbaden passed it on to Berlin! This left the State Department with the prospect of having its whole policy knocked on the head by a simple "no" from Berlin. On the other hand, a "yes" would mean that United States policy is exactly what Berlin wants it to be. It is difficult to see what excuse can be offered in time of war for a diplomatic policy which can only be pursued with the consent, implicit or explicit, of the enemy. This single fact is sufficient to brand that policy as mistaken and dangerous.

Appeasement of Vichy has worked no better in other parts of the world. In the Far East, France has certain island positions which could be of use to us—notably Noumea in New Caledonia, the only Clipper stop on the southern route still available to us. General De Gaulle controls all France's Pacific possessions except Indo-China. He has offered us any bases we need in them. But the State Department's agreement with Vichy obliges it to deal with Admiral Decoux, the former Governor of Indo-China, whom Vichy hastily named Governor General of all France's Pacific possessions for the express purpose of providing someone to negotiate with the United States. If we want to use French Pacific bases we must ask permission of Admiral Decoux, who can't deliver them. We cannot accept General De Gaulle's offer because by doing so we should grant him recognition.

In the Western Hemisphere the State Department made an agreement with Admiral Robert of Martinique. This was actually reached on November 14 although it was not revealed until much later. Vichy denied knowledge of it, in accordance with the State Department-Pétain plan for direct negotiations between Washington and French possessions. The agreement included an assurance from Admiral Robert that the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon would not be used to serve the Axis. Yet at the time it was signed, a wireless station built after the armistice and controlled by an engineer sent especially from Vichy was already operating on the islands, sending out messages useful to German submarines and raiders. So far as is known, the State Department agreement contained no clause silencing that station.

Meanwhile Admiral Muselier, sent to Ottawa by General De Gaulle, informed the Canadian Admiralty that the islands had asked the Free French to take them over. Ottawa consented, but United States Minister Pierrepont Moffat asked Muselier not to take this action. Muselier was willing to comply but was overruled by De Gaulle, who informed him that Vichy was planning to make greater use of the islands to further Axis purposes and that they must therefore be occupied quickly. Muselier applied for a visa to go to Washington and explain the situation to the State Department. He was refused a visa! He then sailed for the islands, without American sanction and to a degree without American knowledge, but with the blessings of the Canadian government.

The State Department, instead of accepting the fait accompli, chose to make an issue of the occupation of the islands, thereby giving powerful pyschological comfort to the Axis, which the German-controlled French press and radio were quick to exploit. This decision demonstrated how thorough-going was the State Department's willingness to play Pétain's game against De Gaulle. Further proof was furnished by another event not made public: General De Gaulle, in the belief that common action against a common enemy made it essential that his delegation in the United States should include a military attaché, named a World War veteran to that position. The State Department found him, like Muselier, undesirable, and refused him a visa.

This record of State Department policy toward Vichy indicates that our diplomats have become so involved in what they no doubt consider a policy of the greatest cleverness that they have lost sight of basic principles. It might be worth while to hang in every office of the State Department a sign reading: "De Gaulle is fighting against the Axis. Pétain is the prisoner of the Axis. Nothing the United States can do will alter these two facts."

Our Plan for Victory

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

PERHAPS the most significant news item in the period immediately preceding the war went unnoticed by the vast majority of the American people. On December 4 the Chicago Tribune published large sections of a war plan purported to have been prepared many months ago by the Joint Board of the Army and Navy for the victorious prosecution of the war. No one in an official position has attempted to deny its authenticity, and it gives excellent internal evidence of being genuine.

In this plan the war is divided into three phases. In the first the Allies are frankly on the defensive and are to be kept going by economic and military assistance while the United States prepares itself for large-scale participation. This introductory phase, ended somewhat prematurely by the Pearl Harbor episode of December 7, was to be preparatory to a second stage in which the United States, its plans well advanced, was to abandon the defensive completely and send a second A. E. F. to Europe.

Invasion of Europe was considered out of the question until Germany had been weakened by aerial and naval attack. Prior to this step the following conditions would have to be created:

> 1. The surface and sub-surface vessels of the Axis must be swept from the seas, particularly in the Atlantic waters contingent to Europe.
>
> 2. Overwhelming air supremacy must be accomplished.
>
> 3. The industrial and economic life of Germany must be rendered ineffective.
>
> 4. The combat effectiveness of the German air and ground units must be weakened by dispersion and shortage of materials, including fuel.

5. Popular support of the war effort by the peoples of the Axis powers must be weakened, and their confidence shattered, by subversive activities, propaganda, deprivation, and the destruction wrought.

In order to prepare for the worst likely set of circumstances, the Joint Board assumed the complete defeat of the Soviet Union by July, 1942, an entire year before it expected to have available enough ships or enough men for an invasion of Europe. The land attack was to be directed at the reduction of outlying bases where the German hold was weakest, beginning with Norway; before an attempt should be made to conquer the citadel of Hitler's strength.

The third period of the war was to see the total military defeat of Germany and its allies.

Needless to say, the forces required to accomplish so difficult a military task would be enormous. A total of more than 10,000,000 men would probably see service during the course of the war, their exact number depending upon circumstances not yet certain; the navy and marine corps were expected to jump to 1,250,000 men, the army air corps to about 2,000,000 and the army itself to about 7,000,000. The plan stated that a certain number of troops were to be used as garrisons for advanced bases and home defense, while the rest, 215 divisions in five field armies, a large proportion of them mechanized and armored, were to serve as an expeditionary force to defeat Germany on its own soil. The equipment of so large an army would demand drastic increases in the manufacture of weapons, and 17,000,000 tons of additional merchant shipping, twice our pre-war merchant marine, was expected to be needed to transport the men and keep supply lines running. The aerial increase envisaged was only slightly less spectacular, the goal being a force of 7,000 bombers, requiring a 40 per cent increase in air bases.

Japan's entrance into the war on the side of the Axis was fully expected. The eventual military cooperation of German-occupied territories, Vichy France, and possibly Spain and Portugal was also anticipated. To counter Japan's activities, American aid in defending Siberia and Malaysia by land, a Chinese offensive, extensive air raids, and an economic blockade were to be used.

Such in brief was the original plan of operation. Wherein will it have to be modified as a result of the events of the past six months? How valid are the assumptions on which it rests, and what are its essential weaknesses?

One obvious weakness lies in its time schedule. July, 1943, is an extremely late date to start a decisive campaign. The plan itself recognizes this, saying, "But time is of the essence, and the longer we delay effective offensive operations against the Axis the more difficult will be the attainment of victory."

The fundamental assumption that sea power and air power can prevent the war from being lost but cannot retake conquered territory or alone bring a decision is regarded as reasonable by all experts save those naval and aerial enthusiasts who consider that their own arm is the only one likely to win a war. Soviet defeat by July, 1942, now looks constantly less probable. If the United States is able to rely on continued heavy Russian pressure on Hitler by land, the American forces that will be engaged, the time that will be required to achieve victory, and the probable losses are all subject to reduction. Less dependence, however, can be placed on air power, since accurate devices now detect planes regardless of altitude or weather conditions.

It has become plain that the defensive measures outlined will not defeat Japan and that there must be a large-scale offensive in the Pacific. By its conquests Japan has already gained access to rubber and tin and a limited iron supply. If its aggression to the south and west is sufficiently successful and it can consolidate its gains, it will be amply able to withstand the strain of a long war. Even to defend Malaysia, as contemplated by the Joint Board, superior sea and air strength must be attained. Until the United States achieves that superiority, the Allies will continue to meet defeat in the Far East.

What progress have we made in carrying out the plan?

In the European theater we have made definite gains. The German submarine offensive in the North Atlantic has bogged down so badly that ship losses have been reduced to a fraction of their former extent and the Germans are reported to be experiencing the greatest difficulty in supplying trained crews for their undersea raiders. British air supremacy over large areas of Western Europe is already an accomplished fact. All Europe is seething with unrest, and even German morale will probably suffer if the losses in Russia continue; German air and ground strength has already been decreased. Whether the economic and industrial life of Germany can be seriously disrupted from the air is open to question; the example of Great Britain leaves room for grave doubt. It is more likely that the Axis will suffer from a shortage of raw materials, especially oil and manganese, as a result of the enormous and continued consumption in the east and the failure to gain new sources of supply by conquest.

Viewed as a whole, the European phase of the American victory program, enormous as is the task set, appears entirely feasible. Germany may easily be so weakened that a successful land attack can be made by the time we have enough men and shipping to launch one.

Much less can be said for the Asiatic phase. Not only were the original measures considered by the Joint Board inadequate, but Japan has badly upset their timing by its raid of December 7 and its subsequent rapid successes in the Far East. This part of the American scheme for achieving victory must be revised.

Need We Fear Russia?

BY RALPH BATES

I

IT WOULD appear that in one vital matter the "British imperialists" of Mr. Eden's and Mr. Churchill's kind are in advance, not merely of public sentiment in this country, but of much liberal opinion. The British Foreign Minister, upon his return from Moscow, spoke sensibly and frankly of the problem of Anglo-Russian relations. There were, he said, suspicions on both sides. In declaring that wisdom and statesmanship would allay them, Mr. Eden implied that these suspicions were not unreasonable or fundamental. Nothing like this sobriety exists as yet among various liberal circles. Too many conversations have suggested to me that certain progressives dread Russian successes somewhat more than they fear Russian defeats. It appears that what this liberal Clivedenism would like is a Russian setback short of catastrophe, or modest—and expensive—victories short of triumph.

This state of mind is much more widespread than is supposed, and if unchecked will have evil consequences. There is no utility in merely urging trust in the wisdom of governments, either in London or in Moscow. To inform the world that a little dog might like to nestle in Stalin's lap is faulty propaganda. The world is not a little dog. To attempt to convince people that the Soviet Union has never made a mistake, that the Russo-German pact was just an effort to gain time in order to come to the relief of the democracies, is similarly to mistake the problem and to perpetuate it. It will be useful, therefore, to mention the several fears which exist in liberal circles.

The root of them all is the one passionately expressed by Norman Thomas in a recent debate with the writer at Boston. It is, incredible as it may seem, the one utilized by Hitler in his speech "explaining" his invasion of Russia: that by defeating the Reich we shall surrender all Europe into Stalin's hands. Next in importance is the often expressed fear that at some opportune moment the Soviet Union will back out of the war. Sometimes the argument takes the form that protracted reverses might cause Moscow's defection. At other times, it is said that a victorious Stalin might choose the same course. Again, it is suggested that the Soviet Union, having been aided to survive, might not observe the conditions of the peace treaties. Variantly it is feared that the Soviets will gain influence in certain quarters of the world, for example, the Balkans or the Far East, and that this will lead to Communist Party control of those regions. One observes, also, the lively fear that Russian triumph or unchanged survival will lead to such a strengthening of the Communist Party elsewhere that at some moment when that party is enabled to turn a leaf in its anthology of theory and tactics it will be in a position to work mischief comparable to that which it has recently eschewed. And, finally, one meets the peculiarly dreamy regret that in coming to terms with Moscow we may be enabling Stalin to carry his regime, unamended, into the Russian future.

Some of these possibilities may frankly be given the status of certainties. All aid to the Soviet Union is support for the existing regime. The Red Army is a stable army. It is firmly controlled by the Russian Communist Party. And though the belief is not relevant to the argument, the conduct of Communist troops in Spain gives one every reason to believe that that control, quite as much as the patriotism incorporated in it, has in part provided the foundation of the Red Army's magnificent showing. The true answer to this particular fear was given by Mr. Eden and will be dealt with later. Again, it may be conceded that the Soviet Union's survival will entail the extension of its influence in the Balkans, possibly of Communist Party influence. The case was certainly no different when, before Russian participation in the war, liberals urged the destruction of the Nazi regime, nor would the consequences of collective security in 1938, or of voluntary belligerence of the Soviets in September, 1939, have been otherwise. The price, if it must be so regarded, is a small one to pay for victory. And if Rumania is compelled to restore Bessarabia, as it ought, or if the Communist Party becomes predominant there, that also would surely be a small price. One can imagine better solutions for the Rumanian people than a Communist dictatorship, but if we know anything of the predicament of that people we would be hasty in assuming that this would be worse than preservation of the old feudalism. To confront the last of these cloudier fears, Soviet survival may strengthen the Communist Party in Britain and the United States. That result may be disturbing to some and exasperating to others; that it can be a danger is beyond belief.

The other fears originate in difficulties that can be met by wise statesmanship. The similar fears in Moscow must be so met. Progressive opinion should not have needed instruction from Mr. Eden. We are not making war upon Germany because its own regime is fascist, however much we may have disagreed with Izvestia's unforgotten statement that fascism is a matter of taste, but because Germany has gone to war with the aim of establishing fascism throughout the world. Prior to 1933 no Socialist advocated rearmament against the feeble Italian regime, much less war upon it. The same rule is to be applied to the Soviets. The case of Finland will be promptly adduced. The Russian demands upon Finland in the summer of 1939 were inordinate. Temporary occupation of areas strategically necessary for Soviet defense against the Reich was reasonable, but to demand outright cession was to conflict with the unmistakable character of the oncoming war as one for national liberty. The Finnish people, therefore, were justified in their resistance, just as certainly as they are doing a foolish wrong to themselves now. But when the Finnish instance is advanced as proof that the Soviet Union has a permanently aggressive character, one must disagree. That Moscow is still aware of its past blunder is as apparent now as it was in the dropping of Kuusinen.

II

The Soviet Union, like any other power, behaves according to its fundamental character under two conditions—when no alternative action is possible, and when, at the same time, it is put in a position to do so. To refuse all collaboration with the Soviet Union at Munich and shortly afterward to guarantee that Britain would go to war if Poland were invaded was to invite the Russo-German pact. London's stupidity opened up deceptive possibilities, for the Soviets, of military preponderance and security in Europe, with the additional lure of world revolution, or at least of the all-important German revolution, to be stabilized by Soviet intervention. To ridicule Chamberlain's stupidity, is not, of course, to assert that the Russian demands in 1939 were justifiable, but to recognize the circumstances under which the disaster occurred. Those circumstances are universally determinant. The case is not otherwise with Britain. Had there been any way to avoid war, over the Polish issue, Chamberlain would have taken it. There was no alternative; hence the British people's respect for democracy became his. Criticism of the two errors of London must be the basis for sound thinking.

Whenever one begins to advance this preliminary argument it is rarely long before someone interjects, "Very well, since Stalin has no alternative but to fight, let him fight. The minimum of collaboration should be directed to the end merely of enabling him to do so." The cynicism is as revolting as it is unstatesmanlike. And when this attitude, disguised with the name of realism, is combined with one of puling protest that the Soviets do not attack Japan, one confronts futility raised to the level of a moral virtue.

The plain duty of self-preservation compels us to a collaboration of a fulness which no existent treaty envisages and no public trend at present fosters. Even if we grant that victory might be ours without the most ample partnership, it is still true that victory so obtained would be far more costly than it need be, for us as well as for the citizens of the Soviet Union. To shy away from collaboration, or to set impossible conditions for its achievement, is to kill men, our men. To revert, then, to the argument presented above, simple inspection of the reality informs us that the Russians are fighting superlatively well and at formidable cost to themselves because they must. The intentions of states and their political tactics derive from such implications; their defection from prudent and moral courses or their acceptance of them is so determined. All states pursue this major or that minor objective, adopt this theory of behavior or that modification of it, according to these imperatives and possibilities. In the case of the Soviet Union, which, after supporting democracy and instructing the Spanish Communists to check the momentum of the Spanish revolution, reverted to a support of revolutionary defeatism which inevitably served the purposes of Hitler, the consequences are so immediately dramatic, so confusing of values, so entangled with emotional consequences that the laws governing such changes are forgotten.

Proper understanding of these laws would incline us to reason that because the Russians must fight at the present moment, earnest collaboration and unstinted help are likely to be repaid with honest partnership. For Russian security is more important to the Kremlin, as Spain showed, than any particular theory of revolution. The Russian imperative is our imperative, and both constitute the condition of partnership. To treat the Soviet Union with the indifference and the Machiavellian opportunism secretly approved by too many in our democracy is to create the state of mind, on both sides, that led to the Russo-German pact.

Military efficiency demands far more intimate collaboration than exists, for there are few areas of the war in which the Soviets' help is not of vital importance. The situation in the Far East, which for long must be adverse, cannot be fully remedied without Soviet collaboration. Let us be frank about the Soviets and about ourselves, in this Far Eastern question. The situation now existing there is not unlike that which prevailed in Europe prior to June 23, 1941. The Soviets' eventual enemy, Japan, is being engaged by other countries, thus permitting the continuance of Soviet neutrality. What some apparently fear is that the Soviet Union is abstaining from action with the definite intention of allowing the ABCD powers to take the strain without regard for the results. There is no proof that this is so, but if it were so, and if as a result the Japanese appeared likely to conquer positions whose retaking might become disproportionately costly to us and to the Soviet Union, what would be the correct course to follow? Granting for the sake of argument that Moscow's point is correct, that the German campaign must come first, one course is inevitable. It is to put the Soviet Union in such a position that its strategically placed troops may be utilized at the very first moment of confidence. It is not impossible, however, that Russian territory might be lost in the process. If, therefore, Moscow quite reasonably made it a condition that its frontiers should be restored during the war, by American troops, it would be honorable and expedient to give that guaranty in contractual form.

Asia Minor and the Balkans pose similar questions. The force of the argument is not apparent, however, when one takes its items piecemeal. For the mere glueing together of tactical plans, however competently it may be done, does not constitute a grand strategy. A grand strategy exists only when the economic and military apparatus of a group of allies is treated as one system, when the characteristic strength of a consortium is thrust against the characteristic weakness of its rival. A grand strategy can only be evolved when the common political denominator of a group of allies becomes the basis for a vigorous morale. Such a morale must itself close the gap in the allied ranks. In this case the gap was precisely the disunity between the Western powers and the Soviet Union. The entry of America into the war and the defeats in Russia will have begun to corrode German morale. Nothing could be more violently disruptive of that morale than a final, contractual, implemented, and visibly working unity of the powers. No grand strategy can exist if the allied powers are reluctant to impose their solution, the whole solution, and make it work. The Atlantic Charter, accepted in principle by the Soviets, points the way to its own complementary agreements.

III

At present there is an increasing unity between Britain and the United States. That rapprochement, patently and deeply sincere, has caused some to believe that the two countries must form, and are forming, a bloc to balance the Soviets and the eventual turbulence in Europe. Such a conception, if carried out, would be disastrous. Fortunately, to take the more readily assessable case of Britain, the understanding between London and Moscow is better than is commonly realized. That understanding, sealed by a treaty already amplified by secondary contracts such as that between the Polish government-in-exile and the two major powers, has had profound consequences for public feeling. Britain is committed, subject to modification of frontiers by discussion, to a restoration of the Polish state; so is the Soviet Union. Moscow, agreeing to make no separate peace, has expressed its willingness to help create a stable Europe. Military conversations between the two powers are intimate. A Russian trade-union delegation is in Britain, invited by the Trades Union Congress, which has a fraternal solidarity pact with the Russian federation. The full significance of this is apparent if one remembers that it was the British trade-union and labor movement which in 1920 put an end to the British government's intervention against the Russian Revolution, and that the head of the recent British labor mission to Moscow was Citrine, the moderate who declared during the Russo-Finnish War that the labor movement would not tolerate a "switching" of the war against the Soviets. The intention of the Foreign Office in welcoming the Russian mission is doubtless to give the Soviet leaders confidence and perhaps, in addition, to clear their heads of any lingering dreams concerning Communist influence in Britain. To conclude this hasty survey, the Soviet Union has been invited by Washington to adhere to the declaration arising out of the Atlantic Charter. It has accepted. The United States is granting generous lease-lend aid to it. All this is admirable but insufficient.

The clearest indication must be given to Moscow that its regime's stability is a Russian concern and that its frontiers will be the subject of mutual guaranties by the victorious states. This, surely, is merely to extend to Moscow the cardinal assurance that is the essence of the Atlantic Charter. There can be no stable peace without a Russia free from fear of the rest of Europe. The organisms required for full collaboration, as they are created, must be supplemented by others of post-war reconstructive purpose, and these, as areas are reconquered, must be set to work. There is no need to wait for the end of the war to elaborate the new League or whatever regulative institution is envisaged. It should be the prerogative of that League to elaborate peace aims now with candor and amplitude. The Soviet views must be taken into account here. Economic aid for reconstruction of devastated areas may be granted to Britain as well as to the conquered countries. It should be extended to the Soviet Union also. Relaxation of economic restrictions, promised by the Atlantic Charter, together with creative schemes for enrichment, must include the Soviets. Great as the recuperative powers of the Soviet Union may prove, the reconstruction of European economy demands that its recovery be rapidly accomplished.

Over and above unstinted fighting, the Soviet Union has a contribution to make and one which will test the nerve of its leaders: eventually it will have to work out general disarmament plans with other powers. Its willingness will depend on circumstances within our control, just as British and American disarmament must depend on the Soviets' good sense in aiding us to create a stable Europe. Doubtless there are other contributions that the Soviet Union may be called upon to make, and some it may proffer without prompting. Whatever may be the case, this one may believe: without collaboration between all the anti-Axis states, in war and peace, we cannot be confident of profitable victory. The Soviet Union is one of those states, and one of the most powerful. Because it is the one most likely to be ignored, or feared, it is time we began to be precise in our thinking about it.

Paris in the Morning

BY IDA TREAT

THE noise of the plane waked Henriette. She held her breath. She could not help it. What made them fly so low? People said they did it to scare the Parisians, to remind them the Germans were there. As if they needed that to remember.

The plane passed over, but the throbbing went on in her head. She must have been crying in her sleep again. She never cried when she was awake, but she could not help her dreams. Perhaps the pills the doctor gave her to make her sleep were to blame for the nightmares.

Her back ached, too. It felt as if her spine had rusted and grown together. That came from sleeping huddled in a heap. It had taken her so long to get warm when she went to bed. It could not be anything else. She still had two months—. The doctor did not like those pains. He warned her she was not getting enough to eat. Of course she wasn't. People had to fight for every mouthful these days, and there were days when she did not feel like fighting.

Henriette lay looking at the room. In the drab December light it looked blighted. The dark splotch on the wallpaper had spread. That meant the gutter was leaking again, and now the landlord would never fix it. The muslin curtains hung limp at the window, like gray rags. No wonder they were gray. She had not washed them in months. She had to save the three cakes of soap. Her pillow was a smudgy gray too, like the sheets. She longed to make her bed up fresh again—smooth, clean sheets. But she would need all her linen later on. Staying in bed so much was what dirtied the sheets. Bed was the only place where she could keep warm.

Through the mica panes of the salamander in the fireplace she could see the black curling fragments of the books she had burned the night before. It was silly to have burned them—they flamed with a roar and gave off the merest flicker of heat. In twenty-four hours the salamander could burn a whole scuttleful of coal—one-third of her fuel ration for a month. The fuel ration, though, was purely theoretical. There wasn't any coal.

It came over her that this was Monday. She must go to the mairie for her allocation. That meant more standing in line, for she could not get there before ten o'clock and there would be crowds ahead of her. If she went to the mairie at once the milk store was sure to be closed when she came back. The doctor said she had to have milk.

Henriette crept out of bed and stood shivering in the damp cold of the unheated flat. She longed dizzily for a cup of coffee. Jean always used to bring her her coffee in bed mornings before he went to work. Throwing a coat about her shoulders she pattered to the kitchen in her bare feet. There was no coffee, only roasted barley, but it would be hot. She held a saucepan under the faucet; a few drops tinkled into the pan, then the faucet gagged. The landlord had turned off the water again; he was afraid the pipes would freeze. The only faucet that worked was in the court five flights down.

She tilted up the water pitcher. Just enough for her coffee. Washing could wait. She would wet a towel in the court and rub her face and hands before she went out. Anyhow there was no soap. As for the white powder they sold at the market as a soap substitute, she would not risk using it again. Her hands still stung from it. Luckily she had not tried the stuff on her face. She peered at herself in the glass above the sink and wondered what Jean would say if he could see her, so yellow and thin. That was what war had done to her. It was funny how neither of them had thought of war except as fighting and maybe dying—never in terms of food, coal, and soap. Though perhaps she should not lay it to the war. It had all come with the defeat.

She stood warming her hands at the gas flame while the water heated. What did people do who had no gas? Perhaps they gathered twigs and fallen branches in the Bois de Vincennes. The concierge had brought back a whole sackful last Sunday. She said the Bois was full of people picking up wood. The agents were there, too, to stop people from breaking off branches and keep them away from the part of the Bois the Germans had shut off. They had something hidden there—tanks or an ammunition dump. If the Bois had not been so far away, Henriette would have asked the concierge to let her go along the next time. But the Bois was too far, and the doctor had forbidden her to walk. That was why he made her give up her work at the bank. After the buses stopped, the only way to get there was to walk. So now she must get along as best she could on her allocation. Twelve francs a day. Could anyone live on twelve francs? The money she had saved from her salary could not be touched. She would need it later on. In two months—she never dared think beyond that date. It was as if everything stopped there.

The water sizzled on the side of the saucepan and burst into noisy bubbling. Henriette poured it carefully through the filter over the little mound of ground barley. It came through a watery brown. She decided to add half a lump of sugar. There were thirty lumps left in the box and still twenty days to go until the end of the month. The doctor had been so cross with her for sending all her last month's ration to Jean. Sugar was food, he said—she had to think of herself. As if she could forget Jean, up north in a prison camp. She wondered whether Jean ever got the sugar.

She drank down the bowl of brown liquid and tried to hurry into her clothes while the warm feeling lasted. She wished she dared let the gas burn while she dressed. The company had warned her they would shut it off if she went beyond her quota—just one-half of what she burned the year before. Keeping away from the mirror, she buttoned her dress and smoothed her hair. She knew she looked a fright, but what difference did it make? No one cared how she looked; she didn't care herself.

Locking the door of the flat behind her, Henriette started down the stairs. From the street came a crashing noise like rushing water. The concierge at the door turned to speak to her.

"That's the third truck since yesterday."

Across the street, before the Lufthansa offices, soldiers in green uniforms were unloading coal.

"If we had a few Boches living here, there would be coal for us," grunted the concierge.

Henriette was glad no Germans lived in their house. She could not bear to look at them, with Jean a prisoner. She passed the coal truck with averted head. The noise followed her, sacks and sacks of coal rushing like water down the chute. A wave of hate welled up inside her so intense it was like nausea. All that coal for grown men in warm uniforms. What would happen if she went across and asked them, "Just a little coal, Messieurs, for the new baby—"? She felt herself grow hot. Not even for the baby would she ask anything of the Germans.

Halfway down the block a line of people stood huddled against the wall, outside the charcuterie. She heard a woman say they had been there since before daybreak. The charcutier had blood-sausage on sale. For blood-sausage, boudin, you did not need a ration ticket. Boudin—she could actually smell it, rich, dark, crackling, bursting in the pan. The thought made her feel giddy, and for the moment she forgot everything except that she wanted desperately a piece of boudin. She took her place at the end of the line.

In the line everyone was talking. That was where you got the news, for few people read the papers any more. As the woman beside her said, it was not worth spending fifty centimes on a paper just to get mad. Henriette asked her what had become of the old man who used to sell papers on the corner. He was a brave old fellow; when he shouted "Paris-Soir," he always added, dropping his voice a fraction, "and its lies." "Paris-Soir—et ses mensonges." The woman said she guessed the Boches had heard him. Anyhow he wasn't there. She said her husband had just lost his job because of the Boches. They had fired all the boueux—they would not let Frenchmen work in the sewers any more. They were afraid someone might plant a bomb under the Hotel Majestic or some of the other places where German officers were quartered. The woman just beyond said that was not the only reason. They did not want the French to know they had mined the whole city. She lived next door to the Lycée D———; every night she heard their drills burrowing in the stone. "They're going to blow up Paris if they have to leave."

The man next in line said the British would blow up the Boches before they got a chance to leave. He hoped they would; he did not care what happened to him. "They can blow up the whole place and welcome, provided they get the Boches." The woman next to Henriette said she felt the same way. She would not mind being bombed by the British if only the Boches were too.

Farther down the line they were talking about potatoes. A woman said she stood four hours in line the day before and only got two pounds, and they were frosted. Someone said the Germans chalked Deutschland on the cars of potatoes they didn't take, so people would think they came from Germany. The speaker said he knew it for a fact; his son worked at the freight yards. From potatoes talk switched to the riots at the Villette abattoir—sixteen killed the day the Germans took all but 600 cattle out of 4,000 destined for Paris. "One man stuck two Germans with his butcher knife before they shot him—and it's only the beginning."

A woman in a shabby gray shawl moved along the line holding out a bottle. "Buy my saladine. You won't miss oil on your salad if you use my saladine." She poured a few drops on her palm—a pasty, yellow mess. Henriette felt her gorge rise. What was it? Probably something that made you sick. Her neighbor in the line asked her if she had tried boiling lichens. You got them at the drugstore; they made the water thick. "But it has no taste," another woman put in. She had tried it, she'd rather go without. So many people were sick from eating these substitutes—not to mention the rotten food. The fish they sold at the market—one look at it was enough.

"Do you know the fish man gets a basket by truck every day from the coast? He sells it privately. People go to his house after dark."

"Yes, and what do they pay for it? Fifty francs a pound and more. Une honte!"

"There's no defeat for the ones with money—."

"The people can starve—."

Henriette felt faint as she listened, huddled against the wall for shelter from the wind. The damp cold of the pavement seeped through her thin soles turning her feet to ice. The shoes needed mending, but there was no leather at the cobblers, and how could she afford a new pair? Six hundred francs for a pair of shoes! She found herself hating the people who could pay 600 francs—the same sickening hate she felt for the Germans. A lucky thing she had bought wool for the baby's things last summer. Now there was no wool in the shops, even for the rich.

Step by step the line shortened. Henriette had almost reached the door of the shop. She could hear the hubbub inside. People were shoving and shouting: "Only one left . . . she gave it all to her friends . . . it's an outrage . . . two pounds to the first ones and now nothing left for us . . . Monsieur l'Agent!" A policeman jogged around the corner, his cape flapping, and elbowed his way through the door.

"Look what she gave me for four of us." The man who had spoken about potatoes pushed past Henriette holding out a few inches of dirty gray sausage stuffed with what looked like red clay. Was that the boudin? The agent reappeared in the shop door, driving people before him. "All out! All out!" he shouted; then the door crashed shut. "That's how it always is," a woman's voice called shrilly; "stand in the cold for hours, and for what? Peau de—!"

Henriette glanced at her watch. Already half-past nine. And still the milk to get, and the trip to the mairie; she would have to show her "mother's card" at the crêmerie and try to be served first. She had the right though she hated to use it. She knew how it would be.

It was worse than she anticipated. The crowd before the milk store resisted like a wall when she tried to force her way in. The outer rim gave a little, stretched, and closed in behind her. She was caught, hemmed in, powerless to stir. A back resisted, an elbow jabbed. Voices spoke about her: "No, you don't, my girl . . . where's her card? . . . she's another one with a pillow under her skirt . . . show your card." She could not reach her card; her arms were pinned to her sides. She tried to protect her body. They were crushing her. She couldn't breath. "Monsieur l'Agent!" she screamed. Then she knew she was going to faint.

She did not faint, for the policeman had her by the waist. He had got her out of the press and was telling her to sit down on the curb until she felt better. He was a burly Corsican with a kind voice.

"You're all right, petite dame, you're all right," he kept repeating. "I'm a family man myself. Anyone who looks at your face can tell what's the matter with you. I'll tend to your milk. Where's your card? In your bag? Better let me see it—just for the sake of these people. You mustn't mind them; they've all got their own to think of."

He brought her the half-filled milk can and helped her to her feet. Henriette staggered a little when she tried to walk. She still felt queer and breathless. She hoped she would not have to stand in line too long at the mairie for her allocation.

In the Wind

CLARENCE BUDINGTON KELLAND, the book and magazine writer who was recently appointed publicity director of the Republican National Committee, has been identified with isolationist-America First elements in the party since the beginning of the war. When Verne Marshall organized the No Foreign War Committee, Kelland would not join but gave it his indorsement. When Wendell Willkie spoke of his followers as the "loyal opposition," Kelland argued that the phrase was a contradiction of terms. Last April he was listed as one of the sponsors of the meeting of Women United from which Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt fled in embarrassment when anti-Semitic catcalls filled the hall.

THE UNITED MINE WORKERS are organizing Helena Rubenstein's cosmetics business. . . . The Cannery and Packinghouse Workers are organizing gravediggers throughout the country.

WELL-TO-DO HOUSEWIVES in New York's suburban areas are hoarding soap, sugar, and other commodities, and the chain stores are rationing sugar in sections where hoarding has threatened to curtail the supply. . . . In one of the city's most expensive department stores a mother was observed outfitting her six-year-old son for the next six years.

THE COMMUNIST PARTY is backing the action of the State Department in rebuffing the De Gaullists on the seizure of St. Pierre and Miquelon.

EUGENE TALMADGE of Georgia was the only state governor who did not support the pledge of loyalty to the President sponsored by Admiral Richard E. Byrd. Talmadge sent this wire in reply to the Admiral's request: "It doesn't take anyone from New York or any other state to notify us of our duty in times of an emergency like this. All we ask is for New York to come up with us, which I am satisfied they will do."

COMMENTING on some of Colonel Knox's restrictions on news of the navy, Gene Lindberg, Denver Post columnist, wrote:

> The boy stood on the (censored) deck
> Whence all but he (deleted)
> (This message gives out shipping news > and cannot be completed.)

THE LONDON News-Chronicle reports that some of the native English fascists interned in prison camps have been demonstrating against their treatment. "I thought you would play the game," said the camp commandant. "I can tell you that unless you do behave as is expected of you, we shall be using disciplinary measures." The News-Chronicle added, "Among the men are some who went to public schools."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Shall the Poorest Pay the Bill?

ON SATURDAY, December 6, the day before the war broke out, H. L. Mitchell, secretary of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union, and I had breakfast together in New York. He went back to a middle South already altered by bombs on Honolulu. I went back to North Carolina. Not even humanitarians hear—or want to hear—as much about Mitchell as they once did when angry landlords in the Arkansas delta called him the "pants presser from Tyronza" because he had deserted small-town dry-cleaning to try to organize the tenant farmers. He is still working at it. But he wrote me across the South, "We are not likely to be heard above the war." He counted without Senator Byrd of Virginia, who has proposed as a war measure what he has been incessantly proposing as a peace measure—that practically all government aid to the littlest farmers be whacked away. Also Byrd proposed it again almost in coincidence with census reports, just coming out, which indicate that the number of farmers in the lowest income group of farmers has practically doubled in the years which led through the New Deal to war.

When Senator Byrd drew up his figures to show how much a government in need of all its resources could save out of the poorest farmers in America through destroying the Farm Security Administration, I doubt that he knew how their need of help had increased. Not many Americans realize what has happened to those farmers. I know I was surprised to learn it from the census reports. I suspect that the Department of Agriculture was. Actually from 1929, the year the depression began, to 1939, the year this war began, the number of American farms bringing their operators only $600 or less, including everything used or sold, had increased from 28 per cent of all our farms to more than 47 per cent. And this had happened even though in the Southern states 200,000 of the poorest families, which pulled every income average down, had been squeezed entirely out of agriculture. In those Southern states the number of farmers making $600 or less a year out of all their efforts has risen from a little more than one-third to just a fraction less than two-thirds of all.

Such little farmers, of course, are a long way from Senator Byrd, who as Farmer Byrd is the biggest apple grower in America on his five thousand acres of beautiful orchards in the Valley of Virginia. Even in his poll-tax state, however, a good many of those little farmers must be numbered among his constituents. In 1929, the Bureau of the Census reports, a little more than 10 per cent of the farms in Virginia received in total value of farm products sold, traded, or used at home less than $250 a year. That meant approximately 17,424 Virginia families living at so low a level. But in 1939 the Virginia families living at that level amounted to a fourth of all the farm families of Virginia. With a family on every farm, 43,035 Virginia farm families were down at that bottom level.

Such figures, of course, cannot be regarded as encouraging to those in the New Deal who have tried to help raise the standard of living of all American farmers. Incidentally, the figures do not include government payments, but such payments naturally go in greatest sum to the biggest farmers. Such payments certainly would not pull the poorest up very far. It is also true that 1939 was not agriculture's best year. Neither does 1929 stir happy memories. Since 1939 undoubtedly, as Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau has reported, farm income has risen. For millions it is still down there below even the conception of people who live in cities.

There are implications in these figures that deserve the study of our agricultural leaders. There are suggestions in them of the failure of our high plans in the past for a better America in the future. They show how little the Farm Security Administration has accomplished in terms of the hope with which it was created—that it could make reality of the American's dream of a decent free life on his own sustaining land. By these figures the dream seems almost a bad joke. But one thing these figures do not suggest is that the United States of America can load the cost of the war effort on the backs of the little farmers.

Senator Byrd is not the only American who realizes the necessity for sensible retrenchment in some peacetime functions of government at a time when America will need all its resources for a war which will be costly beyond all past computations about anything. But not many Americans aware of the facts will wish retrenchment to begin with stopping aid to the poorest people of the farms. We shall have to sacrifice certainly, but the strength of America in war will not be served by Senator Byrd's suggestion of putting the ax first to the necks of those who are already most bowed down. We are not going to save this democracy by sacrificing those who are already hurt most and who qualify for the sacrifice only through being least able to make themselves heard.

BOOKS and the ARTS

WILLIAM JAMES: 1842-1942

BY IRWIN EDMAN

IT IS hard to realize that we are celebrating this month in America the hundredth anniversary of the birth of William James. He is, it is true, already a classic in American philosophy and American literature. "Pragmatism," which he termed "a new name for some old ways of thinking," has become an established—though ambiguous—part of the philosophical vocabulary. "The Varieties of Religious Experience" has been read and has been an influence all over the world. James, none too disciplined or technical an expert in philosophy, has for at least fifty years now been a refreshing and revolutionary influence on more technical philosophers. He as much as any man was responsible for liberating American thought, in so far as it has been liberated, from the heavy dialectical chains of German metaphysics. He is, moreover, a span from the classic tradition of American writing and thought to the present. His life, like his thought, is a link between the era of his birth, in the golden day of the New England mind on an isolated continent, and these times, when American fate is involved with the fate of all free men on all the seven seas.

What makes it hard to realize that we are celebrating the century of an American intellectual classic is that there are many people alive, some of them still in their prime, who remember the man in his habit as he was. Their eyes light with enthusiasm as they recall the generous sallies and the humane wit of this "Irishman among the Brahmans," this révolté in the genteel tradition, this philosopher who started as a doctor and remained to the end a healer of men's souls, this psychologist with the instincts and the gifts of a poet and a painter, this inspiring teacher and perpetually outgiving friend. The generation of his Harvard students is still alive, and James lives not only in the memories but in the pages of many philosophers, including John Dewey. Though some of his more technical reflections date—just as the most up-to-date discussions in the journals of philosophy will be dead in a few years—there is much in him that seems only of yesterday, or, one hopes, the intimation of a better tomorrow. "The Principles of Psychology," for example, is in its essence far more living and penetrative about human behavior than many textbooks published within the last month. And "The Moral Equivalent of War" expresses a hope and a necessity now become more poignant and central than ever in the predicament of mankind.

The very character of James's gifts had in it the seeds of the decline of his reputation and early reservations about it. As long ago as 1923 Santayana expressed the distrust his fellow-philosophers had of the professional contribution of the personality they so much admired. "He made," said his one-time colleague at Harvard, "raids upon philosophy." James would have loved the phrase and might even with pleasure have used it about himself. In the hands of a critic it was intended as something other than praise. It was a way of calling attention to the sporadic, episodic character of James's thought, never a consistent or comprehensive system, never marked by clear or consistent principles. It was, rather, a kaleidoscope, vivid, varied, and disorganized. In one sense James did make raids upon philosophy. He repeatedly attacked, and from many different quarters, the widespread ramparts of metaphysical systems, of "system" itself in philosophy. He had the artist's sense of the multiple aspects of existence for any sensitive and living spirit. Ideas were visions and perspectives, and they were the changing visions and perspectives of knowledge that was always an exploration, an adventure, a journey of constantly new unfoldings and discoveries. James had, too, the poet's sense—and that of the poet of action—of the reality of the changing, the moving, the primitive urgency of life itself. James was not the first in philosophy to emphasize the fact and the primacy of fluency and change. The Greek Heraclitus had beaten him to it by two thousand years. But philosophy had in the hands of the logicians and the rationalists emphasized the static, the coherent, the unified character of "reality." James, like the poet that he was, restored men to the innocencies of their more immediate experience. He was fond of recalling his readers and hearers to the plural, many-sided, changing aspects of experience as we have it, to the fact that we are living in a "pluriverse" rather than a universe. He accented, however, not simply the plurality but the moving character of existence. The universe was for him not a static system but a plurality of goings on, of processes.

In such a view of the world all views were relative. They were projections and hypotheses for action. They were themes for guidance, programs of navigation by which one might control the waves of the future. A great deal of emphasis has been placed on James's theory of truth. He insisted that truths were always to be measured by consequences, that there was no such thing as the truth, finished and final. Truths were hypotheses that worked. The panoplied idealists at home as well as abroad laughed at this "cash-in" notion of truth. James had unfortunately used the phrase himself. Bertrand Russell accused James of trying to elect God by popular vote. Technical critics pointed out the ambiguities to which James's not very critically expressed version of truth led. It seemed at times, especially when James dealt with religious matters, where he was very tender to the sensibilities of sick souls, that one not only could but should, in the interest of living more hopefully, believe what one wanted. His essay "The Will to Believe" was parodied as "The Will to Make Believe."

In the assaults on James's loose and often contradictory theories of truth, in the criticisms leveled against his rather happy-go-lucky versions of "experience," his main intentions and his central insights have often been forgotten. The most careful analysis of truth in terms of operations, subscribed to by the most sober-minded logicians and philosophers of science, has James to thank for the original impulsion he gave to the treating of existences in terms of movement and knowledge in terms of operation. In the easy pickings possible to technical criticism it has also been forgotten how much James did to retrieve philosophy from the dialectics of the academy to the concerns of the whole man in a whole life. Grant that he lacked Greek composure and Spinozistic detachment, though he could on occasion eloquently set forth both, he did, nevertheless, no less than his great predecessors, take philosophy with human seriousness. Philosophy was a window for the soul, a clarifying way by which life might be lived; religion was a salvation, an adventurous belief, an audacious but justifiable commitment to the not impossible good.

James has of late been criticized for his lack of any "social" philosophy. In retrospect he does seem to belong to the tradition in which his father grew up and in which he was brought up. He belongs morally in the line of liberal transcendentalism and Protestant individualism. He is nearer Emerson than Dewey, and nearer even to Swedenborg, his father's prophet, than to statistics and economics and sociology. Thus he could consider war and its equivalent apart from the economic and social causes and consequences. He was an American moralist paddling his own canoe on a New England stream or on Walden Pond. But it is forgotten how acute and how responsible a social critic he was, in the way that Emerson was. He was a democrat in the sense that he resented all assaults of organized bigness on the independent human psyche. He would have hated totalitarian government as he hated totalitarian systems of thought. He was a liberal, an internationalist, an anti-imperialist, a civil-service reformer. He wrote of himself, "In my earlier years my whole political education was due to The Nation." And he valued E. L. Godkin as the gadfly critic of American life. The Nation, incidentally, can boast of book reviews, like all those of that period anonymous, and letters from James on many things, from the Galileo festival in Padua to the abuse in medical advertisements. It is incidentally of interest to readers of The Nation that James's "Principles of Psychology" was reviewed in this publication by Charles Peirce. He began by remarking that "the 'Principles' was probably the most important contribution that had been made to the subject for many years." He continued, however, by charging the book with "idiosyncrasies of diction and tricks of language." He complained that it was superficial and untested, despite its pretensions to scientific method.

James was a member of a "royal family" intellectually. The brilliance and originality and saltiness of his father are only beginning to be recognized, just as the great stature of his artist brother is beginning to seem less at this distance of time. William James is a member of a greater family: the spiritual kinship of Emerson, Thoreau, Whitman, and the intellectual fraternity of those philosophers from Aristotle down who have thought to find a way of thought that should be a saving way of life. Philosophy in James's hands, as in those of Socrates in the "Charmides," was in more than one sense a charm.

One might sum up one's impression of James's whole philosophy in the terms that a young reviewer in 1891 used in the Atlantic Monthly about "The Principles of Psychology": "But it would be pedantry to regret the loss of logical unity in a book so rich and living, in which a generous nature breaks out at every point, and the perennial problems of the human mind are discussed so modestly, so solidly, and with such a deep and pathetic sincerity." The reviewer was George Santayana.

Debunking the Debunkers

THIS AGE OF FABLE. By Gustav Stolper. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

THE war will end in a peace, and the peace will consist of as much wisdom as the democratic victors—if they win—possess. Their wisdom will be measured by the popular understanding of the nature of the world, of its political structure, and of its economic realities. In the United States twenty years of writing and teaching have been devoted to an exposition of what was called the post-war world, an exposition which, as we now realize, was generally negative. Until the United States found itself again at war, a great number of persons described as intelligent were beset with deep doubts about Europe's war, about the future of capitalism, and about the validity of democratic principles as practiced in the United States and Great Britain. They had accepted concepts about the nature of war, about imperialism and collectivism, about spending and inflation, about planning and security which persist today as part of the fabric of public thinking. And as such they are likely to be woven into the peace.

It is appropriate, then, to examine these concepts and appraise them as suitable material for the building of a brave new world. They are, in the main, bitterly negative concepts in that they were adopted to take the place of discarded ideas, abandoned in disillusionment. The last twenty years have belonged to the debunkers. And the social philosophy of debunkers is not what one would turn to for construction and reconstruction after the world's greatest war.

So it is of great service to have someone debunk the debunkers, and in so doing to picture the world once more in perspective, with a line drawn between reality and illusion, hypothesis and fact. This Mr. Stolper has undertaken with clarity, vigor, and, all told, great persuasiveness. He was not thinking specifically of the peace to come. He wrote before America had the shock of finding itself in greater danger than the warning prophets had dared to say. But the value of his book is its contribution to the solution of the problems of this crisis.

Mr. Stolper is an unashamed protagonist of liberal capitalism and democracy. That is not to say his book is a defense of capitalist democracy as practiced since the last war. Mr. Stolper can thump the capitalists; many of the most tragic mistakes of the past generation have been committed by capitalists or the politicians of capitalist lands. He does not write in praise of capitalism as such. This is not a broadside of propaganda. It is a patient, lucid exposition of the chief fables of this age. Some of these fables are intricate and have been built up gradually. Being an economist, Mr. Stolper devotes much time to correcting popular misconceptions about economics, such as the fear of bankruptcy because of an increasing national debt; he explains the working of the gold standard, the realities of inflation and deflation. Then he gives the socialist planners a going-over. He analyzes the problem of poverty amidst plenty as it appears to his liberal-capitalist mind. He sternly rejects the concept of production-for-use as against production-for-profit, that prime comfort of most left-wingers. He is sure that full state control of major economic processes inevitably leads to dictatorship and the loss of individual freedom.

He takes up, too, the fables about Germany and Great Britain. His estimate of British progress in the period between the First and the Second World War will be read with some astonishment, and enormous profit, by many Americans, for this period of British development has had almost no exposition in this country. It may be bizarre that one of the best summaries of British development to appear in this country should be the product of a writer of German background. Mr. Stolper—and Mrs. Stolper, who had a share in this part of the work—sees Britain more clearly than most Americans because he is a European in culture and knows the magnitude of British achievements measured by European standards.

Here is a book that should be welcomed by anyone willing to put his concepts of the world to a sharp test. If he can come out of its cross-examination with his suppositions intact, he will be entitled to feel himself on solid ground. Not that everything Mr. Stolper says in arguing for liberal capitalism is puncture-proof; a writer who is answering bad reasoning is entitled to a few liberties of over- and understatement. But Mr. Stolper has made a notable contribution to the greatest social understanding there can be, the knowledge of the realities we have lived by and shall continue to live by.

RAYMOND GRAM SWING

The Fifth Continent

INTRODUCING AUSTRALIA. By C. Hartley Grattan. The John Day Company. $3.

A BOOK on Australia could not be more opportune. Hartley Grattan, after years of preparation, has hit the right moment for publication, just as the Labor Prime Minister of the Commonwealth is impelled by events to remind his countrymen and the world that the South Pacific is a single oceanic region inseparable from the American continent. Mr. Grattan enjoys advantages for his study such as fall to very few Americans. He has paid three visits to Australia, the longest of them as a Carnegie traveling fellow. He has a cordial liking for the land and its people, and he has been able to observe them under the pressure of war.

Australia is much younger than European North America, and its physical conditions have enforced a development utterly unlike that of the United States. In area the two countries are almost equal, but the total population of the island continent is not much more than that of New York

ESSAYS ON ANTISEMITISM
A Volume of 11 Historical and Analytical Essays
by Recognized Authorities

Foreword by PROFESSOR SALO W. BARON
(Columbia University)

ON THE PSYCHOLOGY OF ANTISEMITISM
by ISRAEL S. WECHSLER, M.D.
THE ECONOMIC BACKGROUND
by BERNARD D. WEINRYB JEWS IN MEDIEVAL ART
by JOSEPH REIDER
THE JEWS AND ISLAM
by SAMUEL ROSENBLATT
IN THE HELLENISTIC-ROMAN WORLD
by RALPH MARCUS
and others.

Cloth-bound 202 pages Postpaid $2.00

•

Order from—JEWISH SOCIAL STUDIES
1841 Broadway New York City
A remittance must accompany the order

AMUSEMENTS

Theatre Guild Productions
PAPA IS ALL!
Patterson Greene's Riotous Comedy with
JESSIE ROYCE LANDIS • CARL BENTON REID
GUILD Theatre, 52nd Street West of Broadway. CO. 5-8229
Evenings, 8:40 Matinees Thursday and Saturday, 2:40

★ MARY BOLAND
★ WALTER HAMPDEN
★ BOBBY CLARK
In Sheridan's Greatest Comedy
THE RIVALS
SHUBERT Theatre, 44th Street West of Broadway. CI. 6-5990
Evenings, 8:40 Matinees Thursday and Saturday 2:40

"Buoyant, Giddy and Funny . . . Ought to make everyone very happy."
-Atkinson, Times

Max Gordon presents
JUNIOR MISS
A New Comedy by Jerome Chodorov and Joseph Fields
Based on the stories by Sally Benson — Directed by Moss Hart
LYCEUM Theatre, 45th St. E. of B'way. CH. 4-4256
Evenings, 8:40; Matinees, WEDNESDAY & SATURDAY, 2:40

"A GALE OF LAUGHTER."—Atkinson, Times.
MY SISTER EILEEN
THE RIOTOUS LAUGH HIT
BILTMORE THEATRE, 47th St. W. of B'way—CIrcle 6-9353
Eves., 8:40 — Mats.: Wednesday and Saturday, 2:40

City—a fact which to Americans seems hardly credible. The vast northern and central spaces are almost uninhabitable. White settlement may never stretch far from the ocean, and there would seem to be no possibility of changing the extraordinary balance by which half the population is crowded into five large cities. The national community is in all respects unique. There is no parallel on earth to these basic realities. The Australians must tackle their problems with a minimum of help from the experience of other peoples.

Among all those problems Mr. Grattan moves easily and with ample knowledge. His chapters on economic resources, on production and trade, are lucid and admirably compressed. He describes the remarkable industrial expansion, especially in steel, since the First World War and gives a valuable summary of the facts as to Australia's present production for war. The people, of course, are completely united, and were so before the deadly menace of Japan appeared in its stark outlines. But, needless to say, war-time unity does not diminish the difficulties of Australian politics, which during the forty years of the federal commonwealth have displayed a queer complexity. Here is one democratic country where political parties are built upon the hardpan of vital interests, upon sharp conflict between the great cities and the "Outback," with a relatively large wage-earning population possessing an advanced trade-union system. Australia, like New Zealand, has established minimum standards and upheld them with marked success, and although Sydney and Melbourne reveal an astonishing tolerance of slum misery, the national minimum itself is unchallenged. There is no question in the English-speaking world more interesting than this—whether Australia will be able to continue along its present lines, and, perhaps above all, whether the grim issue of population will not compel a drastic change of policy as to immigration and everything else.

Mr. Grattan describes the setback to political Labor twenty years ago, and the recovery. He follows the career of the singular Welshman W. M. Hughes, active still, so long after the fall of Lloyd George, his crony at the Paris peace conference. Hughes insisted on Australian expansion over the islands—a policy possible only with United States backing. Mr. Grattan explains the turn of fortune by which Robert Menzies, a seemingly significant figure in 1940, lost the premiership after his resounding tour of England and America. (Not yet is it easy for a dominion statesman to find his place in the imperial scheme.) Mr. Grattan throughout is fair and animated, and frequently challenging. I cannot, for instance, accept his remark that Australia does not make the appeal of the exotic. For all English people, I should say, the fauna and flora are attractive because of exceeding strangeness, and the limitless "bush" seems to them the remote opposite of any European forest. Australians are irritated, and rightly so, by the pervasive references to early penal settlements, which by the way nobody recalls in relation to the American colonies. Two facts in this connection ought always to be stressed: first, that the settlement of that vast country—a heroic achievement—was influenced only to a limited extent by the imposition of penal institutions; and, second, that a large percentage of the men and women transported were not criminals but decent victims of an inhuman legal system.

S. K. RATCLIFFE

Novel of Mexico

NAYAR. By Miguel Angel Menéndez. Translated from the Spanish by Angel Flores. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

THERE could be no better introduction to "Nayar," the novel that received honorable mention in the recent Latin American prize contest, than the three documentary movies "The Wave," "Chico," and "The Forgotten Village." The landscape of Mexico, the types of Mexicans and Indians, and their customs, as revealed by the camera, can serve as a frame of reference when we enter Nayar.

The narrator of this story, Enrique Salerit, happens to be a government official working in the Treasury Department at San Blas, a deserted town on the western coast of Mexico. He establishes a firm friendship with Ramón Córdoba, a halfbreed, whom he accompanies on his hunting trips through the virgin forests of the nearby estuaries. Understanding the dismal compulsion that forced Ramón to kill the judge who dishonered his wife and then to burn his house, he flees with his friend into the jungle. They have many adventures among the salt workers in the region. But it is only when the two reach the Nayar Sierra that the novel reveals its depth. The regional nomenclature—María Jesús, Santa Teresa, San Francisco, San Juan de Peyotán, all hamlets in the neighborhood of Nayar indicated only on a very detailed map of Mexico—smacks of religion and Europe, but the reality behind defies both.

The Cora Indians, whom the fugitives reach in their fastnesses in the Sierra Madre, reluctantly tolerate them. Suspicion, resentment, and distrust separate Ramón and Enrique from these Indians. The Cristero rebellion is let loose in the meanwhile by the reactionaries; fire and rapine spread through the settlements. To make matters worse, the rainy season sets in, and the Cora Indians, in order not to be embroiled in the fighting, determine to maintain their furtive aloofness by abandoning their huts to hide from the storms of nature and of man in the innumerable mountain caves.

With the exception of their chieftain Gervasio, the Indians are haunted victims of ignorance, superstition, and magic. Against the storms the Elders seek help from their obsidian idol Tláloc. A ceaseless downpour rages on, destroying the crops, while the fifteen Elders in the cave adjure their god. Nothing can match Chapter 30 of this novel, which describes the ceremonies of propitiation in the cave as dimly perceived by Enrique, whose white skin excludes him from participation.

Calamities pursue the harassed Indians. Their food supply is destroyed; the enemy infest their land; the weather discourages them even more than their other misfortunes. So deeply ingrained is their resentment against whites and mestizos that reports that the triumphant government forces do not wish to harm them come as a surprise. As the besieging troubles of storm and rebellion subside, the inner savagery of the Cora Indians comes to the surface. Gervasio's wisdom and common sense are defeated in the council called to decide whether Uchunchu, the sorcerer, is to blame for the sterility of the soil and the sudden death of their animals. Once the death sentence is imposed on the self-confessed sorcerer, Ramón rises to uphold the simple notions of justice and right. "It may have been that in his blood rose the two immensities the halfbreed has to bear within, and from this clash issued the thunderbolt which unbalanced his thought." When the government troops arrive, it is too late to save Uchunchu, and Ramón also lies dead beside the hot ashes of the victim.

"Nayar" is derivative in more than one sense. For its theme and philosophy it goes to the indigenous parti-pris so widespread in contemporary Latin American literature. What startles the reader is to find the rhetorical and highly sophisticated devices developed in the twenties employed here in the presentation of a social problem. If the author's flamboyant style is inappropriate for action and conflict, it is most felicitous for the creation of moods.

M. J. BENARDETE

America, America!

THE MIND'S GEOGRAPHY. By George Zabriskie. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

THE POEM OF BUNKER HILL. By Harry Brown. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

ONE poet is concerned with America simply because he was born and brought up here. He is not interested qua poet in ideas or his interior life or in culture or politics; so he writes about the scene. The second poet is in a hurry to be successful; if Americanism is the order of the day, then Americanism is his thing.

But Harry Brown is the victim instead of the exploiter of fashion, for fashion corrupts whatever native poetry he may have in him. "The Poem of Bunker Hill" tries to be an epic, a patriotic manifesto, and a properly modern poem all in one—which requires no small facility on the part of the poet. Brown has facility, indeed, but it does not extend to narrative verse. Technically, the best passages of his poem are the inspirational ones—which are coincidentally the falsest and most offensive. Nor can I deny Brown the ability to perpetrate howlers with a certain plausible finish. Read fast, he can get away with murder. The best part of the poem so far as I am concerned is the description of the actual business of the battle, since it gives information, and gives it with a directness that only a peculiar confusion of genres could permit. Brown has managed here to get the best, or the worst, out of both prose and verse. The latter's conventions relieve him of any trouble about his periods, while prose sanctions his neglect to keep some sort of beat or measure. But since prose is the lower common denominator, he would have done better for his reputation as a writer to have kept to it. For example, this is verse, but awful as verse or prose: "And then he smiled. But his smile was pitiful/ And injured and sad." This is not verse, but acceptable as prose: "And as they retreated the volleys of the Americans/ Grew less intense."

For the rest this poem is a passage of high-toned flag-waving, a shameless bid for applause, a dive into the swim, a well-timed jump upon the band-wagon, executed with pretension and chic. It is impossible today, and has been for a long time, to conceive of a historical event both important and simple enough for epic treatment. Brown is sensitive enough to suspect this but not wise enough to be convinced. He spends hyperbole and affects ignorance in the effort to convince himself as well as others that his theme does meet these requirements. Instead of elevating and simplifying his manner to fit the theme, he must inflate and oversimplify the theme to fit his manner, claiming for the American Revolution a content of such purity and historical force as can just barely be argued for Christianity. (It was all right —within limits—for certain modern poets to be simple-minded about the Socialist revolution, which has not yet happened; it is another thing to be that simple-minded, given the present state of the historical sciences, about something which has already happened.) To keep such a long narrative going in up-to-date verse, the poet pillages almost every notion, catchword, and device hallowed by the usage of the correct contemporary poets, and by Homer too; does it with an infallible instinct for the chichi that is nothing else but chichi.

There is History, for instance, which is derailed not once but a dozen times in this work. Prescott's men go "walking into History"; they approach a little hill "Where the course of History would begin to undergo/A revision not mentioned in the Sibylline Books"; and "A bud of History was about to burst into flower." Love too, which is beginning to share History's bull market among the younger poets, is pulled in by the feet like Hector's body and thrown on the daedal heap along with the despoiled corpses of Homer, Auden, and sundry others, for ". . . men had walked across the world and found a thing called Freedom,/Discov-

To keep abreast of
HISTORY in the MAKING
FILL OUT AND MAIL THIS Order Form

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVE. • NEW YORK

In order for me to keep abreast of history in the making, please enter my subscription to The Nation for the period indicated below. I inclose $..................

☐ One year $5
☐ Two Years $8
☐ Three Years $11

Special Introductory Offer

☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name..

Address..

....
1-17-42

Foreign and Canadian postage $1 a year

ered a thing called Love. . . ." Love, that is, was discovered by Columbus along with America and syphilis. Poetry, like this is produced by a poet without modesty and without convictions. And we would disbelieve the importance of the creation of the world to hear it rehearsed in this idiom. "The Poem of Bunker Hill" is as spurious, flatulent, and vulgar as neo-Americanism itself. American patriotism—the real national kind, not the positive fear of Hitler—is dead, has already happened. As Marx says, the second time anything happens it comes as a bad joke.

George Zabriskie is a different story. The best of this first book of poems is descriptive, panoramic writing that effaces itself for the sake of the object or scene. It presents the dingy neighborhoods of tin-can-littered lots, the wide dull streets, the neat and airless suburban purlieus of the greater New Jersey that is the America most Americans know. Against this, the poet invokes the escaping railroads, Daniel Boone, and the frontier; he can only fall back on what excited his boyhood. This is slight, strictly minor poetry, of course, but I read it with more immediate pleasure than I have got from the work of better poets. The pleasure is in the smooth sliding numbers, Zabriskie's ease, his remarkable metrical skill, and the poise, unusual in such a young and provincial poet, which enables him to keep everything, even his faults and his influences, under control. There are faults, there are falsities, but never a false tone. This is Zabriskie at his best:

> Westward, the stinking marshlands green with spring,
> And east the Hudson, where the soiled gulls cry
> From docks; for here the ships come in from paradise
> And hell, the soiled waters lick the laden bottoms
> Of a busy world.

"From paradise and hell" is not so good, nor is the last half-line. But the effect of this poetry is not in detail or phrase, it is cumulative; it makes its point by insisting with sincerity and perfect tact.

But Zabriskie's ear is so careful and he has so much tact that he is in danger of having no style at all. His verse is too neutral and almost too transparent, lacking the momentum of a manner of its own to carry it over the inevitable voids. Realizing this, he sometimes tries to force a style in the "modern manner" by combining terse syntax with periphrastic diction:

> In your ears the ivory click of poised precise
> Synthetic spheres, the muttered curse and slight
> Laconic word . . .

(Note, incidentally, the duplicated enjambement and the repetition on the same beat of the adjectival "ic.") The pool-parlor resists the writer's poetic faculties. He cannot intensify what he feels about it into poetry without recourse to artificial means; he strains after a pregnancy of statement where there is nothing to be pregnant with. (And "muttered curse" is a cliché.) This all relates itself to Zabriskie's most serious defect—thinness of feeling or the inability to touch it. When Zabriskie attempts to evoke more than the immediate scene he falls into air, launches himself on big but used-up words like "torrential" and "shattering" in the effort to approximate emotions he may feel but does not yet possess for poetry. Zabriskie is a recorder, not a maker. But to be a poet is to make. Such skill and tact as his argue a genuine vocation for poetry, but they are not enough. They do not promise enough by themselves. The poet also needs culture. He must leave New Jersey.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

Nazi Economics

THE NEW ECONOMIC WARFARE. By Antonin Basch. Columbia University Press. $1.75.

HITLER'S COUNTERFEIT REICH. By Karl Robert. Alliance Book Corporation. $1.

THE STRUCTURE OF THE NAZI ECONOMY. By Maxine Y. Sweezy. Harvard University Press. $3.

OF THESE three additions to the avalanche of books on the Nazis and the Third Reich, Dr. Basch's study is by far the most important contribution. The title of his study is misleading, for Dr. Basch has covered ground going well beyond that of economic warfare proper. In fact, this publication of a series of lectures delivered recently at Columbia University represents an excellent introduction to the entire subject of war economics. The topics treated range from the Nazi technique of peaceful economic penetration to the problems arising from the shift of the economic system from a war-time to a peace-time basis. The experience of Europe, especially of Germany and Great Britain, in preparing for war is described in a manner which permits the reader to draw clear-cut conclusions about the vast efforts that are still called for from the United States. Dr. Basch does not provide any soothing words for those addicted to the business-as-usual mentality. He explodes the fallacies on which this mentality is based just as ruthlessly as he lays bare the hollowness of various assertions about the imminent collapse of Germany through economic or financial causes.

The pseudonymous author of "Hitler's Counterfeit Reich" was apparently the economic mentor of American correspondents stationed in Vienna. His little book is essentially a collection of outbursts and exhortations against the Nazis and their tricks, and does not offer anything new either in facts or in interpretation.

In "The Structure of the Nazi Economy" Maxine Y. Sweezy has attempted to provide a comprehensive picture of the Nazi economy at work. The actual achievement, however, falls far short of the aim in three respects. First, the exposition is too heavy-going for the non-professional public Secondly, Dr. Sweezy goes over much ground that has already been covered at least as competently by other authors, notably by R. H. Brady in "The Spirit and Structure of German Fascism" and by G. W. Guilleband in "The Economic Recovery of Germany, 1933-1938." Her distinct contribution is limited to two chapters dealing with German corporation profits and the distribution of German national income. Finally, Dr. Sweezy's interpretation of the economic development of the Third Reich suffers from leaning too heavily on the point of view of the German Social Democrats. The latter regard the Nazi economic system largely as a scheme devised for the protection of the capitalist system.

THOMAS REVEILLE

IN BRIEF

GENESEE FEVER. By Carl Carmer. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

Mr. Carmer has real feeling for the Genesee country, and as long as he sticks to the landscape or to his historical sources he writes an interesting tale of the settlement of upstate New York in the early 1790's. But when he departs from his sources, and when the lights of the landscape are out, the characters are revealed as concoctions of arrant bookishness. His females, arch, pliant, and very pulpy, deserve no better fate than this description by one of the men in whose love they are framed: "Her even teeth were a white gleam in the gold-brown of her long face."

DRAGON'S TEETH. By Upton Sinclair. The Viking Press. $3.

The sequel to "World's End" and "Between Two Worlds" carries Lanny Budd and his family through the years from 1929 to 1934 and involves them, of course, in the blood-curdling events accompanying Hitler's rise to supreme power in Germany. The incomparable Lanny meets the Führer, Göring, and Goebbels, has further dealings with Sir Basil Zaharoff, pursues his researches into the nature of the spirit world, and culminates a busy five years by intriguing for the release of a Jewish prisoner from Dachau. Once again Mr. Sinclair has endowed a novel with the irresistible attraction of a living newspaper, a fictionized "Berlin Diary," and admirers of the first two books in the series will certainly want to follow their hero through his new adventures; but the writing seems less skilful, more hurried, than that of "Between Two Worlds"—as if the pell-mell rush of events in the past few months had driven the author to finish this book under forced draft for fear it might sound ancient before it left the press.

DAKAR: OUTPOST OF TWO HEMISPHERES. By Emil Lengyel. Random House. $2.

This timely historical, geographical, and political survey by the author of "The Danube" and "Turkey" is said to be the only comprehensive book on Dakar in any language. It is also concise and illuminating. Considered in its relation to French West Africa, the Atlantic islands, and Brazil, Dakar is shown to be of absolutely vital importance to the United States. At this juncture in history the general reader anxious to understand our world situation will find Mr. Lengyel's new book as interesting as its predecessors and very important. The end-paper maps are extremely useful.

PUBLISHED THIS WEEK

The Dry Season. By Malcolm Cowley. New Directions. $1.

Ireland, Past and Present. By Tom Ireland. Putnam's. $5.

Conversation in London Between Stephan Laird and Walter Graebner. Morrow. $1.50.

Outline of Zionist History. By Lotta Levensohn. Scopus. $1.50.

Vitamins and Minerals for Everyone. By Alida Frances Pattee. Putnam's. $2.

We're the People. By Irene Paull. Midwest Labor. Cloth, 50 cents. Paper, $1.

Poems from the Book of Hours ("Das Stundenbuch"). By Rainer Maria Rilke. Translated by Babette Deutsch. New Directions. $1.

Our Landed Heritage: The Public Domain 1776-1936. By Roy M. Robbins. Princeton. $5.

Radio Goes to War. By Charles J. Rolo. Putnam's. $2.75.

Netherlands Overseas Territories. Information Department Papers, No. 28. Royal Institute of International Affairs. Oxford. 75 cents.

Some Historians of Modern Europe. Edited by Bernadotte E. Schmitt. Chicago. $5.

A Shortened History of England. By George Macaulay Trevelyan. Longmans, Green. $3.50.

China Builds for Democracy: A Story of Cooperative Industry. By Nym Wales. Modern Age. $2.50.

Land, Labor, and Wealth: A Handbook of Ecomomic Terms. Compiled by Ellen Winsor Evans. Caxton. $2.

DRAMA

Old Man of the Tribe

THERE is a theory—widely held by those who go in for theory-holding—that the greatest and most popular plays are those in which papa, or someone in papa's shoes, finally gets it in the neck. This is supposed to account for the enduring charm of such plays as "Hamlet" and the Agamemnon trilogy, to say nothing of many modern works, including "The Playboy of the Western World" and "Desire Under the Elms." The explanation is, of course, that all men hate their fathers; and a very good explanation that doubtless is, though I must confess that I have always been troubled by one thing: how is it that members of the female sex, who are supposed to love their fathers and hate their mothers, manage to endure such plays, and why don't they demand an equal number of purges adapted to their own particular spiritual complaint? Can it be merely because men have done most of the writing in the past; and will the time come when the Old Woman of the Tribe is as popular a victim as the Old Man?

In any event Freud's theory may throw some light on the bright prospects for the Theater Guild's new comedy "Papa Is All" (Guild Theater). Of course the fact that the performance is rather unusually good and that the writing and production skilfully impart a slick theatrical finish to what might otherwise have been a piece a bit too folksy for current Broadway taste may have something to do with it also. But at least there is no missing the fact that the pattern could not be more unmistakably clear if it had been devised by a psychoanalyst for therapeutic purposes. Papa is as unmitigated a nuisance as he ever seemed to any son, and papa is neatly disposed of by the son himself.

The scene is near Lancaster, Pennsylvania, the characters are "Pennsylvania Dutch," and the particular household chosen is one of those least touched by modern life because presided over by a patriarch who "doesn't hold" with any new-fangled notions or new-fangled machines—especially if they tend to make it any harder to keep an eye on his wife, his daughter, or his son. Patterson Green, the author, is said to be an outlander who resided briefly in the region he has made his setting, and I am certainly not prepared to say how accurate or how searching his presentation may be, but at least he has got enough of the language and the characters for light theatrical purposes. Too earnest students of folklore have a way of writing plays incomprehensible without footnotes and of getting dialect so confoundedly accurate that any audience not composed exclusively of philologists has a hard time finding out what the personages are talking about. Mr. Green writes a dialogue easy to understand but full of quaintly amusing words and delightfully surprising syntax, and he has also caught something else which supplies rich humor—namely, that practical realism in matters amorous as well as material which seems so often characteristic of those with a rigid code of conduct. "Papa Is All" means, by the way, "all in," or in other words, dead.

The plot is rather ingenious, even though it has its relation to Synge's "Playboy," and it is provided with a sufficient number of surprises at the proper points to keep the action in lively movement. Obviously they mustn't be given away, but it can do no harm to say that Papa is so plainly no good to anybody that no one in either the play or the audience has occasion for anything except unmixed gratification when his son, a budding mechanical genius little likely to realize himself in a family where the devil is regarded as the patron of mechanics, seizes a God-sent opportunity to crack the old man over the head with a monkey wrench and to stow him away in a coal car bound for parts unknown. The performance, as I have already said, is rather conspicuously smooth and brisk. Carl Benton Reid plays the father well but as a somewhat conventional "heavy." Celestine Holm and Emmett Rogers act, respectively, the daughter and the son also well, though in a similarly "straight" fashion; and I should say that the acting honors go to the more colorful performances of Jessie Royce Landis and Dorothy Sands. Miss Landis, a very competent actress who deserves much better opportunities than she has had recently, gives very rich though quiet humor to the part of the mild wife with more spirit than one would give her credit for, and Miss Sands is extremely good as the talkative neighbor who spills the beans while trying to assure everybody that she won't.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

WOODROW WILSON'S epic struggle for a just peace based on the League of Nations is a weighty theme for a play; it could easily bog down even a notable effort. But Howard Koch and John Huston had enough courage to tackle it, and the result, "In Time to Come," justifies their endeavors. And the theatergoer who, in his turn, musters enough pluck to spend an evening on so elevated a plane will be rewarded. "In Time to Come" is a first-rate play. More than a chronicle, it is a study, even a penetrating study, of Wilson the man. Both his fatal weaknesses and his great qualities are part of the complex personality which unfolds itself at the Mansfield Theater. As the play progresses, one has increasingly the feeling that Wilson's passionate identification with the cause for which he is fighting, because it makes him unable to meet cynical political maneuvering, first dooms the cause and then dooms him because the cause is doomed. This, rather than Wilson's failure to win support, is the essential tragedy of the play. Richard Gaines plays the role of Woodrow Wilson with a real sense of its tragic implications.

M. K. C.

MUSIC

TWO readers have objected to my high estimate of Virgil Thomson's music criticism. They are New York Philharmonic subscribers who have been tearing up their tickets for the Mitropoulos programs of contemporary music which Mr. Thomson has been urging on the Philharmonic directors as the only thing that will give their orchestra a secure place in the intellectual life of the city and nation. And when Mr. Thomson tells these readers that the music of 150 years ago which they are deeply affected by is really as incomprehensible to them as the painting and literature of the past because it was produced by men "whose modes of thought and attitudes of passion were . . . different from ours," and that they can really understand only the contemporary music which they dislike, since it is the product of the processes of thought and feeling of their own time—when Mr. Thomson does this, he drives these two readers to a violent denunciation of writing in which they insist he has his eye not on his subject but on the audience which he wants to impress and shock with his cleverness, his perversity, his daring. And from this they go on to the other things which they claim to detect in the writing—the special pleading for causes in which he is not disinterested, the personal friendships and animosities, and other such motivations.

These readers attack in Mr. Thomson the things which deflect or corrupt a critic's judgment; what I value is his judgment when it is not deflected or corrupted. That is the distinction one has to make constantly. The late William J. Henderson wrote about Walter Damrosch with loyalty to a friend; he wrote about Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic with an old man's crotchety notion about prima donna conductors; but at other times his competence, honesty, and vigor produced some of the best writing on music of his day. Today Mr. Thomson may evaluate a book with graciousness to a fellow-member of his Critics' Circle; or as a composer he may tell the New York Philharmonic directors that the only way to give their orchestra a place in the life of the American public is to have it embark on a five-year devotion to the music of contemporary composers, which I suspect would leave the orchestra without an audience after one year; but about music and performances he often writes with exciting penetration (often, I say, not always).

Whenever I write anything of this sort there is someone who asks: "Isn't it the business of a music critic to criticize music? Why, then, do you criticize criticism and critics? Why do you, when other critics don't?" It is true that the others don't; and this has given people the idea that no critic should. But many years ago Bernard Shaw, who wrote some of the finest music criticism I have ever read, observed that "musical criticisms, like sermons, are of low average quality simply because they are never discussed or contradicted," and advocated the formation of "a Vigilance Committee of musicians for the exposure of incompetent critics." He did this because he considered good criticism important; and good criticism was important for him because music was important. And those are my reasons—for reading criticism, for being concerned about it, for getting enthusiastic about Shaw, Tovey, Turner, even Thomson, for getting angry about some of the others.

Shaw not only believed that criticism should be discussed, but himself acted on his belief; and scattered through the brilliant volumes of "Music in London 1888-1889" and "Music in London 1890-1894" are paragraphs on the subject that are pertinent to the criticism of today. Thus, the proposal to form a critics' club elicited the statement that "clearly a critic should not belong to a club at all. He should not know anybody: his hand should be against every man, and every man's hand against his." And explaining why one of the London critics was disliked and attacked by the others, he wrote:

> He has the force to write individually, originally, making his mark with every opinion he delivers. Of how many critics in London is it possible to say as much? When one thinks of the average critic, with his feeble infusion of musical dictionary and analytical program, the man who has no opinion, and dare not express it if he had, who is afraid of his friends, his enemies, of his editor, of his own ignorance, of committing an injustice (as if there were any question of abstract justice involved in the expression of a critic's tastes and distastes), it is impossible not to admire L. E., who, at an age at which all ordinary journalists are hopelessly muzzled by the mere mass of their personal acquaintance, can still excite these wild animosities in the breasts of his colleagues.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

"By Their Fruits . . ."

Dear Sirs: I celebrated New Year's Day by reading Miss Adams's review of Dr. Zilboorg's book in the December 27 issue of The Nation.

I feel chagrined about this review because I think it puts The Nation in a somewhat absurd position, even though I know you are not responsible for the opinions of your reviewers. I do not know Miss Adams, and perhaps it is not presumptuous for her to be so opinionated regarding a field of science that is rather highly specialized. But on the face of it, her strictures represent a reactionary position and spirit which are entirely incompatible with the ideals of your journal. To defend the racial-purity theory of Hitler or to criticize an author for not adhering to it would be precisely parallel to the position taken by Miss Adams. For her to sneer at Zilboorg and that which Dr. Zilboorg represents—namely, the psychoanalytic developments in science—is not only unbecoming but, in my opinion, anachronistic.

Furthermore, her review is full of misstatements. Dr. Zilboorg does not belong to "a school of psychiatry"; he in no way indicates that he believes that one school is the "only possible scientific one"; he is not "forced to defend Mesmerism"—which is now a universally acknowledged piece of reality and a widely used technique which poor Miss Adams evidently does not know; Dr. Zilboorg's statement that the discovery of a specific cause of syphilis was a step backward for psychopathology is not at all astonishing but quite well known; Miss Adams's fine writing about "the patient men working" in laboratories does not contradict the fact that many other patient men work in psychological clinics and use hypnosis, psychonanalysis, and other psychological techniques with the same hopes that her sentimentally portrayed laboratory men have; it is a canard to say that Dr. Zilboorg classifies laboratory workers with witch-burners. What peculiar personal experiences and attitudes have led Miss Adams to her emotionally charged "review" I, of course, have no idea, but I do think it is unfortunate that so important a book about so important a subject should have been so poorly represented in your pages.

It is perfectly true that psychoanalysis is not understood by a good many scientists, including a few psychiatrists, and that these few psychiatrists, some of them very emphatically, voice their objections. It is also true that some psychoanalysts either by bad manners or ill-chosen exhibitions give the reactionaries plenty of ammunition. But these things no more invalidate psychoanalysis than the behavior of some Americans and the arguments of some totalitarians invalidate the principles of democracy. "By their fruits ye shall know them." The spirit of Grace Adams's review would burn witches, say what she likes in defense of it. KARL MENNINGER

Topeka, Kan., January 8

Why Is There No Plan?

Dear Sirs: I quite agree with Mrs. Reyher's criticism of Louis Adamic's "Two-Way Passage" in your issue of December 20. But she spoiled the pungent taste of her little article by ending it with a rather sweeping flourish: ". . . the blueprint itself [of a democratic federated United States of Europe] may be regarded as a little naive and amateurish by the professional architects."

I am tremendously curious to know who are these mysterious "professional architects." And how does it happen that in spite of their feverish activities before and since the League of Nations, and in spite of scores of millions of dollars donated by Carnegie, Rockefeller, and other gullible Americans, there is not even a vague outline of a practical and acceptable plan for the world order? ELY CULBERTSON

New York, January 7

No Third World War!

Dear Sirs: On the day that the United States declared itself officially at war President Roosevelt stated that "we will not only defend ourselves to the utmost, but will make very certain that this form of treachery shall never endanger us again."

On the evening of our declaration of war fifteen leading Chicago organizations sponsored a meeting at Orchestra Hall in this city in order publicly to vow that this purpose shall be fulfilled. These organizations were the Committee to Defend America; Fight for Freedom, Inc.; the Keep America Out of War Congress; the Fellowship of Reconciliation; International House; the Chicago Church Federation; the Young Women's Christian Association of Chicago; the Chicago Rabbinical Association; the Cook County League of Women Voters; Federal Union, Inc.; the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom; the Campaign for World Government; the League of Nations Association, Midwest Office; the Commission to Study the Organization of Peace, Midwest Office; the World Citizens Association, Chicago Group. The chairman of the meeting was George V. Denny, president of Town Hall, Inc. The fifteen sponsoring organizations had taken divergent stands on the war issue, and one of them went out of existence on the day the meeting was held. They represented hundreds of thousands of Midwesterners.

The meeting adopted unanimously a resolution which may do its part to prevent a third World War. It reads:

> At this time, when thoughts are centered on the war, we recognize that it is also important to plan for winning the peace.
>
> We, as Americans experienced in the progress of justice, stability, and security through the democratic federation of states, aware of the economic interdependence of the peoples of the world, convinced of the impossibility of attaining a just and lasting peace under the anarchy which is inevitable in the absence of appropriate institutions of international governments, in order to promote international and national welfare, which we deem to be one, request the President and the Congress of the United States immediately to establish a commission to study the improvements in world organization necessary to provide security to nations and freedom to men, as stated in the sixth article of the Roosevelt-Churchill declaration of August 14, 1941.

JOHN R. VAN DE WATER,
General Chairman
Forum on World Organization

Chicago, December 26

An Immense Change

(Excerpts from a letter recently received from London)

. . . Things have been quiet here for three months. But we are not giving up precautions of any kind. I personally am absorbed in fire-fighting, and if you were sufficiently unconscious and unable to protest, I could bump you downstairs and save your life, if not your bruises. We learn to deal with smoke and to use pumps and to suspect upholstered armchairs. Yesterday we were thrilled to the marrow to lie in a puddle while directing water upon a burning room—fortunately only a practice one. It is like going back to childhood's adventurous games and even more exciting.

BOOK BARGAINS

U. S. A mailing free. Order now!

Military Strength of the Powers: Max Werner..	[illegible] .30
Soviet Power: Dean of Canterbury............	.35
Chaos in Asia: Hallett Abend...............	.50
It Can Be Done: James Maurer...............	.50
Seven Red Sundays: Ramon J. Sender.........	.50
You Can't Go Home Again: Thomas Wolfe....	1.00
Revolution [illegible] Nihilism: Hermann Rauschning..	1.00
My Life [illegible] Rebel: Angelica Balabanoff......	1.00
Lawless Judges: L. Goldberg [illegible] E. Levenson...	1.00
Painting for Beginners: Jan Gordan..........	1.39
Out of the Night: Jan Valtin................	1.69

The following Modern Age books, 25¢ each; choice of any 5 for $1.00

Peace It's Wonderful: William Saroyan
How Socialism Works: John Strachey
School for Barbarians: Erika Mann
Love Here Is My Hat: William Saroyan
The Pastures of Heaven: John Steinbeck
Cities of Sin: Hendrik de Leeuw
One-Fifth of Mankind: Anna L. Strong
Daring Young Man on Flying Trapeze: William Saroyan
February Hill: Victoria Lincoln

DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR, 212 B'way, N. Y. C.

KNOW THE WORLD Today!

SCHOOL FOR DEMOCRACY

announces its second term

Registration January 14-26. Lounge, library, gymnasium facilities

53 COURSES

Current Events
History
Economics
Politics
Science
Philosophy
Art
Literature
Music
Movies
Psychology
Trade Unionism

95 LECTURERS

William Blake
Bella V. Dodd
Waldemar Kaempffert
W. C. Handy
Earl Robinson
Philip Foner
Walter Scott Neff
Morris U. Schappes
Howard Selsam
Vilhjalmur Stefansson
Herbert Aptheker
Michael J. Quill
Walter Rautenstrauch
William Malisoff
Bernhard J. Stern
Josephine Truslow Adams
And others.

SCHOOL FOR DEMOCRACY
13 Astor Place New York City
GRamercy 7-4086
[illegible] per course • Scholarships for union members

SCHOOL FOR DEMOCRACY
13 Astor Place, New York City
Please send catalogue to

NAME..

ADDRESS......................................

Food is extremely well managed here. If we never have less than at present, we may count ourselves lucky. Now that rationing has been extended to subsidiary things—not all, of course—there is a much more even distribution and not such a struggle to get things. Where they are not rationed, the shop-crawlers—people with time—of course get the best of it. I don't think anybody can complain that they don't get enough, and, personally, I should stop all extra parcels, kind as you all are about that. They take up shipping space and are luxuries we could go without.

I don't think the next six months will be easy, but you have only to look back over a year to see the immense change in the situation. I always felt Russia might easily have come in against us, and while I can't admire sufficiently its bravery and stubbornness, I feel that the help to us is something to be thankful for, but not to be overwhelmed by. We have a common cause at present; that is all. This is not to say that I am anti-Russian; very far from it, and I think we have been immensely stupid about it hitherto. But Russia has been difficult, too, and I feel that while it has made immense progress, it has mounted from a much lower level than many other nations, and it is rather stupid of enthusiasts to regard it as in the forefront of civilization. Some of our people hold up Russian housing as an example. I don't think ours is very good, but it seems to be the common thing for people to live four in a room in Moscow. And that isn't the case here, with a few horrible exceptions, which are regarded as horrible and not as a commonplace.

MURIEL HARRIS

Collecting Scrap Is Fun

Dear Sirs: In view of Keith Hutchison's article in The Nation of December 27 entitled From Scrap to Tanks and dealing with our government's need for scrap metal, it may interest you to hear of a project carried on during the Christmas vacation by some of our second-year-high-school boys and girls.

These youngsters were very eager to do something concrete and helpful in the present situation and therefore decided to see how much old metal they could collect during the holidays. They telephoned a great many persons in the vicinity and classified those who responded favorably according to their geographical location. Then on Saturday afternoon, January 3, one of our parents borrowed a truck and drove out to collect, with four of the boys along to help. The excitement when we found a beautiful heavy winch or a completely broken down but very metalliferous boiler was worth the trouble and hard work of hauling.

To our great surprise we collected four truckloads of metal in one afternoon, and we have only begun our researches in this community. One of our local contractors says that when we feel we are ready, he will send us a junk man, arrange a price with him before he sees the metal, and have the weight checked for us on a local coal dealer's scales.

In addition to telephoning, many of the youngsters went scouting to outlying farmers who perhaps had no telephone, and to rubbish heaps, which suddenly take on a strange desirability.

Here, I feel, is a real contribution that young people of high-school age all over the country can make.

FRANCIS H. ELWYN,
Chairman of the Staff,
Hessian Hills School

Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y., January 9

"God Help the Nation . . ."

Dear Sirs: For the last two years I have not liked The Nation—it wasn't the good old fighting Nation that I had known for so many years.

But finally I found once more something in The Nation that was like the old one. That was Jonathan Daniels's article on the Negro firemen in the issue of November 22. If ever there was a blot upon our country it is the Negro problem. You that live close to it, where you see many Negroes all the time, cannot sense the injustice as we Westerners do when we go back East. We have two Negroes in our whole county, a county that is as large as Rhode Island; can you imagine the impact of the Negro question on me when we traveled leisurely from here through the East and South? God help the nation that lets this evil thing fester—at least the President could appoint one of his many fact-finding committees.

EMILY H. LOTT

Buffalo, Wyo., December 27

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address [illegible] well [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 154 · NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 24, 1942 · NUMBER 4

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 77

EDITORIALS

The Truman Report 80
The East Is Vital 81
Free and So-called Free by Freda Kirchwey 82

ARTICLES

Can Nelson Deliver? by I. F. Stone 83
How to Lose the War by Donald W. Mitchell 85
The Limits of Liberty by Reinhold Niebuhr 86
Bavarian Evening by Toni Christen 88
Winter Solstice. A Poem by Rolfe Humphries 90
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 91
Congress Can Stop Inflation by Frank D. Graham 92
In the Wind 93
A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels 94

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Good Critics, Rare and Common by Mark Van Doren 95
Letters to Montagu by Joseph Wood Krutch 96
First Book by Rolfe Humphries 97
War and the Writer by H. P. Lazarus 97
The Soviet Defense by Joachim Joesten 98
Proportional Representation by Gaetano Salvemini 100
Drama: "The Rivals" by Joseph Wood Krutch 101
Films by Anthony Bower 101
Records by B. H. Haggin 102

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 103

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER · Washington Editor I. F. STONE · Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON · MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor RICHARD H. ROVERE · Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN · Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX · Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., [illegible] Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

BY ESTABLISHING THE WAR-PRODUCTION Board under the supreme command of Donald M. Nelson the President moved away from the balance-of-power theory which has caused so much confusion and overlapping of authority in the past. We hope Mr. Nelson will prove to have the "touch" of his great naval namesake, who knew that victories were won by imagination combined with organization. He is one of the few business men brought to Washington during the emergency who has enhanced his reputation there and won the respect of the New Dealers without losing that of the business world. Mr. Nelson was formerly a kind of procurement chief for the greatest merchandising organization in the country—a job which required not only buying skill but the ability to inspire and assist manufacturers in the mass production of popularly priced goods. This means that his chief experience has been with the light industries; now, as I. F. Stone points out in his Washington letter, he has to tackle the capital-goods monopolies. Among his greatest recommendations are a real vision of what is needed to beat the Axis and a strong belief that America can and will do the job. In some quarters, however, there are doubts about whether Mr. Nelson is as tough as he will have to be. Among those who must now take his orders are some very hard-boiled gentlemen who will want to go on running things their way and will be out to get him if they can.

*

HITLER HAS BROUGHT THE BATTLE OF THE Atlantic right up to our shores, perhaps with the design not merely of destroying valuable shipping but of upsetting American morale and influencing the Rio conference. Another objective may be to present proof to Japan that Germany is in a position to offer something more than moral support. Certainly this foray into our home waters is going to add to the present burden on the navy, and it might necessitate convoying coastal shipping. It may prove possible, however, to simplify that task by instructing all ships to keep close to shore and providing constant patrols of shore-based aircraft. The sinking of four ships within five days between Nova Scotia and North Carolina indicates that a pack of submarines is in operation. Survivors of a torpedoed Panamanian freighter who have reached Canada report U-boats as "thick as catfish," including one or more "little ones." Since only the bigger types have sufficient range to cruise independently from European bases, this suggests either that a "mother" ship is being employed or that Germany has the use of some base nearer than the coast of France. Could this be the Azores? A third possibility is that secret depots have been established somewhere on this side of the Atlantic. Despite the vigilance of the British and Canadian navies, it is not inconceivable that a hide-out could be found in one of the innumerable bays of northern Newfoundland.

*

POLITICAL WAR IN RIO HAS DEVELOPED during the first eight days of the conference fairly closely along the lines predicted in The Nation last week. Sumner Welles delivered one of the best speeches that could have been made, and to judge from reactions in Latin American quarters he has employed his considerable talents in trying to smooth out the difficulties of a very complex situation. But the most subtle envoy could hardly correct in a week the mistakes his own department has been making for a year. A year of appeasing Castillo, in direct disregard of the advice of our real Argentine friends, is having its effects in Rio. Whatever formula it may agree to, Castillo's Argentine remains the grand saboteur of hemispheric solidarity. Largely for geographical reasons Chile, with its long coastline and its islands in the Pacific exposed to the threat of Japanese attack, is also showing a hesitation that must be disheartening to the Chilean delegation itself. It can be assumed that in the end some sort of resolution indorsing a break with the Axis powers will be adopted, with the Argentine, Chile, and perhaps one or two other small South American countries abstaining or agreeing to a compromise. But this will not wipe out the fact that a political battle had to be fought at a conference where spontaneous and unanimous agreement should have been the normal course. It is that feeling which makes it difficult to discount entirely the confidence with which the spokesman of the German Foreign Office referred on January 20 to the prospective resolution in Rio supporting the rupture "of certain Latin American countries with the Axis" as "a pure technicality."

*

THE SURRENDER OF THE AXIS FORCES IN THE Halfaya Pass will considerably ease British communications over the long line which now separates their Egyptian bases from the army fighting General Rommel in eastern Tripolitana. It should also release troops and equipment for that battle, which seems to have reached a temporary stalemate. There are indications that despite the havoc wrought by the British fleet in attacking convoys some additional Axis reinforcements and equipment have reached North Africa at a time when the strengthening of the British position in that region must be weighed against the urgent demands of other fronts, notably Singapore. Rumors of Nazi plans for a spring drive in the Mediterranean, including possibly an attack on Turkey, may have been deliberately circulated as part of the war of nerves. But there are indications that they cannot be taken lightly. In the past week the much-bombed fortress of Malta has been facing aerial assaults of increasing intensity, suggesting that an effort may soon be made to remove that very sharp thorn in the side of the Axis. Malta's importance as a naval base is no longer very great, but as an air base it has been playing a great part in the Battle of the Mediterranean, sending out bombers north and south to attack both Sicily and Tripoli and to harry Italian shipping transporting men and supplies to North Africa.

*

ANOTHER SHARP THORN CAUSING ACUTE pain to both Germany and Italy is the growing guerrilla army of General Draja Mikhailovich, recently honored for his services by being appointed Minister of War in the Yugoslav government. This force has scored repeated successes against the Axis armies of occupation. It now appears that Hitler has given up hope of wiping out the resistance of these bold fighters, at least during the winter months, and has withdrawn his troops to the larger cities. Reports from Turkey in the New York Times and the Christian Science Monitor speak of strong pressure being put on Hungary and Bulgaria by Berlin with a view to using their armies to accomplish the costly task of "pacification" which has baffled the Reichswehr. Neither one of these puppet states seems very enthusiastic. Recently Hungary has received visits from both von Ribbentrop and Count Ciano. The former is said to have proposed that the whole Hungarian army should be placed at the disposal of the German High Command, that Hungary should supply more food to Germany, and that German troops from Russia should be allowed to take up winter quarters in Hungary. As a sweetener for this program the Nazi Foreign Minister offered southern Transylvania, which is now in Rumanian hands. Even von Ribbentrop is said to have been embarrassed when Premier Bardossy produced documentary proof that Germany had recently promised Rumania sections of Transsylvania assigned to Hungary by the Vienna award. Nevertheless, he was able to insist on the acceptance of part of his demands, including that for more food, although the Hungarian population is becoming increasingly restive because of the shortage of supplies. Swiss sources report that one Hungarian and three Bulgarian army divisions have now entered Serbia to undertake "police duties."

THE AXIS GENERAL SITUATION SEEMS TO BE going from bad to worse. Field Marshal Walther von Reichenau is now reported to have succumbed to poor health. Berlin says that he died of apoplexy; Moscow insists that the Gestapo nursed him in his last hours and that Dr. Hitler was the attending physician. Moscow reports further that Marshal Wilhelm Keitel "suddenly has fallen ill." Stockholm estimates that altogether some twenty Nazi generals have been confined—victims of an epidemic which began somewhere west of Moscow early in December. In Berne the Berlin correspondent of the Neue Zürcher Zeitung reports that "many high-ranking German officers on the Russian front have fallen sick because even at their headquarters there is a general lack of comfort." We don't doubt it. Meanwhile Great Britain reports that its collection of Italian generals in the African theater has reached the operatic total of seventy-nine—which reminds us rather irresponsibly of that well-known musical phrase, "Repeat ad Libya."

* * *

PLANS FOR COMPENSATING WORKERS thrown out of their jobs by the all-out war-production program were drawn up last week at a White House conference of Administration and Congressional leaders. Although details of the legislation remain to be ironed out, the plans call for reimbursing the unemployed workers at a rate of 60 per cent of their normal wages up to a maximum of $24 a week, provided they use their time training for jobs in the war industries. Since most state unemployment funds pay only 50 per cent of wages up to a maximum of $15 or $18 a week, and that only for fifteen or sixteen weeks, the new scheme will require federal financing. The President has approved of an appropriation of $300,000,000 for this purpose, but doubts have been expressed that this sum will be sufficient to provide for an estimated total of over 4,000,000 unemployed. While there will be some hardship despite these plans, the forehandedness shown in drawing up these proposals contrasts most favorably with the dilatory manner with which Congress met the vastly greater problem of unemployment during the depression.

* * *

ONE NEED NOT BELIEVE EVERY DETAIL OF this week's John L. Lewis story to be pretty sure that Honest John is cooking up a new sensation for labor—object: a return to power. Opinions vary considerably as to whether Mr. Lewis, as reported in the New York Times of January 19, conducted unauthorized negotiations for an A. F. of L.–C. I. O. merger, with George Meany to be president, Lewis vice-president, and Philip Murray, much to Murray's surprise, secretary-treasurer. Some labor leaders think, or profess to think, that the story was spun out of the finest gossamer; others believe it follows the general pattern of the Lewis ambitions and is at least a trial balloon. Still others consider the release of the story—supposedly by Meany's office and with Lewis's knowledge—a brilliant tactical move, combining advance propaganda for the scheme with a subtle variety of blackmail. According to this theory, whether or not Lewis actually conducted secret negotiations—he is reliably reported to have tried Hutcheson and Tobin before striking it lucky with Matthew Woll—he emerges before the public as the champion of unity, while those who denounce his alleged maneuvering stand revealed as opponents of what many a Gallup poll will tell you is an extremely popular objective of the American people. For all its shrewdness, however, it is improbable that the Lewis plan, if any, can be put into effect. Mr. Murray, while explaining for the record that he considers the stories of Lewis's underground dickering "a lot of newspaper bunk," has made it clear that peace between the two organizations can only come "in a democratic way," that is, without benefit of those delicate services of John L. Lewis which would enable him to pick his ticket.

* * *

THE WAR DEPARTMENT'S PROJECT FOR AN army of 3,600,000 men by the end of 1942 illustrates the value of advance planning. In the last war the army did not reach this size until nearly a year and a half after our entry into the conflict. Although the plans for mobilization which were worked out during the years of peace have not been followed in any exact sense, they have served as a yardstick for the present program. In every case, however, the M-Day plan is to be accelerated. Particular attention is being given to the expansion of the air corps. To make this possible the educational requirements for pilots are being relaxed, and the lower age limit for applicants is to be reduced from twenty to eighteen. It is estimated that this will create a reservoir of 2,000,000 additional young men eligible as candidates. Although details of the army's program have been kept secret for obvious reasons, its general outlines appear to be sound. That an immediate expansion is called for can hardly be disputed. Whether it will be wise to expand it beyond the 3,600,000 mark in view of the demands for war materials to fill our own and lend-lease requirements is a question which can only be decided by the course of the war. Obviously, increasing care must be shown by the local draft boards to avoid calling up men who can best serve their country in factories or in technical capacities.

* * *

STEEL PLANTS IN THE YOUNGSTOWN AREA were operating last week at only 84 per cent of capacity, the lowest rate in eighteen months. This was not because of any slackening of demand—there are customers waiting for every ton of steel that can be turned out—but for lack of sufficient scrap metal to feed the furnaces. Other leading steel districts are also reporting falls in production for the same reason. Mill stocks of scrap are steadily declining as consumption keeps ahead of new deliveries, and there seems a strong probability that further reductions in steel output will occur in the coming weeks. OPM officials are scurrying around trying to move supplies from the scrap dealers' yards to fill the most urgent needs. They are also reported to be taking an inventory of scrap in the automobile graveyards, which it is believed are capable of producing a good deal of additional material. The difficulty here, however, is that car junk dealers are more interested in selling spare parts than in reducing body-work to scrap and are inclined to hold out for higher prices. Consequently there is now some talk about requisition. Little or nothing apparently is being done by the OPM Bureau of Industrial Conservation to engage more public interest and cooperation in locating and collecting supplies from normally neglected sources on the lines suggested by Keith Hutchison in The Nation of December 27, 1941. A letter from the Hessian Hills School in our last issue suggested what could be accomplished even by small groups in small communities. In Georgia the Department of Education has just inaugurated a state-wide scheme for the collection through the schools of waste materials of all kinds. If Washington would only supply a little stimulation and direction, similar efforts would no doubt be made throughout the country.

The Truman Report

THERE are only a few matters in the report of 288 pages submitted by the Truman committee with which our readers are not already familiar. The committee's findings in respect to the fumbled planning of aluminum, steel, and copper expansion, the failure earlier to mobilize the automobile industry for war, the cold shouldering of small business in the defense program, the dangerously dual position occupied by the dollar-a-year men, the scandalous handling of amortization privileges, and the War Department's sloppy supervision of camp construction—all have been discussed in our pages and in our Washington correspondence. The report is in many respects confirmation of disclosures first made in The Nation. In other fields we are ourselves indebted to the committee for first insights into outstanding flaws in the arms program.

Of the new material in the report perhaps the most striking and the most disturbing is that dealing with aviation.

> Apparently [the committee says] there has never been and is not now any real planned and coordinated program for the production of aircraft. Our services have merely purchased what the manufacturers had to offer instead of planning to use available facilities to produce what they needed at maximum capacity. Though it was seemingly created to organize and manage production facilities, it appears that as far as aviation production is concerned, the Office of Production Management simply acted as a rubber stamp for the service agencies, allowing them to follow their own policies of procurement.

The committee reports a shortage of planes so acute as to hurt the morale of our pilots.

> It may be claimed that this shortage existing with our own forces comes as a result of huge shipments diverted to foreign consumers. Actually, the facts do not indicate that to be the case. Information made available to the public has shown that of the best types, our shipments abroad have been very limited.

The report also tells in full for the first time the story of the Bethlehem Steel contract being negotiated by Jesse Jones, a contract worse, if anything, than that with Alcoa. It tells the full story of the Wolf Creek Ordnance Plant, and of the carelessness of the War Department in supervising it. It tells of the exorbitant profits being made in the shipyards and of the navy's failure—perhaps intentional—to keep the books of its own yards in such shape that they can be used as a yardstick with which to measure costs in the private yards.

We are sorry that the Truman committee lacked the courage to say in public what many of its members have said in private of Jesse Jones, Knudsen, and Stettinius. We are sorry to see its weak acquiescence in proposals to revise the tax-amortization law to make it easier to fleece the government. We are sorry to note that while "pulling its punches" on the principal malefactors in business and the dollar-a-year men, the committee exaggerated the bad effects of strikes on the defense program. It said that strikes cost defense 26,000,000 man-days of labor, but this is the figure for time lost in all industry. The OPM figure for time lost in defense industries is 2,500,000 man-days, less than a tenth of the figure used by the committee. We note, too, the contrast between the vague recommendations in this somewhat hastily put together report and the far-sighted program of the Tolan committee.

Nevertheless, after all these criticisms have been made, the fact remains that the country is deeply indebted to Senator Truman and his colleagues. Mead and Wallgren deserve special mention with the chairman, and even the conservatives like Brewster, Ball, and Connally showed a vigorous readiness to probe the shortcomings of business men that does them honor. The committee has already paid back many times over the meager $40,000 it had to spend. The revisions which have taken place in aluminum, steel, and shipbuilding contracts as a result of its revelations are worth several millions of dollars. It focused attention on the worst abuses in the arms program, and an advance copy of its report and a conference between the President and Senator Truman preceded the current reorganization of defense.

In England the Select Committee on National Expenditure of the House of Commons has made extensive and continuous investigations of arms expenditures straight through the war. We need such inquiries here. As censorship closes down on the facts and begins to shield incompetence in office, the people and the press will become more and more dependent on Congress for knowledge of what is going on in arms production. The Nation would like to see the Truman committee's life extended "for the duration," with an ample budget. An expenditure of $250,000 a year on the committee would yield many times that amount in the correction of extravagance and the disclosure of corruption.

The East Is Vital

EACH week that passes brings home more clearly the shocking unpreparedness of both the United States and Great Britain in the Pacific. It is now admitted, for example—some six weeks after the opening of the war—that no reinforcements were ever sent to the Philippines. Nor do any substantial number of Americans appear to have been sent anywhere else—to Singapore, the East Indies, or Australia. Some planes have been getting through, but in small numbers. The British record, as Donald W. Mitchell shows elsewhere in this issue, is fully as bad. London is reported to be restive not only because of the strategic effect of the defeats but to an even greater degree because of the blow which British prestige has suffered throughout the Far East. Australia is bitter over what it considers Britain's tendency to minimize the East in its strategic plans.

Under these circumstances Secretary Knox's statement on the importance of keeping our eyes on Hitler as the No. 1 enemy was singularly unfortunate in its timing. Despite the recent Nazi reverses in Russia, no one will care to deny that Germany is the most powerful member of the Axis. In the long run it will probably prove the most difficult to conquer. But war is indivisible, and a setback on one front is bound to have unfavorable effects on the others. The loss of Russia, with its huge manufacturing capacity and rich stores of raw materials, would of course be disastrous for the Allies. But it would be hardly more so than the loss of East Asia, with its incredible wealth in rubber, tin, oil, and various tropical products.

Loss of this storehouse of strategic materials, moreover, might prove less serious in the long run than the disillusionment of millions of our allies, real and potential, throughout the East. The Chinese, particularly, have been seriously disturbed by our conduct of the war and Secretary Knox's disparaging comments on the importance of the Eastern front. Several Chungking newspapers have expressed apprehension regarding the apparent trend of Allied strategy. Sun Fo, chairman of the legislative Yuan and son of the founder of the Chinese Republic, went so far as to question the wisdom of China continuing to fight "if the United States and Britain intend to allow Japan a free rein in the Far East while they are finishing off Hitler." If the Chinese, relatively strong in their present defensive position, feel thus let down, what of the Filipinos, the Malays, and the inhabitants of the Dutch East Indies, who are being left to bear the brunt of Japanese imperialism? Will these peoples ever again have confidence in American and British promises of support? Or may we expect to see other native leaders following the example of the Thai military clique or of Premier U Saw of Burma? It is not to be supposed that U Saw, who has been detained by the British on charges of having communicated with the enemy, has any illusions about the Japanese proffers of friendship. But he must have enough doubts regarding British strength to have considered it advisable to play both sides of the game.

Secretary Knox's argument that once we have disposed of Hitler we shall have little difficulty with Japan is plausible so far as it goes. But it could also be argued that we should smash Japan first, as the weaker member of the Axis—after which we would have vastly greater resources to turn against Germany. From the standpoint of practical military strategy this plan has at least several advantages over that advanced by Mr. Knox. In the first place, it would be comparatively easy for us to amass overwhelming military superiority in the Far East, but there is no hope of achieving this in Europe during the present year. Secondly, there is no convenient way in which the United States can immediately throw its immense resources against Germany. The only fronts on which Germany is now fighting are in Russia and Africa—where American supplies rather than man-power are needed. While we dare not cut off this flow of supplies or relax our efforts in the Battle of the Atlantic, we should have enough resources left for offensive operations in the East. The position of the Soviet Union also plays an important part in the picture. We cannot readily send an expeditionary force to Russia, but defeat of Japan would release Russia's huge Far Eastern army for use against Germany.

As has already been indicated, we do not wish to minimize the importance of Hitler as the chief threat to American security. But at the moment Hitler is being held in check on all the chief fronts where he is fighting. On the other hand, our failures in the East show rather clearly that the importance of this sector has been underestimated. Any steps now being taken to remedy the situation are of course military secrets. But the events of the last fortnight demonstrate that adequate steps were not taken either before the outbreak of war or in the early days of the conflict. It is difficult, therefore, to have confidence that the East is getting its full share of attention today.

Free and So-called Free

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THIS isn't a dissertation on the State Department. I'm tired of the subject. If a word or two about the vagaries of Hull's bad boys creeps into these lines, it's a typographical error. This article is going to deal with movements, free and so-called free, and how they should behave. Never a word about the State Department. Or hardly ever.

When Adolf Berle wrote the strange composition on free movements put out by the department right after we got into the war—remember, the one saying that in general free movements weren't officially considered in the best of taste and perhaps American citizens had better steer clear of them—a lot of confusion was created in the minds of people who had thought we were fighting Hitler for the preservation of freedom or the restoration of freedom or something like that. The confusion wasn't cleared up by the opposition of the department to the freeing of the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon by the Free French. People began to wonder: Are we against Hitler and his puppets or are we against the people who are fighting him? A question like that is disturbing in war time. People like to know whom they're shooting at and why.

Well, some of the officials in Washington evidently decided that something ought to be done to unscramble people's minds. Who they were I don't know, but I suspect the President and a few other liberals and nonconformists. They believed that it would not advance the Allied cause to have every anti-Nazi and anti-Fascist in every country of the world asking himself and his friends why the United States, which had just plunged into the war against Hitler and Japan, should be run by officials who dislike and distrust anti-Nazis and anti-Fascists, especially organized ones. So when the inter-Allied pact—the anti-Axis pact—was drawn up during Mr. Roosevelt's and Mr. Churchill's talks in Washington, it was announced that in addition to the original twenty-six signing nations, the United Nations would welcome statements of adherence from "appropriate authorities which are not governments."

This was a shrewd gesture and it worked fairly well. No sooner did the word go out than the line of appropriate authorities formed both on the right and the left. Free groups old and new, so-called and genuine, hurried to Washington to declare their adherence to the pact. Whether this signatorial get-together had any beneficial effect on democratic opinion in Paris and Delhi and Buenos Aires, I don't know. It proved at least that some people in Washington recognized the necessity of placating that opinion, if only verbally and symbolically. But I must confess that I wish the gesture hadn't worked so well. I wish the democratic groups had shown a little more skepticism and restraint and had asked for at least a crumb of substance to back up the broad, sweeping promises of freedom—like a dollar paid down to bind a contract. Only a few of them hesitated or ignored the invitation.

This was natural enough. The free movements long for support and acceptance. Most of them, as Mr. Berle's composition indicated, live under the shadow of official disapproval. And since those that do can work for their cause in the United States only by sufferance of the government, they are inclined to respond to even the most evanescent gestures of good-will. There were other motives at work, too. Lively competition exists between organizations representing different tendencies in the various national groups. And each one wants to be among those present when the roll is called up yonder at the Peace Conference. Take Hungary as a rather typical example. Democratic Hungarians in the United States have formed a federation headed by such proved believers in freedom as Rustem Vambery and Ladislas de Fenyes. They have met with representatives of the other states of Eastern Europe to lay plans for a post-war democratic federation and for the basic economic changes on which ultimate peace in that part of the world must rest. But another "free Hungarian" movement has been launched by Tibor de Eckhardt, spokesman of Hungary's landowning aristocracy, anti-Semite, reactionary, and, at a date not far enough in the past to be forgotten, active participant in the Horthy white terror. The first group has been trying patiently to lay before the authorities in Washington the elements of a democratic reconstruction of the Danube Basin. Mr. de Eckhardt, however, has the jump on the democrats. His "free Hungary" movement has been approved by the State Department—definitely and unequivocally. All the more reason why the democratic federation should want Hungary's adherence to the pact registered under its name also and not left to Eckhardt. Thus competition hastens the accumulation of signatures, and freedom finds new and strange names among its sponsors.

The plan to invite adherence from these varied groups may have been innocently conceived as an encouragement to forces that have been ignored and rebuffed. I think it was. But it has tended to create a pleasant fiction which is likely to draw attention away from a nasty fact. And I believe that the genuine democratic groups among the European émigrés would have been wise to withhold their signatures from a pact of freedom until the recognition of freedom becomes part of the policy of the United States government.

The Free French have done so. To their credit they have taken the position that they must be accepted as one of the fighting allies before they sign the pact. They are not interested in helping to wipe out the evil effects of the State Department's blunder. They are not hurrying to accept unspoken apologies for unrevoked insults. They are waiting for Washington's attitude to become clarified and defined. By holding aloof they have greatly enhanced their prestige and dignity.

I wish the other genuine free movements had exercised the same restraint. The process of clarification would have been much accelerated if free Spaniards and Austrians and Hungarians and assorted anti-Nazi Germans had bided their time until Mr. Berle and his colleagues had made up their minds whether they want a post-war Europe dominated by Eckhardt and Otto, Pétain and Franco, and other similar crusaders for freedom, or whether they want democrats.

Can Nelson Deliver?

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 17

I CAME back from the Midwest feeling very optimistic. Some of the optimism has worn off in Washington. To tour the plants of the automobile industry, to see their marvelous organization, to talk with the production men in charge of them and with automobile labor and its leaders, is immensely to increase one's confidence in America's fighting power. The business men one encounters in the factory make a very different impression from the business men one sees dollar-a-yearing in Washington: the man in charge of the gear-grinding is not at all like the man with an ax to grind.

The production men and the engineers of the automobile industry command one's respect. They know their business, and the spirit they show now is quite different from the spirit of a year ago. When I was in the Midwest last year to get the story of the Reuther plan I found automotive executives engaged in long theoretical arguments to prove that their plants, with the exception of possibly 10 or 15 per cent of their machinery, could turn out automobiles only. Today, with automobile production about to be finally curtailed, they are buckling down to the task of finding other uses for their machines in making arms.

I visited many small parts plants, as well as the Studebaker factory in South Bend and Ford's River Rouge plant in Detroit. After looking at many of the machines and asking many questions of the engineers and production men who took me around, I was convinced that there are few machines in an automobile plant which cannot be put to other purposes. When one gets down to it, it is hard to find any special-purpose machine for which some other use cannot be found. The only special-purpose machine, in an absolute sense, is the automobile factory itself. It is the arrangement of the machines, the pacing of the inspections, the flow of the materials, the timing of the labor that make the plant so wonderful an instrument for turning out motor cars.

Once automobile production is stopped, one has a collection of machines which can smooth, grind, mill, or bore parts for a plane, a tank, or a gun. New attachments must be made—new tools, dies, jigs, or fixtures—and new production and assembly lines must be planned, but the old machines need not stand idle till automobile production is resumed. Plans already being made contrast sharply with the 10 to 15 per cent estimates still current among the automotive dollar-a-year men. A Ford engineer preparing to make a new tank engine four or five times the size of the comparable engine formerly produced in his plant showed me his machine-tool requirements. Eighty per cent of them will be met by retooling existing machinery in Ford production lines.

Only a tank factory can turn out a whole tank and only a plane factory can turn out a whole plane, but any factory equipped to do metal work, whether automotive or otherwise, can turn out parts for planes, tanks, and other kinds of armament. Ordinary methods of procurement, however, are nowhere near sufficient for the task of mobilizing this widespread machine-tool equipment for the arms program. What we need is over-all production boards, here for a whole industry, there for a whole city or a whole busy river valley, which can break down blueprints for tanks, planes, and guns and parcel them out in accordance with the capacity of each individual plant. This job of reorganizing industry for arms production is a jigsaw puzzle—the larger the number of pieces the more combinations become possible. We need a production board which can move an idle drill press from Kenosha to complete a new gun-part production line in Chicago, and find the machines needed at South Bend in a machine shop at Flint.

We need the present management men for their experience, their ingenuity, their engineering genius. We also need labor on these boards, for three reasons: first, to get those simple, obvious ideas—like the ones embodied in the Reuther plan for automobiles and the Murray plan for steel—which do not occur to management because they run counter to management's interests; secondly, as a means of siphoning up from the man at the bench the suggestions and complaints which can do so much to improve efficiency; thirdly, in order to inspire labor to greater effort by making it a partner in production. I am not suggesting debating societies for each industrial area—every board must have a government chairman empowered to make final decisions. But even in ordinary business an executive can benefit by listening to his workmen, as well as his engineers, before he makes up his mind. No enterprise can be run by soliloquy.

I had hoped to see some such scheme emerge from the industry conversion conferences, though the first one in Detroit last Wednesday ended with nothing more than an agreement on what nine points were to be discussed at the next meeting. Automotive executives are worried over talk of labor participation in management. The automobile workers' union is a glacial force which has already transformed a citadel of the open shop into the union town that is Detroit. Management is afraid labor may win this battle, too. But it has been afraid in the past of many other things which have since proved less than disastrous. Management fought seniority as disruptive of efficiency, but has since found it profitable. Seniority has required the training of men to handle more than one job, has given the manufacturer a much better-trained and more flexible labor force. Labor participation in management may some day prove as profitable on the books of business as on those of society.

Before we win this war, we shall have to turn to great industrial pools and to labor representation on the boards controlling them. There is no other way to obtain the full mobilization of capacity and enthusiasm needed to overtake the Axis. It is in this perspective that the new war-production shake-up in Washington seems but a first step in the organization of industry for maximum arms output. The centralization of authority in one man was necessary, but equally necessary is the creation of new supporting organizations, by industries and areas, to bring about wider participation of both men and machines in the war effort.

Donald Nelson is an able and progressive business man, but it remains to be seen whether or not he can do the job and how far the President will support him in it. As Director of Purchases in the old NDAC, Nelson had to deal with consumer-goods industries—textiles and shoes—in which output is more than ample for any army. That is quite a different task from the one before him now, in which he must deal with the monopolistic heavy industries and with the job of converting industries like automotives and radio to war production. Even in the smaller job as Director of Purchases, Nelson was not always successful in impressing his own ideas on his dollar-a-year subordinates. There was some scandalous ax-grinding, and the prices paid were often exorbitant.

In the past Nelson has not been much of a fighter, though the reorganization was itself the result of an undercover fight in which Nelson was partly a leader, partly a convenient rallying point. His problem is an enormous one, for no organization can be reformed merely by changing the men at the top. Patterson in the War Department and Forrestal in the Navy have both learned a good deal in Washington, but neither has been too successful in changing the methods of the procurement officers under them. Nelson and Knudsen do not get along. Nelson has long been critical of Knudsen and the automobile industry. Will Knudsen's job of Director of Production in the War Department be that of a mere figurehead—as Nelson hopes and has been given reason to believe? Or will the "Lieutenant General" be in full charge of army production and procurement—as the White House statement on the new setup would lead one to conclude?

The War Production Board itself is merely a new name for much the same cast of characters that has been running defense straight through the shifts from NDAC to OPM to SPAB. Under the executive order the board's power would seem to be chiefly advisory. The strongest characters on it are Jesse Jones and Knudsen, in that order. None of the New Dealers on it are fighters. Will Nelson be able to keep the board in its place and outfrown Jones and Knudsen when it meets? He can give orders to Jones on the financing of plant expansion, but so can the President. How far will Jones, who often flouts Roosevelt's wishes, obey Nelson's?

So long as the actual placing of the contracts lies with army-navy procurement officers, it will be hard for Nelson to get new ideas across, to adopt new methods of procurement. He may find it easier to veto army-navy plans than to force them to operate in accordance with his ideas. What are his ideas? How far is he prepared to abandon ordinary buy-and-sell methods of procurement for the virtual organization of production itself under government auspices? I should say that he is beginning to see the need for a new approach, but the question is whether officials whom he cannot hire and fire will obey him. Will he fight to take over the supply services? Or will he put "his own men" into the army-navy procurement? Many of these men are dollar-a-year men hostile to new ideas that disturb ordinary business methods. If he puts them into army-navy procurement, will he be taking over the army and navy supply services or will they be taking him over? The probability is that he will try the method of "infiltration. It remains to be seen how successful it will be.

How to Lose the War

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE war in the Pacific has thus far brought nothing but defeats to the United Nations. Pearl Harbor, the sinking of the Repulse and Prince of Wales, the capture of Hongkong, the occupation of the Philippines, the sucessful campaign in Malaya, the penetration of the British and Netherlands Indies, the loss of tin and rubber resources vital to American defense—all these blows have fallen in a period of less than two months. Upon our understanding of what has happened and why it has happened and the avoidance of further blunders the final outcome of the war may depend.

Japan's initial strategy of striking a surprise blow preceding the declaration of war and then launching rapid attacks against its superior but divided opponents is exactly the same in its essentials as that which enabled it to win the war against Russia. Many persons laughed off Russia's defeat in that war as the result of inefficiency and corruption; yet the United States and Great Britain are not even faring as well as did the Russians. Nor can the Allies legitimately plead Japanese bad faith as the cause of their misfortunes. In twentieth-century warfare surprise attacks are merely good strategy. No war of modern times has been so long and persistently predicted as one between Japan and this country. Yet no heed was given to the presence of Japanese warships in the mid-Pacific or to the warnings of the Secretary of State.

The surprising successes at Pearl Harbor and in the Far East assured Japan what it needed—complete sea and air dominance in the vital theater of operations. Its achievement of this end was greatly aided by the enemy's failure to have sufficient forces in the crucial areas to make it pay a heavy price for every military gain. The persistent falsehoods with which the British have tried to disguise their inadequate preparations in Malaya have fooled only themselves and their allies. Division of the United States navy between the Atlantic and the Pacific, carried out in the summer of 1941 against expert naval advice, made the Pacific fleet, even before the disaster at Pearl Harbor, inadequate to undertake the rapid offensive needed to safeguard the Far East. The planes which should have caused the Japanese thousands of casualties in their attack on the Philippines were sent elsewhere. Yet it is still too early to pronounce those decisions mistakes. The air power sorely missed from the Philippines aided the British in Libya, and American naval aid in the North Atlantic may have staved off defeat by submarines. In the Pacific, however, these diversions made Japan's task infinitely easier.

It would probably be unjust to dwell on the mere extent of Allied losses. Guam, Hongkong, and Wake were written off in advance. Theodore Roosevelt forty years ago termed the Philippines the "Achilles heel of American defense" and, regarding them as indefensible, issued preliminary orders for the evacuation of the Asiatic fleet in the event of war with Japan.

Not the fact of losses but the manner in which they were incurred should cause profound dissatisfaction to every citizen of the British Empire and the United States. For these early defeats have been accompanied by a succession of national, administrative, and purely strategical mistakes on the part of the Allied powers. All the Allies except the Dutch must plead guilty to the cardinal sin of underestimating the opponent. Stories of Japan's economic weakness were repeated and exaggerated out of all proportion to the facts. Its army and air force were ridiculed, and the idea that it could fight a power of the size and strength of the United States was made to seem preposterous. Americans appeared to be—some still are—drifting in a world of fantasy untouched by the harsh reality of war.

The British were evidently even less troubled by facts. The commanders in Malaya failed in preliminary planning and felt confident that the Japs were bluffing—making exactly the same mistake that anti-Axis pacifists committed for years prior to 1939. Now that uncensored eyewitness accounts of the fighting in Malaya are reaching us, it is becoming increasingly and painfully obvious that the earlier commanders at Singapore were not the flower of the British army. Realization is wanting that this is a war which we can lose and are losing at present.

With the underestimation of Japan there existed—and may still exist—a fundamental error of strategy. Wars are won only by offensive action, and yet our plans for defeating Japan in the Pacific, as drawn up by the Joint Board of the Army and Navy after July, 1941, contemplated defense of Malaya and Siberia, economic blockade, bombing raids, aid to China—all essentially defensive measures or strokes of attrition. The Japanese upset this "Maginot Line" psychology in exactly the way Hitler beat France—by an attack not covered by the calculations. Unless the Allies rid themselves instantly and completely of this defensive concept of warfare they may well lose the war in the Pacific, for Japan's weaknesses—its lack of economic resources and its attenuated lines of communication—will not operate to bring about its defeat unless they are exploited by strong opponents.

The basic error of strategy has been accompanied by colossal military mistakes. Evidently neither the far-flung submarine patrol near enemy harbors nor the army and navy intelligence service had any advance information, though Japanese warships had maneuvered near Pacific islands for weeks. The menace of fifth-column work, to which Hawaii by reason of its population is particularly subject, was likewise neglected. Yet even with these failures, distant aerial naval patrols, reconnaissance by surface vessels operating nearer to home bases, close aerial patrol by the army, inshore surface patrol by small craft, and finally the army's air-raid detectors should all have afforded warning of an approaching attack. Not even the elementary routine precautions of torpedo nets about anchored ships or of camouflage and decentralization of the air force were employed. Fuel dumps supposedly sunk in rock protection deep underground burst into flames at the first bomb. This much is clear from the facts of attack. Further investigation will uncover more.

Elsewhere than at Pearl Harbor Allied mistakes have been less concentrated. In Malaya the British have been repeatedly caught napping by the extreme adaptability and trickiness of their Japanese opponents. Their "scorched earth" policy has been a ghastly farce. Huge supplies of tin, rice, and rubber have been allowed to fall undamaged into Japanese hands. Bridges, tugs, and docks have not been rendered useless. Even a radio station was left intact for the use of the ready Japanese propagandists.

Much of the American poor showing in the Philippines has been due to indecision about whether the islands should be defended or evacuated, which left us prepared to do neither. Had there been a sufficient air force to attack invaders, the transports that came into Lingayen Gulf at night would have been an easy target. Loss of the Philippines was expected, but so quick and easy a Japanese victory was not.

Given the blunders in strategy, the lack of adequate forces, and the obvious ineptitude of various Allied commanders, the deeds of the average sailor, soldier, marine, and airman have been heroic. The defense of Wake has already taken rank as a service classic. But though Americans have fought ably and well, the complacency of many civilians and the mistakes of some of the higher officers in the services have been a discouraging feature of American participation in total war. We should frankly face and recognize these blunders. To continue them may be fatal.

The Limits of Liberty

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

THE question of civil liberties in war time has divided liberals and progressives today into two groups—"absolutists" and "relativists." The absolutists, thinking in terms of absolute rights, refuse to countenance any restriction of liberty of expression, and are inclined to hold to their position without regard to the political consequences which may flow from it. The relativists insist that freedom of speech should be withheld from those political groups which intend to destroy liberty.

As one who is in broad agreement with the relativist position in the matter of freedom, as upon every other social and political right or principle, I should like to outline a position which, while it does not agree with that of the absolutists, represents a modification of the views of the relativists.

The idea that freedom of speech is an absolute right, inherent in "natural law," which we cannot abridge without destroying it in toto comes to us from eighteenth-century thought. The eighteenth century appropriated and reinterpreted conceptions of "natural law" originally elaborated by Stoicism and later incorporated into medieval Christianity. "Natural law" is a law of reason and supposedly gives us absolutely authoritative moral and social norms and "inalienable" rights. In a sense theories of natural law refute each other because each generation, or at least each culture, believes that the natural law embodies different specific norms. Everything from liberty and equality to property, the obedience of children, and the prohibition of contraceptives has been regarded at various times as a requirement of natural law.

The Stoics and the medievalists were wiser than the eighteenth century at least in this, that they regarded liberty and equality as requirements of the absolute, but not of the relative, natural law. This is to say they believed liberty and equality—equality representing ideal justice—to be ultimate but not immediate social norms. Neither one can be fully realized in the complexities of actual history, if for no other reason than that they come into conflict with each other. Eighteenth-century nationalists disregarded this wise reservation of Stoic and Catholic thought and made liberty an absolute norm and freedom of expression an absolute right.

The difficulty with this conception is that man requires community as much as liberty, and he has never been able to achieve community in large units of social cohesion without an element of coercion. Since both liberty and community are basic requirements, libertarian social theories which are founded on the assumption that liberty is the basic requirement of man's nature are just as erroneous and just as dangerous as the opposite theories which maintain that liberty must be completely subordinated to the requirements of community and social cohesion. Nor can we maintain that the individual requires liberty and that society requires cohesion. Both the individual and society need both in order to express their true nature and fulfil their proper function.

The relativists are just as correct in resisting those absolutists who would make liberty an absolute right as in resisting those who would make peace, as against war, an absolute social norm and who are easily betrayed by this dogmatism into the false peace of capitulation to tyranny. But the relativists are wrong if they imagine that liberty should be denied only, and always, to those groups which do not believe in liberty. They are wrong first of all because they have by implication adopted their opponents' conception of democracy. Democracy does not consist merely in the preservation of liberty. Democracy is a social and political form which preserves unity in terms of liberty; and since no democracy has ever achieved unity without some measure of coercion, no democracy has ever maintained pure liberty.

It might be just as dangerous to allow anarchist sects to spread their propaganda in a time of emergency as to allow totalitarian sects to do so. We ought not to define our problem merely in terms of immediate exigencies. We do not happen to be threatened by anarchist sects, but no one can deny that libertarian philosophies have, in recent years, seriously impaired the unity and striking power of the democracies in their battle for existence with tyrannies. They have brought confusion into our counsels by defining every coercive act of government—the Conscription Act, for instance—as "fascist." It is possible, furthermore, that a national community might be seriously threatened in an emergency by groups which did not question the basic creed of democracy but merely took a defeatist attitude toward the political and military situation.

If the relativists should achieve a more complete relativism in evaluating the various "rights" in a social situation, they would, paradoxically, be able to find a larger area of agreement with the libertarian absolutists than they have found thus far. A relativist position which could support the libertarian position in so far as the latter makes a genuine contribution to democracy but which would have to challenge its absolute dogma would analyze the democratic problem about as follows: The democratic norm is the largest measure of unity together with the largest possible measure of freedom. A time of emergency—that is, a time when the community is threatened by internal or external peril—requires closer social cohesion than an ordinary period. This greater unity is partly achieved by voluntary efforts based on emotions prompted by a common danger. But it is not completely achieved by purely voluntary efforts. There must actually be a greater measure of coercion, partly to eliminate recalcitrant and even traitorous elements and partly to save time, for a community must act quickly in an emergency.

Against the absolutists, the relativists must insist that it is not possible to lay down absolute principles about the preservation of liberty. The degree of liberty which we can maintain depends upon the intensity and extent of an emergency and the degree of unity achieved by purely voluntary efforts. Britain, for instance, can afford to preserve liberties to a greater degree than some other democracies because various traditional and other resources give this nation a unity in an emergency which has been the envy and despair of other nations.

The relativists must also insist that no such sharp line can be drawn between freedom of speech and freedom of action as the absolutists draw. However, it is frequently necessary to draw a line between the freedom of speech of a private individual, which ought not to be abridged at all in a democracy, and the freedom of organizations to spread subversive propaganda, which may have to be restricted. Hitler was not merely speaking but acting when he corrupted the youth of his nation with his lies. The restriction of his liberty to do this would not necessarily have saved Germany, since his propaganda both aggravated and expressed a sickness in German society. The sickness of a society cannot be cured merely by coercive unity; but it may be important to prevent a social disease from spreading while society seeks to find the real cure for its ills.

Relativists can agree with libertarian absolutists that all societies tend, particularly in times of crisis, to apply coercive remedies for their ills too precipitately. Relativists can join with absolutists in resisting those forms of coercion which have nothing to do with prudent statesmanship but are merely the tools of a fanatical tribalism, striking out venomously against that which is "alien." Such resistance is particularly to be desired in the present war, in which loyalties are determined not primarily by racial but by ideological differences, and in which the appeasers of yesterday will be inclined today to persecute aliens who fought Hitler long before they did.

The relativists will also make common cause with the absolutists whenever they remind the nation that coercive means of unity can never be more than an alloy in the amalgam of social peace. If the coercive alloy becomes too important, democracy is imperiled. The relativists can furthermore join the absolutists in reminding the community that every bureaucracy seeks to discourage criticism of its own mistakes by interpreting it as criticism of democracy itself. Freedom of criticism is necessary for maintaining the efficiency of a democracy. Every restriction upon freedom of speech must therefore be carefully scrutinized and grudgingly granted.

There is a final point on which absolutists and relativists ought to find partial agreement, though it is the point on which their disagreement is most obvious at the present moment. The relativists should insist that the right to preach doctrines which challenge the foundations of a democratic society ought not to be abridged unless such a challenge results in a "clear and present" danger. They cannot regard such a right as absolute, and they would not allow a community to be thrown into confusion rather than restrict this right. But they know that the uncoerced consent of a community depends to a large degree upon the prestige which its government enjoys, and that nothing enhances the moral prestige of a state so much as the inner security which allows it to indulge in the "luxury" of permitting criticism of its basic doctrines. A policy of coercion, on the other hand, suggests weakness, and may therefore lead to further disaffections which require further coercive restrictions.

The relativists will, of course, part company with the absolutists at the point where the latter would sacrifice the unity of the community rather than restrict liberty. Any community in a time of crisis will tend to preserve its unity; it will use coercive means as a last resort. If the community is either very sick or very imprudent, it will use too much coercion and become involved in the vicious circle of repression which ends in tyranny. But it is silly to assume that moderate restrictions inevitably end in dictatorship.

Communities may, like individuals, face emergencies and diseases which need not be fatal. To be sick in bed does not doom the patient to stay there until he dies. Coercive means of unity are analogous to the doctor's medication and stimulants. The constant use of a stimulant will not restore a weak heart, but neither will its momentary use necessarily prove fatal. Deeper sources of health must of course be found. The Weimar Republic may have destroyed itself by its doctrinaire libertarianism, though of course the suppression of Hitlerism would not alone have prevented its destruction.

It is important, in other words, to consider all factors in a social situation, and to have a flexibility in tactics which does justice to momentary contingencies while maintaining an inflexibility in strategy which does justice to the basic principles of human society. But loyalty to principle does not mean loyalty to one principle, when human society is governed by more than one principle. No democratic society can survive if it acts upon the assumption that liberty is the only principle of democracy and does not recognize that community has as much value as liberty. The absolutists like to regard the relativists as opportunists who are devoid of principle. But decent relativists merely recognize, as absolutists do not, that life is governed by more than one principle, and that not even the relation of these various principles to one another is fixed. They know that history is full of novel situations and surprises and that a wise statesmanship must know how to do justice both to immediate exigencies and to perennial human needs.

Bavarian Evening

BY TONI CHRISTEN

WHEN the air raids on cities of western Germany became severe, Frau van Druten, widow of a privy counselor and recipient of a generous state pension, went to live at a boarding-house in Tegernsee, Bavaria. Nights spent snugly in bed were better for the health of a lady past seventy than frequent descents into air-raid shelters on cold nights.

Though she missed her furniture and her knickknacks, she wasn't really homesick for Münster, her home town, for on her first walk through the village she recognized many of the promenaders as people she knew who had left Münster ostensibly to live with married daughters or nieces elsewhere. Settled in furnished rooms or boarding-houses at Rottach or Tegernsee, they continued to enjoy one another's company, play bridge and rummy, and exchange food and clothing acquired outside their ration cards.

There were no bombings in this part of Germany, and Frau van Druten quickly settled down to the pleasant routine. Tegernsee was a popular resort for Germans on furlough from the army, navy, or civilian defense, and this gave you a chance to meet friends or relatives from the four corners of the Reich. It was delightful to rediscover old friends and incidentally get answers to many questions you could not ask in your letters—like whether Cologne bridge and Hamburg harbor were really a shambles, whether Göring was sealed up in Karin Hall, and whether those Bodelschwingh children had been bombed by the enemy or subjected to mercy deaths.

In August she had the joy of welcoming her nephew Robert and his family from Duisberg. His daughters were pretty and well-behaved, though the un-Aryan curve of their noses, which they inherited from their mother, was a bit embarrassing at times. Robert, a general practitioner, looked—at least during his first vacation days—more as if he were sixty than the forty he was.

They went to the Tegernseer Hof for tea and discussed their friends. "Oh dear, did the Windhorsts really lose their son before Moscow?" And, "Look, Robert, over there by the music stand, at the table by the potted palm; it's lawyer Tannenbaum from Essen. He came here four weeks ago, and at first looked very thin and yellow and jerked his head back and forth. People said he had been in a concentration camp. Do you think he might have Jewish blood? How foolish of him to attempt to win a case against a party official."

She inquired after some Jewish acquaintances in Duisburg and expressed contentment that they had left the country. Not that Frau van Druten was anti-Semitic. Oh, no; her husband had been a liberal and so was she. After the pogrom in the fall of 1938 she had been one of the first to visit her smitten Jewish friends and bring them food and plates to eat from.

Robert and his family stayed for two weeks, then left refreshed for home and new bombing ordeals. Later Gerichtsrat Heine, a friend of the late Herr van Druten, arrived to stay. The Herr Rat, also pensioned and over seventy, called on Frau van Druten every day and asked her to walk with him. Frau van Druten easily forgot her aching ankles while the Herr Rat told juicy stories from the days when he was a judge in a divorce court. Afterward they would stop at a pleasant inn for a cup of acorn coffee and some artificial pastry with three real plums under Ersatz whipped cream.

The Herr Rat developed into quite a trusted friend. Once or twice Frau van Druten felt he might become even more than a friend. He had hemmed in an embarrassed way and started a sentence with, "Now, gnädige Frau, I am coming to a rather delicate question." However, each time the delicate question had not been so delicate after all but had been aimed at rather prosaic things: whether Cousin Strombeck had really left a million to his widow when he died last year, and whether at some time of his early life he hadn't been involved in bankruptcy and barred from Münster's fashionable Verein for that reason. The Herr Rat had quite distinctly relaxed when he learned that Strombeck had left nearer two millions than one and that the bankruptcy debts had been paid long since. Thereafter he had gone almost out of his way to be nice to Ida Strombeck, who was staying at the pension with them.

In spite of the war and the bombings and the low food and clothing rations people were full of unserious ambitions and interests. Take pretty Ella von Stumm for instance. Frau van Druten saw her at the Tegernseer Hof, the only hotel which offered afternoon tea with music. Ella, who must have arrived just yesterday, was too busy flirting to come and greet Frau van Druten properly. Someone said the man with her owned quite a big country place north of Hanover, with chickens and cows, which had of course their value in these meager times. But Ella, though only twenty-five, had a very nice husband of solid Westphalian stock, doing well, too, with the manufacture of vacuum presses.

Frau van Druten did not like people to be adventurous even in peace time. In war time it was outright indecent; it showed lack of respect for the sacrifices of our heroes at the front. Frau van Druten began to think of her nephew Willy, who was with the army in Russia. Willy, a World War flier and now a colonel in the air force, had been distinguished by the Führer for valor only a few weeks ago. Dear, dear, at times she felt very much in need of seeing him if only to get the idea back that somewhere this war was really happening and that all this discomfort and general vague depression they were experiencing at home was really good for something. Of course, some wounded men were in convalescent homes around Tegernsee, but they were almost well. She guessed they kept the more serious cases nearer the front.

Their Sunday supper was as usual—liverwurst sandwiches and herb tea and Mondamin pudding. Afterward the pension members sat around in their winter coats because the house was showing the November cold. They all felt a bit chill, possibly because they had had so little to eat. (Frau van Druten remembered she still had tucked away a piece of pastry sent to her by mail. It came from her former cook, Elsa, who was married to a Münster Conditor.) The Herr Rat saved the situation by suddenly producing a bottle of "Cloister" liqueur—a Benedictine imitation made by the monks in Ettal. Possibly he wanted to be attentive to Ida on her birthday. Ida looked wonderful in her black lace dress from Madame Lölgen's Düsseldorf establishment and her double string of pearls, but she was even sharper tongued than usual, choosing to make the poor old Mosler woman a target of her wit. True, Frau Mosler annoyed them all a bit by bragging about the information she received through her daughter in Switzerland about how the war was really going—that America would come in now any day, and that the German High Command had made a terrible mistake by going into Russia, and that losses before Moscow were beyond conception. Ida picked all her arguments to pieces until the woman got up, quite pale, and left the room.

At just the right moment the doorbell rang. The maid rushed to the door and let in an officer, dazzling in the blue-gray uniform of the air force with the insignia of his colonel's rank shining on his shoulders. It took Frau van Druten some time to realize that this tall, bony, weather-beaten stranger was her nephew Willy. What a surprise to see him in Tegernsee all of a sudden!

They crowded around him full of curious questions. Willy, it seemed, had flown to Munich from Reval in twelve hours the day before and taken a car to Tegernsee to see his aunt. He had to be back at the front tomorrow night. He took his aunt's arm and politely guided her away from the group and upstairs to her room. "I have some business to talk over with you, Auntie."

They sat down opposite each other.

"I hope nothing is wrong, Willy," said Frau van Druten somewhat worried. "Is it Egon again?"

It might well be Egon. Willy's only son had been a problem child ever since his mother died. And though he had been sent to fine National Socialist schools he had not improved with the years. He was a snob and lazy and had been thrown out of every school he had ever been sent to. Now he was in a labor camp. He could not be dismissed there—they had to keep him—and he knew it.

Willy shook his head. "No, it isn't Egon. He seems to be all right for the moment."

"I hope the war is going on all right," said Lucy Druten. "Sometimes we hear things."

"Leave that to the Führer," her nephew interrupted her sharply, adding as an afterthought: "Russia is awful—nothing but misery and fear! When you see faces that smile as your friends do here, you can hardly believe your eyes." He had never talked like that before. Lucy Druten looked at him in astonishment.

Willy said after a silence: "I really came to ask your advice, Aunt Lucy. Do you remember Fräulein Emmy from the War Ministry? You met her in Berlin in 1939."

Lucy Druten nodded.

"I never could make up my mind whether to marry her or not; my first marriage wasn't such a success."

No, poor Willy's wife had run off with a Rumanian consul. Fräulein Emmy, Lucy remembered, came of rather modest background and had no dowry, but was sweet and unassuming and terribly in love with Willy, at least she had been at the time when Lucy knew her.

"I suppose she has a lot of character," said Lucy hesitantly. Nowadays, she had heard, people married for character rather than for money, position, or good looks.

"Yes," said Willy without enthusiasm; "her health is rather frail, though. But it isn't that which bothers me so much as her age."

"Her age?" said Aunt Lucy surprised. "I imagine she is a good deal younger than you, in her early thirties, I should say."

"Thirty-two, to be exact," said Willy with a frown. "A girl in the twenties would be easier to train. Anyway, she came to Munich last night to meet me and put the question squarely to me whether I'd marry her or not. What shall I do, Aunt Lucy?"

"Really, Willy," said Frau van Druten, "I'd rather not advise you. When I think of the disappointment your stepmother turned out to be—"

Energetically Willy put down his mother's picture, which he had been holding all along. "Of course, I knew you would have the right answer." He got up, looking very much relieved.

"But I haven't said a word," said his aunt bewildered. "What will you do?"

"Not marry her, of course. Here, Aunt Lucy; I almost forgot to give you your present. I picked it up in Reval two nights ago. So long, Auntie."

It was a bottle of Danzig Goldwasser. Dear, dear Willy.

There was hardly time to call after him to take good care of himself and avoid getting colds. He was down the stairs in no time, and after another second she heard the car outside give a snarl and move off in the darkness.

She felt empty. Willy had come and gone so suddenly. And talked about such silly things. Was there a knock at the door? She opened rather unwillingly, in no mood for questions. It was Frau Mosler, come to inquire for news from the front. She had a son at the front and it was just possible that the Colonel had a message from him.

But Frau van Druten had no message to hand on. The other turned to go, looking paler and more crushed than ever. Frau van Druten felt sorry for her. In sudden inspiration she went to the cupboard, drew forth the pastry, and handed it to the other woman.

"From Conditor Schüler of Bismarckstrasse," she said. "His wife sent it, but it's nothing for me. Doctor's orders."

She shoved the woman out of the room, then walked toward the alcove where her bed stood and started to undress.

Winter Solstice

BY ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Look sharp, to see the winter day
Before the January thaw
Presume upon a longer stay
Hardly visible, though.

Beyond this light that falls on snow,
Bright orange on sheer white, behold
The lawn with softer texture glow
Green under gold.

Watch the bare tree, whose print you know
Familiar on the single cloud,
Fuse with that rounded shadow, draw
That rounded shape around
To cast on summer ground.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

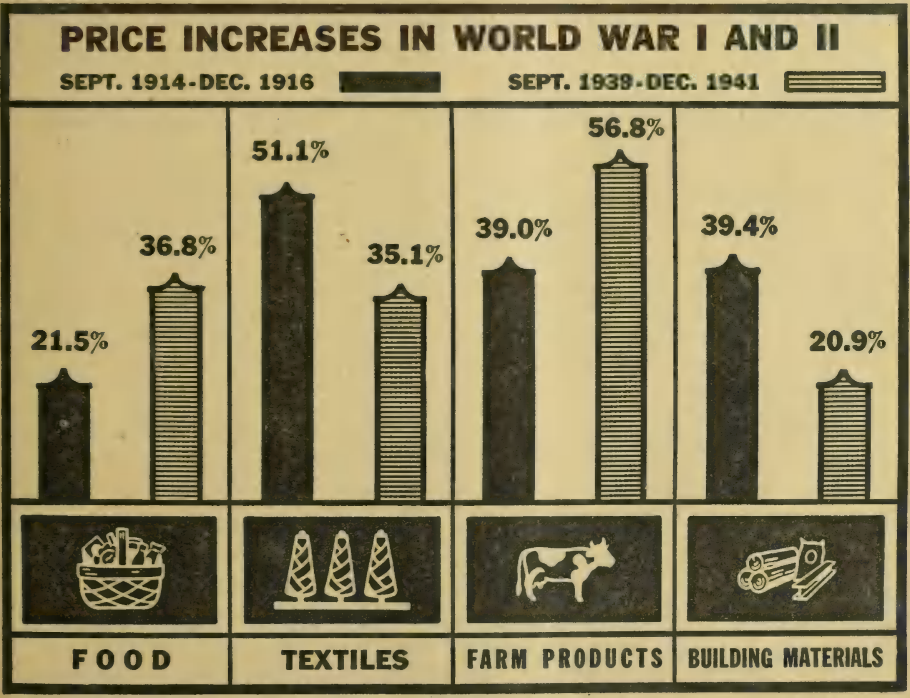
The Inflationary Spiral

IN DECEMBER, 1916, World War I had been in progress for twenty-eight months, and our entry into the conflict was still in the future. But the United States had for some time been experiencing a war boom, thanks to Allied orders, and there had been a considerable rise in prices—not so sharp a rise, however, as took place between the outbreak of World War II and Pearl Harbor.

The chart below, based on the weekly indices of wholesale commodity prices compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, illustrates some interesting differences in price movements during these two periods. In the past two years, it shows, the prices of food and farm products have risen much more steeply than in 1914-16, while prices in the two industrial groups—textiles and building materials—have moved upward more sedately. In the earlier period there was, of course, no attempt at price control; that was deferred until after we had become a participant in the war. But ever since September, 1939, the federal authorities have been attempting to discourage a rise in the cost of living.

The chart is both an illustration of the very partial success which has been achieved and a comment on the appalling dilatoriness of Congress, which after being in labor with a price-control bill for over six months seems about to give birth to a monstrosity designed to promote inflation. The Senate's parity-plus bill, unless drastically amended, is likely to give a sharp twist to the inflationary spiral forcing wages and industrial prices upward in the wake of farm products.

Up to now the manufacturers have been comparatively discreet in their demands for higher prices—their profits have been healthy anyhow—and have at least paid lip-service to the ideal of financing the war without inflation. They have been content to let the farmers carry the ball, knowing that you cannot have inflation in one economic sector without having it in another, and knowing, too, that business is better placed than agriculture not only to make money out of rocketing prices but to keep it. However, a recent note in the financial pages of the New York Sun was suggestive. "The way to get more munitions and win the war," wrote Carlton Shively, "is to let the most powerful of all production stimulants —price—get to work. We can preach patriotism, urge the purchase of defense bonds, implore everyone to sacrifice, imprison chiselers, and what not, but the way to get the goods is to pay for them."



Graphic by Pick-S

Congress Can Stop Inflation

BY FRANK D. GRAHAM

THE frivolity of Congress in merely toying with alleged expedients in the prevention of inflation is placing the Treasury in an embarrassing and dangerous dilemma. It is clear that the greater the sale of government securities to private individuals—rather than to banks—the greater will be the check on inflation. But unless the intelligent private citizen is assured that inflation will be stopped in its tracks, he will surely hesitate to buy government or any other bonds, and the Treasury, therefore, cannot sell to the populace at large its existing types of securities, under existing circumstances, without resorting to something very close to chicane. Though a large sale of bonds to the public would do a good deal to stop inflation, the sale of the present types of bonds can be made with a clear conscience, if at all, only as inflation is prevented, whether or not the sale of bonds is large.

Inflation could be stopped dead if Congress really meant business, but unless it is stopped dead, it can scarcely be stopped at all. Inflation does not just happen; it is purely an outcome of a failure to restrict the monetary purchasing power in private hands to an amount no more than sufficient to buy at preexisting prices the volume of goods currently available to the public. At the moment, this is the failure to siphon off into the Treasury, through taxation plus borrowing from real savers—not from the banks—the same proportion of private income as the Treasury's outlay for the panoply of war bears to the total national income. Inflation will not be stopped by threats to cut off heads, or by any powers given to any official for this purpose, but solely by the abstraction of enough of the people's now enlarged money income to keep private spending to the amount appropriate to the available volume of consumers' goods. For this purpose taxation and real borrowing are both complements and alternatives, each to the other.

The fact that prices are held to an existing level is always a powerful influence in combating forces under which they would rise. For when people see that prices are not rising, they are disposed to accumulate money balances and this keeps prices down. But when they see that prices are rising, the desire to spend their money before it loses in value becomes urgent, and money balances are then drawn on to a quite abnormal extent. This sends prices up and inaugurates a spiral of spending, rising prices, more spending, a further jump in prices, jacked-up wage rates to take care of the rising cost of living, and so ad infinitum. It is an illusion to suppose that we can have inflation in any measure that we will. On the contrary, inflation is a wild horse to which, in circumstances like the present, it is madness to give any rein whatsoever.

Unless inflation is prevented, the citizen who buys bonds of the existing type is, in the sequel, cajoled into paying taxes under the delusion that he is making an investment. It would be much better to make him pay his taxes straight, because in this fashion the job to be done can be accomplished much more effectively, and cheaply, than in any other way. If we have inflation, the money incomes—and the real incomes—of certain sectors of the population will be increased through no special virtue or contribution on their part. Such incomes will rise at the expense of others and, what is more important, to the detriment of our common purpose, since the enlarged incomes will be taken, at least in part, in goods which the demand of the recipients of higher money incomes will call into being. Such goods can be produced only by limitation of our potential military output. If, therefore, we tax by way of inflation, the tax will be harmful to our present urgent purpose, and will bear crushingly upon the most provident members of the community while sparing the wastrels.

The case against the issue of bonds under existing conditions does not turn merely on the prospective decrease in their value. For a long time now I have put by a large proportion of my very modest income in the purchase of what I hoped would be an adequate deferred annuity for my declining years. This is the great bulk of my life's savings. The terms of the contract preclude the surrender of my claim for an immediate cash consideration, and I cannot, therefore, even make the attempt to hedge myself against the menace of a decline in the value of the monetary unit. In the degree of the inflation I shall, as a result, not only be deprived of a large part of my current income but have my savings taken from me as well. This confiscation of my capital might very readily so reduce my net worth year by year as much more than to wipe out any income I might receive. Whatever the proportion of the net social income that the government would have to take to cover expenditures completely by taxation, I would still be better off.

My case is far from unique. If we have inflation, the whole system of "social security" which we have been building up will become a mockery. At the inception of the social-security program certain malevolently inspired antagonists propagated the doctrine that the government's obligations would be directly repudiated when the time came to make heavy payments thereunder. This was an obvious canard. The government will without any doubt meet its obligations, in the accounting sense, but in the degree that inflation has occurred it will be repudiating them in fact. The people concerned will surely be more interested in the fact than in the form, and any such repudiation by subterfuge is, as the experience of Germany has shown, the open door to the most violent social disturbances.

Since no person or corporation will buy government bonds of existing types without coaxing so long as the prospect of inflation is not scotched, the Treasury has almost no option but to spread the lime for prospective purchasers of its issues, unless and until Congress takes really effective action. The Treasury is of course entitled to assume that Congress will act to preclude the spoliation of those honest and thrifty citizens whose interests they are both supposed to serve. But the citizens, observing the actions of Congress up to the present time, would not be justified in any such assumption. The sole way that the Treasury could escape from the dilemma into which it is thrust by the tergiversations of Congress would be by the offer of a new type of bond payable as to both interest and principal according to an index of general prices or cost of living.

The expedient just mentioned is a not very satisfactory substitute for Congressional measures intelligently designed to prevent any inflation, but it would be a whole lot better than nothing. People would no doubt readily buy such bonds, regardless of the prospect of inflation, even if they were issued at next to a zero rate of interest. The buyers' real welfare, moreover, and that of all holders of claims against mutual insurance companies would be much better realized, under inflation, if these companies should also buy heavily of such bonds rather than of those that bore a much higher, nominally positive but really negative, rate of interest.

The true way to tap the savings of private individuals is to keep a stable price level. But if a vacillating legislature cannot summon the resolution necessary to avert the stupendous evils which inflation bears in its womb, the Treasury might at least refrain from duping the trusting buyer of its present issues, and give him a gilt-edged bond rather than an alleged "security" surrounded by a broad band of—perhaps temporarily invisible—mourning.

The very issue of securities carrying money interest payments, and redemption, proportioned to the money cost of living would provide a strong impetus to the adoption of checks to inflation. The money burden on the government in its purchases of war materials will rise as the price level rises, and the money cost to the Treasury of interest and redemption of the bonds would then also rise in corresponding degree. The concern of the government, as an administrative body, in the prevention of debasement of the value of the dollar would therefore run on all fours with the immediate and permanent concern of the people as a whole. It is not impossible that in the effort to prevent an increase in the money cost of financing the war Congress might screw up the courage to do its duty resolutely and see to it that inflation does not occur, thus relieving the Treasury of the dilemma into which it is otherwise inevitably thrust.

In the Wind

THE PUBLISHERS of "Mission to Moscow," the communiqués, diary, and letters of Joseph E. Davies when he was ambassador to the Soviet Union, have been displaying in their advertisements a blurb by President Roosevelt. "You exercised," writes the President, "a happy faculty in evaluating events at hand and determining with singular accuracy their probable effect on future developments." Since the most publicized feature of "Mission to Moscow" is its support of the thesis that the 1936-38 purges gave Russia the internal unity necessary for its fight against Hitler, the President's statement in the context of the ad has been widely interpreted as an indorsement of that view. The fact is that the statement was not prepared for the book at all but is an excerpt from a letter written by Roosevelt to Davies two years ago when the latter resigned his post as "special assistant to the State Department in charge of war emergency problems and policies."

AT THE NOVEMBER CONVENTION of the C. I. O. it was claimed by many anti-Lewis delegates that the United Mine Workers were trying to raid and destroy the Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers, a left-wing union headed by Reid Robinson. Now, with the tide running high against Lewis, the situation is reversed, and the Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers are gaining ground at the U. M. W.'s expense. Several organizers from District 50 of the U. M. W. have gone over to Robinson's union, and jurisdictional disputes are developing in several sections.

THE CURRENT ISSUE of Free World has an editorial note apologizing for its failure to include its regular book section and promising to make amends in the next issue. Among the books listed as not reviewed on schedule is Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward, first published in 1888.

TOM GIRDLER, former head of Republic Steel, on the war: "The Japanese are little yellow insects, and it is our job to build planes that will drop bombs on them."

ED KELLY, mayor of Chicago, on the peace: "We must make this nation so strong that, when peace finally comes, President Roosevelt will be able to sit down at the conference table and tell every other nation in the world to go to hell, if that will be for the best interest of the United States."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Report from the Low Country

ONCE there was a signpost on the Battery in Charleston. Tourists rode by and were amused by it. A wooden arrow pointed out across the bay, past Fort Sumter and the sea islands. It said, "To Europe," and it gave the exact number of miles. I did not see the sign when I was there this time. The bay was as blue as it ever had been in January. The park between the abrupt skyscraper hotel and the elegant old houses, many of them owned by Charlestonians-for-the-season-only, was quiet and secure. But the memory of the signboard remained, and the miles it counted seemed shorter. Maybe because Charleston had seemed so pleasantly remote from the world, it seemed closer to the war. Perhaps because it was a sort of central point on the road from the North to the sun it seemed even more significant in change than the camp and factory and seaport cities which have been overwhelmed. There is a continuing durability in Charleston's quaintness. There you can see, all on one excellent stage, what has happened to the millionaire and the migrant.

Like most grand dames, Charleston was always a good deal more hard-headed than it seemed. Even when its faith was in tourists and its trade was in antiques and charm, Charleston kept one foot firmly planted in the Navy Yard. Its aristocrats hated the New Deal but were glad to see the Santee-Cooper power project spread across the wet lands around it and between the plantations of the millionaires. Today old pipe-smoking Negro women still sell flowers on the streets. Out in the theatrically beautiful gardens the azaleas, which once seemed the most material of assets, are already in process of secretly blooming to the season. Also North Charleston sprawls in trailers and new square miles of housing projects. Even down below Broad Street and near the Battery defense workers have displaced tourists. There are ensigns on the streets, young fliers of the interceptor command, welders, bookkeepers, stenographers who are richer than they were when they worked for decorous law firms. There are Gullah Negroes who would rather work for Uncle Sam at $3.50 a day than for sea-island truck growers at $1.50. Any "foreign" construction foreman must have as much trouble understanding their talk as the tourists did. Even the biggest tourist hotel explains —"but not as apology"—that its service may not be quite what it used to be because many of its veteran employees have left to serve the country.

Still Charleston wonders about the tourists—and not only Charleston. Even Mr. Rockefeller's Williamsburg in Virginia is telling its old patrons hopefully that the brave British clung to their week-ends. It is just a little way to the Williamsburg where so much of our democracy began from the crowded Washington where it is being defended. An exhausted patriot can depend on Williamsburg for patriotic resuscitation between Friday and Monday. But Charleston knows that it is a long way for a week-end for its best old customers even by air. Old ladies in limousines have to think about tires as much as the drivers of jalopies. The Charleston season is embarrassingly close to the government's own tax season on March 15. But halfway down the road from Manhattan to Miami, it seems also at the center of the question of what war will do to the vast American touring industry, which sometimes seems as vital as any industrial priorities problem from California to Maine.

There is, of course, just as much profit for a taxicab driver in hauling sailors to town as there was in hauling tourists to the gardens. Railroads sell more tickets and meals and beer to New York boys returning to Savannah from furloughs than it ever did to patrons on their way to Palm Beach. It may be harder on the furniture, but a landlady gets as much money from three welders in a room all the time as she could collect from a season of wealthy tourists. She not only gets more money; she uses fewer sheets. Neither ensigns nor admirals buy as many antiques, but something must have happened to the import trade in Southern antiques, most of which used to come by the shipload from England.

This is written only as a report of change to a good many Americans who are going to have to stay home and work this winter or just stay home and take a load off their tires. The quaintness and the quietude of the old places they used to go to—and Charleston is only one of them—might not be quite the same even if they could get there. There may soon be an air-raid siren in the steeple of old St. Michael's Church, high over the quiet cemetery and the narrow twisting streets. That siren would be designed to warn Charleston. It would not only wake a welder; up over the quietness of Charleston it would jerk even a millionaire out of his bed, even out of a four-poster under a tester in a mansion which rents in season for $20 a night. Apparently the azaleas haven't heard all this news; they are still moving to bloom. And the sun is warm on the shipbuilders and the empty sea wall alike.

BOOKS and the ARTS

GOOD CRITICS, RARE AND COMMON*

BY MARK VAN DOREN

THE good critic is both rare and common. The common sort is never heard from, for he is that private reader to whom the writer writes, he is that nameless stranger, wise, humorous, and sensitive, who understands everything; his is the perfect mind which perceives that the truth of a written thing is most apparent while it is being read, and that this truth, though simple to the point of delight, is also multiple beyond the power of commentary. He is a legend in whom the writer must believe, but he is more than a legend; he is any man who reads well. The rare sort reads as well, and as privately; then publishes a record of his reading. But if he is truly a rare one he does not expect too much of the record. He does not count on its being complete, either for the thing he has just read or for literature as the whole thing which I shall henceforth call poetry. He does not assume that criticism, cooled into words, can define poetry any more than poetry, having found even its best form, can be adequate to life. He is bold, or he would not have spoken at all; but he has the modesty, the healthy fear, of one who explores difficult places.

He has also the wit of one who is free to see that he may be out of place altogether, or if he belongs where he is, that his stay should be short. The rare good critic knows above all things how to be brief. This is because he has other concerns than literature alone, and larger ones, though he may not speak of them; he may only imply them in the air he has of not being overwhelmed by the duty of the moment, which indeed in his hand seems less a duty than a pleasure. The rare good poet wears the same manner with respect to his work, concerning which we can assume that it was only one way, perhaps accidentally arrived at, by which in any case he would have said what he had to say, been what he was to be. The critic can afford more often than he does to leave some space between him and his subject; to move in easy, rapid circles around it; and to dart in with judgments only when they offer themselves to him naturally, as it were on the fly. He is more likely then to say things which we shall remember—most critics never do that—and to leave his game as much alive in the end as it was before he stalked it. He can afford to keep his head up and his eyes on everything around him; to remember, in brief, that criticism is an art at which luck and love assist. The last thing he can afford to do is to move in on poetry like a beater, crouched and tensed, to seize it at the center. For it may not be there when he arrives; it may be running rings around him as he creeps; and anyhow, tension is not the tool. The relaxed man may learn more, even if it is only that when the animal charges the best thing is to step out of its way, throwing a glance over a shoulder and saying what one sees.

All of which is fanciful, but the current notion of the critic, judging by the endless articles which accumulate in the quarterlies, is fantastic. The encirclement which poetry is undergoing there is as dreadful to behold as it is humorless to hear. The environment for art which this criticism would provide is sand, not sense: deserts of ingenuity and plateaus of learning, but almost never the clear figure of a man who approaches and sees, and with a decent suddenness says what he sees. The effort, it would seem, is not to liberate poetry into a current of true and fresh ideas such as Matthew Arnold once asked for but to crowd in upon it, capture it with definitions, and immobilize it. Poetry already struggles as if bound, as if breathing were hard. And this may mean that Arnold's ideas have lost their freshness. But it may mean too that Arnold was wrong in the emphasis he placed upon ideas as a condition for poetry, just as he was wrong in assuming that he or anyone could know the relation between Shakespeare's art and the thinking of his time. We do not know that much about poetry, and we never shall. Yet the contemporary critic, more Arnold's grandson than he chooses to admit, goes on heaping dunes of ideas about the figure of poetry in the dry hope that she will then revive. The notion that she had drooped for reasons other than her own was Arnold's too. So there she sits, teased night and day to listen while the possibility of her existence is debated. No wonder she still droops, if she does.

Criticism was never more academic than it is now. But it is not about the rules and the proprieties that we are lectured. It is about the processes and the symbols; criticism, obsessed with a desire to be scientific toward poetry, limits itself to questions of psychology and language. How does it feel to think like a poet, and how does he shuffle the counters of speech? The questions are inherited from Coleridge and Wordsworth, who inherited them from Dryden and Hobbes. "What is poetry?" said Coleridge, "is so nearly the same question with What is a poet? that the answer to the one is involved in the solution of the other." The place to look was in the poet's own mind, which for Coleridge had become the special wonder of the world. As if it were more wonderful than the mind of man as such, and as if poets must be more or less than men in order to be at all. What the mind thinks is a better question than how it does it, if only because the second question, being unanswerable, begets doubts that thinking is ever done. Contemporary criticism never doubts, however, that this is the place to hover and halt; and it has already halted so long that in the perfection of its rest there is some taint of rottenness. Our literary age is sick with a distempered appetite for the latest news of itself. Its writing is about writing; the heroes of its novels are writers; the death of James Joyce moved many who will never read

---

* This essay forms the preface to a collection of reviews, many of which appeared in The Nation; the volume will be published in February by Henry Holt and Company.

"Finnegans Wake" to lament the loss of "one who after all was so pure a writer." So pure that he cannot be read by them. But that does not matter, for is he not the most special case to date of the special mind which poets by definition must possess?

The tragedy of Joyce is a footnote to the comedy of his time, whose thoughts run so laughably in the one groove of language. The obsession with this single element among several in the art of composition is at least as old as Coleridge, who for all his promise that he would substitute poetic thoughts for poetic diction did but commit his successors in criticism to a serial, self-perpetuating revolution of the word. The series grows tiresome, begins to seem temporary; for even if it is tolerably old it cannot claim to be ancient. Language occupies a corner in Aristotle's "Poetics," but only a corner. The foreground is filled with action, character, design; with understanding and discovery; with life itself, of which poetry is a report. And if it be objected that Aristotle limited his discussion to poetry as story, the answer is that he did not therein limit poetry. He released it for the exercise of its largest function, which is to show humanity in motion. Even lyric poetry does that when it is alive: as it never again will be if criticism can help it.

Criticism is doing all it can to arrest the lyric in its flight. Rhythm, gesture, sound box, and vocal cord: it disciplines itself to be blind and deaf toward these, which it despises as the mere essentials of an art. The incidentals, the dictionary meanings, are what it loves, and little heed is paid to whether they are truly there in the poem or not. The poem is a bird that threatens to escape the net of analysis; so the net grows ever wider, and tougher with inwoven semantic threads. It will fail of its purpose, but meanwhile it yawns everywhere through criticism and depresses its victim. It can make nothing of first lines like those in Shakespeare's sonnets and songs, or of Defoe's best prose. Such things, being undiscussable, are passed over as unimportant. And indeed their only importance is that they startle us into recognition of the mystery which smiles through language whenever it succeeds. Criticism now is not greatly interested in success, just as it is nervous in the presence of genius. It prefers the poem whose author can be seen sweating at his job of extending or intensifying an image to the point of systematic dulness, to the end of an admirable aridity. Criticism, itself a puritan for work, can praise only the laborious, can respect poetry only when it groans to overreach itself and become discussable. A sensible acquaintance of mine once remarked of the semantic brethren that they missed only one meaning: some people write better than others. But they are not bothered with better and worse, they have not left themselves free to make judgments. Criticism as they practice it is at best a faulty science. It is not an art.

The art of reviewing, what is it? First it is the art of reading without prejudice, without demand, without thought of the reader's self. This is one of love's arts, for it is nothing less than a skill in surrender, a readiness to understand. Afterward comes memory of what has been experienced, and the describer's art which sets that memory down as precisely as possible, honoring its uniqueness. Only then come measurement, comparison, judgment, and perspective.

Letters to Montagu

HORACE WALPOLE'S CORRESPONDENCE WITH GEORGE MONTAGU. Edited by W. S. Lewis and Ralph S. Brown. Yale University Press. Two Volumes. $15.

THESE are the ninth and tenth volumes in the still far from completed series devoted to Walpole's correspondence, and it is hardly necessary to repeat that the edition is obviously one of the great works in its class—physically as well as in the thoroughness with which the material has been collected, arranged, and annotated. Walpole can now be read with more pleasure and completer understanding than ever before; more could hardly be said in praise of any edition.

The present two volumes follow the established plan of printing both sides of the correspondence in chronological order, and this correspondence is probably more intrinsically interesting than either of the two previously dealt with. With William Cole, Walpole discussed chiefly antiquarian matters; writing to Mme du Deffand he was both uncomfortably aware of a duty to be done and somewhat constrained by the necessity of keeping the devotion of his aged admirer within bounds; but the letters to Montagu were written con amore. So far as Montagu himself is concerned, he did little to justify the great name he bore except write letters to Walpole, and apparently he grew finally too indolent to do even that, but the two had been school friends and Montagu was more than a good recipient. He could write in Walpole's own style and was, indeed, probably partly responsible for the style his more industrious friend brought to perfection.

The correspondence begins with a letter to Montagu dated May 2, 1736, when Walpole was not yet twenty; it ends with another to Montagu which was written in October, 1770, many years before the writer's death but recording an attack of the gout so severe that "though seven long weeks are gone and over since I was seized, I am only able to creep about on a flat floor, but cannot go up or down stairs." In between lie more than 700 pages of letters which not only distil the essence of a lively and accomplished man but also present a picture of the political and fashionable world drawn by one in a singularly fortunate position, for Walpole was a detached spectator whose birth, nevertheless, gave him the right to come as close to the scene as he cared to at any moment, and even, when he so desired, to mingle with it. As Mr. Lewis remarks in his introduction, these letters begin merely as private if formally composed epistles but show increasingly the effect of Walpole's later intention to leave a record for posterity; and they include famous passages of descriptive narration like that of the "Richmond Fireworks" and of the entertainments in honor of the Princess Amelia. Yet it is certainly one of the charms of Walpole that few others have been able so successfully to incorporate set pieces into familiar letters while still making it seem that they belong there.

I should not be surprised if one effect of this edition should be to reduce somewhat the currency of the textbook sneers so often repeated in connection with Walpole. His were certainly not heroic virtues, though his liberal opinions were probably more sincere as well as more often publicly expressed than is sometimes assumed. God (and Sir Robert) made him self-indulgent though amiable, somewhat effeminate, and wholly a dilettante. But it can hardly be said that he failed to make effective use of the talents he had.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

First Book

POEMS. By Anna Maria Armi. Random House. $2.

MISS ARMI, we are told, came to this country from Italy only ten years ago, and since that time has mastered the English language sufficiently to use it as a medium of poetry. She does write well; and she must have had the advantage, to begin with, of knowing a good deal about poetry.

There are traces, still, of foreign idiom—the vocabulary is weighted rather beyond the normal with words of Latin derivation; a poet whose native language is English would be less inclined to rhyme, for instance, heart and hart, or lastingness and nothingness, or to say "morose canescence," even in translating Horace. The beat comes trochaic often when the native ear would expect an iamb; the pronouns, more prominently placed, are subject to more stress than we impose on them in English; the word order is occasionally wrenched, for no effect that one can see. There are many set forms; translations and poems in classical meters aside, we find many sonnets, as well as examples of the villanelle, the sestina, and another form whose name I do not know, but which Miss Armi uses with excellent effect in untitled poems on pages 53 and 87. But these matters may derive from personal as much as from foreign language.

Before a single poem had been published, Miss Armi's work had been discovered by Mark Van Doren and W. H. Auden; where and how the jacket does not say. Her discovery of Auden, I take it, must have antedated her discovery by him. This shows Miss Armi's good sense; however great pleasure the reader might derive from picking up a first book of verse without a sign of Auden's influence, he would have to face the chance that it might not be very good. For Auden's talent, of course, is the most impressive—and instructive—to come along in our time. Miss Armi has also, I surmise, read Yeats with profit.

On Miss Armi's account I wish that her poems had been more effectively organized; is nobody around Random House competent to give advice in such matters? There seems no particular order in the arrangement of the collection, which is also somewhat long for a first book, though God knows a young poet can be forgiven for thinking, these days, that a first book may well be the last, and shooting the works accordingly. The collection suffers, moreover, from not being broken up into sections; 131 pages, straight, before the 30 pages of translations begin, does impose considerable demand on the powers of sustained concentration; and the fact that many poems are untitled complicates the situation. Under the circumstances, the index of first lines, however necessary, is still cluttersome.

Miss Armi's lyrical style, so far, tends to philosophical and reflective statement; she has still to learn how the English language may be put to singing use, how to make it sharp and incisive, how to relieve allegory by getting more significant work out of the symbol. It is to be hoped that in the next ten years her work will find occasional publication, not merely accumulate, and that editors will not only welcome her original poems but use her excellent talent as translator. There can't be too many good translations of Horace and Catullus.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

War and the Writer

A LEAF IN THE STORM. By Lin Yutang. The John Day Company. $2.50.

IN TIME of war the writer suffers under the same forces of dislocation as the rest of us, but on him their effect is double, for he reacts both in his own person and in the persons and world of his creation. He is not only in the war, and thus disabled, but his guns are spiked, since he is deprived of his heritage as a writer. How a writer writes is, in every age and under whatever compulsion, more than half determined by the reservoir of past writing; and in time of war the stream of the tradition in which he must work is dammed up, its current cut off by the influx of new values that for the best of human reasons demand to be expressed only in terms of their own overriding urgency. In so far as it is capable of literary form, however, the writer's material cannot be expressed in its own terms; it must take its form from past writing. Consequently the old mode of expression persists while the new insists; and both are impoverished.

"Our task here," writes Lin Yutang, "is to trace what the war did to one woman, one leaf among the millions." Neither the task nor the tracing, neither the end nor the means, is as simple as the thesis, for the author is under a twofold authority: the war story, which demands its own uncompromising treatment; and the love story, which is written, as it had to be, from past literary tradition. Neither succeeds. The stories are not fused by the one woman, Tanni, or by the tricks used by every novelist, which are too patent here, especially the misunderstanding between Tanni and Poya, contrived for the express purpose of moving Tanni from the love story to the war story. Nor are the elements of the plot followed through; we are told what is to happen but we do not see it happen. And although the characters are sometimes permitted to act naturally, the action is far too often merely stated, described, recapitulated. It follows that the emotion of the characters is not felt, for the emotion is not completed in suitable action, only in action obviously manipulated by the author. The arbitrarily contrasted characters of Peng and Poya are presented fully formed and undergo but scant change because of the war or their love for Tanni. Peng is better realized than Poya, who is so static that, incapable of dying, he has finally to be killed off by the author in self-defense. I feel, too, in this book, as compared with "Moment in Peking," the intrusion in the love story of an especially Western kind of vulgarity—the flabby notion and facile routine of "romance," the groove in which the writers of so many best-selling novels play.

"A Leaf in the Storm" is a failure when it is judged by the standards Lin Yutang has himself provided in his best work, "Moment in Peking." Few novelists today have Lin Yutang's feeling for a scene, his ease in filling a room with living people; none have his beautiful sense of poise, which, when he describes voices, features, mannerisms, or even Tanni perched on a chair, makes the book inhabited by a presence that seems actually to exist in space. For Dr. Lin, who does not have that much overrated talent for condensation, the major fault of the book is its brevity. If it had been at least twice as long—it has 368 pages—the story and the plot might possibly have worked themselves out. Then the part about the war would have had the scope provided by a long novel for the blending of detail. And the characters, who seem so eager to grasp every opportunity they are given to act naturally, might have found the leisure to enjoy the ease and naturalness which are the author's best qualities.

The pages about the war (1937-38) are often interesting in themselves, but except when they are an integral part of the story they are simply informative and, as such, extraneous to a novel. Information kills the characters by establishing two levels of communication which do not meet. A novel should be an uninterrupted amplification and clarification of the author's intention, and this intention is weakened or completely nullified by the intrusion of information. Even generalizations such as "the wrong man has done to man" or "war does strange things to people" have meaning in a novel only when, in the novel's living context, they are conclusions arrived at, known, and suffered through in terms of the ordered fiction of the book. Then, as in life, such statements take on a tragic meaning.

As for the war itself, the author sees the enemy committing atrocities "not possible with normal men," killing "for the delight of it." If the enemy is the measure of abnormality, what safeguard is there for the sanity of the enemy's enemy? It is learned nonsense to suggest that "to make the matter plain . . . the realms of abnormal and criminal psychology and of mass and race psychology must be coordinated." And this affirmation of Poya's is also nonsense, more shocking even if more understandable: "But in order to have the morale to stand up under these sufferings, every Chinese must hate the Japanese. Therefore the Japanese soldiers must continue to be as brutal and beastly as they are now."

"For even as one shut out from a garden and come away still keeps thinking of the garden . . ."—I remember these words from "A Leaf in the Storm," for some such feeling as they convey kept turning my mind back to "Moment in Peking" with every succeeding page. My warm welcome to Mulan, who is reintroduced, brought home the difference between the books. In "Moment in Peking" the life of the characters and of the places derives largely from the conventions, the form, of an ordered society, providing frame, definition, boundaries, within which the individuality of the characters is projected. It is this formal restraint of conventions, of a continuity, of a base taken for granted, that must be present before the individual life of a character can have more than an isolated meaning. War, striking at the writer with doubled impact, deprives him of the security necessary to the consummation of his talent. It is no wonder that in most novels written in time of war the story is perfunctory and the characters are unconvincing. While a civilization is at war, neither the writer nor the people he writes of are capable of the orderly development through which completeness is achieved. H. P. LAZARUS

The Soviet Defense

HITLER CANNOT CONQUER RUSSIA. By Maurice Hindus. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

THE KREMLIN AND THE PEOPLE. By Walter Duranty. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.

SEVEN months of war on the plains of western Russia are over, with neither the Soviets nor Hitler as yet decisively beaten. Defeated, utterly, are only the world's military experts, or at least the great majority of them. For the second time since September, 1939, their theories and predictions have been proved totally wrong by the march of events.

First these experts banked heavily on the impregnability of the Maginot Line and on the glorious record of the French army: the famous line cracked at the first push, and within a few weeks the "world's best army" found itself in German concentration camps. Next the experts were ready to bet their last button that the Red Army would be a pushover for Hitler's legions and that an anti-Stalin revolution would quickly follow. So was the high Washington official who confidentially told Maurice Hindus, a few weeks before the outbreak of the Nazi-Soviet war: "The German army will go through Russia like a knife through butter." Well, today the knife looks badly blunted, and it was the butter that did it.

Liberals, too, made a lot of mistakes in their judgment of Soviet policies and Soviet chances, not so much from the military point of view—those who had seen something of Russia with their own eyes were much less defeatist than the military experts—but in their appreciation of Stalin's zigzag course up to the fateful June 22, 1941. There are, in the main, three issues on which most liberals erred, not perhaps from an ideological point of view, but from the standpoint of a realistic policy. First, seeing the tremendous holocaust of life, comfort, and happiness which the rigorous application of the successive five-year plans exacted from the Russion people, they were appalled by what they took to be the inherent ruthlessness and despotism of the Stalin regime; second, they condemned en bloc the bloody purges of the years 1936-38 as the desperate attempt of a dictator to crush all opposition to his rule; third, in their dogmatic horror of aggression and natural sympathy for the under-dog they were completely swept off their feet by the "unwarranted" Russian attack on Finland in December, 1939.

Today it must be admitted, I believe, that many of Stalin's acts were dictated by necessity. Although we may never be willing to condone the methods employed in the purge, the Finnish War, and other cases, we should not close our eyes to the fact that these were preventive measures which subsequently were justified by the course of events. Everything the Soviet dictator did, or failed to do, after the advent of Hitlerism—even the nefarious pact of August, 1939, which has not proved a sound instrument of diplomacy in the light of later developments—was ultimately designed to strengthen Russia's position for the inevitable life-and-death struggle with the Nazi forces.

All the world admits now that if the democracies today stand a fair chance of winning this war against the fascist world front, it is primarily thanks to the magnificent staying power and push of the Soviets. But the Red Army would never have been able to withstand the Nazi onslaught if years of intensive preparation had not given it a mechanized equipment comparable to that of the Germans. It was, in Hitler's own admission, the amount and quality of this equipment—much of which was and is being produced in the new industrial districts far beyond the Urals—that turned the tables on Nazi aggression.

In his very informative "Hitler Cannot Conquer Russia" Maurice Hindus presents a complete survey of this "hidden strength" of Russia, how it was built up, at an enormous cost of life and material comfort, and how it was set in motion to save the Soviet state from the new Napoleon. He takes us, painstakingly, on a tour of inspection through "the new factory" and "the new farm" of Russia—the sinews of Soviet resistance and counter-attack.

Only once under the Soviet regime has the long-suffering Russian people had a short period of ease and material comfort. That was during the winter and summer of 1935-36. It did not last long, because soon the Hitler menace took a formidable shape and the entire economic system of Russia had to be placed on a war footing. The production of consumers' goods once more became unimportant as compared with the need for machines. "Every available ruble," writes Hindus, "went into national defense." Once again hardship and privation became the Russian lot.

But it is not only because of the vastness of Russia and its tremendous industrial resources that Hitler cannot conquer that country. It is also because he has nothing to offer to the Russian peasant, no longer a mujik, to the new intelligentsia, or to the Russian worker. Next to the monumental misjudgment of the military experts, the greatest miscalculation of the Soviet war was Hitler's belief that his "crusade" would lead to a Russian national revolution. The peasants did not rise, except as guerrillas to fight the invader; the intelligentsia in the conquered regions did not cooperate; the workers moved, with their equipment, to new industrial regions far behind the front; even nine-tenths of the White Russian emigration abroad rallied to the Soviet banner.

It matters little, in Maurice Hindus's opinion, whether or not Hitler occupies Moscow, Leningrad, all of European Russia, or even more, beyond the Urals. "The formal front may collapse. The Red Army in Europe may break up into disconnected units. That will not end the hostilities. All occupied Russia will become a front. Fighting will go on, anywhere, everywhere."

Walter Duranty's book is concerned more with the political and moral than with the economic and military aspects of the "Russian miracle." His is a lively, colorful account of the why and wherefores of the frequently puzzling policy which the Kremlin has pursued these last few years at home and abroad.

The book centers around the great purge, which has been one of the principal contributing causes to the world's failure to appreciate the internal strength and cohesion of the Soviet state. It is Duranty's well-substantiated opinion that a great many, though certainly not all, of the victims of the successive purges were guilty of conspiracy against the security and integrity of the Soviet Union. This applies, in particular, to the group comprising Radek, Piatakov, and Muralov, and

AMUSEMENTS

"Buoyant, Giddy and Funny . . . Ought to make everyone very happy." –Atkinson, Times

Max Gordon presents
JUNIOR MISS
A New Comedy by Jerome Chodorov and Joseph Fields
Based on the stories by Sally Benson — Directed by Moss Hart
LYCEUM Theatre, 45th St. E. of B'way. CH. 4-4256
Evenings, 8:40; Matinees, WEDNESDAY & SATURDAY, 2:40

"A PERFECT COMEDY"
—Atkinson, Times
LIFE WITH FATHER
with HOWARD LINDSAY
DOROTHY STICKNEY
EMPIRE, B'way & 40 St.—269 seats $1.10
Evgs. 8:40, Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40

Theatre Guild Production
★ MARY BOLAND ★ BOBBY CLARK
★ WALTER HAMPDEN
In Sheridan's Greatest Comedy
THE RIVALS
SHUBERT Theatre, 44th St., W. of B'way. Cl 6-6699
Evenings, 8:40; Matinees, Thursday & Saturday, 2:40

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Readers' Service Division
The Nation · 55 Fifth Avenue · New York

Don't Miss An Issue!
To keep THE NATION coming regularly
just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVE. • NEW YORK

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I inclose $..........

☐ One Year $5
☐ Two Years $8
☐ Three Years $11

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER
to new subscribers only

☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name..........
Street..........
City..........
State..........
1-24-42
Extra postage per year: Foreign and Canadian, $1.00

to the eight generals headed by Marshal Tukhachevsky. It is true that the trial and summary execution of these ranking officers did much to undermine Soviet Russia's prestige abroad, but it also eliminated in time a fifth column of the first magnitude. France might still live today if it too had carried out a timely purge of its generals.

JOACHIM JOESTEN

Proportional Representation

DEMOCRACY OR ANARCHY? A STUDY OF PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION. By F. A. Hermens. With an Introduction by C. J. Friedrich. Notre Dame (Indiana), The Review of Politics. $4.

WHEN the electorate has to choose one man to be, say, President of the United States or Mayor of New York, it is gathered, as it were, into a single-member constituency, and the man is chosen by the majority of the voters, with the minorities getting no representation.

If many representatives are to be elected and the area is divided into local constituencies, each electing one representative, the majority of voters in each constituency carries the day, and again the minorities are done away with. However, the party which in a given constituency is in the minority may be in the majority in the adjoining one. Thus minorities, by taking advantage of local circumstances, have a chance of winning representation here and there even if in the country as a whole they are not in the majority.

Proportional representation was devised in order to allow not only the majority but also all minorities to be represented in local councils and central parliaments according to their numerical strength. It is a perfect system of suffrage as long as no more than two parties are in the field. Then the number of representatives obtained by each of the two parties is exactly proportionate to the number of its followers. It is a good system also when the competing parties are more than two, but one of them musters a majority of the voters; then the majority gains power while all the minority parties get representation according to their numerical strength. In all these cases, with single-member constituencies or under P. R., there is a majority which rules, while the minority or many minorities supervise the activities of the majority.

Trouble arises under P. R. as soon as there come into being three or more political parties none of which musters a majority of the voters. In this case no efficient administration can result unless some of the parties form a coalition capable of capturing a plurality. Unfortunately, coalitions are more difficult to achieve under P. R. than under a system of single-member constituencies.

Under the latter system the different parties must combine during the electoral campaign into no more than two coalitions in order to get a plurality and conquer the seat. Those who refuse to cooperate with other parties, if they are not strong enough to get a plurality, court defeat. In addition, when the contest is over, the coalition which got the plurality goes to power without the electorate being shocked by this fact, since the coalition had already been working during the campaign and the winning majority in the electorate had indorsed it. Vice versa, P. R. leads each party, during the electoral campaign, to stress its own particular features as clearly and as uncompromisingly as possible. As a result, when the campaign is over, the utterances of the election period act as obstacles to a coalition among groups whose leaders, on the previous day, had boasted of being poles apart. Even when a coalition is formed, and some coalition has to be formed unless a new election is summoned, the cooperation of the different partners in it is half-hearted and inefficient because each group not only remembers the previous electoral contest but, more especially, must keep its eye on the coming one. From a mathematical point of view P. R. is perfect. But it makes efficient government difficult. And what people need is not mathematical satisfaction but government. And government is possible only if there is a solid majority which rules.

Mr. LaGuardia, and Mr. O'Dwyer, and Mr. Hartmann, and Mr. Davies might all be good or bad mayors of New York. But suppose the Mayor of New York were to be elected by a municipal council which in its turn was to be elected under a system of P. R. In the city elections of last November the Republicans, the American Labor Party, the City Fusion Party, and the Union City Party would not have been obliged to combine behind LaGuardia in order to get a majority of the votes; Mr. Davies's followers, who withdrew from the contest before Election Day, would have stood their ground, thinking with good foundation that their votes would have a considerable weight in the future municipal council; the Socialists would have got at least one representative; and perhaps also the followers of Mr. O'Dwyer would have split into minor groups. All the candidates would have hurled at one another the same charges with which Mr. LaGuardia and Mr. O'Dwyer edified the electorate. The municipal council would have contained mathematically proportional representation of all these competing groups. But a municipal council divided into so many groups, embittered by the struggle for power, would have had difficulty in agreeing on a strong personality; and in any case a mayor elected by such a council and accountable to it for the whole of his term of office would most likely be a failure.

These things and many others can be said against P. R. and are to be found in Dr. Hermens's study, to which Professor Friedrich of Harvard has contributed an excellent preface. I have to confess that I once advocated P. R. in Italy, but the experience of Italy from 1919 to 1922 and that of the Weimar Republic had shaken my faith even before I read this book. Political scientists and politicians in this country would do well to read it and meditate upon it.

It seems to me, however, that Dr. Hermens lays at the door of P. R. too many evils for which other causes were responsible in Italy and Germany, that he adorns with too many miraculous gifts the single-member constituency, and that his theory is weakened rather than strengthened by too much speculating about how much better things would have been if a system of single-member constituencies had prevailed. A supporter of the latter system could too often reverse Dr. Hermens's "ifs" and maintain that things would have gone even worse if Dr. Hermens had had his way. Arguments by "ifs," unless they are used with economy, are apt to sow controversy rather than carry agreement.

GAETANO SALVEMINI

DRAMA

"The Rivals"

I AM not prepared to say at precisely what moment it was that "The Rivals" ceased to be one of the two most successful and most durable pieces of hokum ever designed for the English stage and became, instead, a classic to which solemn school children must be shepherded by conscientious instructors. By now, however, the transformation is so definitely complete that reviewers can praise the Theater Guild's new production at the Shubert Theater for its refreshing irreverence—though just how you would play Mrs. Malaprop or Bob Acres reverently it is a little hard for me to imagine—and ordinary spectators will probably find their inclination to laugh somewhat impeded by the fear that they are being exposed to education.

So far as the play itself is concerned, it has, when considered purely as a viable piece for the contemporary stage, its weaknesses and its strength. Chief among the former are both the fact that the satire on a particular variety of romantic sentimentalism infecting young girls of the period is meaningful today only in so far as the analogy with current forms of folly is evident, and the further fact that present-day audiences are very likely to be bored by those highly conventionalized intrigues involving mistaken identities and elaborately planned deceits which everybody seems to have enjoyed for a good two hundred years and which probably nobody really enjoys now. Among the sources of its strength are the skilful use of farcical situations still serving writers less adept and flashes of wit which still coruscate.

Sheridan's writing is both more robust and more coarse-grained than Congreve's, but there are bravura speeches like that of the sensitive Faulkland on the subject of girls who dance when their lovers are absent which achieve a fine effect of cumulative absurdity, and there are bits like that when the bellicose Sir Lucius silences Bob Acres's wish that in the duel he might have a little right on his side with the pertinent exclamation, "What the devil signifies right, when your honor is concerned? Do you think Achilles or my little Alexander the Great ever inquired where the right lay? No, by my soul, they drew their broadswords and left the lazy sons of peace to settle the justice of it," which are just about as pertinent as they ever were. Unlike either Wycherley or Congreve, Sheridan was never equal to the intellectual feat of sustaining a consistent comic attitude throughout a play. He was, for one thing, far too ready to yield to sentiment as the easiest theatrical way out of a situation, and for another, probably too averse to sustained thought ever to be quite sure himself where he stood, so that a few years after "The Rivals" he could do on Lady Teazle one of the most disgraceful jobs of whitewashing to which a decent dramatist ever stooped. But there are flashes which reveal that his kinship with the great creators of intellectual comedy is as real as that with the modern tradition of farce which he helped to found.

The Guild production starts with a text which adds a prologue, some incidental songs, and concluding speeches by Arthur Guiterman, but which also, in addition to indulging in some minor tinkerings with the dialogue, discards the whole first scene and most of the sentimental conclusion—with the result that though the audience is spared some lush moralizing at the end it is also left with a pretty sketchy justification for the whole intrigue, which has little point unless the heroine's rooted aversion to any suitor who doesn't come over the garden wall is firmly established. Miss Le Gallienne, the director, has so many stars to work with that the production carries a suggestion of a Players' Club revival, but the presence of Bobby Clark lifts the whole thing to quite another level. Haila Stoddard is very charming as the languishing Lydia, Mary Boland very authoritative as Mrs. Malaprop, and Walter Hampden appropriately heavy as the heavy father. Several of the other performers are equally satisfactory. But it is Mr. Clark who adds the touch of genius; and, indeed, the most notable thing about the production may be just the fact that it furnishes the solidest foundation so far for the new reputation of that comedian as a "legitimate" performer. In "Men Are All Alike" he was merely gyrating in the vacuum provided by a non-existent play; in the revival of "Love for Love" he stole the show, which tended to collapse under the vigor of antics almost too much for the very fragile structure of the whole. But "The Rivals" is robustious enough throughout to furnish just the opportunity he needs, and he can be incomparably the most entertaining part of the proceedings while still remaining, as he was not before, really a part of them.

One can recognize in Mr. Clark many of the attributes usually characteristic of the best low comedians. He has the abounding energy which enables him to add those additional flourishes, those grace-notes and trills of absurdity, which make the difference between a competent performance and one which seems richer than anyone has a right to expect. Thus, to change the metaphor, he is continually adding that last straw which breaks the camel's back of solemnity and wins the roar which we cannot but emit. He has also a delight in his own antics which is irresistibly contagious, and that gleam of triumph in his eye, that conscious delight in his own folly, which asks for and gets the response of an audience. But I still do not know exactly why so simple a thing as the flourish with which he sprinkles sand on the just-written challenge is so excruciatingly hilarious. That is Mr. Clark's secret, which I can only hope he will neither keep hidden nor lose.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

HAPPILY only one war epic to report from Hollywood this week; other films are of the usual type, but showing a distinct improvement in quality. The pleasantest surprise is "I Wake Up Screaming"—the title is certainly original, if somewhat blunt—a murder story with a psychological twist, brilliantly directed and photographed, with an economy of dialogue and a consciousness of the screen as a medium which make the rather commonplace plot appear novel and exciting. The cast—Betty Grable, Victor Mature, Carole Landis, Laird Cregar—is not very distinguished, and the production costs must have been almost, if not quite, in the B category, but an intelligent use of light and shadow and a well-arranged musical score which emphasizes the suspense of the plot have made this picture far more entertaining than most of the star-studded, extravagant Hollywood productions. Mr. Mature has made a remarkable recovery from his spell as a "beautiful hunk of a man" in "Lady in the Dark," and proves himself a most competent actor, while Mr. Cregar contributes a performance to make anyone, no matter what the state of their conscience, wake up screaming.

"Ball of Fire" allows Gary Cooper to exploit his talent for combining charm with gaucherie and at the same time manages to avoid being a hackneyed star vehicle simply by having hit on a rather funny basic idea. Mr. Cooper plays one of a group of professors engaged in compiling an encyclopedia, his task being, when the picture opens, to write a treatise on slang, a subject of which his cloistered life has given him no first-hand knowledge. It remains for Barbara Stanwyck as a tough night-club singer and close associate of gangsters to teach him a few up-to-date expressions and to play havoc with his bookworm-eaten heart. This would have been a better picture if an aura of exaggerated sentimentality and eccentricity had not been thrown around the professors, whose behavior is as quaint as that of Snow White's seven dwarfs.

Preston Sturges, who has to his credit such excellent pictures as "The Lady Eve" and "Christmas in July," makes a nasty blot on his copy book with "Sullivan's Travels." Perhaps Mr. Sturges, like the successful novelist, has been forced by popular demand to be overproductive, for he seems to have run out of original ideas. "Sullivan's Travels" is, I think, meant to carry a social message to the effect that everyone wants to laugh and not bother his head over silly old poverty or anything unpleasant like that. This message would carry more weight if Mr. Sturges had succeeded in being funny, but having borrowed a little from Frank Capra for his thesis and from Orson Welles for his technique, he reverts to the Keystone comedy for his humor, and dishes out a succession of automobile chases, custard pies, and comic falls which is likely to drive the audience to gloomy and private thoughts. Veronica Lake, after an initial reluctance to brush her hair off her face, generously allows us to see both eyes, and Joel McCrea lends a certain charm to the character of the movie director who wants to experience poverty in order to make a picture about it.

Elisabeth Bergner, after a long absence from the screen, is to be seen in a drama entitled "Paris Calling," all about the fall of France. It is strange that apparently no one has realized that it is impossible to exploit contemporary tragedies for entertainment purposes without making them seem incredibly false. Miss Bergner is a fine actress who deserves better material than this.

ANTHONY BOWER

Speak . . . read

JAPANESE

CHINESE, SPANISH, RUSSIAN

Quickly, Easily, Correctly

The Linguaphone Method enables you to speak any of [illegible] languages—by LISTENING to voices of native teachers in your own home. Amazingly simple, thorough, sound; no smattering. SEND FOR FREE BOOK.

LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE

3 R.C.A. Building, N. Y. C. • Circle 7-0830

RECORDS

VICTOR'S December set of Fauré's Requiem (844, $5.50) has straggled in. All of Fauré's music is beautifully written; but this is the one work, among those I have heard, that has impressed me as proceeding from emotion which, though reticently expressed, is deeply felt. Pelletier's performance with the Montreal Festivals Orchestra, Les Disciples de Massenet, Mack Harrell, Marcelle Denya, and Roland Roy at the organ, is good and is excellently recorded. The French performance in the older Columbia set, which I could rehear only on a small machine, seemed more sensitively wrought; but its recorded sound, though good, is probably less impressively brilliant and spacious on a large machine.

With this has arrived also Victor's December set of Glière's Symphony "Ilia Murometz" played by Stokowski with the Philadelphia Orchestra (Set 841, $6.50). The work is a minor, diffuse, and in the end tiresome example of Russian nationalist writing, much of which you have heard before in Rimsky-Korsakov and Ippolitov-Ivanov; and it must have interested Stokowski because of the opportunities it gave him for the brilliant and occasionally strident sonorities on these records.

Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra also provide the accompaniments for Helen Traubel in the January set of three of Wagner's songs to poems of Mathilde Wesendonck: "Träume," "Schmerzen," and "Im Treibhaus" (Set 872, $2.50). "Träume" and "Im Treibhaus" use material which is used more effectively in the second-act duet and Prelude to Act 3, respectively, of "Tristan and Isolde"; and the songs are only moderately interesting. Miss Traubel's voice is steady, powerful, and opulent in "Schmerzen" and "Im Treibhaus," but is afflicted with tremolo in "Träume"; as recorded it blankets the orchestral part a good deal of the time—most regrettably in "Im Treibhaus"; and "Träume" is given with its orchestral introduction lopped off.

An excellent performance by Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony, recorded with hard brilliance (Set 848, $2.50), provided the occasion to hear Sibelius's "Tapiola" again after a number of years, to hear it, moreover, with Ernest Newman's notes telling me again what marvels were issuing from the phonograph, and nevertheless to be amazed all over again by the nothing-at-all for twenty minutes with which Sibelius managed to convince himself he had produced a piece of music and to convince Newman he had produced "one of the greatest works in the whole range of symphonic music."

After this pretentious tripe of Sibelius, whose merest hiccough moves Newman to solemnity and technical analysis, it is a relief and a pleasure to listen to something even as moderately substantial and enjoyable as the music of the eighteenth-century composer William Boyce that Constant Lambert put together for the ballet "The Prospect Before Us." And the pleasure is increased by the beautifully finished playing which the Sadler's Wells Orchestra does under Lambert's direction, and the balance, cleanness, and refinement of its recorded sound (Set 857, $3.50).

Boyce's little opera "The Chaplet" was given at the final Coffee Concert of the Museum of Modern Art, and turned out to be not worth the performer's trouble and the audience's attention. The Negro cast included a contralto, Carol Brice, who was extraordinary in the beauty of her voice, the ease of her singing, the apparently natural good taste of her phrasing. The best concert of the series was "Hebraica," at which Naomi Aléh-Leaf and the Uri Taiman group offered Yemenite songs and dances, and Ezekiel Albeg gave examples of the cantillation of the Jews of Bagdad. The flaw in this program was the disturbing nineteenth- and twentieth-century contexts provided by the piano accompaniments for the group of two sixteenth-century songs of the Spanish Jews and two Chassidic songs, and the pretentious style in which these songs were done by Sarah Gorby. "Cuadro Flamenco" had the excellent guitarrist Villarino and singer and dancer Anita Sevilla, but the flashily inferior dancer Antonio Triana; the two jazz concerts also offered a few good things like Maxine Sullivan's swinging of English folksongs, Anna Robinson's extravagances, some J. C. Higginbotham's trombone-playing, and things as bad as Maxine Sullivan's swinging of Schubert's "Who Is Sylvia?", boogie-woogie played on the harpsichord by Sylvia Marlowe, and the exhibitionistic stunts and noise that are inevitable on such occasions.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

The Federation of the Free

Dear Sirs: Reinhold Niebuhr's review of "Design for Power" in the issue of January 10 appears to me, as coauthor with George D. Brodsky of the volume in question, to create an impression which is at best unfortunate and at worst misleading. This is the more deplorable as Dr. Niebuhr sees eye to eye with the authors on fundamentals. I trust therefore that neither he nor the editors will take amiss a few words of correction.

First, and least important, the book is not "a history of the Second World War" or a piece of "journalism." I am indeed guilty of perpetrating a history of the first phase of the conflict in the form of a highly detailed and documented analysis. Its title, however, is not "Design for Power" but "Night over Europe," published early last year. The scope and nature of the more recent book can be grasped quite easily by anyone who bothers to look at the Table of Contents and the design of the first seven chapters. It is—I am quite willing to let Dr. Niebuhr in on the secret—a narrative, an analysis, an atlas, and a critique of the foreign policies of the seven great powers from Versailles to Pearl Harbor. Its "purpose" is not, as Dr. Niebuhr alleges, "fully revealed in the final chapter," to the last three pages of which he devotes almost all of his review. The last chapter merely states certain conclusions regarding the culture crisis of our time and offers certain speculations about things to come.

What I most regret is that Dr. Niebuhr's reading of the last few pages of the last chapter—which incidentally, like the rest of the book, is written in quite simple English—leaves him all at sea regarding what is said there because of his fogginess as to the meaning of certain terms in everyday use. Though Dr. Niebuhr declares that he also favors a democratic world federation, it is clear that he does not know what this means. Yet the advocates of federalism as a cure for world anarchy have been crying from the housetops for years that the basic answers to the questions which Dr. Niebuhr poses de novo are to be found in the written constitutions and the political experience of the successful federal democracies of our time—the United States, Canada, Australia, South Africa, Switzerland, et al.

To say with Dr. Niebuhr that the "abolition of the 'sovereignty' and 'independence' of states" means the creation of a "super-state," potentially "imperialistic" and "tyrannical," is all but equivalent to saying that the United States is an imperialistic, tyrannical, super-state imposed upon New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, etc. Of course Dr. Niebuhr does not believe this. He knows that it is a free federation of democratic commonwealths which have not at all suffered any "total abrogation" of their "sovereignty." He should know that a democratic federation by definition has none of the attributes which he rightly condemns and that it contains in its own constitutional structure the solution of the problems which he finds so perplexing. To equate "élite" with "imperialism," "super-state" with "federation," "power politics" with all politics, and "world organization" with "imperial power" is to indulge in semantic confusions which, I venture to believe, are nowhere to be found in the book reviewed but only in the mind of the reviewer. To say finally that "one cannot be at all certain that the author is thinking of a democratic world order" is simply an admission that he has not read through even the last pages of the last chapter of the book.

Let Dr. Niebuhr not look to political scientists for blueprints. Let him read the Constitution of the United States, the Federalist papers, the works of Lincoln and Wilson, and the recent writings of Streit, Humber, and Curry. Let him study Winston Churchill's belated offer of "Union Now" to France in June of 1940. Above all, let him and all other good men and true reflect that the establishment of a democratic world federation can only emerge from the imagination and the wisdom distilled out of the spirit of all free peoples in the crucible of war. The coming Federation of the Free will not be imposed from above. It will grow up from below out of the sufferings and the needs, the experiences and the aspirations, of all the peoples who know the meaning in their daily lives of the international anarchy which must be abolished and of the federal democracy which must be extended to world-wide scope if the war and the peace are to be won.

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

Williamstown, Mass., January 13

No Adequate Blueprints

Dear Sirs: Professor Schuman seeks to refute my rather mild criticism of a lack of clarity and precision in his conceptions of world organization by explicitly disavowing the measure of political realism I had ascribed to him. He finds the answer to the problem of international government "in the written constitutions of the successful democracies" and the blueprints for a world order in "the works of Lincoln and Wilson and the recent writings of Streit, Humber, and Curry."

This means that his thought moves on the basis of the assumption that problems of political integration on new and higher levels can be solved by application of experience gained on the lower levels. I challenge this whole assumption. The international community is as different from the national community as the nation is from the family. Every new level of political organization rests less upon natural forces of social cohesion and requires a shrewder manipulation of power and of political mechanics. National communities rest upon some degrees of ethnic unity, some measure of homogeneity in culture, and very certainly upon geographic limitation. Furthermore, the fear of foes, which prompted their unity in part, is a more potent force than the general fear of anarchy.

The international community that we must organize must harmonize vast vitalities, abridge age-old sovereignties, arbitrate between incommensurate interests, and do all this without the basis of a common history or a homogeneous culture. To prevent imperialism on the one hand and anarchy on the other in the international community is different in degree to the point of being different in kind from the same problem on the level of the national community.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

New York, January 16

Don't Coddle the Movies

Dear Sirs: You have taught me to expect a high standard of criticism in your book, theater, and music reviews. So it is somewhat painful to find "Philadelphia Story" and "How Green Was My Valley" referred to as "first-rate pictures" by your Mr. Bower.

Mr. Bower would have done well to end his review with the first sentence, in which he said that 1941 would be remembered as one of the worst in the history of the motion-picture industry. The daily press in its reviews is doing its share of "coddling" of the movies. The Nation ought to keep clear of such reviewing. BERNARD J. FRIED

Brooklyn, N. Y., January 13

The Post-War Collapse:

Savers Must Invest

Dear Sirs: The two articles by Harold Strauss dealing with our post-war economy (January 3 and 10) were of great interest, but the logic of his reasoning leads to a somewhat more drastic conclusion than he arrives at. He shows that in a mature economy continued investment in the expansion of the means of production results in a narrowing margin of profit and a declining rate of interest. The capitalist class, therefore—meaning the owners of industry and those who own or control investment funds—are opposed to expansion. And they will prevent expansion after the war by holding investment funds idle, as they did during the thirties. But even though they cease investing they will not voluntarily reduce their saving. This hoarding of investment funds causes unemployment and depression.

As a remedy Mr. Strauss suggests government investment, or devices for inducing investment, or both.

Investment cannot be induced, however, unless investors are allowed to name the terms and conditions upon which they will invest. What these terms are can be discovered in any conservative program: lower income and profits taxes, and reduced expenditures for public welfare. But these would clearly aggravate depression rather than relieve it.

A huge program of public works, on a scale comparable to the rearmament program, would give us reasonably full employment, but it would not result in an expansion of industry—which is a prerequisite of a rising standard of living. If public works were financed by borrowing, then a triple benefit would be conferred upon investors and the owners of industry: first, existing plants could operate at approximate capacity and at a high rate of profit, as they are doing now; secondly, excess savings could be profitably invested in government bonds; and, thirdly, the plant and equipment of industry could be restricted to its present capacity without causing a depression.

If we take a rising standard of living as our objective, and if we accept Mr. Strauss's analysis of the problem, then the remedy indicated is a tax on idle investment funds owned by individuals and business concerns. Society would say to capitalists: Your function is to save and to invest; if you save without investing, then workers are thrown out of employment and the economy sinks down in depression; therefore if you save you must invest. If you refuse, then society will tax away your idle funds, for which you can find no use, and put them to some good purpose.

GEORGE R. WALKER

Boston, Mass., January 14

And Progressives Must Act

Dear Sirs: I've just read Harold Strauss's Program for a Peace Economy, and I am wondering how energetically you will follow it up. I hope that publication of the article is not merely a trial balloon but a first stepping-stone toward attainment of the objectives described.

What can be done about it? Strauss says that "it is not possible to expect conservatives to support a program such as has been outlined." But, for that matter, how readily will it be accepted and implemented by non-conservatives?

Dreamily, Strauss says, "If democracy means anything, it means that the people of America can and will find a way to avoid such a collapse." There you have your modern John the Baptist, a voice crying in the wilderness. The immorality he refers to has flourished a long time. None of the three strong factors in the current scene—government, business, labor—shows any marked sign of making a new approach to the problems of modern economy. In what direction shall we look for leadership, organization, education, and implementation?

Those who agree with Strauss in principle should form a board of strategy. When we speak of democracy we are speaking of some fifty million voters and their elected representatives. Democracy is political and economic. Blocking the attainment of the progressive ideal is the stupendous inertia of political and economic habit.

The development of war politics and economics is producing a situation in which the nuclear centers of progressivism should functionally expand. First-rate observation, comprehension, analysis, vision, and the like have not been lacking. Now leadership, organization, strategy, programs, and incessant endeavor should be forthcoming.

For years I used to edit what, in the sales promotional field, we called "house organs" or "house magazines." One of our main efforts was to encourage reader response, be it ever so humble. But then, of course, we had something to sell. Possibly in the field of journalism of the liberal persuasion similar methods should be instituted.

EMORY L. KING

Ridgefield Park, N. J., January 14

Request to the Soviet Union

Dear Sirs: On December 4 two leaders of the Jewish labor movement in Poland, Henryk Ehrlich and Victor Alter, were arrested in Kuybyshev by the Soviet authorities. They had been arrested once before, in September, 1939, during the occupation of Poland by the Soviet army. On that occasion they were deported to inner Russia. They were liberated in the fall of 1941 after the signing of the first Polish-Russian agreement. This time they were arrested without any explanation, the Soviet authorities refusing to disclose the charges against them.

Alter and Ehrlich have been energetic and devoted fighters against Nazism and for democracy. Notwithstanding the suffering inflicted by the Soviet government on Poland and on them personally, they supported without reservation the policy of Soviet-Polish understanding and the formation of the Polish army in Russia. Some days before their arrest they issued the following appeal to the Poles in the Soviet Union:

> A new Polish army is being formed today to continue the fight against Hitler. We take this opportunity to appeal to every able-bodied Polish citizen in the Soviet Union.
>
> Join the ranks of soldiers who once again will enter the fight for Poland's right to independence and who, together with the other Allied armies, will free Poland and the rest of the world from intolerable brown slavery. To those of you who are unable to bear arms we appeal to do all in your power to help the army to achieve victory.
>
> Participation in the present war is a duty and an honor. In the name of the Jewish working masses and of Jewish intellectuals who have placed their confidence in us, we declare our readiness to do our part in the struggle and ask for the opportunity to do so.
>
> H. EHRLICH, W. ALTER
>
> (From Poland Fights, December 23, 1941)

In a world struggle for democracy i is not too much to ask the Soviet government to reassure the United Nation by freeing these men at once.

FRANK KINGDON

New York, January 15

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 154 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 31, 1942 NUMBER 5, PART 1

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 105

EDITORIALS

Ireland and America 107

Everybody Wins but Lewis 108

Unanimity at Any Price by Freda Kirchwey 109

ARTICLES

WPA, Alias SPAB by I. F. Stone 110

Our Debt to the Dutch by Hallett Abend 111

Why Argentina Balked by Hugo Fernández Artucio 114

In the Wind 116

A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels 117

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Mr. Davies's Revelations by Margaret Marshall 118

The "Southern Review" 119

"Discography" Unlimited by Jacques Barzun 120

Churchill, Democratic Tory by Reinhold Niebuhr 122

Records by B. H. Haggin and Evans Clark . 123

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 124

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor RICHARD H. ROVERE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

"DERELICTION OF DUTY" ON THE PART OF Admiral Husband E. Kimmel and Lieutenant General Walter C. Short has been found to be the main cause of the Pearl Harbor disaster by the President's investigating commission headed by Justice Roberts. This verdict is amply sustained in the commission's detailed and clear report. Both Admiral Kimmel and General Short received specific warnings of the possibility of a surprise Japanese air attack in early 1941, about the time they took up their commands, and were then instructed to prepare plans to meet such an attempt. Exercises based on those plans were frequently carried out last year, and had they been put into operation as the diplomatic crisis thickened in November, the Japanese raid would have been either impossible or largely ineffective. But neither of the responsible commanders considered that there was serious danger of an air attack even after receiving very urgent warnings of probable war in late November. General Short, who was primarily responsible for the defense of the islands, decided that the situation would be met by ordering "Alert No. 1," which provided for special precautions against sabotage. Messages subsequently received from the War Department seemed to him to indicate that this step satisfied the requirements of the emergency. Actually these precautions contributed to the effectiveness of the Japanese bombers since, for protection against saboteurs, grounded planes were concentrated instead of dispersed. The most amazing failure of the army and navy commanders in Hawaii was that after the warning received on November 27 they held no consultation on what action should be taken, while each assumed without further inquiry that the other was carrying out necessary precautions. This fact indicates an almost unbelievable irresponsibility. It also emphasizes the absolute necessity of unified supreme command in the defense of such a position as Hawaii.

*

THE ROBERTS COMMISSION HAS ABSOLVED Secretary Hull of all blame for the Pearl Harbor surprise, declaring that he kept the War and Navy departments fully advised of the course of his negotiations with the Japanese envoys. It seems to us, however, that the report justifies the conclusion that some indirect blame attaches to the State Department. For instance, in various instructions sent from Washington to the commanders at Hawaii great stress was laid on secrecy, with a view to avoiding provocation and preventing complications in a tense situation. This was clearly a reflection of the State Department's belief that the Japanese wouldn't bite if stroked the right way. We can now see that the one thing which might have checked the Japanese was open provocative action that would have interfered with the surprise on which their whole strategy turned. The commission comments on the completeness of the Japanese organization of espionage, which was carried on through the consulates, and points out that efforts to combat it were hindered "because, the United States being at peace with Japan, restrictions imposed prevented resort to certain methods of obtaining the contents of messages." Here again the State Department's insistence on treating Axis agents as gentlemanly diplomats entitled to all the nice courtesies of protocol tied the hands of our intelligence officers. Although the Japanese and other Axis governments constantly violated the privileges of our diplomats, even to the extent of placing microphones in their offices, the State Department would never sanction the use of such methods. This unrealistic policy in dealing with gangsters must be counted as a contributing factor to the complacency that prevailed at Hawaii.

*

AXIS FORCES STRUCK A NEW SERIES OF powerful blows last week in both the Pacific and the Mediterranean. In a surprise attack the Japanese have succeeded in effecting landings at Rabaul, capital of New Britain, in New Guinea, and on the Solomon Islands north of the Australian mainland. Further landings have been made at Balik Papan in southeastern Borneo and at Kendari in southern Celebes. The landings along the Bismark Archipelago are particularly serious because they threaten the main line of communications between the United States and the present Far Eastern war zones. It seems difficult to believe, however, that the Japanese can maintain these footholds, thousands of miles from their bases, against a determined counter-offensive. On the Singapore front the situation seems somewhat better stabilized, although new Allied withdrawals are reported. In Burma the British continue to retreat before the Japanese and Thai invaders. Only in the air and on the sea have the United Nations succeeded in scoring any real successes. Over Rangoon British and American airmen are reported to have shot down more than thirty Japanese planes in two days. New aerial reinforcements appear to have aided greatly in strengthening Singapore's defenses. In the Strait of Macasser Allied air and naval forces combined have sunk or damaged eighteen Japanese ships in what is described as the severest blow of the war. The Mediterranean presents the same picture of reverses on land but success in the air and on the sea. In a surprising counter-offensive made possible, presumably, by a diversion of Allied reinforcements to the Far East, General Rommel has pushed north of Agedabia and is threatening Bengasi. But the Allies have struck back in the air, sinking a 20,000-ton transport and damaging a number of other ships in a large Axis convoy.

*

ONLY ON THE RUSSIAN FRONT HAS THE news been unqualifiedly good. The Soviet offensive midway between Moscow and Leningrad which has resulted in the capture of Kholm and Toropetz represents one of the most brilliant tactical maneuvers of the war. As a result of this advance Rzhev, northern anchor of the Nazi winter line, has been cut off and the Russians have reached a position from which they can either strike northward toward the Baltic, threatening the German force besieging Leningrad, or south against Smolensk. The week also has seen the destruction of the powerfully fortified Mozhaisk salient, from which the Nazis hoped to launch their spring drive against Moscow. Some Soviet advances have also been reported in the Donetz basin, but details of action on this front have not been released for some time. In the Crimea the German claim to have recaptured Feodosiya would appear to be correct, although it has not been confirmed from Soviet sources. The extent of the Nazi setback in the north has raised speculation as to the effect of the defeat on Germany's plans for a spring offensive. It is evident that the Nazis have not only lost a considerable amount of equipment and supplies which they counted on for the offensive but have been forced to draw upon their reserves of troops and airplanes. But it is too early to hope for a disruption of the German spring program. That will depend on how much longer the Red Army is able to continue its drive.

*

THE PRESIDENT WILL BE CONFRONTED BY a pretty dilemma when the emasculated price-control bill reaches his desk. If he exercises the veto which it richly deserves, the Price Administrator will be left to struggle along with his present limited non-statutory powers until Congress gets around to passing a new measure. That might mean another six months' delay, and there is no guaranty that a more realistic bill would be enacted. On the other hand, if the President signs, the lofty multiple ceilings which the farm bloc has succeeded in imposing will constitute a positive encouragement to inflation. It is true that the bill has been somewhat strengthened in conference. The provisions for licensing businesses as a means of enforcement and for buying, selling, and storing commodities, which were thrown out by the House, were substantially restored by the Senate and have been agreed to by the conferees. Senator O'Mahoney's amendment which would have created a new parity formula tied directly to wage levels has been eliminated. On the other hand, the Bankhead amendment giving the Secretary of Agriculture veto powers over any ceiling fixed on unprocessed farm products remains. The net effect is to permit a rise in farm prices to 110 per cent of parity, or to the average for each crop during the decade 1919 to 1929, or to the market price on October 1 or December 1 last year, whichever of these alternatives is highest. In most cases it is expected that the formula of 110 per cent of parity will determine the ceiling. This can mean a further increase of 37 per cent in wheat, 50 per cent in corn, and almost 100 per cent in rye. If there is a new jump in the cost of living, increases in wages and industrial prices will be inevitable. Leon Henderson is being handed a blunted ax, and the only possible whetstone in sight is the rapid organization of consumers so that their voices may reach the ears of Congress.

*

THERE WAS ONCE A VINSON-TRAMMELL ACT which limited profits on arms contracts to 7 per cent of cost when the contract was negotiated and 8 per cent when competitive bidding was used. The act was repealed at the beginning of the arms program after a capital sitdown strike, but the Administration promised an excess-profits tax in its place which would prevent a new crop of war millionaires. Now we have a report by the House Naval Affairs Committee, headed by Representative Vinson, which offers evidence that a good many corporations are making "unconscionable" profits on their arms contracts. Roughly 60 per cent of all completed and uncompleted contracts studied were in the hands of ten companies, of which General Motors was one. Speaking of completed contracts, the committee declares: "The largest percentage of profits in this group was reported by Delco-Remy, Harrison Radiator, Cleveland Diesel Engine, and Fisher Body, all divisions of the General Motors Corporation, which reported profits of $3,398,487 on $17,292,685 of contracts, amounting to an average net profit of 24.5 per cent on the cost."

*

IT IS A PITY THAT THE COMMITTEE HAS weakened its report and distracted attention from its figures on business profits by including some entirely irrelevant findings about the assets of labor unions. Since September, 1939, it asserts, net assets of American labor organizations, A. F. L., C. I. O., and independent, have risen from $72,000,000 to $82,000,000. This total does not seem very impressive if compared with the earnings of some of our great corporations. But the committee declares: "The tremendous financial gains made by labor organizations present an astounding picture of concentration of wealth, a situation hitherto associated only with industry and finance." We commend Representative Joseph B. Shannon of Missouri for his courageous and intelligent protest against this strabismic attempt to smear labor and thus soften the committee's strictures against capital.

Ireland and America

IT MAY seem odd at first to some of our readers that The Nation should devote an entire supplement to Ireland at this critical moment in world history. But we are confident that this feeling will be quickly dissipated by a reading of the articles in this special number. For many decades the Irish people have looked to the United States for support in their struggle for complete independence. The story of America's assistance to the Irish cause during the dark days between 1916 and 1921 is fully described in the supplement by Suzanne La Follette. During this period no magazine rendered more effective aid than The Nation through its publication of the facts of British misrule and its organization of the American Committee of One Hundred.

At a time when Ireland's policies are of vital concern to the people of the United States, it is only fitting, then, that The Nation should undertake an examination of the background of those policies. Readers of The Nation are prepared to be sympathetic with Eire's desire to exercise full and unqualified sovereignty as an independent nation. They understand why De Valera had no choice at the outbreak of the war except to declare neutrality. But a careful reading of the supplement suggests that the situation has changed sharply with the entry of the United States into the war. De Valera himself said in 1919 that "when America entered the war it made a difference." That statement has not lost its significance with the passage of years.

It is apparent that with the division of the entire world into two camps the maintenance of an impartial neutrality has become increasingly difficult. Because of its strategic position Ireland must either aid the democracies or play Hitler's game. No middle course is open to it. If it continues to play Hitler's game by an unfavorable interpretation of neutrality, it must inevitably forfeit American sympathy and support and take its place, when the war is over, with the anti-democratic nations at the peace table.

Dark though it is, this prospect is not likely to prove decisive with De Valera. Because of his American background he is much more likely to be moved by the realization that a refusal to conclude some arrangement regarding bases endangers not only the future of the British Empire but that of the United States. Perhaps the decisive factor in inducing a change in policy will be the knowledge that thousands of American boys of Irish descent will soon be moving through the submarine-infested waters near the Irish coast. De Valera has repeatedly said that Ireland will go to any length to repay its debt to the United States. Before America's entry into the war he may have had some reservations about the consideration that would be given Eire's post-war claims in the event it supported the Allied cause. But he no longer can have any doubts. For he knows that the United States will not forget those who come to its assistance in its hour of danger.

Everybody Wins but Lewis

JOHN L. LEWIS'S sudden espousal of unity in the labor movement is, if we may slide into Lewis English, the accouplement of an unimpeachable idea with the most impeachable auspices. We have always looked forward to a merger of the Congress of Industrial Organizations and the American Federation of Labor, and it hardly requires a Gallup poll to establish the wide popularity of such a move. Theoretically unity would strengthen labor's bargaining position, would serve the war program by confronting the government with a single and coherent trade-union policy, and would be a blessing to the consumer and the rank-and-file unionist, both of whom have grown weary of the senseless intra-union squabbling that has plagued the country these past six years.

Desirable as it may be in principle, however, unity, like any other worthy objective, has a price beyond which it ceases to be profitable; it may, moreover, be attained by methods and with motives which negate in advance any possible benefits. One may concede, for example, that the unity of Europe is a noble purpose without supporting the efforts of Adolf Hitler in that direction. We do not wish to make too much of this odious comparison, but the plain fact is that a scheme for labor unity worked out by John L. Lewis and William Hutcheson is suspect from the start. The C. I. O.—which may be said to have been born, ironically, out of an "accouplement" between Lewis and Hutcheson that involved a right hook to the Hutcheson jaw—has twice repudiated its first leader: when he indorsed Wendell Willkie in the Presidential campaign of 1940, and when he tried to deliver the labor movement to the isolationists in 1941. Losing caste with many of his most ardent followers, Lewis has steadily become more irresponsible, more vengeful, more embittered. With the collapse of his power in the C. I. O., his bid for the kind of unified labor movement which he has repeatedly denounced in the past must inevitably be viewed as a shrewd but desperate maneuver to regain the throne.

Hutcheson, perhaps the most reactionary and intolerant bureaucrat in the whole labor movement, and Lewis found common political ground in the activities of the America First Committee, and even if we discount altogether the rumors of an isolationist plot we are entitled to look with the greatest misgivings on any plan to unite labor for the war effort which draws its inspiration from two stalwart heroes of that discredited band. A political interpretation of the unity move is further warranted by Lewis's gross failure to consult Philip Murray before proposing the resumption of peace negotiations. Murray, who might have been consulted as president of the C. I. O., as a member of the archaic labor peace committee by whose authority Lewis claims to have acted, or simply as a lifelong friend, has incurred the wrath of his former chief primarily because he is a warm, if critical, supporter of the Administration and its foreign policies.

If unity is a good thing in itself, it may reasonably be asked—and in fact is being asked—why a merger cannot be effected on the initiative of individuals more reliable than Lewis and Hutcheson. President Roosevelt and Philip Murray, it seems to us, have suggested the answer and provided a good alternative, acceptable to the executive councils of both labor bodies. The issue that created the C. I. O. and stimulated it to amazing growth is still present and operative—namely, the issue of industrial unionism versus craft unionism. If either side were disposed to yield all the way, it would simply dissolve and enter the rival organization. That is out of the question. If, however, there were to be a compromise, with some industries consigned to one form of organization and some to the other, it is plain that many existing unions would have to go into the discard. Aside from the principle involved, that is not a prospect that incumbent officials can be expected to relish, and the slow and painful process of working out the details would certainly be marked by such scheming, horse-trading, and generally unlovely power politics that there would be little energy or time left for the problems of war production.

In place of this sudden introduction of chaos, the President's plan calls for a three-man committee from each of the two labor bodies to consult with him on all jurisdictional disputes and on any other matters relating to labor's part in the war effort. With the degree of co-operation that has already been achieved between the two groups, this arrangement promises, at least for the present, most of the advantages of a merger with none of the confusion and bitterness which a wholesale reallocation of jurisdictions would precipitate. It is simply a case of choosing harmony without unity in preference to unity without harmony. Everybody wins but John L. Lewis.

Unanimity at Any Price

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

EVERYBODY is happy as the Rio conference disbands. Sumner Welles is profoundly gratified. Acting President Castillo rates the outcome a triumph for Argentine diplomacy. Brazil is pleased at its acrobatic success in serving both as Argentina's advocate and as the stout supporter of hemisphere solidarity. And the Nazis are happy—with good reason. Such universal satisfaction is sufficient comment on the political formula finally accepted by the powers assembled at Rio. To attain unanimity the conference surrendered to the spirit of disunion—personified in the government and representative of Argentina. To achieve some general expression of the will to resist Axis aggression the conference yielded to the one undisguised pro-Axis element in its membership.

The victory of Argentina was summed up in the qualifications imbedded in Article 3 of the agreement:

> The American republics, in accordance with the procedure established by their own laws and within the position and circumstances of each country in the actual continental conflict, recommend the rupture of their diplomatic relations with Japan, Germany, and Italy, since the first of these states has attacked and the other two have declared war on an American country.

This formula has been correctly and promptly interpreted by the Acting President of Argentina as leaving every nation free to adopt the decisions "that its special situation and circumstances counsel."

Now the comfortable attitude toward the outcome at Rio, the attitude adopted by many good and patriotic commentators, can be summed up something like this: "We didn't get all we asked for, of course, but we achieved greater understanding and established the determination of almost the whole hemisphere to stand solidly against Axis aggression. So the conference was a success in spite of certain minor concessions."

This interpretation would be permissible if the meeting just ended had been just another pan-American get-together aimed at closer relations and general understandings about ordinary international affairs. But the conference at Rio was a war conference called to plan for the defense of this hemisphere against implacable enemies with which the United States is already physically engaged. Latin America is even now one of the major battlefields of that war, as Mr. Artucio convincingly points out in his article on another page. Indeed, when Dr. Castillo assumed dictatorial powers under the cloak of a decreed state of siege, he may in effect have signed a Vichy armistice with the enemy, and the "Battle of Argentina" may have been won by the Axis.

By yielding to Argentina's demands at Rio, by allowing a pro-Axis government to write its own reservations into an agreement for hemispheric resistance to the Axis, the other powers gave up more than the substance of the one great issue before them. They solidified the control of the elements in Argentina which were responsible for its recalcitrance and encouraged their counterparts in every other Latin American state.

What would have been lost by sticking firmly to the original clear-cut terms of agreement proposed by Mexico, Colombia, and Venezuela? Argentina's representatives would either have signed, and suffered a salutary diplomatic defeat, or they would have refused to sign and found themselves isolated. If Argentina had felt itself forced to join the rest of the hemisphere in declaring clearly for a break with the Axis, the pro-Axis policy of Castillo would have been weakened by its surrender. If it had held out, the democratic forces in the country, admittedly the great majority, might have felt strong enough to oust their present rulers.

That this was perfectly clear to the men in power in Buenos Aires is evident from two revealing dispatches in the New York Times. On January 23 Arnaldo Cortesi reported from the Argentine capital that the news of the compromise formula had caused great relief. "It is clear," he said, that Señor Castillo "must be glad at having been relieved of the responsibility of standing alone against the prevalent opinion of the republics of this continent, which might have brought about some reactions of Argentine public opinion. . . . The agreement announced today seems to eliminate the danger of complications of this nature." On the next day he described the visit of the German envoy to the Argentine Foreign Office and said that the Acting Foreign Minister had assured Herr Meynen that Argentina had retained "full liberty of action." "From this reply," he went on, "it is inferred that no change in Argentine-German relations is foreseen, at least for the present."

So the unanimity achieved at so great a price at Rio has permitted the elements that forced the fatal concessions to appear before their own dissatisfied people wearing the laurels of their diplomatic triumph. Thus strengthened, they may well be able to hold on to their power and continue to help the Axis in its war against the hemisphere. And if anyone thinks that a benevolently neutral Argentina is not an important asset to the Axis in America, he has not followed Nazi methods of political warfare. A base of operations is all that is needed to subvert the best efforts of neighboring republics to stamp out their own native fascists and rid themselves of the horde of Axis agents that still infest them. Even the substantial benefits which should flow from the economic agreements reached in the last days of the conference will be partially nullified by the political success of the pro-Axis group.

WPB, Alias SPAB

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 23

THE operator at the same telephone number says "War Production Board" instead of "Office of Production Management," but one sees the same dollar-a-year faces in the corridors. On Donald M. Nelson's desk is an elaborate memorandum from Merrill C. Meigs, the dollar-a-year Hearstling from Chicago, proving that we cannot build 60,000 planes this year—or half that many. As, indeed, we cannot so long as men like Meigs hold—continue to hold—the same key positions in the arms-program setup despite successive "shake-ups," each of them little more than a rechristening. I mention Meigs only as an example, but he is worth a little attention on his own. He is top man for aircraft production, and has been since the days when they called it the National Defense Advisory Commission. He was Hearst's publisher during the Chicago strike, is an amateur pilot, and as Sidney Hillman once explained to me, he knows the aircraft people personally. Of other qualifications for this crucial post—energy, imagination, drive—none are visible in Meigs. He is not a production man and he will never be caught stepping on an aircraft manufacturer's toes. There are many more like him in WPB, alias SPAB, alias OPM, alias NDAC, and they're still there, despite Nelson's latest reorganization.

If I remember my Anthropology I, certain primitive tribes think a sick man may be saved by changing his name, thereby confusing the evil spirits on his trail. The method has now been tried out again on the arms program. More valuable time—time that means lives—is going to be lost while we slowly wake up to the fact that, as the French say, the more it changes, the more it remains the same. No organization is ever reformed by changing the man at the top or by paper recharting of its bureaus, much less by rebaptism. I'm not going to bother the reader or waste space describing the six new branches into which Nelson has divided the WPB, because I don't think they matter. Just about one month has passed since the last inner reshuffle of this kind. "Calling for a greater degree of industrial mobilization," said the press release, "the Office of Production Management today announced an organization change designed to speed up conversion of civilian industry to war-time production." The details, quite elaborate, have since gone down the drain, but for several days they were the wonder-formula of the Knudsen and Hillman offices. The details of the present rearrangement of internal bureaus will seem as inconsequential a few weeks hence. They approach nowhere near the heart of the problem.

In this umteenth shake-up the President has made the discredited Knudsen a Lieutenant General and Director of Production for the army. The actual placing of the contracts is still in the hands of the army, and my guess is that this will be no honorary post, and that the greatest single bottleneck of the arms program—the automotive genius who knew the automotive industry couldn't be converted—will be firmly planted in army procurement. At the same time, when Nelson pulled the big silk handkerchief off the big silk hat this week, it was seen that Knudsen's fair-haired boy, W. H. Harrison of A. T. and T., was to remain Director of Production in WPB as in OPM. Knudsen and Harrison, as Nelson unnecessarily explained at press conference, will work together. Now I know of no better illustration of what is wrong with the arms program than the testimony of these two men before the Tolan committee on December 22. Harrison was being questioned by Congressman Sparkman of Alabama, and the "division" referred to in the passage I am about to quote is the Division of Production.

> MR. SPARKMAN: Has your division ever made a survey of existing facilities of industry, particularly of the automobile industry, to see what convertible and idle facilities could be used for the production of tanks, airplanes, and other types of equipment?
>
> MR. HARRISON: Only in the sense that we are looking for specific items. We do then contact and discuss the problem with individual manufacturers. . . .
>
> MR. SPARKMAN: You never would be called upon, then, to make a survey that would show you the complete picture as to the convertibility of any particular industry, would you?
>
> MR. HARRISON: Well, up to the present time, sir, we have been taking the individual items and trying to place them, in cooperation with the army and the navy, in those places where it is clear that we would get the quality wanted and in the necessary time, considering, likewise, the price that is involved. But from the standpoint of taking an over-all industry and analyzing and surveying its capacity, no.

A few minutes earlier Robert K. Lamb had asked Knudsen about the methods used to spread work out to smaller business men:

> With reference to the small producer, will the procurement officer deal only with prime contracts, so that the subcontractor or small producer will have to come in as a subcontractor for an intermediate subcontractor?

MR. KNUDSEN: Yes, sir; that is right.

DR. LAMB: In other words, he [the small business man] will have to find the subcontractor?

It is the reverse of these methods which must be followed if there is to be any hope of achieving the President's huge arms goals this year. Instead of buying individual items, the government must organize industry for production; and instead of relying on the individual small business man to find himself a subcontractor of a subsubcontractor who is willing to give him a small piece of the arms job, production boards must break down the blueprint into bits and pieces and hand them out directly to small business.

From a long talk I had with Senator Truman, who understands the need for this approach to the problem, I gathered that Nelson himself was thinking in these terms. And Nelson indicated as much when he spoke of setting up a one-man boss for each industry to handle conversion. But here again, as in the WPB alias OPM itself, results cannot be obtained so long as the same type of men, dollar-a-yearlings and army-navy bureaucrats, must be relied upon to carry out the orders. Nelson is likable, intelligent, and well-intentioned, but too trusting. Thus he has handed over Floyd Odlum's subcontracting duties to Harrison, who has the big business point of view, and he picked Edsel Ford's brother-in-law, Ernest Kanzler, as one-man boss of the automobile industry. In these two moves the business-as-usual crowd won precious victories. Odlum was a failure, but he had men around him who couldn't be trusted to keep orders away from little business. His powers are in "safe" hands now. The Kanzler appointment means that the automobile industry will be able to handle conversion in its own way in its own time and eliminates the "danger" of labor participation in management. Yet the secret of reforming the arms effort lies in bringing labor and small business into full participation in the work of production boards in every area and every industry. It will not be reformed by changing one dollar-a-year man for another. Nelson hasn't even changed the dollar-a-year men.

Our Debt to the Dutch

BY HALLETT ABEND

ON FEBRUARY 2, 1940, a diplomatic conflict began between Japan and Holland which was of utmost importance to the United States. On that date Japan made its first move toward demanding special trade privileges in the Netherlands East Indies, and for more than sixteen months thereafter kept applying pressure against the Dutch authorities for greatly increased supplies of rubber, tin, and oil. The Dutch suspected that Japan wanted these vital materials to facilitate further conquest in the Far East and to reship to Germany. The Dutch said that existing economic relations could continue, that Japan could purchase as great a proportion of the products of the East Indies as it had averaged during the preceding five years. Japan was not satisfied and kept pressing for further concessions, and the Japanese press began to publish editorials about the "manifest destiny" of the empire beckoning from the south. When, last June, the pressure was relaxed and Japan met diplomatic defeat with pretended good grace, the Dutch felt certain that the next step would be war. In six months their forebodings were realized. But they had won precious time for us as well as for themselves.

The High Commands of the United States army and navy blanch now when they consider how doubly desperate the situation would be today in the Far East if the Dutch had yielded to Japan's threats in June of last year. There would have been Japanese planes on all their landing fields on December 7, and Japanese ships in all their harbors. Thousands of Japanese reservists, disguised as laborers, traders, or fishermen, would have infiltrated into the islands between June and December and would have smuggled in ammunition. British North Borneo offers an example of what would have happened on Java, for there 2,000 supposedly Japanese fishermen suddenly appeared, clad in the uniforms of military police and heavily armed. The Japanese would have been able to seize the oil wells, tin mines, and power plants before they could have been destroyed. Soerabaja would have been made useless as a base for the united navies under Admiral Thomas C. Hart, and the route from Australia to Singapore would have been closed the first week of the war.

Instead of yielding, the East Indies prepared their defenses feverishly and therefore were far from powerless when December 7 arrived. Their fleet had been at sea, prepared for war, for eight days. Within three weeks their submarines and planes sank more than a score of Japanese troop transports and destroyers off the coasts of Luzon and the Malay Peninsula.

During the period of negotiation the East Indies were in no position to fight, and it devolved upon two stout-hearted, wise, and patient men to play a masterly game. Jonkheer A. W. L. Tjarda van Starkenborgh Stachouwer, the Governor General of the Netherlands East Indies, and Dr. Hubertus Johannes van Mook were playing perilously for time against a wily, greedy, and impatient foe. Every week was precious, for every week their preparedness program advanced farther.

His Excellency Tjarda van Starkenborgh Stachouwer is descended from a long line of Dutch aristocrats, and before the war was one of the largest landowners in Holland. For generations his forefathers have held positions of trust at court, and have had in large part custody of the fortunes of the ruling house. At one time he was on the staff of the Netherlands legation at Washington, and his wife is of a wealthy Baltimore family.

H. J. van Mook, by contrast, is the son of two Amsterdam school teachers. He was born in Semarang, Java, obtained his early education in the Indies, and then studied in Holland. He began his career as an assistant in the police department of Batavia. Later he was appointed to a seat in the Volksraad, or Parliament of the East Indies, and as late as 1934 was editor of a radical bi-weekly called De Stuw. He was in the United States in 1936 as the chief delegate from the East Indies to the conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The demands which the Japanese government made upon these two men are amazing in their effrontery. Here they are, published in full for the first time: (1) the right of unrestricted immigration to the East Indies for all Japanese; (2) the concession for a cable, Japanese owned and operated, to run from the island of Yap to Batavia; (3) unrestricted fishing rights for Japanese among the islands of the Netherlands East Indies, which cover an area as large as the continental United States; (4) unrestricted rights to operate coastal shipping lines between ports of the East Indies; (5) unrestricted rights to operate air lines between the islands of the East Indies and to have branch lines to Japanese lands and possessions, also the right to acquire air fields; (6) unrestricted rights to explore the islands and to develop mineral and oil resources; (7) definite pledges to allot to Japan large percentages of East Indies exports of rubber, tin, oil, quinine, and other supplies vital in time of war, taking in payment large imports of Japanese factory products; (8) the establishment of jointly owned and managed industrial enterprises, docks, warehouses, and hydroelectric developments.

These are the terms of an arrogant conqueror. They were coupled with threats of direct action to bring about the fulfilment of Japan's "divine mission in East Asia" if they were rejected. Except that they did not include provisions for Japanese naval, military, and financial "advisers," they were strangely reminiscent of the outrageous demands which Japan made upon China in 1915 —the infamous secret Twenty-one Demands.

The situation for the Dutch was almost desperate. The collapse of their government in Holland and Britain's exposed position after Dunkirk left Batavia no alternative but to temporize. At Bandoeng, the army headquarters in Java, were 750 heavy machine-guns—but no ammunition. Near Batavia were 20 tanks. There were trained crews to operate 400 tanks, but Britain had to keep all it could make, and we were turning out almost none in 1940. The Dutch were short of rifles, had an inadequate supply of munitions, and were pleading with Washington for bombers and pursuit planes.

Late in August of 1940 Japan appointed its Minister of Commerce and Industry, I. Kobayashi, head of a special delegation to the East Indies. The mission arrived in Batavia on September 12, and except for a few economic experts, was made up of army and navy men. "Evidently they expected to move right in," the Governor General told me.

A fortnight after the Kobayashi mission reached Batavia came the formal announcement that Japan had become a full ally of Germany and Italy. When negotiations got under way, the only important demand which Kobayashi insisted should be granted immediately was for a greatly increased supply of oil and gasoline from Borneo and Sumatra.

Van Mook prepared a caustic reply declaring that the East Indies government was not running an international filling station. The Governor General toned the wording down to a polite reminder to Japan that the government owned no oil wells but permitted certain companies to produce oil under concessions. The baffled Japanese found they would have to deal with American- and British-owned producing companies, and these corporations said, with politely regretful phrases, that most of their output was already contracted for long ahead.

Kobayashi liked heavy luncheons. He liked plenty of hot rice wine with his meals. Often he would go sound asleep during the talks and even snore. Loudly. Then, he would awaken with a jerk, pound the conference table with his fist, and make outrageous and insulting threats. The Japanese delegates were often aghast. More than once they asked their Netherlands hosts to expunge records of Kobayashi's awakening remarks from the official minutes of the meetings. Outwitted and sweating, Kobayashi returned to Japan on October 22.

Kenkichi Yoshizawa, an experienced diplomat, succeeded Kobayashi. Yoshizawa started out briskly enough. Arriving at Batavia three days after Christmas, 1940, he declared he was "the last of the negotiators."

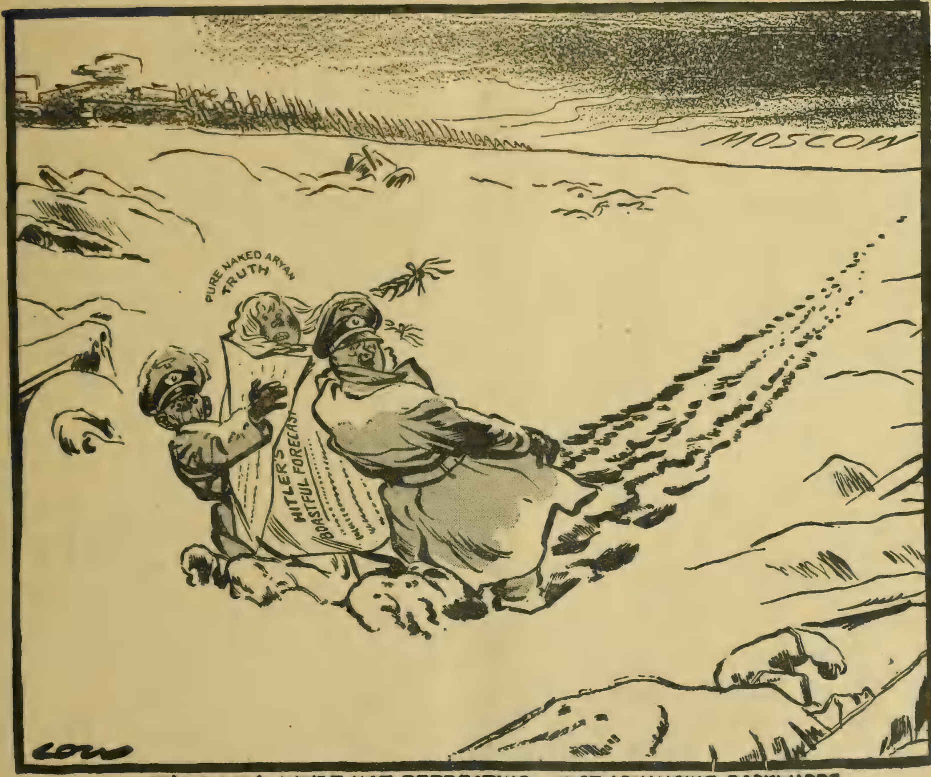
The Dutch had to keep in mind that any sharp move might precipitate a Japanese attack, and the United States and Great Britain were then in no position to give the East Indies adequate aid. So they dragged the negotiations along.

On May 22, 1941, the Japanese presented a "final" written memorandum covering their "minimum" demands. The Dutch made a "final" written reply on June 6. Then came a lull of ten days, after which Yoshizawa made a formal demand for a final personal hearing by the Governor General himself. Van Mook replied that His Excellency was not a negotiator but the ruler, by proxy, for the Queen. Finally it was agreed that this "final" meeting was to be technically between the van Mook and Yoshizawa groups, but that it would be in the presence of the Governor General.

Yoshizawa was brief, but he practically delivered an ultimatum. Van Mook also was brief—his speech was a heated and utter rejection of the Japanese demands. Then the Governor General diplomatically took up the Japanese demands and point by point rejected them.

It would not be right to hamper the development of valuable elements of the population by being too liberal in the admittance of foreign workers and foreign interests, he said. Moreover, it had become a traditional policy with the Netherlands government to show no discrimination against any friendly power, and privileges granted to one must be granted to all. The Indies had reached such a stage of domestic development that further assistance was not needed, except from the mother country. The amount of business to be done would not justify a new cable to Japan. Radio and wireless in the islands were efficient and adequate for all needs, coastal shipping was adequate, and the air lines had been "amply developed by Netherlands enterprises." As to air lines, he added, being sweetly reasonable, the Netherlands would consider proposals for reciprocal agreements—well knowing the Japanese would not permit Dutch-controlled lines to land planes on Japanese territory.

Yoshizawa was stunned. He looked around at the expressionless faces of the members of his own delegation. Then the "last negotiator" backed down. He said to the assemblage that he was sorry to have failed in a great mission for the first time in his life. He bore no ill-will, he said, and as a gesture of amity he would then and there buy 100,000 tons of the sugar the Dutch had been unable to sell. So ended the great saber-rattling bluff—in a sugar deal. To this day officials in Batavia are puzzled by Yoshizawa's backdown. His government must have approved in advance; must have had its reasons, as yet inscrutable.



IT'S A LIE! WE'RE NOT RETREATING—JUST ADVANCING BACKWARDS

"They could have conquered us with ease in 1940," said the Governor General the last time I saw him. "They thought they could come at any time and have us as dessert, after a full meal in Indo-China and Thailand. But they waited too long. Now we are ready to fight, not talk."

Allied losses in the Far Pacific have been so serious that today we distil cold comfort by recalling that Japan's victories have cost it very dear. Had the Dutch given Japan the demanded concessions in the East Indies, those victories would have been attained at less than half their subsequent cost. Such cheap victories would have greatly prolonged the war, and would have made the difficulty of our ultimate triumph much greater.

"Those funny Japanese and their funny ideas," van Mook said to me on one of my last evenings in Batavia. "They threatened us, actually told us that we must join their so-called co-prosperity sphere. Later, they said, the United States would be forced to join, and then America, Japan, and Holland would rule the world. They dismissed Britain and Germany from their calculations for the future, saying that both would be exhausted and utterly powerless after the war."

The Governor General's last words were of a different tenor. We had sat silent for a time after a long talk. Then, across the wide lawns, from the distant and dusty street came a clanking rumble to break the peace of the great palace. We rose together and walked to one of the windows. Down the road rolled a long line of field artillery, trucks, small armored cars.

"Look at that spectacle," His Excellency exclaimed. "This country's total resources and savings are being spent on guns, ships, planes, bombs, tanks. It will take a generation or more for these 70,000,000 people to amass again the wealth which we are spending now so willingly upon preparedness. And all because of Hitler's frenzy, Mussolini's vanity, and Japan's greed. We must all fight this evil thing togther, and win such a victory, regardless of the cost, that it can never occur to mankind again."

Why Argentina Balked

BY HUGO FERNANDEZ ARTUCIO

THE beautiful ideal of continental solidarity has been torn to shreds at the conference at Rio de Janeiro to the open satisfaction of the Axis powers. This sinister task has been performed by Dr. Ruiz Guiñazú, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Argentina, fervent admirer of the Franco regime in Spain and public prophet of a totalitarian victory in the present war. As this article is being written, reports from the Brazilian capital clearly indicate that the Argentine government will stubbornly adhere to the dictum laid down by the president of the delegation just before the conference began: Argentina, he said, would oppose any interpretation of continental solidarity that might entail going to war against the Axis.

The position of Acting President Castillo is no less clear-cut; after the protracted struggle of the first week of the conference it must be evident to the most optimistic or gullible that even if some compromise formula is ultimately agreed to, the present Argentine government will never whole-heartedly cooperate with the rest of the hemisphere in a vigorous anti-Nazi policy. Whatever concessions Dr. Castillo may make in words, he cannot be expected to abandon, even under the strongest pressure, a policy which is part of a continuing, calculated political plan embracing the internal organization and control of Argentina as well as its relations with its neighbors and with the Axis powers.

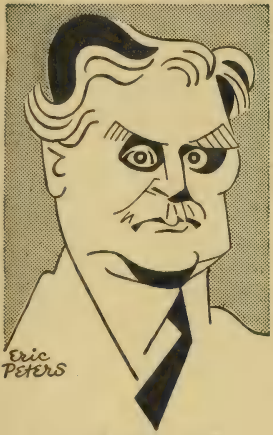
Proceeding with deliberate and systematic steps, the Acting President has gradually suppressed all those civil rights through which the majority of the people of Argentina might express their profound feeling of solidarity with the United States and the anti-Axis cause in general. First, without any constitutional authority, he dissolved the municipal council of Buenos Aires, which served as an effective instrument of the popular will. Immediately after that he suspended the guaranties for the elections of December 7, opening the way for one of the most scandalous electoral frauds ever known in the Americas. Later, when the United States was treacherously attacked by Japan, Dr. Castillo prohibited the nation-wide pro-Ally organization, Acción Argentina, from holding the more than 2,000 meetings that it had called throughout the country to express the sympathy and support of the people of Argentina for their northern neighbor. As a finishing touch, the Acting President shed his last pretense of democracy by prohibiting a unique meeting in honor of President Roosevelt, convoked not by representatives of the boisterous and agitated public but by the most conservative personalities of the democratic Argentine bourgeoisie, such men as the former Minister of Foreign Affairs, Dr. Julio A. Rocca, and the Nobel peace-prize winner, Dr. Saavedra Lamas.

It was to effect these repressions that Castillo declared the state of siege which was hypocritically justified as a measure taken to insure Argentina's strict adherence to its obligations under the Havana convention.

What brought about the present desperate situation in that country of the south whose intellectual and material development has constituted one of the miracles of this century? Foreign agents have succeeded in deeply dividing public opinion. Grave symptoms of totalitarian penetration have appeared in the military establishment of the country. Relations between capital and labor grow more tense and acrimonious day by day. The various foreign colonies which are dotted over the vast areas of the republic have developed a dangerous consciousness of being national minorities. A wave of crass materialism has spread through many sectors of the people. Men of good-will cannot find common ground on which to unite in the work of national salvation. The political situation, completing this unhappy picture, is vividly described by Américo Ghioldi, leader of the opposition in the House of Deputies, in a letter to the writer sent from Buenos Aires on January 14. Mr. Ghioldi writes:

> I now write you my impressions regarding our political situation. I cannot tell you anything encouraging about the present or the immediate future. A government which has no public support is maintaining itself in power in order to carry out within the country a frankly anti-democratic task and externally a confused and complex policy that threatens to leave Argentina completely isolated in the continent and viewed with ill-feeling by the other countries, which up to a few years ago had granted her most-favored-nation treatment. The state of siege smothers public opinion, paralyzes the press, inhibits the action of the political parties, and finally suppresses all expression of the thought and the conscience of the citizens.
>
> Since the elections of December 7 the people have fallen into a state of obvious depression due to the nausea produced by the frauds and to disappointment at the weakness and lack of action of the majority party. Acción Argentina is restrained and neutralized by the government, thanks to the weapons of coercion which the state of siege has placed in its hands. The newspapers, just as if they existed under a terror, inform us of nothing and do not even hint at the most minor detail. The political parties have been silenced. Our party is the only one that has called a national assembly of delegates to consider the internal situation of the country; but it had to be suspended on the second day of its deliberations under pressure from the police. Nevertheless, we were able to draw up and sign a manifesto which we distributed at first clandestinely and then published in La Vanguardia yesterday. This resulted in an order closing down our newspaper for a period of five days, and we must expect other sanctions in response to future acts which we may feel obliged to take. As you see, our situation could not be more unpleasant.

The existence in Argentina of a masked political plot with international ramifications was exposed at a memorable session of the Argentine Congress by Deputy Ghioldi. There have always been people in Argentina willing to create a government on the totalitarian model without recourse to the ballot box. This particular plan was drawn up by the darkest forces in Argentina—leaders of the landowning oligarchy which regained control of the government at the time of the revolution of September, 1930, led by General Uriburu. Some of these leaders would willingly avail themselves of foreign help, even if it meant the enslavement of the country, so long as they themselves could retain the power which they seized in defiance of the political wishes of the mass of the people.



Acting President Castillo

This oligarchic element controlled the destinies of the Argentine republic until the beginning of this century. Then the Conservative Party, today called the National Democratic Party, was swept out of power by democratic forces which had been tremendously strengthened by the heavy inflow of immigrants from Europe. This change opened enormous possibilities for the democratic development of Argentina. But the landowning oligarchy also owned the other principal sources of national wealth, and although it had suffered a political defeat it was far from vanquished. It had to wait fifteen years, but the hour of its revenge arrived when the second administration of Hipolito Irigoyen, the hypnotic caudillo of the Radical Party, became honeycombed with corruption and the party itself began to decay.

The wealthy landowners have controlled the government ever since, retaining power by violence, fraud, and corruption, increased or decreased from time to time as circumstances have dictated. Today this control is maintained through an alliance with the agents of foreign invasion and the most reactionary forces of Argentina—those forces which keep green the memory of the tyrant Rosas and talk a great deal about the "restoration." They use a system of propaganda that borders closely on the technique of the war of nerves. They know well the political function of fear. A great deal of what is now happening in Argentina is the result of this war of nerves. To speak perfectly plainly, those who are carrying on the war of nerves are the same men who control the government and are working to defeat democracy.

The foregoing statement can and must be applied to Acting President Castillo. On more than one occasion it has been pointed out that he either did not wish or did not know how to curb certain evident symptoms of national decomposition, and he has paid no attention to the proved facts of totalitarian penetration. The newspapers, the political parties, and the labor organizations have denounced the guilty tolerance of the executive toward the election frauds. The Acting President, however, each day moves farther away from the people.

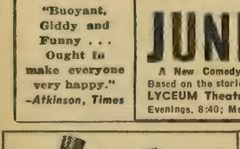
The existence of the dangers here described is unquestionable, but equally unquestionable is the existence, though so far rather vague and hidden, of a deep sentiment in favor of the restoration of those basic principles of democracy which were laid down by the founders of the Argentine nation. That sentiment, crystallized into a powerful political force, is the weapon that must be used by those who have the responsibility of defending the hemisphere.

Until now the grand strategy required for the defense of South America has been developed only in the military and economic fields. Little or nothing has been done to plan political warfare, for which the chief instrument must be public opinion freed and transformed into a fighting expression of the democratic beliefs of the people. From the body of public opinion can be drawn the militant and disciplined regulars to form "commando" squads in the army of democracy.

If this lesson had been learned in time and the Argentine people had been aided by the forces directing this great battle for democracy, yesterday in Rio de Janeiro, today in Buenos Aires, the fifth-column government of Dr. Castillo would no longer exist as the advance guard of an army of invasion against the shores of America.

"Buoyant, Giddy and Funny . . . Ought to make everyone very happy."
-Atkinson, Times

Max Gordon presents
JUNIOR MISS
A New Comedy by Jerome Chodorov and Joseph Fields
Based on the stories by Sally Benson — Directed by Moss Hart
LYCEUM Theatre, 45th St. E. of B'way. CH. 4-4256
Evenings, 8:40; Matinees, WEDNESDAY & SATURDAY, 2:40



"A PERFECT COMEDY"
—Atkinson, Times
LIFE WITH FATHER
with HOWARD LINDSAY
DOROTHY STICKNEY
EMPIRE, B'way & 40 St.—269 seats $1.10
Evgs. 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40

Theatre Guild Production
★ MARY BOLAND ★ BOBBY CLARK
★ WALTER HAMPDEN
In Sheridan's Greatest Comedy
THE RIVALS
SHUBERT Theatre, 44th St., W. of B'way. CI 6-6699
Evenings, 8:40; Matinees, Thursday & Saturday, 2:40

In the Wind

A REPRESENTATIVE from an Eastern state recently wrote to the Library of Congress asking if it could supply him information concerning the whereabouts of the underground railway that connected the North and South during the Civil War. He was, he said, planning to submit to Congress a proposal that it be shored up and used for air-raid shelters.

LEON TROTSKY'S biography of Stalin, which was withdrawn from circulation by Harper's because the firm felt it an inauspicious moment to publish such a book, has become a real collector's item. The decision not to sell the book was only made after copies had gone out to reviewers. Harper's asked all persons who had copies to return them; the few who did not comply could now get as much as $100 for their copies.

AT ITS RECENT CONVENTION the Associated Farmers, California employers' organization, was informed by its chief lobbyist that not a single one of the 426 bills which it had opposed in 1941 ever reached the Governor's desk.

FROM THE SOCIETY COLUMN of the London Daily Express: "Mrs. Bunce went to make bombs—small pretty bombs, turned and shaped by her gentle, domesticated hands."

A GROUP OF SHORT-WAVE radio listeners recently compiled some statistics on German broadcasts. They discovered among other things, that during 1941 Martin Dies, Hamilton Fish, and Gerald P. Nye led all other Americans in favorable mentions over the Berlin radio.

AUTRE TEMPS: In a recent editorial on defense production, the Daily Worker said: "The employers have a right to reasonable profits; have a right to manage their own plants; have a right to make contributions to the war program out of their own experience; have a right to press their point of view."

REPORTING ON HIS EXPENSES in running the Georgia Executive Mansion, Eugene Talmadge listed his servants as follows: "One maid, one cook, one butler, and one chauffeur, at a total cost of $50 per week."

A GERMAN REFUGEE who broadcasts anti-Axis speeches to Europe made a curious complaint against the restrictions on "enemy aliens." "I speak to Germany over the short-wave radio," he said, "but I am not allowed to own a short-wave receiving set, and so my wife is not even permitted to hear her husband talk."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

PUBLIC LIBRARY

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Too Much Travel and Talk?

THE porter jerked the mattress of my berth. We would be getting in in twenty minutes, he said. It was dark as pitch outside the window. The occasional lights did not seem to break the great natural American blackout of the winter darkness before dawn. I got up sleepy and waited in the cold corridor to get off the train as it stopped briefly in the small city. And while I waited, boys began to go by—husky, good-looking boys going before daybreak, to the diner, which would have to work hard to feed them all before their cars would be switched off on the way to the naval training station. They looked in their civilian clothes very much like the boys in khaki who on their way back from furlough had crowded the day coaches on the way South.

"The government's traveling," said the conductor. He pocketed the government transportation request which I handed to him. "We get more of this than tickets or money."

That ought to be good news to persons disturbed by the immense huddling of government on the shores of the Potomac. It should please anybody who is alarmed by the fact that if the American population had grown at the same rate as the employees in the capital, the number of Americans would today approximate eight billion. Travel means that the government is spreading out into other parts of the country, which is where government ought to be. But I've talked to this traveling government. I have been a little part of it. Like thousands of others I've traveled thousands of miles to listen to an incalculable amount of talk by people who left their work to talk. And I know I am not the only American who is beginning to wonder whether there does not exist a confusion between conferences and accomplishments which needs to be examined.

Obviously not as many conferences are held in Washington as protective secretaries at officials' doors report. Being "in conference" may be a form of protective coloration which allows a man to do a lot of work. But conferring does go on endlessly all the same, and not alone where men just have to cross the street or the hall to confer. Americans are crossing rivers and mountain ranges, states, even the continent, to confer. That some of the conferences are productive no sensible man can doubt. It is also indisputable that a lot of men busy on indispensable jobs are everywhere moving as steadily as the trains, the air lines, and the automobiles to sit in cigarette smoke and listen to men say what they have said before, time and again.

Of course, there are advantages to the transaction of business face to face. Wise decisions depend upon the meeting of many minds, and the meeting of the minds may be easier if the faces before them meet also. Long before government got big I knew about a railroad executive who did not like to commit himself on paper. They told the story about him that one morning he got a long letter. He read it, put on his hat, got on the train, rode five hundred miles. He walked into the office of his correspondent.

"No," he said. Then he turned around and made the trip back home.

I'm not suggesting that there is any such traveling now in this government, which is definitely not afraid of paper work. But a man I know who has been criticized for not doing his local defense job well told me rather pathetically that he couldn't go to a conference in Atlanta, Georgia, because in the same week he had been also called to another in Chicago, Illinois. Both may have been useful conferences. Many conferences undoubtedly are extremely useful. But I keep recalling the recent conversation of some busy men who had gathered in a hotel room after a conference. They had just listened to a morale-building address by a former Exalted Ruler of the Elks now giving part of his time to the effort for victory. There was more weariness than morale in that hotel room.

The trains are crowded. Because of lack of Pullmans some of America's soldiers traveling long distances on this continent have had to sit upright all night long in old coaches. The hotels need not worry about the tourists if they can still count on the conferences. But the tire-wear caused by talk must be reaching serious proportions. I am not proposing any rigid rationing of conferences. But it is about time that somebody in government in America began to think about the diminishing returns in terms of action from what looks like increasing travel for talk's sake.

I know the conference is a good old democratic method. But I also know that this old democracy of the United States still depends on men staying on their jobs and using their own intelligence and initiative where they are. I wonder whether, if they were told less, they wouldn't have time to do more.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Mr. Davies's Revelations

I'VE been a little dazed by the reviews of "Mission to Moscow" by Joseph E. Davies (Simon and Schuster, $3). The first one I read appeared when I had only 100 pages behind me and was already wondering whether I could possibly fight my way through the dreary thicket of Mr. Davies's prose, where hanging clauses beat about one's head, one's feet drag at every step in a tangle of second-growth clichés, social, political, and aesthetic, and no birds sing—not a single bird. I didn't see all the reviews, but all I did see made me feel as if I were reading the wrong book. They seemed to be talking about a fascinating volume of "revelations" about all those Soviet mysteries we have pondered over so long. The book I was reading was a mish-mash, unbelievably dull, of every opinion, left, right, and center, that has been expressed about Russia in the last ten years. With one important exception: on the Red Army Mr. Davies sticks to one story, that it was and is a highly efficient army. I'm delighted to give him credit for that.

For the rest, his book is a confused muddle of uncorrelated impressions which, like the Bible, might yield proof for any opinion about the matters he discusses. Take the Moscow trials. The impression has been assiduously fostered that he not only "explains" the trials but proves that Stalin's purges, as well as every other Soviet policy, have been completely justified by events. To be sure, in one of his most characteristic sentences, complete with hanging clause and an orphaned "and which," he does say that the defendants were guilty.

> Viewed objectively, however, and based upon my experience in the trial of cases and the application of the tests of credibility which past experience had afforded me, I arrived at the reluctant conclusion that the state had established its case, at least to the extent of proving the existence of a widespread conspiracy and plot among the political leaders against the Soviet government, and which under their statutes established the crimes set forth in the indictment.

But who ever doubted that the purges were the result of some sort of conspiracy against Stalin? The great question was whether that conspiracy was a fascist plot hatched in Berlin or an attempt to overthrow Stalin designed by Old Bolsheviks for Old Bolshevik reasons. Or again:

> All of these trials, purges, and liquidations, which seemed so violent at the time and shocked the world, are now quite clearly a part of a vigorous and determined effort of the Stalin government to protect itself from not only revolution from within but from attack from without.

Even Trotsky would have admitted that. And he would certainly have granted the truth of Mr. Davies's "revelation" that "Stalin's policy is that he must have peace for the development of the U. S. S. R., and to keep his own government securely in power." Mr. Davies assumes later on that the Russian generals were fifth columnists. He never proves it, for the simple reason that no one, as Mr. Davies himself makes clear, could possibly obtain any real evidence.

Joseph Barnes says that Mr. Davies's book "gives heart to embattled democrats." Did he read this complacent sentence on page 227: "The Spanish situation doesn't look so good, but it may be that Franco will settle the issue by conclusive military success speedily"? Or the astounding remarks about Germany on page 434: "The bogy that a war would entail communism in a defeated Germany and Central Europe is plain bunk. Germany would go Socialist or become a sensible military autocracy" (my italics)?

On the other hand I should be the last to deny that Mr. Davies is a firm believer in capitalist democracy. On numerous occasions he gives fervid, if illiterate, thanks that he is an American. He is even more eloquent and repetitious in stating his belief "in the instincts of human nature toward self-interest." "These are imbedded in the glandular, nervous, and physical organisms of men and are the resultant of the atavistic forces of centuries." Mr. Davies also believes that evolution is better than revolution.

Large sections of Mr. Davies's book are given over to reports on Soviet industry. But here again there are no "revelations." He asks the questions any tourist asks and gets the same answers, the same welter of statistics. But it is hardly news in 1942 that there is tremendous industrial activity in the Soviet Union. And when I came face to face with the following footnote on page 611 I thought for one happy second that Mr. Davies was satirizing his own "revelations":

> One of the significant facts connected with totalitarians which I noted in Europe is the manner in which, and the degree to which, they give attention to the youth. "As a twig is bent, so grows the tree."

To those who have not read even newspaper accounts of Soviet Russia during the past ten years, Mr. Davies's book may come as a "revelation." His silly remark about Stalin, that "a child would like to sit in his lap and a dog would sidle up to him," and his general provincial wonder at the "Soviet experiment" will endear him to those who have taken up the ridiculous line that Stalin, having come over to the Allied side, now stands exonerated of all his crimes; and that the Red Army would not be fighting the way it is if the GPU had not conducted one of the cruelest man-hunts in history.

"Viewed objectively," as Mr. Davies would say, "Mission to Moscow" is the book of an American business man-lawyer-politician whose heart is in the right place but whose mind is a wilderness of clichés, many of them contradictory. His monumental illiteracy might be dismissed as irrelevant if his writing were not so accurate a reflection of his primitive mental processes.

I am in favor of giving all aid to Russia; I yield to no one in my admiration of the exploits of the Red Army. But I do not feel compelled, therefore, to admit either that Stalin is vindicated or that Joseph E. Davies has written an important or revealing book.

The State Department ran no risk in releasing these amorphous dispatches; but one wonders why Davies's disparaging remarks about Ambassador Dodd were permitted publication. They are unpleasant and gratuitous—not because they are critical but because the basis of the criticism is never revealed.

MARGARET MARSHALL

The "Southern Review"

THE winter issue of the Southern Review, just published, is a special number devoted entirely to William Butler Yeats—a comprehensive survey of his achievement by fifteen American and English critics. The second of a series of symposiums that was initiated in 1940 by the Review's centenary issue on Hardy, it would be a remarkable editorial accomplishment at any time, and gives further evidence of the position the Southern Review has maintained since its foundation seven years ago. In that time it has become the most distinguished literary and critical quarterly in America, one of the few of its rank in our history. Thus it comes with the force of a disaster to learn that the Louisiana State University, which has generously financed the Review since its inception, has felt obliged by the war to withdraw its subsidy, and that unless unforeseen arrangements are made, the coming April issue will be the last. It is particularly depressing that one of the first casualties of the war should be the most distinguished literary journal we have, and to see that among the first things a war tends to destroy are the very possessions and institutions it is presumably being fought to save.

Perhaps the most serious problem that taxes the citizens of a civilized nation in war time is their duty to distinguish between the sacrifices that give strength and the losses that weaken the spirit and intelligence of their cause. Comforts, privileges, luxuries, and profits must inevitably be surrendered, if only because they are usually symptoms of the deficiency in moral courage and foresight that brings wars about. But when traditions and liberties—cultural, religious, educational—begin to disappear, we know that something is being damaged, perhaps permanently destroyed, which it is never easy to repair and often impossible to regain. Recent history, especially in the enemy countries, has shown only too violently what happens when these reinforcements of a people are destroyed. The foremost living authors of England—Shaw, Eliot, Wells, and their equals—have just addressed a plea to the British government to increase the supply of paper for books and magazines lest the estate of literature decline to a condition "past praying for." Horizon, an English magazine of limited circulation and appeal, has recently been saved from extinction by the paper-rationing board through the pleas of American readers. The threatened suspension of the Southern Review is expressly an occasion for Americans to come to the rescue of a national institution which has done as much for the good estate of American literature and thought during the past decade as any other single agency.

In its seven years the Review has published the most consistently distinguished literary and social criticism of its time; it has permitted its authors a scope and freedom of discussion nowhere else surpassed, and not often elsewhere apparent. Despite its association with a regional literary movement, it has printed the work of writers of many shades

"Are We Not Now One?"

"If we are not fighting this war for the children, what then are we fighting for?"
J. B. PRIESTLEY,
Chairman, British Committee

FOSTER PARENTS' PLAN FOR WAR CHILDREN

"DEAR FRIENDS:

"To divert any aid from the children in England now, would be playing into the hands of our enemies.

"For over five years our organization has been helping children suffering bombardments and Nazi aggression. Spanish, Polish, Czech, French, Belgian, Dutch and British children alike, receive loving care and a sense of security in the many children's homes established by the Foster Parents' Plan. As the war progressed in Europe, it became impossible for us to continue work in any country but England. Then we could care for children of all nations who fled to England, as well as for English children.

"Today we are faced with a new challenge. We, too, are at war. That we will be called upon to help those in our own country as a result of this conflict is true.

"Can there be any doubt in our great land we shall always be able to extend a helping hand to all in need? When we say we must help 'our own' now . . . are we not now one? One in the battle and one in extending a loving hand to the children of England. Let us now, at this moment, not forget them. It is our fortunate opportunity to extend this help.

"All eyes turn to America. Let us then have them [illegible] in a continued bond of friendship and goodwill. Will you help, please? No amount is too small.

"Sincerely yours,
"EDNA BLUE,
"Executive Chairman, American Committee."

You can help by "adopting" one of these children as your Foster Child. You will receive a photograph and history of the child just as soon as time permits, and correspondence with the child is encouraged.

The Foster Parents' Plan does not do mass relief. Each child is treated as an individual with the idea that beside food, clothing, shelter, and education the child will live in a homelike atmosphere and receive the loving care that is rightfully belongs to childhood.

PARTIAL LIST OF FOSTER PARENTS AND SPONSORS

Clifton Fadiman
Helen Hayes
Helen Keller
Archibald MacLeish
Thomas Mann
Earl of Listowell
Mrs. J. B. Priestley
Viscount Cecil of Chelwood
Eleanor Roosevelt
Russell Maguire—Honorary Chairman

FOSTER PARENTS' PLAN FOR WAR CHILDREN, INC.
55 West 42nd Street, New York City LOngacre 5-1096

A. I wish to become a Foster Parent of a War Child for one year. If possible, sex .... I will pay $15.00 a month for one year ($180.00). Payments will be made quarterly........ yearly........ monthly........ I enclose herewith my first payment $............

B. I cannot "adopt" a child but I would like to help a child by contributing $................

Name..

Address..

City............................ State............. Date.............

Registered with U. S. State Dept. No. 57. Contributions are deductible from Income Tax.

FRONT PAGE BOOKS
recently published by REYNAL & HITCHCOCK

"Important . . . Stimulating."
—FRONT PAGE, N. Y. Times Book Review

THIS AGE OF FABLE
The Political and Economic World We Live In
By Gustav Stolper

Raymond Gram Swing says: "It is of great service to have someone debunk the debunkers, and in so doing to picture the world once more in perspective, with a line drawn between reality and illusion. This Mr. Stolper has undertaken with clarity, vigor, and great persuasiveness."—The Nation.

William Henry Chamberlin says: "A distinguished achievement of the liberal spirit, the kind of lucid, temperate, yet thoroughly vigorous commentary on the state of civilization that John Locke or John Stuart Mill might have offered if they had lived in the twentieth century."—Atlantic Monthly. $3.00

"Guedalla has never been better."
—FRONT PAGE, N. Y. Times Book Review

Mr. Churchill
By Philip Guedalla

"A miraculously concise and engrossing biography. Well known for his ability to compress history into bright and flowing paragraphs, Guedalla has written a history of the man in relation to the political eras through which he has lived."—Newsweek

"Philip Guedalla, the brilliant biographer of Victoria, Gladstone and Wellington, the histrionic historian of England's greatest "Hundred Years," seems to have been cast by destiny to play the perfect biographer of Winston Churchill."—Walter Millis, N. Y. Herald Tribune "Books."

ILLUSTRATED • $3.00

"An Enthralling Book."
—John W. Vandercook

TIME WAS By Henirich Hauser

John Chamberlain calls these confessions of a Junker "A mixture of shrewd anecdote, hair-raising personal experience, fine objective reporting, and superb analysis."—N. Y. Times. $3.00 of critical and political sympathy, and it has corrected certain popular conceptions of the Southern activity in literature by placing that movement in the perspective of the larger thought of the country and by contrasting its claims with those of other elements in the national life. It has likewise, in every issue, balanced its critical departments with creative work in fiction and poetry by many of the finest talents now at work. Simply to state these services is to insist on their indispensable function. It may, in times like the present, take a special effort of mind and imagination to realize how imperative the kind of work the Southern Review has done is to the prosperity of our common intelligence, but no one who has followed the Review consistently, who has felt the sincerity and zeal of its editorship, and who has profited by the skill and intelligence of its contributors, can be in doubt of what that value is.

REYNAL & HITCHCOCK • 386 4th Ave., New York

The current Yeats number treats that poet's work and activities from many angles, by critics of the caliber of Eliot, Burke, Blackmur, Tate, Matthiessen, Knights, and Ransom, but one argument appears in almost all the essays. Yeats was a poet who, in an age of almost unprecedented violence, distraction, and instability, was able to raise to universal recognition and power the critical spirit and intellectual vision upon which the perpetuation of any nation's sanity and prosperity depends. His achievement, in an age like ours and in a country like Ireland, gave dramatic force and moral impressiveness to his labors even beyond the technical and spiritual triumphs of his art. "He was," says Eliot, "one of those few whose history is the history of their own time, who are a part of the consciousness of an age which cannot be understood without them."

The Southern Review has won its rank as a journal in which a similar consciousness has been apparent and in whose pages a comparable understanding of our time and of the crucial problems it faces in the future may be read. It is the most distinguished literary achievement to come out of the South, the most valuable contribution the Louisiana State University has made to American literature and our critical well-being. But more than a regional asset, it forms a center of intelligent thought and purpose which the country at large, and its writers, cannot afford to lose. Everyone who takes the present and the future with the seriousness they demand will hope that the officers of the university at Baton Rouge will find a way to prevent the suspension of one of the strongest evidences that remain to us of a culture that is worth the fight and sacrifices that are being made to save it.

"Discography" Unlimited

A GUIDE TO RECORDED MUSIC. By Irving Kolodin. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

IF IT'S a pig, you still have to buy it in a poke, but if it's a record, the beams of innumerable minds light up your darkness even before you have dreamed of a purchase. A man is an ass who thinks of going into a shop and using his own ears, long or short, in selecting a disc. As Oscar Levant says on the front flap of Mr. Kolodin's "Guide to Recorded Music," after reading about the six versions of Brahms's Third Symphony he knew more about the records than if he had listened to them himself. Had the book come out a little earlier, one feels, Brahms himself would have dispensed with performance: he would have read himself into a mood of self-satisfaction out of the pages of Mr. Kolodin.

I mean not the slightest disrespect to this latest work of "discography" or its author. I merely stress our growing dependence on printed repertories for the making of our musical choices. It is a case of consumer's research over hill and dale. Our music lover having retired to the country with pencil and paper, he turns first to Mr. Darrell's "Encyclopedia of Recorded Music"—an extraordinary work of erudition from which he learns, for example, that the only thing available from Liszt's "Tasso" is a phrase for the bass clarinet. Parts of the Encyclopedia are now out of date, but it remains the official guide to the musical waxworks.

Next he consults B. H. Haggin—"The Book of the Symphony," with its brilliant elucidations and criticism of favorite works, lists of alternative recordings, and celluloid ruler for measuring, and so distinguishing, codas and bridges. Also by Haggin, two editions and one supplement of "Music on Records," which initiates the listener into the pleasures of buying records and carping and quarreling about music. The reader quarrels with Mr. Haggin, Mr. Haggin quarrels with conductors and companies, the composers have apparently quarreled with those not listed, and in the head of our customer the musical life of America has begun to stir.

Then comes David Hall, who offers a more inclusive feast than Mr. Haggin, with scraps of musical history thrown in free, and the whole set off by a sauce of genuine enthusiasm. Hall will mislead you about the way records are made, and there is something suspiciously Freudian about his confusion concerning the matrix, but persons whose judgment I respect say that I undervalue the many merits of his work. So I gladly withdraw some of my former strictures, confident that ultimately the Recording Angel will do us both justice.

We now return to Mr. Kolodin and his indispensable volume. From Palestrina to Prokofieff (alliteration his), it lists all the recordings of serious music to be found in American catalogues. The author, who has long been a record sampler and whose anthology, "The Critical Composer," confirms his judgment, undertakes to gauge three things—artistic, mechanical, and economic value. Ff no longer means very loud, it means "outstanding interpretation"; asterisks keep a tinge of impropriety, for they deal with reproduction; and only the dollar sign speaks for itself as usual. The order is alphabetical, and the binding will survive the fame of most of those listed within.

When one computes the number of composers, works, performers, duplicates, and sides that Mr. Kolodin has heard or overheard, one is appalled at the magnitude of his accomplishment. Were there not moments, one wonders, such that if the Blue Danube had cropped up as a fourth movement amid the Brahms Double Concerto, Mr. Kolodin would have noticed nothing wrong, save perhaps the sequence of numbers on the label or a marked difference in volume, with "the solo violin utterly inadequate"? But no. He continues infallible through 475 pages of small print designed to spare your ears, your pocket-book, or your aesthetic sense. Only the French language can complain of him for too often neglecting its accents and genders.

Coming in early issues of THE Nation

The Reluctant Dragon

Jesse Jones, writes Dwight MacDonald, is an economic dragon of great power, who is reluctant to stir himself for anything worth while. The third most powerful man in the government, Jones rules over an economic empire larger than those of all the Sixty Families put together. How he got his power and what he does and doesn't do with it is told by a fine journalist in an exciting and revealing series of articles.

Inside the State Department

Ever since he has been Washington correspondent for The Nation, I. F. Stone has kept a vigilant eye cocked toward the State Department. He has studied its bent for appeasement and the men responsible for this trend. He believes that today it is imperative for the people of the United States to know what goes on in this least known but most important government bureau. Mr. Stone's articles, eagerly awaited by Nation readers, are scheduled to begin in a February issue.

• USE THIS CONVENIENT ORDER FORM •

THE NATION • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below.
I inclose $...........

☐ ONE YEAR $5
☐ TWO YEARS $8
☐ THREE YEARS $11

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER

☐ 13 WEEKS $1

Name...
Street...
City...
State..

Canadian and Foreign Postage—$1 a year extra 1-31-42

Much of the time Mr. Kolodin manages to be witty as well as useful, from which I infer that he had an assistant for changing all those needles. We hear about the conductor who was there "merely to give the signal for starting," the modern composer who has produced "a witless, charming work," the performer who was "given poor support by the engineers." Mr. Kolodin can be more violent, but hardly ever when he passes judgment on the music itself, for he does this very rarely. His book therefore does not compete with Haggin's or Hall's, and it fills out the grand outline of Darrell's. So modest indeed are his prefatory claims that it is almost sure he would not want Oscar Levant's abdication of his own ears to become general. The pursuit of happiness in a stuffy booth with a set of Doppelganger's Inverted Fugue for Triangle will not be prosecuted as an act in restraint of trade, and what is perhaps more important, the record owner's delight in making the best of a bad set, in squeezing music out of an old one, and in adjusting his ears to the unevenness of a third, will remain as a necessary corrective to poor recording on the one hand and the possibly over-strict advice of our experts on the other.

JACQUES BARZUN

Churchill, Democratic Tory

MR. CHURCHILL. By Phillip Guedalla. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

THE emergence of Mr. Churchill as the leader of the British people in the hour of their gravest crisis will undoubtedly become central to the drama of the history of this era. It is already quite certain that he will take a place in British history not incomparable to Lincoln's position in our history, and certainly comparable to Pitt's in his own country. Whatever may be the comparative achievements of Roosevelt and Churchill, nothing that Roosevelt can do or has done will have quite the dramatic effect of Churchill's assumption of power a few brief weeks before Dunkirk brought the mighty British Empire so close to complete disaster, and of his superb embodiment of the fortitude of the British people in this dark hour.

Of the many biographies of Churchill which are making their appearance, Guedalla's is the first, at least the first to be published here, which rises above journalism and gives us a full-length portrait of the man and some understanding of his springs of action. It is of course much too early to have a definitive portrait, not only because we lack the historical perspective but also because his own history and that of his tragic and heroic era has not yet been brought to completion. What is possible at this particular moment Guedalla has done, though the biography is hardly sufficiently critical to weigh his weaknesses as a statesman against his remarkable equipment as a commander of an embattled nation.

Many well-known facts in his history are thrown into a new or more vivid light. We are able to see how much he is the son of his father, Lord Randolph Churchill, not only in his peculiar brand of "democratic" toryism—a debt to which he alluded in his recent address before our Congress—but also in the style of his oratory, which both the father and the son partly derived from the measured prose of Gibbon. His intimate relation to Lloyd George through the long years of practically contemporaneous public service casts an interesting sidelight on his career, not widely perceived here.

Even if the climax of his career had not been made so impressive by history, the drama of his life would have engaged the interest of posterity. For here was a man who was in the British Cabinet at the age of thirty-three and First Lord of the Admiralty before he was forty; who went into eclipse after the débâcle of Gallipoli and never again achieved a fully commanding position, despite his virtuosity in Parliament, until he emerged as the leader of a nation which had disregarded his prophecies, scorned his advice, and turned for leadership to the vague and sentimental MacDonald and the unseeing and inert Baldwin. All this is told by Guedalla with a fine sense of its drama.

Churchill's greatness lies in his political realism, particularly in the field of foreign policy. He recognized the realities while his countrymen were content to sacrifice precious years to dreams of island security and of the possibility of beguiling Hitler with nice bourgeois bargains. The political realism which prompted him to proclaim solidarity with Russia on the day after Russia was invaded had long before persuaded him to insist on an alliance with Russia, against the reluctance of other Tories who would have preferred to come to terms with Hitler at the expense of Russia.

Churchill is an imperialist who proves that "class interests," or at least the economic interests of a class, need not, though they usually do, determine the politics of a class. Considerations of the pride and prestige of empire weigh more with him than the cash considerations which the man from Birmingham regarded as paramount in politics. Churchill is, in other words, no "economic man"; and that is one reason why he could comprehend the danger of a man and movement which defied the typical bourgeois calculations of his contemporaries.

Guedalla hardly emphasizes sufficiently, if at all, that Churchill's eclipse between the two wars was due not merely to his unappreciated virtues but to the defects of those virtues. He approaches domestic, particularly economic, politics with very little understanding. His eye has been centered on the international scene. And Britain was engaged in vast domestic economic readjustments between the two wars without essential help from him, despite his "democratic" toryism. Furthermore, his realism in foreign politics operates on the edge of cynicism, as is the case with most realists. The cynicism became particularly apparent in his attitude toward India. On the Indian question his present commanding position in British politics is of fateful negative consequence, preventing Britain from making an adventure in democracy demanded by all the exigencies of the present situation.

No one can deny the greatness of this man in battle. But his defects as a statesman are so obvious that one thinks of his possible contributions to the problems of post-war reconstruction, both economic and international, with apprehension. One can only hope that history will be kind both to him and to our generation by not permitting him to exploit a prestige gained in battle, and deservedly rising as high as that of any statesman in the modern world, in tasks for which he is not endowed.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

RECORDS

STOKOWSKI'S notion that a piece of music for piano is a mere sketch that is completed only when it is filled in with the sounds of an orchestra is not correct: Ravel's orchestral version of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" is effective, but Mussorgsky's original piano version of these imaginative pieces is even more so. I discovered this from a performance by Frank Sheridan a few years ago; but the effectiveness of Mussorgsky's writing is lessened by the affected phrasing and erratic tempos of Brailovsky's performance in the set (861, $4.50) now issued by Victor; and so until a better piano performance is recorded I would choose Koussevitzky's set of the Ravel version.

Artur Rubinstein's playing in Beethoven's Piano Sonata Op. 81a ("Les Adieux") (Set 858, $2.50) is sensitive and fine-sounding, but some of the phrases acquire contours a little like those which Rubinstein gives to phrases of Chopin; and with these contours lose the masculine strength that is characteristic of Beethoven. Sides 3 and 4 of my copy have noisily defective surfaces.

The usual beautiful sound of Heifetz's playing, the unusual simplicity of his phrasing, and his more moderate pace make the new Heifetz-Bay performance of the first movement of Brahms's Sonata Op. 100 (Set 856, $3) better than the older Busch-Serkin performance; but in the second movement Heifetz reverts to his normal phrasing that is one excessive swell after another, whereas Busch plays with the tranquillity that Brahms prescribes; and Busch and Serkin play with more of the grace that Brahms asks for in the third movement. If, then, I were going to acquire the work I would choose the Busch-Serkin version; but I would not acquire the work. Nor do I find Fauré's Sonata Op. 13 interesting; but if I did I would choose the appropriately—and surprisingly—suave Heifetz-Bay performance in preference to the new Elman-Mittman version (Set 859, $3.50).

The music of Dawn and the Rhine-Journey from Wagner's "Götterdämmerung" that Toscanini recorded with the New York Philharmonic in 1936 he has recorded again with the N.B.C. Symphony (Set 853, $3.50). At once, as throughout, one is struck by the increased brightness and liveness of the sounds on the new records; but in one respect the new recording is inferior to the old: with the brightness and liveness on top there is not enough body down below—something that is most noticeable in the fortissimos of the full orchestra, which do not have the depth and massiveness of those on the old records. This performance takes three sides of the set; and the remaining three give us the first recording of Toscanini's magnificent performance of the music of Siegfried's Death. I must add that while I am impressed by the performances I dislike the music. And that the fourth side of my review set—the first side of the Siegfried's Death music—wavers badly in pitch.

Music that I like—the first-act duet, the Willow Song, and the Ave Maria from Verdi's "Otello"—is beautifully sung in German by Tiana Lemnitz and Torsten Ralf with a fine orchestral accompaniment by the Berlin State Opera Orchestra under Seidler-Winkler (Set 860, $2.50). I hope that Rethberg's old record of the Willow Song and Ave Maria will be retained in the catalogue; for she sings them as beautifully, and in Italian. Sides 2 and 4 of my copy of the new set are noisily defective.

On single discs are Beethoven's "Adelaide," not one of his best achievements, but admirably sung by Bjoerling (2195, $.75); three inconsequential German Dances K. 605 of Mozart, well played by the Vienna Philharmonic under Walter (4564, $.75); and the waltz from Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Onegin," not very engaging as played by Fiedler with the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, and brashly recorded (4565, $.75).

B. H. HAGGIN

Latin American Records

AT LAST—for three weeks at least—the small but rapidly growing number of New Yorkers who enjoy authentic Latin American popular music can buy it easily and take it home with them to play on their own phonographs. And many more so far untouched will be exposed to its richness and variety. At the music booth at Macy's Latin American Fair a careful selection of records has been assembled for sale which includes characteristic songs and dances of all the leading countries to the south—music recorded in each by their own singers and performers.

For some reason—probably some absurd suspicion that it won't eventually pay out—the big record companies have done little or nothing to sell their South American wares in the United States. For example, almost all the Victor records made in Argentina, Brazil, or Chile can be bought in the United States only by importation; and the discs recorded in the northern countries of Latin America, manufactured in Camden, New Jersey, for sale in those countries, are not stocked by dealers generally in the United States and so have to be specially ordered from Camden.

But at Macy's Fair you can step up to the record counter and get an Argentine ranchera, a Bolivian bailecito, a Chilean tonada, or a sanjuanito from the Ecuadorian Sierra. And in case you don't know one from another, there are annotated lists which will give you some idea of what would interest you most.

If you want to hear the tango as it is played in Buenos Aires, I suggest "Si no me engañas corazón" on Victor 38712—sophisticated, virile, and sentimental all at once, like the Argentinians themselves. For the rhythmic melancholy of the Incan highlands of Peru get the huaiño "Achachan," Victor 30047. The cueca "Apprendan la cueca" on Victor 53013 is truly Chilean and very different—heartily jolly and noisy. Those who like their Cuban music straight rather than with the sugared synthetics of Broadway should get "Para Vigo me voy"—a conga as it is done in comparsas along the Prado—on Victor 32836. The Brazilian samba "Mama eu quero" on Decca 23131 is nostalgic of costumed carnival parades in Rio and the joropo "La Malicia llanera" on Columbia 5326 has all the lively strength of the plainsmen of Venezuela. For those who like primitive power I recommend the Panamanian tamboreras "Soy Morenita" on Victor 82928 and the Cuban son-afro "Bruca manigua" on Victor 82114—each one unlike the other. And those who have followed, or would like to follow, a mariachi band up the cobbled streets of a Mexican village will especially like "Mañanitas tapatías" on Victor 75271.

EVANS CLARK

COMPARATIVE RELIGION

SIXTY YEARS' STUDY OF ORIENTAL philosophy and comparative religion have brought together our unusual collection. Library available for study or rental at two cents a day. Open noon to 9 P. M. weekdays, Saturdays to [illegible] P. M.

NEW YORK THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY
9 East 40th Street (Room 203)

BOOK BARGAINS

Order now! U. S. A. mailing free.

Sons of the Fathers: Albert Halper..........	$ [illegible]
I Change Worlds: Anna L. Strong..........	.50
The French Yellow Book (Diplomatic)......	.50
We Saw It Happen: 13 N. Y. Times Corresp.	.50
America and the World War: Samuel M. Taylor	.50
The Strangest Places: Leonard Q. Ross........	.50
Folklore of Capitalism: Thurman Arnold......	1.00
You Can't Go Home Again: Thomas Wolfe....	1.00
Flowering of New England: Van Wyck Brooks	1.29
Out of the Night: Jan Valtin................	1.69
Must We Fight in Asia: Nathaniel Peffer.....	.79

DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR, 212 B'way, N. Y. C.

Letters to the Editors

Thomas on Bates on Russia

Dear Sirs: In your issue of January 17 Ralph Bates, writing on the subject Need We Fear Russia? has seen fit to refer to my position on Russia without stating it adequately or quite accurately and without telling his readers that his debate with me took place before America's complete involvement in war. Assuredly, therefore, I am entitled to space to make my position clear. It can best be set forth chronologically.

Beginning in August, 1939, I vigorously attacked Stalin for giving Hitler the green light which cleared the way for his aggressive campaigns in Europe. I denied that Stalin acted out of love for Hitler, but also I denied that the salvation of the U. S. S. R. against possible attack required partial alliance with Hitler. I said that in the light of Stalin's whole record, what he hoped for was a situation in which all his rivals would destroy one another; then at the right time he could step in with his fresh armies and put together a broken Europe or perhaps a broken world.

When Hitler, as usual breaking all his agreements, turned on Stalin—mark you, not Stalin on Hitler—I expressed my hope for Russian success in beating back the invader, but declared the question which of two dictators would be master over the larger part of Europe and Asia was not worth the lives of American boys. As time went on, it became more and more doubtful that Messrs. Churchill and Roosevelt, in the event of complete victory, would have the military power or the ideological strength (consider, for instance, the complete inadequacy of the Charter of the Atlantic) permanently to reorganize Europe and Asia as against the U. S. S. R. pan-Slavism, and Stalin's other army, the international Communist movement. I gave reasons why I believed that it was likely, although not absolutely certain, that after a victorious war on the part of the United Nations, both China in Asia and Germany in Europe would go Communist. In most of Europe there would be no forces that could withstand the economic and military power of Communist Russia plus Communist Germany, to say nothing of the spread of communism in other lands, which spread would be easier because, with all its totalitarian faults, communism is at least free from the monstrous doctrine of a master race.

Since the war has become an inescapable fact for us, I have acknowledged publicly the necessity which our government is under to cooperate in good faith with the great nation against which Hitler's might appears to be breaking. I have acknowledged the reasonableness of Stalin's refusal to fight two wars at one time; but I have raised publicly the double question which no one has answered—namely, to what extent is the U. S. S. R. still permitting Japan to get invaluable stores of oil from its part of the island of Sakhalin, and what possible justification can there be for continuing that trade?

I have also said that no Anglo-American military alliance which may try to ignore the U. S. S. R. and other nations can succeed in rebuilding the world. Of course I want no future war between such an alliance and Russia, but neither do I want to continue this war indefinitely only to the end that Stalin may become lord over most of Europe and Asia. Stalin's regime may be modified by events, but I am not yet persuaded that because he said, "God bless Roosevelt," the dictator of the U. S. S. R. will become a democrat or return to Christianity by Easter—not even if Mr. Roosevelt should be able to send him more tanks than seems probable. I fear that the Russian type of totalitarianism will remain a bureaucratic state capitalism, undemocratic, ruthless, and Machiavellian. The magnificent courage of the Russian people in resisting invasion does not disprove this statement.

Mr. Bates has given some vague program of hope and effort for diminishing my fears. He certainly has not removed them. To me it seems absolutely essential that he and you and all of us who believe in democracy should demand more adequate war aims than the Charter of the Atlantic, and give to the German people trustworthy assurances that if they repudiate their dictator, they will not themselves be crushed and their nation divided. As an evidence of humanity, of concern for suffering, yes, and as a matter of high statesmanship, it would also be well for the British and American governments to invite more of the good-will of the peoples of Europe by a greater and more practical interest in the problems of hunger and disease. Certainly more could be done than is being done to fight these enemies of mankind in Greece, France, and Spain, and possibly even in the occupied countries. NORMAN THOMAS

New York, January 21

The Hull-Miquelon Affair

Dear Sirs: Congratulations on your stand with regard to our State Department and its attitude in the St. Pierre-Miquelon affair. Miss Kirchwey's article in the January 3 issue of The Nation was particularly heartening, giving evidence, as it does, of an uncompromising determination to demand the long-needed purge.

It is quite evident that Mr. Hull, whether or not he is the actual source of the appeasement activities issuing from the State Department, can no longer be considered competent to occupy the high office of Secretary of State. That he has permitted inexcusable irresponsibility again and again among the subordinates in his department is reason enough for his removal. I believe that if you can establish beyond doubt just who is responsible for the undemocratic attitude of the State Department, you should do this service to the American people.

Let me say that I am not unaware of the difficulties you face in editing a completely fearless journal in this day and age. But I am sure that I can go on admiring your courage in the future, as I have in the past. All power to you!

HELEN D. CARPENTER

Portage, Wis., January 12

Dear Sirs: As a reader of The Nation and one who is in sympathy with The Nation's objectives I want to express my regret at your editorial on the St. Pierre-Miquelon affair, and to repudiate as untrue your telegram to Vice-Admiral Emile Muselier, in which you assume to speak for all loyal Americans.

I deplore much that has been done and I wish that we would take a more direct line toward Vichy and the old Marshal, but I am willing to admit that I have only partial knowledge of very delicate matters. Emotion is fine and necessary, but it should not be given free rein, especially by responsible publicists.

ERNEST M. BENEDICT

Franklinville, N. J., January 9

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 154 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 31, 1942 NUMBER 5, PART 2

"The Nation" and Ireland

BY LEWIS S. GANNETT

EAMON DE VALERA was a frequent visitor in the office of The Nation when he first came to America in 1919 to plead the cause of the Irish Republic. In those dark days of the struggling republic The Nation made its pages a forum for uncensored discussion of Ireland's wrongs.

But The Nation came closest to Ireland in 1920-21, in the darkest days of the Black and Tans, when it proposed the formation of the American Committee of One Hundred for the investigation of atrocities in Ireland. I remember well the day in 1920 when Dr. William J. M. A. Maloney came into our editorial conference, his heart aflame with a fire that inspired us all. America, he said, could force England to change its policy; but no paper in America that could command respect would dare to take the lead—except The Nation. The editors talked, voted, acted. Invitations were sent from The Nation's office to more than a hundred leading Americans to form a committee to summon witnesses from Ireland, to listen, and to report on facts.

It is interesting to look back upon the files of The Nation in that autumn of 1920 and note the names of those who dared accept. Hiram Johnson and David Walsh, then as now United States Senators, were among the first. Arthur Capper and "Old Bob" La Follette soon followed. One of the first to join was the president of the Board of Aldermen of New York City, a young man who signed his name F. H. LaGuardia. Cardinal Gibbons, Martin Conboy, Rabbi Judah L. Magnes, William Allan Neilson, and William Allen White were also among the early acceptances.

For Ireland, President de Valera assured the committee of his cooperation. In Washington the British ambassador gave his promise that no one would be denied passage to come and testify. The committee grew from 100 to 150. It elected Jane Addams, former Governor Joseph W. Folk of Missouri, Frederic C. Howe, James H. Maurer, and Senators Norris and Walsh to sit as its commission or "court." William MacDonald resigned from the staff of The Nation to serve as its secretary.

Meanwhile, Terence MacSwiney, Lord Mayor of Cork, had died in prison after the most dramatic hunger strike in history. As Oswald Garrison Villard wrote in The Nation at the time, his soul triumphed over the flesh that a free Ireland might come to pass. His sister, Mary MacSwiney, and his lovely widow, Muriel Murphy MacSwiney, were among the first to come from Ireland to testify before the "American court" which had begun its sittings in Washington. Mary MacSwiney was an orator; but Muriel MacSwiney captured the heart of America. When those two women told their story of Black and Tan devastation, America listened. So did England.

Out of the American Commission on Conditions in Ireland grew, indirectly, the Committee for Relief in Ireland, which did such magnificent work, both in direct relief and in publicizing the need for relief, in 1920-21.

You can still follow the story in the files of The Nation for those years. The Nation made history in many ways, then as later. But I doubt whether anything it has ever done was more dramatic or more immediately and evidently effective than its formation of that American court which sat in judgment upon the British course in Ireland. It was done, it is worth recalling today, under the slogan, "No War with England." The Nation pointed out that the stories of Black and Tan pogroms exacerbated Anglo-American relations, and that an impartial establishment of the facts was essential to any frank relationship.

Whether the two commissions had as much to do with the eventual peaceful settlement and with the establishment of the Free State as Patrick McCartan, first envoy of the Irish Republic to the United States, suggests in his book, "With De Valera in America," or not, I do not know; but they played their part. The record of those days, of the inspiration the Irish patriots gave the editors and readers of The Nation, and of the aid The Nation was able to give Ireland, makes it peculiarly fitting for The Nation today to bring out this special issue dealing with Ireland's problems in the Second World War.

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

America's Role in Irish Independence

BY SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE

EARLY in the summer of 1919 our national capital was treated to an elaborate and largely attended peace parade. The liberated nations were of course represented—all of the countries that had been carved out of the defeated empires by the victorious powers in accordance with their announced war aim of self-determination for small peoples.

Also represented was a small nation whose 750-year struggle for independence had been ignored by the peacemakers. Ireland, denied a hearing at the Peace Conference, had also been denied a place in the peace parade. Ireland was not free; on the contrary, it was at that time an occupied and devastated country. Obviously it had no place in a parade glorifying the liberation of oppressed nationalities by the Allied and Associated Powers. Yet there was Ireland, as persistent as Banquo's ghost, in the person of a lovely young girl wearing upon her fragile wrists the heavy chains of bondage. She stood in the back of an open car driven by a young man who had sworn to get her into the parade, permit or no permit, and did—repeatedly. At the beginning he actually managed to capture the lead. Afterward he kept the outraged marshals, aided by the police, busy driving the enslaved Eire out of the line of march, to the vast delight of the crowd. Thus he stole the show for Ireland; also the next day's headlines.

This dramatization of Ireland's unrighted wrongs originated in the mind of Katherine Hughes, a Canadian of Irish descent who was active in the Washington bureau of the Irish Progressive League. The enslaved Eire was Amelia Rossa, daughter of an American army officer. Her chariot was the automobile of John J. Noonan, a substantial Washington citizen and descendant of the Irish Nunans. And her charioteer was my younger brother, Warren J. La Follette. The whole stunt was symbolic not only of Ireland's plight but of America's attitude toward it. In 1919 the Irish propagandists were making excellent use in the United States of the material furnished them by British stupidity in Ireland; and they could count on the enthusiastic aid not only of Irish Americans but of Americans who weren't Irish at all.

Of course there had always been plenty of pro-Irish feeling in the United States. That was natural in a country with a large percentage of citizens who had either been themselves forced out of Ireland by British misrule or were descended from ancestors thus expatriated. America respected the Irish martyrs. It gave asylum to Irish refugees. This was a matter of course. But the disregard by the Peace Conference of the clearly expressed will of the Irish people, the general disappointment of the American people with the results of their crusade for democracy and their consequent revulsion against British influence, and above all their sense of decency and fair play, outraged by the continued oppression of the Irish people—all this combined to make the Irish cause more popular in the United States between the end of the war and the Anglo-Irish truce of 1921 than it had ever been before or has been since.

The Irish were in sore need of help and sympathy. Their case was desperate. From Easter Week, 1916, they had been in a state of war, without belligerent rights. And they could not hope to win, unaided, a war against the powerful British Empire. They needed support abroad—especially in the United States, to whose public opinion the British government was, for obvious reasons, peculiarly sensitive.

As one looks back upon the tragic history of that period in Anglo-Irish relations, one is struck by what a correspondent in the Freeman—which broke many a lance for Ireland—called "the real tragedy not of the struggle of right with wrong but of right with right." The British government and no doubt much of British opinion regarded the Easter Week rebellion as a treacherous stab in the back. From the point of view of British interest they were right. But from that of Irish interest they were not right at all. Oppressed peoples have always taken advantage of the moment when their oppressors were preoccupied with other wars to launch their own wars of liberation. And so you had Irish right against English right—and British official stupidity against both.

For at the beginning of the war the relations between the Irish and the British Empire seemed in a fair way to become brotherly. A Home Rule Act had been placed on the statute books which was so favorable to Southern Ireland that the Ulsterites under Sir Edward Carson were threatening civil war. It remained a dead letter; and the senseless humiliations visited by the British army upon the Irish volunteers who flocked to the empire forces added to the feeling of national outrage among the Irish people. Then came the ferocious stupidity of the British forces in suppressing the Easter Week rebellion. The uprising was small. British harshness toward its leaders, British murders of innocent people, and British attempts to cover up British crimes turned all Ireland into a Republican camp.

One of the great boons of democracy is that democratic governments cannot get away with total persecution. The persecutions in Ireland seemed frightful at the time. And they were frightful. Yet by comparison with Nazi persecution in Poland or Greece, British rule in Ireland at the height of the terror looks like a mild regime. Elections continued to take place—won in large majority by the Republicans. And a year after the Easter rebellion the British government, although still in the midst of the war, released its surviving leaders from their British prisons. The force of liberal opinion in England had to be reckoned with, and so, after the entrance of the United States into the war, did the force of American liberal opinion. For the war aims announced by Woodrow Wilson's Administration were decidedly liberal, and neither government dared make them appear too much of a mockery.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

A picture of The Nation staff taken in December, 1920, shortly after Muriel MacSwiney, widow of Terence MacSwiney, and Mary MacSwiney, his sister, arrived in this country to testify before the American Commission on Conditions in Ireland. Mrs. MacSwiney is to the left and Miss MacSwiney to the right of Oswald Garrison Villard, directly behind the desk.

It was in the uncertain atmosphere created by liberal war aims and illiberal persecution of thought that the Irish contenders for American public opinion had to press their claims against a government which had the immense advantage of being an ally of the United States. British influence was in the ascendancy, and to oppose it was considered almost as grave an offense as to oppose the American government. Yet even during this period the shrewd propaganda of Ireland's American supporters twice defeated British moves to conscript Irish citizens.

It was after the war, however, that the Irish movement in America really got into its stride. On December 14, 1918, the Republicans won two-thirds of the seats in the Irish elections to the British Parliament. The Sinn Fein had waged the campaign on the issue of separation from England; consequently Patrick McCartan, envoy in America of the "Provisional Irish Government," took the position that the election had established the republic. He proclaimed the republic to citizens of Ireland resident in the United States and Canada; he proclaimed it to the American government and the diplomatic representatives of foreign countries. And since the envoy of a provisional government is above all a propagandist, he saw to it that copies of these proclamations reached the American press, which gave them sensational and nation-wide publicity. The cause of Ireland was beginning to go spectacularly well in the United States.

It continued to prosper. On January 21, 1919, the representatives of Sinn Fein met in Dublin as the Dail Eireann, proclaimed the independent Irish Republic, and called for its recognition. They appointed Eamon de Valera, Arthur Griffith, and Count George Noble Plunkett to present Ireland's claim to independence at the Peace Conference. In America an Irish Race Convention at Philadelphia appointed representatives to press the Irish claim before the conference, and to the astonishment of the Irish-American leaders subscribed a victory fund of more than a million and a half dollars to finance the Irish cause. On March 4, 1919, the House of Representatives passed a resolution expressing the hope that the Peace Conference would consider the claim of Ireland to self-determination. On June 19 the Senate passed a resolution requesting the American envoys to the Peace Conference to attempt to secure a hearing for the Irish delegation. The American people, through their representatives in Congress, had officially recognized the justice of the Irish claim to freedom and self-government.

But the will of the American people went unheeded by their President. Mr. Wilson had agreed with the other members of the Big Four—Lloyd George, Clemenceau, and Orlando—that no claim should be brought before them except by unanimous consent. This agreement of course ruled out Ireland. There are those who contend that Mr. Wilson's complaisance in this matter was dictated less by love of England than by fear that the British government might discover among the Central American republics some claim to consideration equally valid with that of Ireland. Whatever the reason for it, his failure to comply with the request of Congress increased the uneasiness of the American people about the labors of Versailles, for to a great many of them the case of Ireland had become the touchstone of British and American official sincerity.

Their uneasiness was not diminished by the report on Ireland issued by two members of the Irish-American delegation to Versailles, Frank P. Walsh and Edward F. Dunne. It had a strange origin. Finding that it could get nowhere with the British at Versailles, the Irish-American delegation asked for and obtained British diplomatic passports for a visit to Ireland. Whether these passports were granted through British magnanimity or British stupidity seems never to have been determined. In either case, the situation which the delegates were enabled to investigate was appalling. Their report setting forth the facts succeeded in infuriating British opinion, outraging American opinion, and annoying Mr. Wilson very much. It was at this auspicious moment that Eamon de Valera arrived in America as a stowaway and declared himself to be the President of the Irish Republic.

Mr. de Valera had many claims to American interest. First, he had been born here. Second, he had been a leader of the Easter Week rebellion and had been condemned to death with the other leaders. He had been in an English jail and had been rescued by two loyal comrades. Last and most important, he was the leader of the Dail Eireann, chosen by it to be president of the republic which the justice of the Irish cause, the excellence of Irish propaganda, and the stubbornness of the British and American governments had made extremely popular in America. His tour of this country became a triumphal progress. That part of American sentiment which was veering away from Wilson fastened on the young Irish President as a symbol of its disillusionment. Legislatures passed resolutions calling for recognition of the Irish Republic; citizens signed petitions to the same purpose; and the American public bought some $15,000,000 of its bonds.

One cannot say whether or not all this enthusiasm might have led to recognition of the Irish Republic by Congressional action. For a split among the Irish leaders in America prevented them from taking full advantage of American friendship for the Irish people. Basically this split, whose merits I do not feel qualified to judge, arose from a difference of opinion on the question whether the Irish Republic did or did not exist. On the one side was the most prominent of the Irish-American leaders, Judge Cohalan of New York, who held that the republic did not exist. On the other side was the republic's envoy to America, Patrick McCartan, who emphatically held that it did exist. Each, of course, represented an aspect of Irish sentiment in America, although the line was not very clear because Judge Cohalan had a way of suddenly pleading for the republic at meetings. And somewhere in the middle, it would appear, was President de Valera.

This internecine warfare, which for a long time was kept behind the scenes, finally culminated in a deadly feud between De Valera and Cohalan, in the course of which both went to the Chicago convention of the Republican Party in June, 1920, where they seem to have fought, like the two magpies on the garden rail, until nothing was left of either of them. When the Republican platform appeared, it contained no reference to Ireland or the Irish Republic.

Whether or not it was this bitter struggle among the Irish leaders in America which caused the British government to resume the terror in Ireland, certain it is that the terror was resumed. The British government had suppressed the Dail Eireann on September 15, 1919. On March 20, 1920, Thomas MacCurtain, Lord Mayor of Cork, was murdered by English soldiers. Other murders followed. From London came dispatches to the effect that the Irish were planning another Easter Week insurrection, and that the British army and navy were moving in to handle it. The era of the Black and Tans was beginning.

If the dispatches about these British preparations were intended to prepare American sentiment to condone British violence against the Irish people, they were frustrated by the action of Dr. William J. M. A. Maloney, who organized and directed the picketing of the British embassy by American women. Dr. Maloney had intended this action to be in the interest of recognition, and in preparation for it he had persuaded Albert Jay Nock, editor of the Freeman, to write an editorial taking the position that Congress, by its resolutions addressed to the Peace Conference, had already recognized the Irish Republic. The Freeman suggested that "in the event of further military atrocities in Ireland, the Congress could denounce, and should promptly denounce, our existing commercial treaties with England, precisely as our treaties with Russia were denounced in 1911 on account of discrimination against the Jews." Dr. Maloney's pickets distributed broadsheets calling upon Congress to stop the atrocities in Ireland by abrogating the treaties with Great Britain. The pickets were arrested; Secretary Colby expressed the government's chagrin; the pickets came out with banners quoting some remarks of Mr. Colby's in 1916 condemning the English for the Easter Week executions; Mr. Colby sued for peace. There was no Irish insurrection put down by British arms during Easter Week, 1920.

But the terror did not cease. Terence MacSwiney, Lord Mayor of Cork, was arrested on August 12 and refused to recognize the British authority. On October 25 his long hunger strike ended in death in a London jail. He had become one of the long list of Irish martyrs, and the most famous of all, revered by a world which had watched incredulous through the long weeks of his martyrdom. Meanwhile The Nation had formed its Committee of One Hundred, and that committee had formed the commission which took evidence in Washington on the atrocities perpetrated in Ireland by British troops.

The commission's report was a terrible indictment of British misrule. It aroused in England the wrath of the liberals and labor, who had always opposed the course of oppression in Ireland; and the pressure of British opinion at last forced the British government to seek a settlement of Anglo-Irish differences. With the nature of that settlement and its consequences the American people of course had nothing to do. Their last great demonstration of sympathy with the Irish cause was the contribution of more than $5,000,000 for Irish relief. The campaign for this fund was indorsed by President Harding, a fact which did not lessen the annoyance of the British ambassador, Sir Auckland Geddes. Ireland, Sir Auckland maintained, was the most prosperous part of the British Empire and in no need of relief. Whereupon liberal opinion in America began to suggest that it would be just as well if Sir Auckland were recalled.

The fight for American favor was one of the last and most bitterly contested struggles between the British and rebel Ireland. The Irish won, and the wounds they inflicted on British prestige have never healed entirely. One may see their effect in the hatred which has blinded so many Americans not only to the heroism of the British people in their struggle against Nazi Germany but even to American self-interest in that struggle. Thus are the sins of government visited upon the governed. And thus do impressions created in the popular mind by a given set of conditions become stereotypes which persist long after those conditions have ceased to exist.

Ireland Will Respond

BY GEORGE W. NORRIS

FOR many years I have watched Ireland's struggle for independence with great sympathy. Twenty years ago I was associated in a small way with the campaign carried on by The Nation which succeeded in bringing the suffering of Irish patriots to the attention of the people of the United States. The response of the American public to these disclosures played a part, I believe, in the final realization of the Irish dream of freedom.

In saying this, of course, I do not mean to detract in any sense from the magnificent personal achievements of Ireland's present Prime Minister, Eamon de Valera. Few men of this generation have provided more devoted leadership to their country. His patient, persistent, effective efforts will always stand as an inspiration for those who believe, as I do, that fundamental reforms can best be achieved by peaceful and lawful methods.

Today that belief—which is the foundation-stone of democracy—is being challenged as never before in recent history. A victory for Hitler would not only wipe out the results of a lifetime of work for Irish independence but would destroy the very basis upon which that independence has been built. It is not my place to say what Irish policy should be in this crisis. No one sympathizes more than I with Eire's desire to remain out of the war. But in view of its long record of passionate devotion to freedom, I have no doubt that, rather than see tyranny triumph, Ireland will render such assistance as is necessary to the United States and the other countries fighting aggression.

CONTENTS

THE NATION AND IRELAND
by Lewis S. Gannett 125

AMERICA'S ROLE IN IRISH INDEPENDENCE
by Suzanne La Follette 126

IRELAND WILL RESPOND
by George W. Norris 129

DE VALERA, EMANCIPATOR
by Margaret Marshall 130

WILL HITLER TAKE IRELAND?
by William L. Shirer 132

IRELAND'S STRATEGIC POSITION
by Donald W. Mitchell 134

IRELAND'S DILEMMA
by Maxwell S. Stewart 137

DE VALERA'S NEUTRALITY
by William J. M. A. Maloney 141

EIRE'S SEARCH FOR SELF-SUFFICIENCY
by Keith Hutchison 145

CONTRIBUTORS 148
Drawings by Dolbin, John Groth, and Low.

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor RICHARD H. ROVERE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

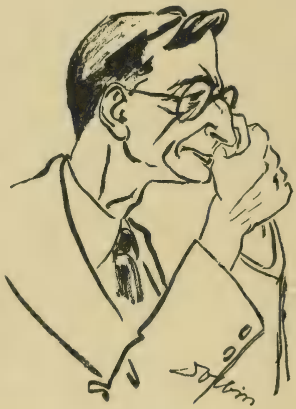
Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Eamon de Valera, Emancipator

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

IF THERE had been no United States, there would never have been an Irish Republic." This statement is taken from a speech delivered at Birmingham, Alabama, in 1920 by Eamon de Valera in the course of his country-wide campaign to arouse support for the Irish Nationalists and to obtain recognition of Ireland's independence by the United States.



Eamon de Valera

It might almost be said, likewise, that if there had been no United States there would never have been an Eamon de Valera, for the present Prime Minister and real head of Eire was born in New York City in 1882, of a Spanish father and an Irish mother. When Eamon, christened Edward, was two, his father died, and the child went to live with an uncle at Bruree, County Limerick. His ties with the United States were not broken—his mother, who remarried, lived in this country until her death in 1932—but they must have seemed tenuous to one who had left it at so early an age. In 1916, however, when De Valera was thirty-four, his link with the United States became vital in the most literal sense of the word. For De Valera not only owes his life to America in the elementary sense of having been born here, but when, with other leaders of the Easter rebellion he was sentenced to death by the British government, the fact that he could claim American citizenship played a decisive part in saving him from execution. And this circumstance, in turn, thrust him into the position of leadership which he has maintained, with only one major interruption, to this day. He was the only commander in the Easter rebellion who escaped execution; he was also the last commander to surrender in that dramatic and desperate fight. It was inevitable that his fellow Irish prisoners, first in Dartmoor and then in Lewes, should look to him for direction. Thus leadership devolved upon him primarily by reason of a seniority resulting from his connection with America; he retained it by force of circumstance and character.

Up to the time of the Easter rebellion, and indeed until his imprisonment in Dartmoor and Lewes, De Valera had been a minor figure in the Irish struggle. As a youth he had been primarily a student, a winner of prizes and scholarships—though he had also taken an active part in school athletics. He began his adult life as a teacher of mathematics and physics at Rockwell College. He became interested in the Irish language, but there is no record of any driving political interest, and up to 1914 he was completely unknown to the general public even in Dublin. When Patrick Pearse organized the Irish Volunteers, De Valera joined them and became a junior officer. He was not, however, a member of the secret society, the Irish Republican Brotherhood, which was the dynamo of Irish nationalism, although he was counted among the "unsuspectables" who served as an innocent front for the I. R. B. When John Redmond committed Ireland to the British side in the First World War, De Valera was a member of the minority of the Irish Volunteers who refused to follow Redmond. The majority, some 160,000, were drawn off, many of them to death in France; the minority of about 12,000 remained to carry on the fight for Irish independence. Even then, he was not included in the inner councils of the I. R. B., which was preparing for an insurrection. De Valera, writes his biographer Denis Gwynn, "was opposed to the insurrection, as most people were, but when the final orders came, he obeyed orders and fought through the whole week." At the end he is said to have remarked, "If only the people had come out with knives and forks."

De Valera's sentence had been commuted from death to penal servitude for life, but he and his companions were released some months later in one of the British moves toward conciliation which alternated so crazily through the years with the British essays in brutal suppression. He returned to Dublin and was immediately elected president of the Sinn Fein; he was also made president of the Irish Volunteers. He was, in a word, the acknowledged leader of the fight for independence. Up to then he had been only a name. Now, for the first time, he became known to the Irish public. He was put forward as a candidate for East Clare in the parliamentary election and won by a large majority. The threat of conscription had given new strength to the Sinn Fein; thousands had joined the Irish Republican Army. As a result of this election, conscription was not attempted. It became an issue again in the spring of 1918 when the German army broke through the Allied lines. It was never applied in Southern Ireland, but in May, 1918, De Valera and other leaders were again in jail, this time for the duration of the war, as a result of the outbreak of violence which the new threat of conscription had let loose.

In the parliamentary elections of December, 1918, the Sinn Fein, campaigning on the issue of Irish independence, won 69 out of 106 seats. Thirty-six of its candidates, including De Valera, were in prison. Those who were at liberty refused to take the seats to which they had been elected. Instead, twenty-seven of them met in Dublin as the Irish Dail Eireann. They adopted a declaration of independence, established the Republic of Ireland, and chose De Valera president of the executive council.

In February, 1919, De Valera escaped from Lincoln Gaol, the story of his delivery being one of the more sensational episodes in the long history of prison breaks. After remaining hidden in England for a while, he was smuggled into Ireland in time to attend the secret meetings of the Dail which preceded its first public session on April 10. As chairman of the Dail, De Valera set up a Cabinet. By this time the hopes of the Sinn Fein had centered on the Peace Conference in Paris, where they counted upon Woodrow Wilson, champion of small nations and representative of the largest body of Irishmen in the world—the 20,000,000 Americans of Irish descent—to aid their cause. In Lincoln Gaol De Valera too had decided that Ireland's hopes lay in Versailles—and in America. He had determined, moreover, to go to America himself.

His colleagues in Dublin disapproved of his plan, but his obstinacy, as one biographer puts it, "was always inflexible," and he had his way. The difficulties were enormous. There was no hope of a passport; De Valera was almost impossible to disguise. But the difficulties were overcome; he was smuggled first to Liverpool and then on board a ship bound for America. And in June, 1919, the stowaway arrived in New York City, to be miraculously produced when the campaign to obtain United States recognition for Ireland's independence was at its height.

For eighteen months De Valera spoke before huge audiences from one end of the country to the other and was interviewed by the press wherever he went. The details of the American campaign, many of them fantastic, may be found in Patrick McCartan's book, "With De Valera in America." Suffice to say that the Irish issue became an American issue, deeply entangled with the fight over the League of Nations, with the Irish throwing their weight against American participation once they had lost their own fight for recognition at the Peace Conference.

De Valera's office in Dublin is graced by a statue of Lincoln; a copy of the American Declaration of Independence hangs on its walls. And with the entrance of America into the war, his relationship to this country once more takes on importance. Only this time it is America which expects help from De Valera. Americans understand why many Irishmen hate Great Britain because De Valera and the Friends of Irish Freedom, greatly assisted by the Black and Tans, gave them a thorough education along those lines in 1919 and 1920. They understand, too, why Ireland, which is defenseless against air attack, has clung to neutrality. But they know that Ireland's position in the Battle of the Atlantic may decide the outcome of the larger battle in which the Nazis are striking for the control of the world, with America as their strongest opponent; and that De Valera's life work, an independent Irish republic, is one of the stakes.

De Valera's Farewell to America

"Land of the free and home of the brave, Farewell! May you ever remain as I have known you, land of the generous-hearted and the kindly. May you stand through time as they would have you who love you—Liberty's chosen champion; and oh, may you never know yourself the agony of a foreign master's lash.

I came to you on a holy mission, a mission of Freedom; I return to my people who sent me, not indeed, as I had dreamed it, with the mission accomplished, but, withal, a message that will cheer in the dark days that have come upon them, and that will inspire the acceptance of such sacrifices as must yet be made.

So farewell—young, fortunate, mighty land; no wish that I can express can measure the depth of my esteem for you or my desire for your welfare and glory. And farewell the many dear friends I have made and the tens of thousands who, for the reason that I was the representative of a noble nation and a storied, appealing cause, gave me honors they denied to princes—you will not need to be assured that Ireland will not forget and that Ireland will not be ungrateful." (Released in New York City on January 3, 1921.)

Will Hitler Take Ireland?

BY WILLIAM L. SHIRER

ABOUT the time the last ill-equipped British troops were fleeing pell-mell from Aandalsnes and Namsos to make Hitler's conquest of Norway complete, and the thoughts of Nazis in Berlin had turned to the next step—invasion of the Lowlands—I had a talk with a German naval officer attached to the High Command.

He was puzzled. He could not understand the British, he said. He could not understand their unbelievable timidity in the Norwegian campaign. In the other war he had been a submarine captain. Like all German naval officers in that war he had come to have a great respect for the British navy and, indeed, for British character. "But in Norway," he kept saying, "I do not understand them. Is it true, as the Führer thinks, that the British have lost their greatness, their aggressiveness?"

The lack of aggressiveness, it was plain, stumped him. Our talk turned to Ireland. Through his submarine periscope he had often gazed on Ireland's green hills, and he liked them. But he did not like, he said, the little boats that used to pop out from the Irish ports and shake him with their depth bombs, or the planes that came out from the Irish landing fields or seaplane bases and made it dangerous to come up even to periscope level during the daylight hours. Suddenly he grew excited.

"Can you tell me," he shouted, "why the British haven't moved into Eire, or at least into their old bases there?"

I tried to say something about Eire being a free and sovereign nation and at peace with Britain, but he just stared at me in complete incomprehension. Now for the first time in that shocking spring of 1940 I realized that I was sputtering hollow words out of another world—a dead one, if our side would only realize it.

"Why don't they take those Irish bases?" he interrupted. "Or is that imbecile Ribbentrop right about the British?" I didn't know the answer. All I knew was that my naval officer and every other officer under Hitler would have had those Irish bases long before if they had been in Britain's position, and that the only man in town who didn't realize it was the Irish minister. We had other things to think about within a few days. Hitler invaded Holland and Belgium, to which he had given even more binding guaranties of non-aggression than he had given Eamon de Valera's nation.

That fall, after the Netherlands and Belgium and France had been pulverized, I had another talk with the naval officer. We had both been up on the Channel to watch the Battle of Britain. The Germans had lost it, and he knew it. He was a bit subdued. But his mind was full of something else by this time. Like all German naval officers he was now concentrating on another phase of the war—the Battle of the Atlantic. Our talk turned to Eire. He still could not understand why the British had not seized the Irish bases. But he was not so explosive about it this time. He was just relieved. New tactics were being employed by the High Command in its counter-blockade against Britain. Submarines and long-distance bombers from bases in Brittany were slipping out past southern Eire. Their coordination was good. And northwest of Ireland they were beginning to bag droves of British ships. The strategical position of Ireland had changed somewhat since our last talk. As a matter of fact, said the officer, Eire had become a key position in the two great battles that, as he thought then, lay ahead—the Battle of the Atlantic and the new Battle of Britain. His ideas were not startling. They seemed obvious—and still do—to any schoolboy. They may be summed up as follows:

That part of the German naval and air forces charged with blockading Britain had gained an enormous advantage by the occupation of the naval and air bases of western and northwestern France. No more long and hazardous trips for the U-boats from Wilhelmshaven or Emden up through the North Sea and around the Shetland Islands and Scotland—a course a thousand miles long—before the submarines could even get to the Atlantic sea lanes. Now a short run of four or five hundred miles from Brest put the submersibles west of Ireland. And the new long-range Focke-Wulf bombers operating from the tip of the Brittany peninsula made perfect spotters for German submarines, which were now operating in packs instead of singly as in the last war. There was only one danger. British fighter planes operating from southwestern Eire could play havoc with the German bombers coming out from behind Brest. British patrol planes based on southern Ireland could make it nasty for the U-boats. British destroyers and other small anti-submarine craft from nearby Irish bases could make it worse than nasty. But the Germans didn't have to worry about that now. Strange as it seemed, the British had not occupied the Irish bases even after Brest and Lorient and Bordeaux fell. De Valera appeared firm in resisting British pressure. And if he ever began to weaken, the Luftwaffe could toss a few bombs on Eire as just a little reminder of what could happen were he to weaken further. This reminder technique was later carried out.

So much for the Battle of the Atlantic. As to the Battle of Britain, the officer merely confirmed what one had heard among German officers up on the Channel during the air battles for Britain. Even if the first attempt to land troops on England failed, or went slowly, the seizure of Eire would be a fairly easy matter. Parachute troops would take the key points. And even though shipping losses at first would be great, enough ships could get through to bring the small number of tanks, guns, and oil necessary to establish a firm foothold. And when this was done, it might not even be necessary to invade England. For once Ireland was captured, the United Kingdom would be shut off from America. It was already shut off from the Continent. It could be forced into surrender within a short time, if only from starvation. I can't guarantee that this was exactly what was in the mind of Hitler and his field marshals. But certainly this general idea was expressed by numerous army and navy officers as early as August, 1940.

Why didn't Hitler carry it out, then? Why didn't he strike at Eire? There are at least three reasons. The failure of the Luftwaffe to gain air superiority over the British Isles in the Battle of Britain forced him to postpone the entire invasion project. That failure also convinced him that it would be folly to risk his entire air force against Britain as long as Russia had a powerful one in his rear. The second reason was Hitler's realization that a neutral, independent Eire gave him great advantages in the Battle of the Atlantic. The third was his conviction that an attack on Ireland would bring the United States into the war.

As the winter of 1940-41 progressed, Hitler's reasoning seemed to be more and more justified by the facts. Allied shipping losses rose to staggering heights. The combination of U-boats and long-range planes operating from French bases and making their way uninterrupted around southern and western Eire to the killing grounds west of Ireland threatened to become more successful than even Admiral von Tirpitz's all-out submarine campaign which almost brought Britain to her knees in 1917.

As for the last point—bringing the United States into the war—Hitler wanted to postpone this as long as possible, or at least until he could talk Japan into taking us on in the Pacific. Until he was ready to invade Britain it would be foolish to provoke America over Ireland. Moreover, Hitler knew that influential sections of the Irish-American population of the United States were among the strongest elements working to keep America out of the war. As long as he refrained from an attack on Ireland they would give him valuable—if unconscious—aid. And in the meantime his very threat of an eventual attack on Ireland kept at least one full motorized British division immobilized in Northern Ireland, a division he knew was badly needed in Egypt.

Who's Next?

It is said in Dublin that the present government of Eire fears that the granting of bases to the Allies would precipitate a German attack. This is certainly true. Dublin and Cork and the other cities would be immediately bombed by the Luftwaffe. Irishmen would be killed. But tragic as that would be, it is not the point. Mr. de Valera's refusal to grant bases to the Allies will not save his country from attack by Hitler in the end, any more than Norway's or Holland's or Belgium's strict neutrality saved them from attack when Hitler found it expedient to smash them. The Nazis will not have the qualms which the British have had about Eire. And once the Nazis are in Dublin, Irish freedom and independence, which were won so late and after so much sacrifice, will be snuffed out. The Nazis tell the Irish a different story, but even Dublin can have no illusions as to this.

One night in Berlin I heard the German radio broadcast a play based on the life of Sir Roger Casement. At the end of his trial, in June, 1916, after he had been sentenced to death for high treason, Casement made a speech which will live as long as the English language. The Nazis, I thought, rather bungled it, but their version recalled to me one of the many noble utterances in that speech as I had read it years before. "Ireland," Sir Roger said, "has outlived the failure of all her hopes."

I thought of it again the other day (January 12) when Mr. de Valera was moved to remark: "We will avoid war, please God, unless we are attacked."

It is a noble hope, like so many others that Ireland has had, but in this Hitlerian world it seems doomed to failure. And to cling to it to the extent of permitting a Nazi victory would result in the failure of the greatest Irish hope of all, the one that became a great reality—Irish liberty and independence. That failure Ireland might never outlive.

Ireland's Strategic Position

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE great Napoleon, surveying the mistakes of his career from the vantage of St. Helena, regretfully concluded, "Had I gone to Ireland instead of to Egypt, the empire of England was at an end."

Few other statesmen—until in our time Winston Churchill—have had the constructive imagination and astuteness to appreciate Ireland's importance. Lying only a few miles west of the larger island, it has always seemed more an appanage of England than a separate entity. Yet any map reveals Ireland's vital strategic position in relation to British communications. About three-fourths of Britain's food and much of the raw material of its industry are produced abroad, and the ships that bring these supplies, as they approach England, converge in the seas directly west of Ireland into a bottleneck only a few hundred miles wide. Any menace to shipping at this point would cut the British life line.

Today the importance of Ireland to the defense of England is even greater than in Napoleon's time. Then invasion by sea alone was practical, and enemy commerce could be attacked only from the sea. Today the Germans have proved in Crete and Norway that aerial invasions from nearby bases are entirely feasible, and the U-boat and bomber have greatly increased the threat to commerce.

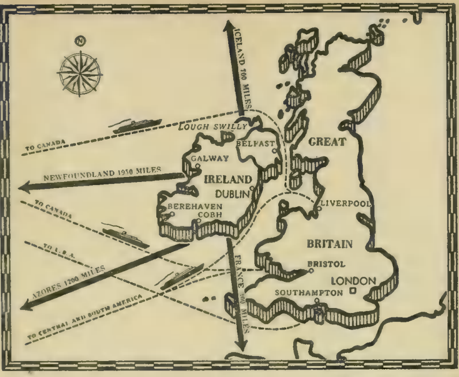
In the First World War Great Britain stood so near defeat that Germany actually set November, 1917, as the date when sinkings of a million tons a month would bring about British surrender. That this result did not follow was not Germany's fault. Under the urgings of America's Vice-Admiral Sims, the British Admiralty finally permitted a trial of convoys, sailing under escort from the bases of western Ireland. With the convoy system in force, losses declined 90 per cent at once, and the menace of the submarine was removed. In all wars the side operating closest to its bases has an important advantage. The adoption of convoys based on Ireland gave this advantage to the Allies.

In 1939 Great Britain entered the Second World War with the confidence born of having successfully defeated submarines in the past. Mine fields and a blockade were set up at once in the Straits of Dover and the North Sea. Convoys were also employed but with greatly lessened effectiveness because the Irish bases which had served in 1917 and 1918 were not available. The hundreds of miles of extra voyaging required rendered the individual destroyer at least 20 per cent less efficient than in the First World War. Soon the rapid Nazi conquest of ports from Norway to Spain gave the enemy submarine and bomber bases dangerously close to the British Isles, whose defenders could operate only from English and Northern Irish ports. If lack of Irish bases reduced the efficiency of naval escort, it hurt reconnaissance planes even more. Whole squadrons of relatively cheap short-radius planes were unusable unless they could be flown from Irish bases or at least over Irish territory. When permission to do so was not forthcoming, the British government, though its very existence depended upon the success of anti-submarine measures, refused to violate the air of its small neighbor.

In the first half of 1941 shipping losses presented as great a threat to British existence as in 1917. The Germans changed their technique, and submarines attacked their prey in packs guided by long-range Focke-Wulf bombers. The individual torpedo gave way to torpedo clusters. Mine fields and blockades lost nearly all their old effectiveness as a result of the vast Nazi advantage in bases. America transferred bottoms from its own merchant marine, but replacements failed to keep pace with sinkings. Relief in the form of newly completed American ships was six months to a year away. The British navy had only about half the number of anti-submarine ships that it used in the First World War. Supplies were got through with increasing difficulty, and rationing was drawn tighter at a time when the Germans were able to loosen their belts a few notches. Stockpiles of raw materials were being rapidly used up, but steel was left on the docks by ships that took food instead. Private estimates based on the rate of sinkings placed British collapse between the late fall of 1941 and the middle of 1942.

When the final history of the present war is written, Hitler's failure to follow through with an all-out effort at sea and in the Near East when he was winning in both campaigns and his decision to attack Russia instead will doubtless be considered his greatest mistakes. A considerable number of submarines and a very large portion of the Luftwaffe had to be withdrawn to fight in the east. And in the same months that saw a slackening of the German effort at sea came a speeding up of shipbuilding in this country and the entry of the United States navy into active hostilities. Since July, 1941, shipping losses have gone up and down, but mainly down. The German U-boat fleet has been considerably reduced, and a shortage of men for crews has been reported. Replacements of Allied shipping losses are also becoming much more rapid.

The danger, however, will last as long as the war. For some time there have been growing rumors of tremendously increased shipbuilding in countries under Axis domination, of twenty-four-hour days at dockyards. Washington fears a new outbreak of submarines and raider activity as part of a campaign to retrieve recent German losses. Unless the Allies are willing to abandon the Far East to Japan in the ill-founded hope that they can later recover the offensive, American sea power must be transferred to the Pacific in full strength, thus cutting convoy protection in half at a time when there is strong indication of acute danger. If Britain in the earlier part of the war could not stand without this American help, is it able to do so now? And if it is, can the North Atlantic be made safe enough for the transport of the new A. E. F. which our present war plans contemplate as necessary for the final defeat of Hitler?



Graphic by Pick-S

Granted that we need Irish bases to launch an offensive against Germany, would such a move be beneficial to Ireland? In answering this question it must be recalled that only three courses are open to the Irish, each with its own dangers. Irish bases may be made available to Allied use with or without active Irish participation in the war; Eire may remain strictly neutral; or, finally, Eire may either allow Germany to use its bases or, much more likely, may be conquered and unable to deny such use.

By neutrality the Irish have gained from both belligerents a fair amount of respect for their territory. Hitler has found it convenient to keep Ireland as neutral as possible since its belligerency would present his enemy with bases from which the German counter-blockade could be more effectively prevented. Allied use of Irish bases might draw some air raids, though the German air force is very busily occupied elsewhere, and the all-out raids used early in the war have long since been proved unprofitable. Moreover, Ireland is farther than England from German bases, and the Irish countryside, as compared with Britain, presents a decided lack of military objectives.

On the other hand, the continuation of the present policy of strict neutrality entails enormous risks. The Irish have been unable to get badly needed weapons from the "arsenal of democracy" because the United States naturally prefers its weapons to be used actively to overthrow Hitler. Should Eire's neutrality cripple the Allies sufficiently to bring about loss of the war, its situation would make all past misfortunes shrink to nothing by comparison.

But a greater risk than that of ultimate Allied defeat is the generally overlooked but very possible chance of German invasion and conquest. The distance from Brest to Cork is well under three hundred miles. Ireland is thus about as close to German bases in France as was Crete to Hitler's Greek bases and is considerably closer than was Norway to Germany. An expedition sent by sea is not likely, but an aerial invasion offers problems no greater than those Germany has solved elsewhere. The often repeated query, "If Hitler couldn't cross twenty miles of the English Channel, how can he cross 300 miles of ocean?" offers no comfort here. Strong British sea, air, and land forces rather than twenty miles of water were the obstacle. Ireland, with half a dozen police boats, 10,000 poorly equipped regular troops, and a minute air force, has no protection worthy of the name. No one questions Irish bravery, but bravery on the part of the unprepared merely adds to the inevitable slaughter.

In enemy hands Ireland would, as Napoleon perceived, threaten the very existence of the British Empire. Germany would then have bases within close bombing distance of every point in England, bases which would so dominate shipping lines to the west that convoys would be a prey to submarines and planes of all types. Protecting British planes would have to operate farther from their bases than the planes of the attacker. The life line across the Atlantic would be cut. Finally, Ireland is not to be despised as a possible land base from which Great Britain could be invaded by way of relatively unprepared Scotland and Wales.

When Hitler fails in a campaign, he immediately turns to some other and more promising field. He has just sustained defeats in Russia and North Africa. Unless his losses have been even more serious than is commonly believed, he will try to regain prestige by a successful campaign elsewhere. There would be no point in conquering Sweden or Switzerland, which are already within the German system. A possible objective is the British position in the Near East, to be attacked either through Turkey or from Crete. Perhaps more probable is a thrust through Spain at Gibraltar and North Africa.

The Near East and Mesopotamian oil would have been attractive objectives six months ago but are much less so today. The British position has been reinforced with men and large quantities of war supplies, and an Axis campaign would now be an expensive and extremely doubtful undertaking. A push through Spain to Gibraltar and North Africa is possible but would be almost certain to bring American seizures of nearby bases in the islands of the eastern Atlantic. Success would, of course, close the western Mediterranean to Allied shipping, but little use has been made of this route anyway. Needed raw materials for Germany cannot be obtained through this action.

A third possibility is an attack on the British Isles or on Ireland alone. In view of increasing British strength in the air, this would seem a desperate chance, but probably the risks are no greater than some Hitler has taken in the past and the rewards for success would be much larger. There are some indications that this move may actually be under consideration. Swedish sources report extensive German reinforcements along the European coast, possibly in preparation for a new offensive.

In case of a German attack on Ireland the British would face a difficult situation. They would be compelled for their own protection to counter-attack the Germans in an island where they have been denied the use of the bases necessary to make defense possible. It is true that they would enjoy the advantages of geographical propinquity, a stronger navy, and, at least at first, greater air power. But on the other hand, Ireland offers no topographical obstacles to an invader and has no strong local defense lines. The Norwegian campaign demonstrated the enormous advantage possessed by the prepared side which strikes first according to a well-calculated plan and imposes on its opponents the necessity of making necessarily hurried and generally inadequate defense moves.

If it will be difficult for England to give Ireland help in case of attack, it will be almost impossible for the United States to act. With no base for operations closer than Iceland, we could not counter-attack with adequate air and sea power before the Germans had had ample time to consolidate their position. Moreover, American aid is likely to be unavailable owing to the needs of the Far East. Yet the danger to the United States from a German attack upon Ireland would be very great. Loss of bases from which we might ultimately launch an invasion of the Continent would mean the probable disappearance of a chance to win the war by decisive defeat of Germany. If we finally won, it would only be after a protracted war of exhaustion in which all the advantages of geography would rest with the Axis and which would take the "last full measure" of American liberty, money, and man-power.

How probable a German invasion of Ireland actually is no one can state with any certainty. Prior to the attack on Norway most military experts would have pronounced victory in such an attempt impossible. Yet Norway was also close to British bases and had infinitely stronger military and geographical defenses than has Ireland. The British keep large armies in England to guard against a German attack on the tight little isle. Yet Southern Ireland is virtually undefended, and a German occupation would place the British in so unfavorable a geographical position as almost to force them out of the war. The fact that only a few German bombs have fallen on the soil of Eire should not lead to complacency. Hitler rarely broadcasts his surprise moves.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Ireland's Dilemma

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

WHEN England declared war on Germany in September, 1939, following Hitler's invasion of Poland, the De Valera government of Eire decided to remain neutral. This decision had been expected. Despite Ireland's ties to Britain, Irish public opinion was strongly against active participation in the war. Rightly or wrongly, most of the people believed that England's fight was not Ireland's. Bitterness against England was still strong though the trade war had been settled and the Irish bases returned in the previous year. A decision to support England in the war would, it was feared, provoke a serious internal split. A decision to support Hitler in his policy of aggression was, of course, unthinkable.

For nearly two and a half years the De Valera government has sought to maintain this policy of strict neutrality in the face of increasing difficulties. At times skilful tight-rope walking has been required. And some incongruous situations have been created.

In the first place, Ireland has been in the position of wanting an Allied victory but refusing to lift a hand to achieve it. There can be no doubt that Irish sentiment has been predominantly on the side of England despite the long feud over independence. It is true that a considerable amount of anti-British feeling remains. But although Irishmen may experience some satisfaction in seeing the British suffer a few reverses, not many would like to see England lose the war. Prime Minister Eamon de Valera made it clear that Irish sympathies lay with England as early as September 2, 1939, when he outlined the Irish policy of neutrality in a speech before the Dail Eireann. The subsequent bombings of English cities deepened this bond of sympathy. Tens of thousands of Irish boys have enlisted in the British armies and may be found on every fighting front. When Belfast was attacked by German planes early in 1941, cities in Eire promptly sent equipment to help quench the flames started by Nazi bombs. Sympathy for Poland, a Catholic country, has led the church to be far more pro-British than it was in 1914. Knowledge of what Nazi occupation would mean to the church in Ireland has intensified this feeling.

Furthermore, certain basic political and economic factors make strict neutrality virtually impossible. Although wholly independent, Eire is still regarded in Westminster as a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations. Northern Ireland, whose separate existence is not recognized by patriotic Irishmen, is officially at war with Germany. In the economic sphere the situation is even more paradoxical. The war has greatly increased Ireland's dependence on trade with Great Britain. This trade can only be carried on with the protection of the British fleet and the R. A. F. And yet Ireland has refused to accord any facilities to the British navy or air force.

Even this is not the worst part of the picture. In the effort to avoid giving the Nazis any pretext for invasion, the De Valera government has consistently enforced a rather one-sided conception of neutrality. Disputes have arisen between Ireland and England over four main issues: (1) the proposed extension of conscription to Northern Ireland; (2) the leasing by the British of the bases restored to Ireland in 1938; (3) measures for the joint defense of the two sections of Ireland; and (4) the internment of R. A. F. patrol planes landing on Irish soil. In each case the British have come out second best.

On two separate occasions the British government has sought to extend conscription to Northern Ireland. From the British point of view this seems perfectly logical. Northern Ireland is politically an integral part of the United Kingdom. There seems to be no reason why a subject of the king living in Ulster should be given preferential treatment over residents of Wales, Scotland, or England. Yet when the British government first proposed an extension of the draft in April, 1939, violent protests came from both Northern and Southern Ireland. The Irish Nationalists at Londonderry dispatched a message to Prime Minister de Valera asking him to "mobilize the Irish race at home and abroad immediately to resist the conscription of Irishmen." Speaking before the Dail on May 2, De Valera declared that while "lawyers might argue that Britain has a right to do this since Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom . . . we . . . regard [it] as an act of aggression." Two days later Prime Minister Chamberlain of Great Britain announced that the plan had been dropped. The speed with which the British retreated was generally regarded as a great personal triumph for De Valera.

Two years later, with Churchill as Prime Minister, the proposal was raised again. But once more De Valera's vigorous attacks, coupled with some opposition from Ulster Loyalists and Laborites, resulted in the plan being shelved. Although the British forces have not lost much in man-power as a result of this decision, the British feel that De Valera went far beyond any requirements of neutrality in interfering with Northern Ireland's share in the defense effort. If, as De Valera's supporters argue,

America's Responsibility

"Peace! Does it not already seem a mockery? And a mockery it will remain unless America takes up the responsibility for the moral leadership of the world to which her consistent traditions, no less than the aims she has set herself in entering this war, entitle her. That headship at this moment is freely offered to her by the common sense and common consent of mankind." (De Valera writing in the Irish World, July 26, 1919.)

"It is in this fact, . . . that American ideals and American traditions are ideals and traditions of liberty and fearless justice, that Ireland's hope lies; and with Ireland's, the hope of the world." (July 31, 1919.)

domestic politics forced him to take this action, the British feel that he should offset it by taking steps favorable to Britain on other matters.

Specifically, the English would be satisfied if De Valera would make some arrangements for the temporary return of the ports of Cobh, Berehaven, and Lough Swilly, which were ceded to Ireland in the 1938 treaty. Officially, so far as we know, the British government has never asked for a return of these bases. But this is undoubtedly because De Valera has made it clear on several occasions that such a request would be rejected. At one time the Prime Minister went so far as to say that he would not give way on the question of bases even if the partition of Ireland were ended.

The importance of Irish bases in the Battle of the Atlantic is discussed elsewhere in this issue. Air bases are perhaps even more important than naval bases since aerial patrol planes must now go many miles out of their course in order to avoid flying over neutral Eire, where they face internment. It is probably fair to say that De Valera would gladly enter into some sort of an arrangement regarding air and naval bases if it were not for the fear that such action would be a signal for retaliatory bombing of Irish cities by the Nazis. The people of Eire know what bombing means. Dublin has suffered several attacks. But these have been nothing compared with those suffered by Belfast in Northern Ireland. Many families in Eire have come to the rescue of friends or relatives who were homeless refugees from the bombed sections of Ulster. Like the residents of Norway, Holland, Belgium, and Yugoslavia, the Irish have naturally wanted to save their cities as long as possible.

With the fall of France, the threat of an invasion of Ireland became very real. Although the government of Eire had been engaged in building up its defenses since the outbreak of the war, its regular army of 8,000 men and 5,000 reservists could hardly afford any real protection against the mechanized might of Adolf Hitler. Furthermore, the defense of the country was greatly hampered by the absence of coordination between the north and the south. On June 29, 1940, immediately after the collapse of France, the late Lord Craigavon, then Prime Minister of Northern Ireland, declared that he was prepared to "enter into the closest cooperation" with Prime Minister de Valera for the joint defense of Ireland, provided this defense was an aid to Britain and the empire. De Valera replied that such a joint defense would be possible only if Northern Ireland were to drop out of the war and join Eire in a policy of neutrality. In fact if not in theory, the chief defense of Eire has been provided by the 200,000 or more British soldiers who have been stationed in Ulster since 1940. This force is, of course, at a great disadvantage in that it is kept far from the strategic areas likely to be attacked by the Germans. It is also at a peculiar disadvantage because of the proximity of neutral Eire. Last June the British army stationed in Ulster staged elaborate maneuvers designed to test tactical plans for combating an invasion of Britain by way of any part of Ireland. Since it was virtually impossible to keep German spies from crossing the border between Eire and Northern Ireland, it is almost certain that the maneuvers were witnessed by enemy agents. And once these agents had spirited the details of the maneuvers back across the border, the information could be forwarded to Berlin in a sealed diplomatic pouch.

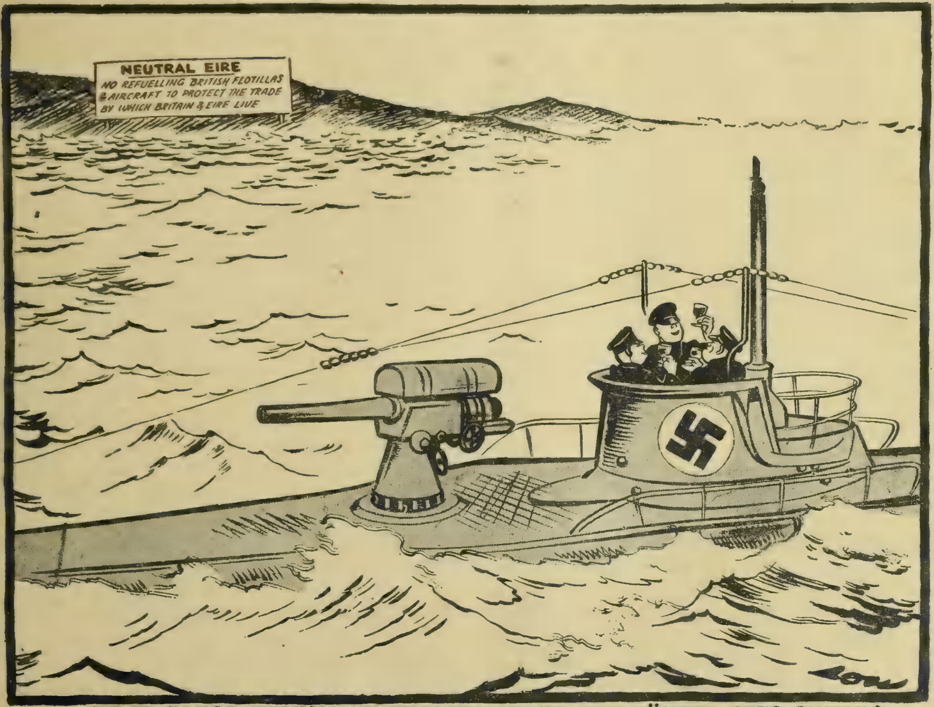
Supporters of De Valera's policy argue that Eire could defend itself if Britain and the United States would provide it with an adequate supply of arms. They point out that 30 per cent of the country's budget is earmarked for defense, and insist that if England would furnish the supplies previously agreed upon, there need be no worry about a Nazi invasion. Unfortunately for those who take this position, Irish resources are clearly inadequate for any real defense against the Nazis. The Irish budget for 1941-42 totaled only £40,000,000, of which about £13,000,000 is available for defense. While the Irish claim an army of 250,000 men, it consists almost entirely of untrained, unequipped volunteers. If Hitler attacks, Ireland's only real hope for successful defense rests with the British navy, the army in Ulster, and the Royal Air Force.

Considerable uneasiness has arisen recently in England regarding Eire's policy of interning all R. A. F. planes which are forced to land there. If the planes were engaged solely in convoying British supplies, there would, of course, be little ground for complaint. But it happens that these aerial patrols are essential for the preservation of Eire's own life line. One of the planes recently interned had run short of fuel while convoying a food ship to Ireland. The Irish public does not know this. Eire's censor has refused to permit the Irish press to mention the fact that ships with food for Ireland must travel in British convoys. If the people were told the truth, they might demand a change in policy.

The existence of the anomalies mentioned above is readily admitted by De Valera's supporters. But they maintain that Ireland's ability to remain out of the war thus far has justified his policies. Few have stopped to calculate their long-term cost. No one seems to have thought through, for example, what would happen if Great Britain or the United States, provoked beyond endurance by unnecessary shipping losses, should seize the bases they require. De Valera has made it clear on numerous occasions that such an effort would be met by resistance. As recently as January 12 of this year he declared that Eire would defend its territory "against any aggressor, no matter who he may be." Such resistance, it need hardly be added, could hardly be more effective against the Allies than against the Germans. In fact, British control of the seas would probably make seizure of the ports a relatively easy task.

What would happen in Ireland in this eventuality? Would De Valera hurriedly send to Berlin for assistance? And if he did, would it be forthcoming? It is doubtful whether De Valera himself could answer these questions. But regardless of how they are answered, Ireland's destiny would be linked with that of Germany. In the event of an Allied victory, which is assumed by even the anti-British I. R. A., the representatives of Ireland would sit on the wrong side of the peace table. After the last war the nascent Irish Republic received powerful support from the United States at the Peace Conference. Today, by refusing to aid the United States in its hour of need, the government of Eire threatens to transform that support into hostility. And failing support from the United States, where will Ireland turn? Hardly to Britain, whose proffers of mutual assistance it has repeatedly rejected. Where else? After the last war the new Union of Soviet Socialist Republics was a powerful friend. Can De Valera count on that friendship again when he has refused aid to Russia's allies? Or must he cast his lot irrevocably with Hitler?

Any balance sheet showing the results of Eire's neutrality would, of course, record on the credit side such benefits as Ireland has received by staying out of the war. Its cities are relatively intact, having been spared repeated bombings, but there is little else on the credit side. In the last war Irish farmers enjoyed unprecedented prosperity because of the high price of foodstuffs. In this war Irish economy has suffered acutely. The prices of foodstuffs have been held at such a low



NEUTRAL EIRE
NO REFUELLING BRITISH FLOTILLAS & AIRCRAFT TO PROTECT THE TRADE BY WHICH BRITAIN & EIRE LIVE
LOW

"GOD BLESS EIRE'S NEUTRALITY—UNTIL THE FÜHRER GETS THERE" level by the British Ministry of Food that Irish farmers have barely cleared their costs of production. Irish industries fared somewhat better at first but have subsequently been hampered by shortages of raw materials. The Irish have also had great difficulty in getting enough wheat. Because of Eire's non-belligerent status, Irish importers have not been able to obtain the shipping priorities available to English importers.

In general, Ireland's neutrality has not helped it to escape the economic effects of the war. On the contrary, its burdens have probably been heavier than if it had been a belligerent. In an attempt to provide defenses where no defenses existed, the government of Eire has been compelled to boost taxes to an unprecedented degree. The first boost came even before the outbreak of war—in the spring of 1939—as a result of obligations taken on with the return of the bases formerly defended by Britain. To provide funds for a £5,500,000 defense appropriation the income tax was increased one shilling on the pound (5 per cent) bringing the tax to five shillings sixpence on the pound. Surtaxes and special taxes on high incomes were also increased. In November of the same year, after the outbreak of war, the income tax was raised another shilling on the pound. Surtaxes and estate duties were further increased, and additional levies were placed on beer and whiskey.

There was little change in 1940, but the record £40,000,000 budget introduced by Finance Minister Sean T. O'Kelly on May 7, 1941, imposed heavy new burdens. The income tax was raised another shilling on the pound, bringing the total to seven shillings and sixpence (37½ per cent). Death duties were increased another 10 per cent, and there were still further increases in surtaxes and the excess-profits levy. The gasoline tax—largely nominal because of drastic rationing—was raised from ten to fifteen pence a gallon, and it was planned to raise the almost incredible sum of £2,000,000 by additional levies on pipe tobacco and cigarettes.

While not in the war, Ireland has had to adapt itself to all the disadvantages of a war economy. In May, 1941, a drastic order was issued under the Emergency Powers Act stabilizing wages and making any increase in transport, utility, or insurance rates illegal. Yet living costs have risen sharply, and, in contrast with the situation in the belligerent countries, unemployment has increased. At the beginning of the war the motor-car-assembly industry, one of Eire's major industries, was virtually suspended because of the restrictions on the sale of gasoline. Thousands of men in other industries have been thrown out of work by the increasing difficulty of getting raw materials.

America Makes a Difference

"Until America entered the war the Irish people had no thought that the end of it would bring freedom to any small people whatever. . . . When America entered the war it made a difference. America's history had been different; and men who were more than skeptical until then of the professions of all governments felt impelled to throw their reasonable doubts to the winds." (From a speech delivered by De Valera in Brooklyn, as reported in the Irish World, September 17, 1919.)

Ireland has had rationing, blackouts, general economic dislocation, and many of the other manifestations of war without being in the war. It has not even succeeded wholly in escaping death from the air. On at least three occasions Eire has suffered from Nazi air raids. The first of these occurred on August 26, 1940, when three Nazi bombers dropped about ten bombs in County Wexford. Three girls were killed in the wrecking of a creamery, and two other girls were injured. After an investigation, the German government apologized, claiming the attack was a mistake. But during the first three days of January, 1941, Nazi planes bombed Curragh, Julianstown, Duleek, Borris, and several densely populated sections of Dublin. Whole blocks of houses were severely damaged in the capital, and more than a score of persons were injured. Again Germany apologized; but its planes returned on May 31 in the most severe raid of all. On this occasion four bombs fell in the city of Dublin, killing thirty persons and injuring more than one hundred. Other bombs were dropped near Arklow in County Wicklow without doing serious damage. As in the case of the earlier attacks, the Nazis expressed regret for their "mistake."

Despite the cost, despite unwarranted bombings, and despite an almost universal desire to see the Allies win, there can be no doubt that De Valera has had the support of an overwhelming majority of the Irish people in his policy of neutrality. At the same time there appears to be a growing feeling that Eire should play fair with England and the United States by making some arrangement about the bases. This view was expressed quite sharply in a speech delivered in the Dail last July by James Dillon, deputy leader of the Fine Gael Party. Mr. Dillon declared that the Dail Eireann "should ascertain precisely what Great Britain and the United States may require to insure success against the Nazi attempt at world conquest and offer to the United States and Great Britain that cooperation to the limit of our resources."

Two years ago such a statement could hardly have been made in the Dail. Even six months ago these views were held only by a small minority of the Irish people. Today they undoubtedly reflect a much more substantial sector of opinion. Tomorrow the minority may become the majority.

De Valera's Neutrality

BY WILLIAM J. M. A. MALONEY

THE ANGLO-IRISH TREATY OF 1921

AT THE peace conference which in 1921 settled the Anglo-Irish war, the negotiators had to adjust (1) Ireland's claim to all its soil, (2) the desire of the Irish Loyalists of Ulster to be left undisturbed in their British allegiance, and (3) England's requirement that its security should be maintained.

The solution of these conflicting claims embodied in the treaty signed at London gave to twenty-six counties of Ireland the status of member of the British Commonweath of Nations, under the name of the Irish Free State. The Loyalists received the remaining six counties, which were given local self-government and were united with Great Britain under the name Northern Ireland.

For Britain's security, the Irish representatives conceded not only the bridgehead of Northern Ireland but also the provisions set forth in Article 7, which read:

> The government of the Irish Free State shall afford to His Majesty's Imperial forces
>
> (a) In time of peace such harbor and other facilities as are indicated in the Annex hereto, or such other facilities as may from time to time be agreed between the British government and the government of the Irish Free State; and
>
> (b) In time of war or of strained relations with a foreign power such harbor and other facilities as the British government may require for the purposes of such defense as aforesaid.

The negotiators evidently considered the islands of Britain and of Ireland to be a single strategic unit for defense purposes, and the Irish Free State, as a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations, to be jointly concerned with Britain for their common safety. In the event of Britain's declaring war the stipulations of Article 7 of the treaty made the Irish Free State a co-belligerent.

The facilities "indicated in the Annex" were Lough Swilly in County Donegal, Berehaven on Bantry Bay, and Queenstown. In the First World War Lough Swilly had sheltered thirty British destroyers that operated in the North Atlantic, Berehaven had given invaluable dockyard facilities to the heavy British naval units that controlled the western seas, and Queenstown had been the base of the thirty-four American destroyers that held open the southern approaches to England.

The treaty, which bears Winston Churchill's signature but not De Valera's, did not wholly satisfy any of the parties to it. De Valera, who had been instrumental in getting the Irish to accept the truce which permitted the treaty negotiations, held the British Commonwealth to be a mighty and admirable aggregation of Christian nations, each marching to political equality with Britain. On such terms as would permit a united Ireland ultimately to acquire a similar status he was prepared to lead his country into that Commonwealth; but on deciding that the treaty did not offer such terms, he denounced it.

Signed at London on December 6, 1921, the treaty led to heated discussions in the Dail before it was finally ratified, by sixty-four votes to fifty-seven, on January 7, 1922. The electorate then approved it by a vote of 486,419 to 133,864.

De Valera still scorned it. In its place he offered a document, usually referred to as Document Number 2, which he entitled "A Proposed Treaty of Association Between Ireland and the British Commonwealth." Many professed to see merely verbal differences between the actual treaty and the one proposed by De Valera. But his alternative Article 7 read: "That so far as her resources permit, Ireland shall provide for her own defense by sea, land, and air, and shall repel by force any attempt by a foreign power to violate the integrity of her soil and territorial waters, or to use them for any purpose hostile to Great Britain and the other associated states." De Valera omitted the pledge of harbor and other facilities to the British government in the event of war, and, by implication, proposed not co-belligerency but neutrality for Ireland. In fact, his whole document indicated toward the British Commonwealth a cautious cooperation which he called "external association."

The dispute over the treaty brought the disaster of civil war to the Irish Free State. Believing De Valera's protestations that the treaty made Ireland subject to Britain and that his Document Number 2 was a charter of ultimate independence, the fighting Irish Republicans rallied to its defense. Carrying with them the war-weary author of the document, they battled valiantly until May, 1923, when they were finally compelled to lay down their arms.

Turning to constitutional means, De Valera, the whilom chief of the rebellion against the Irish Free State, came to preside over it less than ten years later, and as its head began to lead his people peacefully to the freedom he proposed for them. Bit by bit he nibbled away the treaty he had denounced in arms. At no one time did he take more than England must perforce concede to a sovereign member of the British Commonwealth of Nations. As he pursued his purpose his invariable theme was: "We are going to get our independence of Britain, but we are not going to allow our territory, under any consideration, to be made use of by some foreign power as a base of attack against Britain." By 1937 the Irish Free State had disappeared even in name. In its place was Eire—Gaelic for Ireland—with a constitution immediately applicable to the twenty-six counties but avowedly planned for "the whole island of Ireland, its islands, and its territorial seas."

CHAMBERLAIN RETURNS THE BASES

Preoccupied with the growing menace of Hitler and desirous of preserving unity within the Commonwealth, the British government on December 29, 1937, informed Prime Minister de Valera that it was "prepared to treat the new constitution as not effecting a fundamental alteration in the position of the Irish Free State in future, to be described under the new constitution as 'Eire' or 'Ireland,' as a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations . . . "; and added that Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa had intimated that they also were prepared to treat the new constitution in like manner. Disregarding Prime Minister de Valera's open, unilateral, progressive repudiation of the treaty of 1921, the Chamberlain government entered into an agreement (April 25, 1938) with him by which the provisions of Article 7 and its Annex, which made of the Irish Free State a co-belligerent with Britain at war, ceased "to have effect." Eire also obtained at last full and final possession of Lough Swilly, Berehaven, and Queenstown.

In 1921 Winston Churchill had signed the treaty returning these bases to a co-belligerent Irish Free State, member of the British Commonwealth of Nations. In 1938 this watchdog of the Commonwealth growled against giving them up to De Valera's Eire. With incisive logic Churchill warned that the possession of these bases by a neutral Eire would cost England dearly in the event of war; nevertheless, the British Parliament ratified the agreement.

The British legislators ignored Mr. Churchill's warning, confident that self-defense would constrain Eire to stand with Britain in the event of war. And their confidence was not baseless, for as late as February 7, 1939, Prime Minister de Valera informed the Dail that "it would be impossible for Eire, much as she desired it, to remain neutral in the event of war between Britain and any other country." Yet seven months later De Valera essayed the impossible. When Britain declared war, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa assumed the obligation of co-belligerency as members of the British Commonwealth. Had Eire been armed, it too might have stood up, like Northern Ireland, with relative impunity. Perhaps Eire feared its fate too much; but to enter a mechanized war with "bare hands" seemed a suicidal risk. Had Eire been as far from German vengeance as Canada, or as Australia, that risk might have been taken. But it was certainly within the right of Eire as a sovereign state to refuse to take the risk, and to dissociate itself from the other nations of the Commonwealth by a declaration of neutrality. Such a declaration was, in fact, a further affirmation of Eire's sovereign status. Denmark, Holland, Belgium, and other small sovereign states had already indicated their intent to remain neutral. So Prime Minister de Valera accepted from Hitler's minister at Dublin a pledge of Germany's benevolence and declared Eire's neutrality.

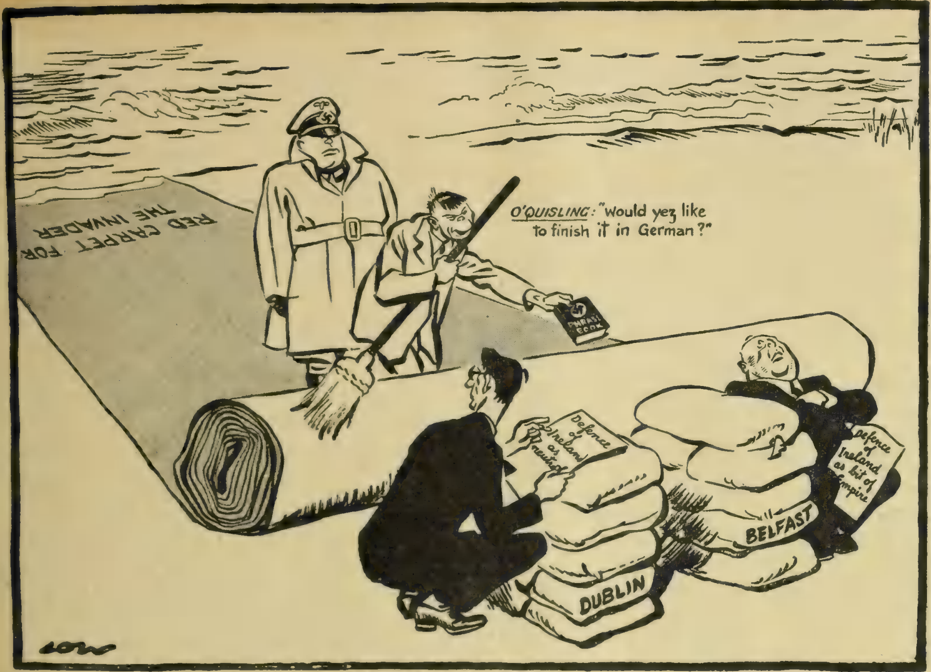
His declaration was ratified by Eire's legislators, even by those who had maintained in arms against him the sanctity of the Anglo-Irish treaty of 1921. The vote did not indicate any lack of sympathy toward England, but only an instinctive shrinking from a sudden, terrible war that was none of Eire's making and that it could ill sustain.

The bishops of Ireland were then no more militant than the legislators. Fully informed of every phase of Hitler's war on the church, the Irish hierarchy neither openly protested nor made any public attempt to rally the Catholic millions of Eire in a crusade to defend the church abroad. At first they may not have believed all that was reported about the Hitler persecution. It may have been hard for them to imagine Franco's powerful ally in the defense of the church in Spain in the role of an anti-religious monster. Yet no Irish priest could mistake what Hitler was doing; not so long ago it was penal also in Ireland to be Catholic, and the lot of the Irish priest then was not unlike the plight in which the war had placed the priests of Poland.

TERRORISM IN ULSTER

Like Poland, too, Ireland was partitioned, and the partition legitimized by treaty. The fact that his own representatives had sanctioned partition was no comfort to the Nationalist of Northern Ireland. Inasmuch as Tyrone and Fermanagh had Nationalist majorities, there was never any moral justification for their inclusion with the four Loyalist counties. In the six counties together, however, the Loyalists outnumbered the Nationalists more than two to one. Since in this part of Ireland Loyalist commonly connoted Protestant, Britain had secured as a bridgehead a Loyalist Protestant state with a permanent Nationalist and Catholic minority.

Although outnumbered, the Catholic Nationalists of Northern Ireland have kept up the struggle for freedom from British rule, and the Protestants of the six counties, now armed with all the powers of government, have brought peace with their clubs. At times the Catholic hierarchy has found it hard to encourage in Northern Ireland the respect for legally constituted authority that



RED CARPET FOR THE INVADER
O'QUISLING: "Would yez like to finish it in German?"
PHRASE BOOK
Defence of Ireland as neutral
Defence of Ireland as bit of Empire
BELFAST
DUBLIN
LOW

IRISH ARGUMENT

it usually ordains. In fact, the sorely vexed Primate of Ireland, Cardinal McRory, Archbishop of Armagh, declared on one occasion that Ireland was "an ancient land made one by God, partitioned by a foreign power against the vehement protests of her people."

While incessantly fighting its indomitable Catholic minority, the government of Northern Ireland has had to defend itself on other fronts. Prime Minister de Valera, with the British standing helplessly by, has progressively repudiated the terms of the treaty that legitimized the partition. In 1937 Eire adopted a constitution specifically including the territory of Northern Ireland. Two years later the Irish Republican Army issued a proclamation calling "upon England to withdraw her armed forces, her civilian officials, and institutions and representatives of all kinds from every part of Ireland," and implemented the proclamation by raiding the border blockhouses and supply depots of the six counties and conducting a campaign of assassination by time bombs in letter-boxes and parcel offices in Britain.

The Irish Republican Army had some 1,500 members in Northern Ireland. To meet their challenge it was the duty of the government to use such force as was necessary. A hundred or two special police—"B specials" as they are locally known—might have been enough. Had 500 been used, the I. R. A. would have felt complimented. But no fewer than 18,000 are said to have been signed on. This means that one out of perhaps every ten male Protestants of draft age in Northern Ireland has made the hounding of his Catholic neighbor his chief war contribution.

In his Lenten Pastoral last year the Bishop of Down and Connor wrote of conditions in his diocese as follows:

> Raids on Catholic houses by the forces of the government have taken place in Belfast on a scale that is almost incredible. They began in September, 1939, and have continued regularly since then. Till the end of September, 1940, raids as reported in the Irish News occurred on fifty-two dates, averaging one each week; and it must be remembered that there were many other raids that were never reported. . . . Last October the Minister of Public Security said "the raids will go on," and in pursuance of that policy from the middle of November till the end of last December raids were carried on almost nightly. . . . Many families were involved on each occasion; for instance, on the eighteenth of July it was reported that one hundred houses were raided. . . .
>
> During these raids many arrests were made; some of the men were interned, some were imprisoned, and the rest after being detained for hours at the police station were released. Many of those released, for whose arrest no reason could be alleged, when they returned to their places of employment next morning were informed that others had got their jobs. In the light of this, who would deny that the raids were successful. . . .

As Catholics, we are constrained to enter a most emphatic protest against these continued, these wanton violations of our Catholic homes, these gross indignities to our Catholic families.

NEUTRALITY DIVIDES EIRE

With Ireland partitioned and with terrorism in the occupied six counties, with Eire still mourning not only the four hundred thousand who fell unheeded in Britain's ranks during the last World War but also the men who died in Ireland fighting to free it from England, Britain could scarcely take a moral stand against Eire's neutrality. But there were still valid grounds on which the neutrality policy might be attacked. Prime Minister de Valera considered these scrupulously, but nothing availed against his fears for Eire's survival. Britain, despite the glorious heroism of its airmen, could not effectively defend its own soil. Vast areas of London had become rubble, and Coventry was a byword for death and destruction. So De Valera, less from free choice than from fear of Hitler, held to neutrality.

Official commentators explained to the people of Eire why their Prime Minister must intern impartially such British and German airmen as landed in the country, why he officially forbade public debate on the merits of the contestants, why it was politic to placate Hitler by bowing to his blows and by giving precedence to German over British war news, why it was prudent to "play down" the war both over the radio and in the press, and why it was especially necessary to ban the publication of the names of the men of Eire who were wounded or killed in the British service. While De Valera stuck to his role, his ministers went up and down the country exhorting the people to put away all thought of war, to make their neutrality without blemish. Persuaded by their own propaganda, they did not seem to notice that neutrality had divided Ireland as no treaty had done, that it had convinced the unbiased that the bridgehead of Northern Ireland was vital to the survival not only of Britain but also of "the democratic way of life," and that it had ended the hope of seeing a united Ireland in our time—for in the name of democracy the United States has felt impelled to help fortify this bridgehead. In addition, neutrality had conferred permanence on Eire's voluntary dissociation from the British Commonwealth of Nations and had alienated any sympathy Eire ever enjoyed among the other Allied powers.

Not the least of the evils that flowed from neutrality was the paralyzing effect on the official mind. Once there was no braver or more far-seeing man in Eire than Sean Lemass, De Valera's Minister of Supplies. Yet on January 3, 1942, he publicly stated: "In this present we hope not for posterity but for preservation, and we know that our preservation is, to say the least of it, very doubtful. . . . The circumstances that might exist after the war, or the plans the victorious powers might have for the reordering of the affairs of mankind, and the place, if any, we might have in those plans, are matters about which we could know nothing."

Happily this abject official state of mind has not corrupted the people of Eire. Many walked out on De Valera's neutrality performance, and he justly made no attempt to stop them. Neither did the church. At every station on the border of Northern Ireland small groups of men from Eire could daily be seen making their way into the six counties to fight or work for Britain; yet without a last blessing from the parish priest few would have thought of going. On an average six thousand men a month are said to have thus aided Britain's war effort. Of these, W. H. Carter, writing in the Nineteenth Century for July, 1941, estimated that some 70,000 had joined the British fighting forces. In a Report from Ireland to the American Mercury of last December William Bayles said that British enlistments from Eire had then risen to the stupendous total of 150,000. This is five times the number in Eire's regular army. It is also more than 5 per cent of Eire's entire population. Bayles believed there must be added to this 150,000 as many more who have gone to work in the war industries of Britain. It is probable that a tenth of Eire's total population is actively in the war—unofficially and as individuals of course, but with their whole heart.

AMERICA MAKES A DIFFERENCE

While the men of Eire were voluntarily making this magnificent, unheralded contribution to the British forces, the aspect of the war definitely changed. Italy suffered eclipse, Germany met defeat in Russia, and the Axis lost in both strength and leadership, while the Allies gained decisive dominance by the adhesion of the United States. With this change, Eire awoke from the nightmare of Nazi vengeance to find that its official neutrality, defensible no longer than it could be reasonably pleaded as essential to its very existence, had grown somehow into a fearful yet comfortable habit which twenty-eight months of practice made hard to give up.

Eire dreads uncharted changes and waits for events to determine its course, but meanwhile the United States and Canada have to face the hazards of the Arctic seas in order to maintain communication with Britain. This northern route is hard to patrol and takes a heavy toll of men, ships, material, and time. The one and only base for the effective defense of the Atlantic sea lanes is Eire. With the aid of Eire the Atlantic could be made reasonably safe for an American expeditionary force. The 20,000,000 people of Irish blood in the United States will be well represented in that force.

For their sake, for the sake of the 150,000 Irish who have gone to the war from Eire, of the 1,200,000 in Northern Ireland, of the 2,000,000 belligerent Irish in Britain, of the co-belligerent Irish in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa—in short, for the sake of the whole Irish race outside of Eire it is a comfort to note that a responsible official of Eire has at last ventured to hint that neutrality is not necessarily permanent, and may, indeed, be suddenly given up. On January 10, 1942, Dr. James Ryan, Minister of Agriculture, was able to announce: "When the position becomes acute there will be some who will favor departure from neutrality. . . . There may possibly be a stampede."

Divided, isolated, and defenseless in a world at war Eire today could not well be in a more acute situation. Controlling all its channels of communication, Prime Minister de Valera could start the stampede overnight.

Eire's Search for Self-Sufficiency

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

NOBODY resembles the mythical "economic man" of the classical economists so little as the Irishman. Nor does the history of Ireland lend itself easily to the materialist interpretation of the Marxist, for in that troubled isle the primacy of politics over economics has been almost constant. Hence in any discussion of Irish political economy past or present the accent must inevitably be placed on the adjective rather than the noun.

Since 1932, when he first became head of the government of the Irish Free State, Eamon de Valera has pressed steadily toward the goal of a completely independent, reunited Irish republic. The economic counterpart of this program has been an effort to make his country self-supporting, to break the conspiracy between nature and the English which hitherto has served to bind Ireland's economy to that of Britain. This policy has brought Ireland few, if any, material gains on balance, and at times Mr. de Valera has appeared to be cutting off his country's nose to spite the faces of his enemies. Yet it must be admitted that from his own point of view and from that of the majority of people whom he leads he has had a large measure of success. For his primary aim has not been prosperity but freedom, and he has been encouraged rather than deterred by the realization that poverty is often the reward of virtue. "If we cannot have silk shirts," he once declared, "let us have homespuns."

It is in this spirit that the drive toward self-sufficiency has been undertaken in Eire. The aim has been to transform its economy so that it serves Irish needs instead of English uses. Explaining this policy in an article in the Saturday Evening Post of January 13, 1940, Maurice Walsh voiced the widespread belief that Britain had sought to maintain Ireland as a kind of colonial cattle ranch, "a place where there was the best food for England, good sport, a simple standard of living for the aborigine—a place to visit in summer and forget in the winter." While first-quality Irish beef, butter, and bacon used to be sent across the channel, inferior foods were imported for home consumption. That has been largely changed, and in the five years following 1931 such imports were reduced by 80 per cent. In the last ten years numerous light industries have sprung up in Eire; so that now a wide range of consumers' goods is produced at home.

Since it was already committed to a policy of economic nationalism, Eire bore the trials of the Anglo-Irish trade war which raged from 1932 to 1938 with comparative equanimity. This conflict was precipitated by Mr. de Valera's decision, soon after becoming Prime Minister, to cancel the land-annuity payments to Britain. These annuities represented interest and principal on loans made to Irish farmers for the purchase of their lands by private English investors, who, however, received a guaranty from the British government. From the British point of view they were a legal commercial debt and were not covered by the clause of the Anglo-Irish treaty of 1921 which relieved the Free State of any liability for the national debt of the old United Kingdom. To Mr. de Valera and his followers the payment of the annuities appeared as the rendering of tribute.

THE ANGLO-IRISH TRADE WAR

Britain's reply to the default of the Irish government in respect of the annuities was a parliamentary authorization to the Treasury to impose duties on imports from the Free State up to 100 per cent over and above any existing duties. The sums obtained by this measure were to be earmarked to recoup the British government for moneys paid out in accord with its guaranties to the annuity holders. De Valera quickly retorted by clapping extra duties on leading categories of British goods exported to Ireland, and the battle was joined.

Economically it was a one-sided contest. Britain was practically the only market for Ireland's meat and dairy products and all in all absorbed over 90 per cent of Irish exports. On the other hand, it was not nearly so dependent on Irish purchases, which accounted for only some 10 per cent of its total shipments abroad. Nor was it a hardship for British consumers to be deprived of Irish supplies: Denmark, Holland, and the dominions were all eager and able to increase their exports of similar products. But Ireland not only could not dispose of its goods elsewhere; it was even unable to arrange for satisfactory imports from non-British sources of such essentials as coal.

The result was that the prices of Irish farm products slumped disastrously, and exports to Britain were almost halved. The price of live cattle in the Free State fell from forty-five shillings a hundredweight in June, 1931, to twenty-five shillings; while during the same period the London price was lowered only eight shillings. At the same time the new retaliatory tariffs sharply increased prices of imported industrial goods which the Irish farmer had to buy. Attempts to arrange reciprocal trade agreements with other nations yielded meager results. Compared with 1933, total imports from countries other than Britain increased £2,236,214 but exports only £22,708. There were plenty of willing sellers, but willing buyers were almost as hard to find as Irish snakes.

The Anglo-Irish trade war continued until 1938, although its ferocity was modified by two different agreements. At the end of 1934 a pact was signed by which Britain increased its import quota for Irish cattle by about one-third and the Free State undertook to admit 1,250,000 tons of British coal. However, the special British duty of twenty shillings a head on cattle remained, as did the Irish duty on British coal of five shillings a ton. Since Irish cattle had to compete in an English market open to the meat of all the world, the duty was in effect paid either by the Irish farmer through lower prices or by the taxpayer through subsidies. But the Irish consumer and not the British mine owner paid the duty on coal, since there was no suitable alternative supply available. Speaking in the Dail on this agreement, Mr. Cosgrave, leader of the opposition, declared that the retained land annuities were being sent to Britain on the horns of Irish cattle, but Mr. de Valera defended it as a business transaction. "It was," he said, "the type of understanding the Irish government has always indicated its willingness to make." A second interim agreement in February, 1936, led to a greater improvement in the situation: Britain reduced its special imposts, and the Free State, which a few weeks earlier had canceled the coal duties, cut in half its retaliatory tariff on a number of important British manufactures.

So long as the trade war continued, Ireland was certainly getting the worst of it from the economic standpoint, but if the British government believed that it could weaken the political position of De Valera and his Fianna Fail Party by hitting the Irish farmer and taxpayer, it made a sad mistake. This was demonstrated in the general election of 1933, when Fianna Fail increased its membership in the Dail from seventy to seventy-seven. The fact was that the chief victims of the trade war were the big farmers of the central plains and the city merchants, who in any event were Cosgrave supporters. The poverty-stricken subsistence farmers of the west, who had no cash crops, the landless laborers, and the urban poor continued to vote for the man who stood up to the British and provided them with relief payments, free beef, and free milk.

The trade war also helped Mr. de Valera to push ahead with his plans to encourage tillage in the place of cattle farming, so that the country could feed itself, and to build up local industries which would keep money at home. Sheltered by high tariffs, new factories were started all over Ireland. By 1935 Free State mills, which before the advent to power of Fianna Fail were producing only half the flour consumed in the country, were grinding out its full requirements. A rapid growth in the cultivation and refining of beet sugar made possible the reduction of imported sugar to 20 per cent of consumption. Unfortunately, this industrial progress was not reflected in the reduction of unemployment, which remained a serious problem and would have become still more grave had not Britain continued to offer an unrestricted haven to Free State emigrants.

While the economic war dragged on to the detriment of Irish trade, it was little noticed in Britain, which was enjoying a period of recovery and industrial expansion. Yet in 1938 Mr. de Valera was able to win from the Chamberlain government a settlement which represented a real triumph. In return for a lump-sum payment of £10,000,000 Britain abandoned annuity and other outstanding claims with a capitalized value of £100,000,000. Retaliatory duties were abolished by both sides, and both states gave preferences to each other's goods. And at the same time Britain agreed to transfer to the government of Eire the three naval bases which had been retained by the treaty of 1921. It can never be said of Neville Chamberlain that he appeased only powerful nations.

A BLOCKADED NEUTRAL

World War II has demonstrated to Eire both the advantages and the disadvantages of self-sufficiency. The tillage program, which has been extended by an order compelling occupiers to cultivate at least 20 per cent of their arable land, has enabled the country to get along without many foreign foodstuffs. The most serious deficiency is that of wheat; the most severe hardship, perhaps, the shortage of tea. Sugar is rationed, but the allowance is fairly adequate. The government's peat-cutting development, which is being energetically pushed, has provided some additional employment and has helped to compensate for much-reduced imports of British coal. But Eire, like many a larger nation, has found that home industries don't insure an independent supply of manufactured goods when raw materials are not locally available. In this matter nature has been niggardly toward Ireland, and neither Britain nor America has much it can spare from its armament program. Moreover, shipping is an increasingly acute problem. Eire has practically no mercantile marine of its own, and until the Battle of the Atlantic is definitely won, the Allied nations are hardly in a position to release many bottoms for its benefit. Nor has Eire's strict observance of neutrality saved it from inclusion within the German blockade zone or its ships from U-boat attacks.

Throughout 1940 unemployment remained one of the Irish government's worst headaches. It was intensified not only by the cessation of normal emigration but by an influx of refugees, mainly woman and children of Irish origin, seeking escape from the blitzed cities of Britain. The past twelve months, however, have seen an improvement, though one that can hardly be ascribed either to better business or to the efficacy of government relief schemes. It is due rather to the expansion of the Irish army, large-scale enlistments in the British services, and the lure of high wages in British munition factories, which has revived emigration.

Normally Eire imports a far greater value of goods annually than it exports, and its trade accounts are balanced by invisible exports such as interest on foreign investments, mainly in Britain, tourist expenditures, and emigrants' remittances. During the economic conflict with Britain the excess of imports was swollen to such an extent that accounts were only balanced by drawings on capital. Since 1939 exports to Britain have been fairly well maintained, although the price policies of the British Ministry of Food have not always seemed designed to encourage Irish farmers to increase their shipments, and with imports necessarily curtailed, the adverse balance of trade has shrunk in a spectacular manner. In fact, in recent months there has been an excess of exports, and as a result Eire's sterling holdings have been growing rapidly. In the view of some Irish authorities the strong financial position which is now being built up will prove a powerful political weapon after the war. Cormac MacAirt writes in the Irish Echo of New York:

> If, however, we escape invasion, and an overwhelming British defeat does not render the pound valueless, then—please God—the Saorstat is likely to emerge from the war in a very strong position materially; and this is bound to have a big effect on the partition issue and, in my opinion, will render the reunion of Ireland almost a certainty.

This hope, it will be noted, is conditioned on the absence of British disaster, but it must be pointed out that even in the event of an overwhelming victory for the United Nations, including Britain, the chances of the pound sterling escaping serious depreciation are not entirely favorable. Britain, too, has depended on the fruits of foreign investment to keep its international accounts straight. Now it is drawing heavily on these capital assets to finance its war effort, and, in addition, it is at this moment having to destroy or allow to fall into enemy hands some of its most valuable investments in the Far East. To the extent that the United States finds alternative supplies of rubber, part of this loss may prove permanent.

Shrinkage in income after the war may force further depreciation of the pound; it will certainly necessitate tremendous adjustments in British trade. If the universal movement toward freer trade envisioned in the Atlantic Charter is not realized, Britain may be forced to restrict its imports and press its exports in order to keep its economy on an even keel. That could mean very hard times for the Irish farmer unless his government consented to make some kind of barter arrangement with Britain, which in turn would probably react unfavorably on Eire's tariff-fostered industries. Despite all that has been done to make Eire more nearly self-supporting, its economy still hinges on its ability to export agricultural surpluses. As the Irish Commission of Inquiry into Banking, Currency, and Credit pointed out in 1938:

> The Free State is predominantly an agricultural country, which means not only that the greatest proportion

De Valera's Message to America
St. Patrick's Day, 1940

"We fully realize what we owe to the support given by our kin in the United States. With their aid we have secured the sovereign status we now enjoy in five-sixths of the national territory. We are genuinely grateful, and our gratitude establishes a further link binding the motherland to those millions of homes in America where today Ireland's national festival is being celebrated with the same sentiments of fervor and devotion with which we celebrate it in Ireland."

> of the population gains its livelihood in agriculture but that the main exports required to pay for necessary imports are obtained from agriculture. . . . Access to profitable export markets for agricultural products will in the future as in the past govern the prosperity of the main body of the Irish people.

Even the group with the biggest vested interest in the self-sufficiency program has, it is worth noting, a good many doubts about its success. In the course of the 1941 budget debate, Erskine Childers, a member of Fianna Fail and secretary of the Federation of Irish Manufacturers, declared that the first twenty years of self-government had been disappointing. The national income, he said, had failed to expand, no new export markets had been established, and the fertility of the land had not been maintained. A few months earlier the same authority, in a lecture summarized by the Journal of the Institute of Bankers in Ireland, asserted that costs of production were too high in Ireland, and must be reduced if industries already established were to justify their existence.

Among the factors raising costs he included managerial inexperience, the smallness of the home market, high taxation, and the indiscriminate nature of tariff protection. He stressed the need for better organization and more intensive research, and said that too little attention had been paid to the development of special types of quality exports. Mr. Childers went on to advocate closer cooperation between workers and employers, to be obtained by the organization of vocational bodies which would include both and replace the Federation of Irish Manufacturers and the trade unions. In addition, he said, very large powers would have to be given to the government in order to insure the success of the industrial-development program for which it had made itself responsible.

In these proposals there is more than a suggestion of a move toward a corporative state on the Italian fascist model. Already under its war-time powers the government of Eire is regulating wages, prices, and almost every detail of economic life. Mr. Childers's program appears to look toward the perpetuation and broadening of these powers, a prospect which cannot fail to alarm those who have expected that independent Ireland would become a model democracy.

We can only hope that if partition is abolished and the republic established, Eire will feel secure enough to turn away from the paths of economic nationalism which lead large nations toward imperialism and small states toward social sterility. Certainly, a self-sufficient Eire could not hope for more than an extremely modest standard of living. Mr. de Valera may argue that simplicity is to be preferred, may reverse Marie Antoinette by saying, "Let us eat bread, and if need be, brown bread," and the voters may continue to indorse him. But so long as the Irish standard of living is definitely below that of neighboring countries, the young people will continue to repudiate that policy by emigrating. And Eire will remain a land of old folks and children, a land which must feed its spirit on the hatreds of the past because it can have no real hopes of the future.

[I wish to acknowledge my indebtedness for a number of facts and figures quoted in this article to "Ireland, Past and Present," by Tom Ireland, just published by G. P. Putnam's Sons.—K. H.]

CONTRIBUTORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT was on The Nation staff in the crucial years of Ireland's struggle for freedom. He now writes a daily column, Books and Things, for the New York Herald Tribune.

SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE left The Nation in 1920 to join Albert Jay Nock on the Freeman, where she ardently supported the campaign for Irish independence.

GEORGE W. NORRIS, veteran member of the United States Senate from Nebraska, was a member of the "court" formed in 1921 by the American Commission on Conditions in Ireland.

MARGARET MARSHALL is literary editor of The Nation.

WILLIAM L. SHIRER'S quiet radio voice is perhaps even better known than his "Berlin Diary," the widely read account of his experiences as foreign correspondent for Universal News Service and the Columbia Broadcasting System.

DONALD W. MITCHELL, avid student of naval and military history, last year completed a book on the defense problems of the United States. He analyzes the current military situation each week in The Nation.

MAXWELL S. STEWART, an associate editor of The Nation, planned and edited this supplement. He writes the annual articles on Ireland and Northern Ireland for "The National Encyclopedia Yearbook."

WILLIAM J. M. A. MALONEY, a distinguished New York neurologist, played an effective role in the Irish independence movement in this country and in the organization of the American Commission on Conditions in Ireland.

KEITH HUTCHISON, before becoming associated with The Nation, was for several years economic specialist in the New York Herald Tribune's London Bureau.

INFORMATION FOR SUSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 154 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 7, 1942 NUMBER 6

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 149

EDITORIALS

Irresponsible Neutrality 152
The Price-Bill Fiasco 152
Churchill's Vote by Freda Kirchwey 153

ARTICLES

Scapegoats and Facts by Donald W. Mitchell 155
Jesse Jones, Reluctant Dragon by Dwight Macdonald 157
Leaders, Not Ghosts by J. Alvarez del Vayo 160
Ogpu at Work by Richard H. Rovere 163
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 164
In the Wind 165
A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels 166

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

J. P. Popo, Esquire by Gilbert Highet 167
Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 168
War Is Hell by Keith Hutchison 169
Mr. Jolas by George Barker 170
The Strategy of Planning by Robert S. Lynd 170
Kermess in Munich by Ida Treat 172
Conquistador by Charles Curtis Munz 172
In Brief 173
Drama: Culture and Anarchy by Joseph Wood Krutch 173
Records by B. H. Haggin 174

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 175

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor RICHARD H. ROVERE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered [illegible] second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

IN WITHDRAWING TO SINGAPORE ISLAND from the mainland of the Malay Peninsula, the British successfully performed a maneuver comparable to the withdrawal of MacArthur's forces from Manila to Corregidor and the Bataan Peninsula. Without doubt the British are now in very strong positions, from which it will be difficult to dislodge them. But it would be folly to conceal the fact that anti-Axis nations have suffered a defeat of the first magnitude. Whether or not the British will ultimately save Singapore from falling into Japanese hands, the withdrawal has largely nullified its value. It would be impossible under present conditions, for example, to use the base for offensive operations; and it is doubtful that the island can be adequately reinforced. There is some question, however, whether the Japanese will risk the losses of an all-out attack on the fortress or transfer part of their forces on the Malay Peninsula to the Burma front in an effort to take Rangoon before British reinforcements reach that city. The situation on the Burma front is almost as critical as that at Singapore. Having taken the strategic port of Moulmein, the Japanese are a comparatively short distance from Rangoon. The defenders are few and inadequately armed, but their positions are fairly strong. And the American airmen who have been sent to guard the Burma road have shown themselves qualitatively if not quantitatively superior to the invaders. Given adequate and timely reinforcements, particularly in the air, Singapore and Burma should both be able to hold out.

*

ELSEWHERE IN THE VAST FAR EASTERN WAR the United Nations are just about holding their own. The Japanese have made further progress in the Dutch East Indies, capturing Pontianak and threatening the Amboina naval base. Although Dutch resistance continues, the oil-rich island of Borneo appears lost to the invaders. On the other hand, the American Pacific Fleet seems to have wrought major damage to Japanese bases in the Marshall and Gilbert Islands and thus cleared the route for American reinforcements for the southern Pacific front. In the Philippines, American and Filipino forces under General MacArthur continue to hold their positions in face of violent Japanese attacks. Although the Japanese have made air attacks on towns in northeastern New Guinea, they have made no further landings in this area. Australian resistance continues near Rabaul and the other points occupied by the Japanese last week. The best news of all comes from China, where the troops of Chiang Kai-shek won a decisive victory at Waichow, north of Hongkong, and are reported to be advancing eastward toward Canton. In North China the Fifteenth Division of Wang Ching-wei's puppet regime has gone over to the Chinese with its Japanese arms. Further desertions are not unlikely and would seriously endanger the Japanese position in China.

* * *

HEAVILY GUARDED BY GESTAPO AGENTS and his own thugs, Vidkun Quisling has been installed as Norwegian Premier by the grace of Hitler. The exact significance of this move is not yet certain, as the German army of occupation will, of course, remain and Herr Terboven, the German Commissioner, is to continue as head of the German civil administration and Quisling's chief adviser.The appointment can only further embitter the 99 per cent of the people who look to the day "when the King comes home." Perhaps the Germans, convinced that the Norwegians can be neither bludgeoned nor cajoled into accepting the "new order," have decided to see if painting the Quisling lath to look like iron will lend it a trifle more authority and so stiffen the oozing courage of the Hirdmen. Again the Nazis may have in mind the placing of direct responsibility for their terror on the shoulders of these traitors so as to provide a supply of scapegoats against the wrath to come. According to some reports, the appointment of Quisling may lead to a treaty of peace between his government and Germany, which is still formally at war with Norway. This would enable Quisling to set up his own diplomatic corps and demand recognition from neutrals, such as Sweden, which continue to maintain relations with the Norwegian government in exile. That would provide a difficult problem for Sweden, but the Swedish press indicates plainly that any attempt at intimidation either by Quisling or his Nazi instigators will be firmly resisted.

* * *

THE SUCCESS OF JUAN ANTONIO RIOS IN THE presidential elections in Chile is a much clearer victory for the United States than the resounding resolutions adopted at Rio. It puts in office a man and a group of parties solidly committed to the democratic cause. It insures Chile's whole-hearted cooperation in the hemisphere's anti-Axis front. And it will fortify the democratic elements in many other South American countries. The election of Rios was in doubt up to the last moment. The rightist candidate, General Carlos Ibañez, had seemed to be gaining ground as the result of heavy financial reinforcements allegedly from Axis sources. Although the Popular Front parties supporting Rios were stronger numerically than the rightists, they were severely handicapped by lack of funds. That Rios won, in spite of this, by a majority of more than 50,000 votes is an impressive tribute to the democratic feeling of the Chilean people. Some observers fear that Ibañez, defeated, will try to overthrow the government by force. This danger must not be ignored; but if the United States carries through with energy its policy of economic support, Ibañez may think twice before attempting a coup. The overwhelming success of the Popular Front at the polls, coupled with the promise of greater economic stability, presents formidable obstacles to a would-be dictator.

* * *

PRIME MINISTER KING'S DECISION TO ASK for a plebiscite to release him from his anti-conscription pledge of 1940 has provoked an unexpected amount of controversy within Canada. Opposition to the plebiscite has been voiced by those favoring as well as by those opposing the extension of the draft to cover overseas service. One Liberal member of Parliament from Quebec, Liguori Lacombe, has crossed the floor of the House and formed an anti-conscription "Canada Party," of which he is the sole member. It is probable that Mr. Lacombe's position will find a good deal of support in Quebec, where a considerable body of French nationalists are firmly against conscription. On the other hand, Ross Gray, a former Liberal whip, has strongly opposed the plebiscite on the ground that it means unnecessary delay and will only accentuate internal conflict over the issue. This view is shared by a section of the opposition Conservative Party, which has in general favored the extension of conscription. So far Mr. King has carefully avoided making any commitment as to what he will do if the plebiscite, as seems probable, gives him a free hand. It is expected, however, that he will immediately ask Parliament to remove the present bars against sending drafted men overseas.

* * *

ADMIRAL MUSELIER HAS WON THE LATEST round in his skirmish with the careful men in the State Department who would like to get the Free French forces out of St. Pierre-Miquelon, thereby keeping the favor of Vichy and saving their own rather shop-worn faces. On January 27 a dispatch from Ottawa spoke of reports of a solution reached in London. According to the plan, the islands would be neutralized, Canada would be asked to assume responsibility for the protection of their neutrality, and Admiral Muselier would withdraw his small force. A few days later the gay Admiral issued a statement from his strategic island post both exposing and repudiating the plan. He wanted to believe, he said, that it was nothing more than another of those false rumors put out by the Nazi propagandists. He pointed out that the people of St. Pierre-Miquelon were not neutral, that neutrality was in fact abhorrent to them; he said, moreover, that the four ships he had brought to the islands had already resumed "the combat at the side of American forces" in the Atlantic and had sunk one enemy submarine. He spoke throughout on the assumption that the Atlantic Charter meant what it said. We await the next round; and we are betting on the Admiral.

*

MARTIN DIES, WHO WANTS CONGRESS TO give him enough money to start another great witch-hunt, has done nothing in recent months to deserve one cent of public funds. During the past two weeks his committee has heard testimony from James Arnold Colescott of the Ku Klux Klan and other assorted fascists, but in general the old pattern of harassing ten liberals for every pro-Nazi he timidly investigates has been faithfully followed. His most ambitious project has been to keep Joseph P. Lash, Malcolm Cowley, and Goodwin Watson out of government jobs on the grounds that each was at one time or another associated with organizations that were part of the Communist transmission belt. In the case of Messrs. Cowley and Lash, Dies seems to have failed, but his attack on Goodwin Watson has resulted in a dangerous Congressional precedent. The bill which grants a new appropriation for the Federal Communications Commission carries a rider, written in by Joe Starnes of the Dies committee, forbidding any part of the money to be spent on a salary for Goodwin Watson. This may well be a usurpation of administrative function by Congress and as such unconstitutional. We hope that it is immediately tested in the courts. If it should go unchallenged, however, we hope that a rider will be attached to the Dies committee appropriations forbidding any part of the money to be spent on or by Martin Dies—or Joe Starnes.

*

IT IS INTERESTING IF NOT SURPRISING TO find Lindbergh's views about the "yellow peril" popping up in a pro-German newspaper in Stockholm. Two recent editorials in Aftonbladet, notorious as a pipe line for Goebbels, have stressed the theme that it is tragic for "white peoples to fight among themselves while the Japanese are taking away their possessions in the East." This was the thesis of the famous article which Lindbergh contributed to the Reader's Digest in March, 1940. Advocating the cooperation of Western nations strong enough to police the world, he wrote: "Germany is as essential to this group as England or France, for she alone can either dam the Asiatic horde or form the spearhead of their penetration into Europe." At a private gathering of leading America Firsters in New York on December 17, 1941, Lindbergh is reported to have stressed again the idea that the yellow races were the only real danger to the West, and his remarks seem to have inspired an undercover campaign by the isolationists to spread the notion that the one important enemy is Japan and to soft-peddle the fight against Hitler. An article in the January 24 issue of the Saturday Evening Post may well serve to promote this campaign. According to its author, Demaree Bess, "the Axis is a myth" so far as Germany and Japan are concerned. We are confronted, he says, not by "a powerful organic union but [by] two separate nations whose ideologies and ambitions and military strategy are more often competitive than cooperative." It is, of course, almost certain that if the Axis won the war, its components would split and fight each other. But it seems to us highly dangerous, as well as incorrect, to minimize the closeness of present working arrangements between the two partners. To do so is to open the door to Nazi propaganda of the kind oozing out through Sweden, propaganda skilfully designed to divide and confuse our counsels.

*

EXCELLENT MATERIAL FOR A HITCHCOCK thriller is to be found in the case of Werner von Clemm, American agent of the German High Command, cousin of Joachim von Ribbentrop, and, according to the indictment against him, fence extraordinary. Mr. von Clemm, a naturalized citizen for the past ten years and reported by the press to have sported an America First button during the heyday of that society, is president of the Pioneer Import Corporation, which, the indictment runs, has been engaged in importing the perfect blue-white diamonds picked up by the German looters of the Low Countries and selling them illicitly to raise funds for financing Nazi propaganda in this country. Involved in the tale is the Nazi High Command, which federal attorneys assert warned the Pioneer Import Corporation last spring that shipments via the Soviet Union would soon stop. "Aunt Kate dying fast" was the cryptic message that heralded the death of the Nazi-Soviet Pact. Thus did America Firster von Clemm learn of Aunt Kate's grave condition before Uncle Joe even knew she was sick. The same week that brought trouble to Ribbentrop's kinsman saw the arrest of another star of the isolationist galaxy. Ralph Townsend, a member of the staff of Scribner's Commentator, was picked up by detectives on a charge of having distributed Japanese propaganda, for so many yen a month, without bothering to register as a foreign agent. Scribner's Commentator, which served as the intellectual organ of the more wild-eyed isolationists but is now bulging with martial spirit, was so feverishly American, it will be recalled, that it fled to Wisconsin to be rid of the subversive foreign influences of the East.

Irresponsible Neutrality

PRIME MINISTER DE VALERA has given a churlish welcome to the American troops who landed in Northern Ireland last week. Although their presence to some extent lessens the chances of a German attempt against Eire, he complains that the American action means recognition of a "Quisling government" in Belfast and support for a partition which to him is as indefensible an aggression as the partition of Poland. Ireland, he says, has no desire to be brought into conflict with the United States, but it is "our duty to make it clearly understood that no matter what troops occupy the Six Counties, the Irish people's claim to union of the national territory and supreme jurisdiction will remain unabated."

Eire's government, it would seem, recognizes no other duty to Ireland or the world than the reiteration of that claim and the maintenance of strict neutrality. Old grievances blind it to present dangers which geography forces it to share with the United States and Britain. Foremost among such dangers is that of a German invasion of Eire which, if successful, would interpose a fatal barrier between England and America and would probably lead to the reduction of the British fortress. It is hardly necessary to argue, at this date, that the defeat of Britain would be a devastating blow at the United States.

De Valera declares that, given arms, Eire can equip a force strong enough to repel or at least delay an invasion. He expects to get such arms from Britain and America, and, in fact, Britain has recently started to ship weapons to southern Ireland. But obviously the provision of such supplies, as well as the import into Eire of much-needed wheat and raw materials, depends on the success of the Anglo-American effort to keep open the North Atlantic sea lanes. That problem would be enormously simplified if air and sea bases in southern Ireland were made available, would even be assisted to some extent if Eire gave the United States non-belligerent rights in its ports. But Mr. de Valera, while expecting to receive benefits from Anglo-American convoys, is not prepared to share the responsibility for their success.

The Irish people and their leaders are aiming, legitimately, at independence for the whole of Ireland, but their aloofness from the cause of the United Nations will only hinder the realization of that aim. Their neutrality impedes Anglo-American cooperation, which is dependent on the maintenance of the Atlantic life line, but in no way bothers Hitler. On the contrary, it allows him to maintain an observation post at Dublin and to organize a fifth column in Eire with branches in Northern Ireland. If and when invasion becomes a desirable move for him, Eire's neutrality will be no more of an obstacle than was that of Norway, Denmark, or Holland. The fact that Britain and now the United States have strong forces in Ulster which could rapidly be moved south is a much stronger deterrent. Should Hitler succeed in defeating Britain, Eire's fate is certain. It could choose either to be a Norway and go down fighting or a Bulgaria accepting without resistance the benefits of Nazi "protection." In either case it would become a German base for the final battle against America.

Eire will never be able to take over the Six Counties except by agreement with the Protestant majority there unless it is prepared to wage civil war and kill, imprison, or deport 600,000 recalcitrants. It demands that Britain shall abandon support for the government of Northern Ireland and force it to accept the rule of Dublin. But how can Britain be expected to repudiate, in the midst of its perils, a government which is giving it support in favor of one that practices a cold neutrality? The fact that Northern Ireland remains part of the United Kingdom is very probably responsible for Britain's continued existence, for had all Ireland remained neutral the German blockade might well have succeeded.

The policy of De Valera's government is, in short, giving the supporters of partition practical arguments difficult to answer, since it seems to prove that Britain can forego its toehold in Ireland only at the expense of its own security. If a few million Irish are indifferent to the continued freedom of 46,000,000 English, Welsh, and Scots, they can hardly expect that their own claims to independence will receive a sympathetic hearing either in Britain or in America, which knows that its own fate is intimately linked to that of Britain.

The Price-Bill Fiasco

THE President must have had many misgivings in reaching his decision to sign the outrageous price-control bill which was dumped on his desk by a recalcitrant Congress. It is possible that he would have decided to veto it if he had not been able to obtain the cooperation of Secretary Wickard in checking the rise in farm prices. The Secretary's action in announcing that government-controlled stocks of wheat and corn will be placed on the market at 85 per cent of parity and his warning against price rises above the parity level indicated that the Cabinet was at last standing together in the effort to prevent inflation. This was confirmed when Mr. Wickard maintained his position in the face of an all-day grilling by the Senate Agriculture Committee. His stand is highly important in view of the powers given him by the price bill.

But even with an assurance that Mr. Wickard will not use his power to block the Administrator's efforts, the price-control bill is still an open invitation to inflation. The fact that it sets forth 110 per cent of parity as a legitimate goal for farm prices probably means that the farm bloc will not rest until it has succeeded in pushing prices to this point. The Administration has power to resist this effort through its control over the stores of surplus commodities, but if it exercises its powers too drastically it may find them curbed by a hostile Congress.

The seriousness of the situation which would arise if farm prices were allowed to rise to 110 per cent of parity does not seem to be generally understood either by Congress or by the public. From the consumers' point of view agricultural prices are by and large food prices. Food costs make up nearly half of the budget of the low-income groups. And food prices have already risen more than 20 per cent, as compared with a rise of less than 10 per cent in the other items in the family budget. Before reaching the ceiling provided in the price bill, wheat prices could rise another 40 cents a bushel, cotton could increase from 16 to 21½ cents a pound, corn could advance from 67 cents to $1.02 a bushel, potatoes could rise from 83 cents to $1.25, sheep from $5.15 to $7.17 a hundredweight, and butter might jump from 34 to 43 cents a pound. Four major farm products—beef cattle, veal calves, wool, and rice—have already reached the point where a ceiling could be imposed under the bill, but it is not expected that action will be taken at this time because of the Administration's desire to increase production of these products. Thus it is apparent that a very considerable increase in the cost of living of working-class families may take place without the Price Administrator being able to do anything to stop it. Such a rise in living costs is almost certain to be accompanied by demands for wage and salary increases which, if granted, will force up the prices of industrial products.

The most that can be hoped from the price bill is that the Price Administrator may be enabled to put the brakes on the inflationary process. He will constantly have to make adjustments upward, for he cannot maintain a ceiling if advancing raw-material and labor costs make it impossible for producers and distributors to break even. Leon Henderson, we may assume, will do everything in his power to check the inflationary process. The success of his efforts will depend not only on the support he receives from other government departments but on the policies which are adopted to finance the war. If the costs of the war are to be met primarily by an expansion of credit, it makes relatively little difference what powers are given the Price Administrator. Under such conditions there is no way in which the inflationary process can long be held under control. But if a determined effort to pay for the war by taxation is made and excess funds are drained off, either by voluntary or compulsory savings, there is hope that even at this late date the spiral of rising prices can be checked. The battle for an effective price-control measure has been lost. But the 1942 tax bill will open a new and more decisive phase of the same struggle.

Churchill's Vote

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

A VOTE of confidence in an hour of national danger means something quite different from what it would in ordinary times. No one knows that better than the British Prime Minister; so it is not likely that he will misinterpret his 464 to 1 victory last week in the House of Commons. That vote was not a measure of the confidence of the people's representatives in Mr. Churchill's government. It was a measure of Britain's determination to win the war.

Mr. Churchill, with his customary admirable frankness, had laid before the Commons the recent record of the government in conducting the war. He had again exposed without camouflage the disastrous lack of preparation which, from the start, has prevented the British, along with Hitler's other opponents, from meeting German aggression in sufficient force with adequate equipment at enough strategic points. This weakness is one for which the present government can be blamed in only a limited degree. Mr. Churchill took over liabilities accumulated through years of slackness and appeasement. His administration may not have reached Nazi standards of single-minded effort, but it has revolutionized British industrial methods and multiplied output.

Nor did Mr. Churchill's opponents convict him of major errors in strategy. Granted inadequate supplies of weapons and men, the choices before the British Defense Minister—who is also the Prime Minister—were desperate; and whatever choice was made was likely to seem unfortunate in retrospect. Since both courses were not possible, was it better to send supplies to Russia and reestablish an active front in the Middle East rather than put the major effort into the defense of Singapore? Mr. Churchill and his advisers decided that it was. They decided that it was more important to help Russia check Hitler's drive through the Caucasus and try to head off a thrust through the back door to Russia, India, and the Indian Ocean. Today, with Singapore under siege, the Dutch Indies invaded at half a dozen points, and India threatened from the East, it is easy to argue that the choice was a mistaken one. But when it was made the American fleet was intact in the Pacific and Japan was still pretending that it did not want war.

Whether or not Mr. Churchill's opponents were convinced by his defense is more or less beside the point; they never had any intention of turning out the government. It was the Prime Minister who insisted on a vote of confidence. Responsible democratic parliaments do not vote against a war government unless catastrophe persuades them of its bad management or its bad faith. That situation has not arisen in England. On the contrary, Mr. Churchill's leadership has become so profoundly identified with the will of the British people to fight and to win that the vote of confidence was really a declaration of faith in the nation itself; and, in spite of his sneers, Hitler must have well understood its significance.

But the vote which officially closed the debate did not end it in fact. Even though no final case was made against the government's conduct of the war, many telling points were raised, and they will keep coming up until the people are satisfied. Already one important change has been promised. In his second speech Churchill announced that he would appoint a single minister of production to take over functions now divided among three agencies. And it is more than likely that other changes—including some in the government itself—will follow. For the illogic of politics makes it easier for the head of a government to do what his opponents want if they vote for him than if they vote against him, and a closer division might well have inclined the Prime Minister to stand by his subordinates just because they and he faced greater odds. It will be no surprise if a few of the most egregious appeasers are eliminated within the next few months.

If they are not, the issue will be joined again. The people, the press, and the Commons are united in outspoken distrust of the Chamberlain hold-overs in the government. They distrust them no matter what happens at Singapore or in Libya. They distrust them for what they are—reactionaries, men who bear direct responsibility for Britain's present precarious position, men who sacrificed all but the very sticks and stones of England itself in their miserable attempts to buy off the aggressors.

As long as these men hold important posts, Churchill's government will labor under a cloud of suspicion that cannot be exorcised by talk. This fact is made amply clear in an article by J. Alvarez del Vayo on another page of this issue. Men will gladly fight and die, and will even march bravely to defeat if necessary, but only when they are led by men whom they honor and trust. The British people neither honor nor trust Sir John Simon, Sir Samuel Hoare, David Margesson, Sir Kingsley Wood, Lord Croft, Colonel Moore-Brabazon, and others of their breed. To most Englishmen these officials are vestigial relics of a regime that brought Britain to the edge of defeat. They are symbols of shame as well as of incompetence. Mr. Churchill has a terrible war to fight. In the months ahead he will need the confidence of the people far more than the support of party hacks. He cannot afford to drag along with him the burdensome load of political deadweights that are still attached to his ministry. In the sharp words spoken by the Labor member, Emanuel Shinwell, during the debate last week there was a solid basis of truth which the final vote could not obliterate. Said Mr. Shinwell: "I suggest there might be two votes of confidence—one for the Prime Minister and the other for the remaining members of the government. In the first case probably 90 per cent would vote for the Prime Minister. In the second instance 90 per cent of the House—and possibly the Prime Minister—would vote against the government."

Admonition from a Friend

Dear Freda: Please hush yo' mouf. Don't you know that all this yapping by liberals about the "free" European groups is upsetting to the Bèrles et al.? Don't you know that these architects of the future at work in their little vacuum down in Washington need the most complete quiet? You mention the "free" Spaniards as being among those who are getting the brush-off, and I am sure that you have in mind men like the Negríns and the Vayos who fought that protracted holding action back years ago when the issues were so clear, so indecently clear. But why bring all this up again when by so doing you risk upsetting delicately contrived plans for a real Free Spanish movement that can go places and, what's more, insure continuity in the department's Spanish policy?

The plan is roughly this: When Hitler moves down into Spain on his way to Gibraltar, Tangier, Casablanca, and way points, General Franco, behind the back of his little hand, will whisper a faint protest. And in London this protest will be carried to the Foreign Office by His Grace the Duke of Alba, who will say, "The Caudillo is having to submit to a fate worse than death, but through me and other friends abroad he is, vicariously, escaping it." Juan Francisco de Cárdenas will carry the same intelligence to our State Department. Then these two gentlemen will be charged with setting up a Free Spanish government around H. R. H. Don Juan de Bourbon y Battenberg, Alfonso's heir, and around Don Juan March, the "last pirate of the Mediterranean," and around the Bishop of Madrid-Alcala, who will either have to be smuggled out of Spain or, remaining there, go underground while his colleagues of the Spanish hierarchy continue to bless the Phalanx and the New Order. In this way the Old Spain of the grandees, the bishops, and the generals can't lose no matter who wins the war, and, assuming that we can win the war by such tricks as these, we will have insured, as I said above, continuity in British and American policy in Spain and the survival of the cherished values of the past to which we have sacrificed so much all these years.

Please, then, don't talk as you have been doing in every issue of late or you will spoil it all, simply wreck a program that goes far, far beyond old stuff like the Fourteen Points, the Pittsburgh agreement, and Peace without Victory. This time it is to be Victory without Peace—if you will only hush yo' mouf and give no hint to the peoples of Europe that there are in America men and women, millions of them, who also want to see the President's Four Freedoms made to mean something.

JAY ALLEN

Scapegoats and Facts

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE report of the Roberts board can be final only to those persons who are satisfied with merely finding scapegoats on whom to pin the blame for blunders. Virtually no military expert foresaw the attack on Pearl Harbor, and few would have prophesied its success if they had thought it possible. It is abundantly clear now as from the beginning that the attack succeeded not because Hawaii lacked ample defenses but only because of the worst failure in leadership known to American history.

The report should be followed up not merely with disciplinary action against the two luckless commanders but with thorough renovation of a military system that in time of test proved utterly defective. For the responsibility for Pearl Harbor goes farther back than General Short and Admiral Kimmel. The disaster was the outcome of faults—and a clinching proof of their existence—which experts have long observed in our army and navy: stupidity and lack of vision in the higher ranks and stubborn non-cooperation between the services. General Short and Admiral Kimmel were products of a system whose faults are now being mercilessly exposed by war.

Far too much of the responsibility lies with the American people themselves. As a nation we have normally pursued a course of disinterest in the armed services. Very few American newspapers and fewer magazines have given space to military affairs or employed persons competent to interpret them to the general public. Since no army or navy can become large and efficient overnight, the public attitude should at least be one of critical support, of sympathetic interest tempered with a readiness to attack blunders and shortcomings.

Intelligent criticism of the services has seldom been forthcoming. In the past civilians have rarely had sufficient knowledge to provide it—a condition which the services, with their tight censoring of news and ostrich-like attitude toward their own defects, have done little to remedy. Criticism from within, if aimed at anything really fundamental, has usually been promptly squelched. Only at rare intervals has an officer, especially one of junior grade, been fortunate enough to succeed in promoting changes without incurring official displeasure.

Every newspaper reader has heard of the case of "Billy" Mitchell in the 1920's. About the same time Admiral Magruder was demoted for revealing bad conditions in American naval yards. An even better illustration of the difficulty of effecting improvements against the opposition of the closed minds in the higher ranks is afforded by the case of Admiral William S. Sims, one of the ablest naval officers the United States ever produced. Early in his career Sims discovered that the gunnery of the American navy was less than a third as accurate as that of the other principal naval powers. Alarmed by his findings, he started a voluminous but entirely one-sided correspondence with the Navy Department, urging the necessity of reforms. When all attempts to bring about a change through the regular channels proved vain, Sims appealed directly to President Theodore Roosevelt, from whom he received authority to put his ideas into effect. They were revolutionary and quickly made American gunnery the best in the world. Had it not been for Roosevelt, the reformer would certainly have been court-martialed by incompetent superiors.

High-grade leadership in any activity depends on the education and selection of the abler personnel for positions of responsibility. Weakness in education may be overcome by intelligent choice of the best person for the job, but if the method of selection employed does not push up the best, the whole service is permanently weakened. In our navy and army rapid advancement of the best personnel is not the rule.

The system of naval promotion, though somewhat the better of the two, has long been a sore spot. Formerly the navy tried promotion by seniority, a method which offered no reward for superior ability and imposed no penalty for dulness or sloth. Men reached high position only when they were about ready to retire. So obvious were the shortcomings of this system that the method was changed to one by which officers were selected for retirement. When the "plucking board" began to cut into good material, further difficulties arose. Today the navy is still using retirement, but has added promotion through selection by boards of naval officers. Each candidate is required to serve a certain length of time in a given grade, and final retirement occurs at sixty-four.

This system has definite defects. The boards that do the selecting are faced with many candidates having similar records. Being human, the board members vote for those they know and like and against those who may in any way have aroused their antagonism. It is significant, for example, that officers not graduated from Annapolis but taken in during World War I have been retired far more rapidly than any other group. Similar considerations further the promotion of men of wealth and social position or with prominent relatives higher up in the navy. From time to time one hears rumors of "rings" and "cliques" within the service devoted to the advancement of their own members. Such reports are hard to check, but they have an ominous sound. William O. Stevens, writing in Forum less than three years ago, cited example after example of gross favoritism and the overlooking of major faults by selection boards. Further, candidates are graded as "most fitted," "fitted," and "not fitted" for promotion. Those in the second group, often excellent men, serve for a few years and are then, in normal times, retired. Only widespread publicity and the personal intervention of President Roosevelt in the spring of 1940 prevented the shelving of eight of the ablest aviation officers in the United States at a time when the navy was in desperate need of flying personnel.

On the whole, the abler men tend to rise, but they do not rise fast enough. Men attain the higher ranks in the United States navy at a more advanced age than in any other. Because they can reach flag rank only late in life and then enjoy it but a short time, most of their careers must be devoted to excellent performance of routine duties rather than to preparation for high command. Older men are also physically and mentally less rugged and are likely to have a rigidly conservative outlook and, as Pearl Harbor indicates, little imagination.

Unfortunately, along with abler persons, incompetents also rise to high rank. When a submarine disaster occurred along the Atlantic coast some years ago, the admiral in charge was cross-examined by a Congressional investigating committee as follows:

> Q. Why did it take so long for air to be started into the compartment?
>
> A. I just can't be positive about such things. I just can't remember. Ask the technical people.
>
> Q. Why was not the salvage line constructed to send breathing air into the torpedo chamber connected?
>
> A. Well, I don't really know. I can't answer that question. My impression is the divers did all they could do. As to details, I can't tell you. You'll have to ask the technical men.
>
> Q. When was the compartment air line connected?
>
> A. I don't know that it was connected. I'm not sure.
>
> Q. Is the Falcon well equipped for rescue work?
>
> A. There is none better anywhere, but I don't know. I can't be positive about such things.

This paragon of naval knowledge was severely censured by the committee for ignorance and incompetence—a fact which apparently did not weigh too heavily on the minds in the Navy Department, for early in the Roosevelt Administration he was promoted to the command of the battle fleet. The reverse side of the medal was the case of Admiral J. K. Taussig, World War hero, brilliant naval scholar, and one of the ablest officers in recent naval history. Whether his involvement in a naval feud on the wrong side back in the Wilson Administration affected his chances of reaching high command is impossible to prove, but though he was high on the list of admirals he was given no position more responsible than the command of a naval district and was retired for age within the past year.

The army has the advantage over the navy of knowing that its promotion system is in need of change. Experience of selective service has had a sobering effect on all but a handful of super-patriots who are convinced that army leadership, like everything American, is the best of its kind. In general outlines the system is not dissimilar to that of the navy except that a West Point background is of much less importance than the corresponding course at Annapolis. A minimum time must be served in each grade, and promotion through the ranks is slow but fairly sure. Efficiency reports, which are a factor in army as in navy promotion, are principally concerned with routine. But while the navy at least pays lip-service to selection by merit, the army promotes through the rank of colonel solely on the basis of seniority. Only when an officer approaches field rank does selection by merit partly replace seniority. The system is further complicated by the large number of reserve officers and national guardsmen, some holding commissions for no very good reason. The most hopeful present development is the granting of commissions to some of the fine selectees who have been called into service.

The results of the army promotion system are unfortunate. Able and original young officers remain in subordinate positions, worn down by the weight of inertia above. Generals are on the average about sixty years old, though Hitler has been able to discover men of the necessary caliber for high command who are in their forties. The estimable old gentlemen who reach positions of responsibility are not progressives, nor do they favor change. In fact, they have a record of having turned down virtually every military invention of the past century until long after it had been adopted elsewhere. And none of these men have been affected as yet by the weeding-out policy which has cut out much military deadwood in the lower ranks.

Probably the weakest part of our entire war system is the lack of provision for cooperation between the services. This has always been a hard military problem, but it has been solved by the Germans and to a considerable extent by the Russians and Japanese. Germany operates under a General Staff which has direction of all three branches. Its best officers are equally at home in the air, on the land, and at sea and are capable of commanding operations in all three services. It has the reality of unified command, with one officer having power to give orders to all units engaged in a given campaign.

Contrast this unity with the situation in the American armed forces. At Pearl Harbor the navy had the duty of long-range air and surface-vessel reconnaissance and of distant submarine and close-in surface-warship patrol. Both services had intelligence officers. Part of the mine-laying was the duty of the navy, part that of the army mine-planter service. Nearby air reconnaissance was the job of the army, as was the maintenance of shore fortifications and anti-aircraft guns. The defense duties of the two services continually overlapped; yet there was little or no exchange of information of vital importance. The army did not know what the navy was doing or failing to do, and the navy was equally in the dark as to the intentions of the army. Nor did officers in either service have the background of education and training necessary to an appreciation of the other's problems. Few would probably have wanted to acquire such a background, for the two groups have been notoriously unfriendly, and joint maneuvers have often produced more recrimination than coordination. In the army, provincialism is so pronounced that officers think mainly, not of their country, or even of the army, but of their own particular branch.

Some machinery has been set up to correct this condition, but it is pitifully inadequate. A few naval and army officers have attended the War College of the other service, but they are men of limited influence. In Washington three joint boards composed of higher army and navy officers deal with situations presenting problems to both services, but their functions are largely advisory and they do not in any sense represent coordinated planning. Real issues arousing sharp differences of opinion which make agreement difficult are generally dropped. Naval district commanders are supposed to work with army men of equal rank. In actual practice the connection is so slight that effective cooperation is almost wholly dependent upon the personal relations of the commanders involved. Neither is supreme in case of disagreement. When relations are not cordial, the result may well be—as at Pearl Harbor—catastrophe.

The remedy for these evils probably does not lie in drastic action, since sudden and unaccustomed changes tend to disrupt such efficiency as there is. Nevertheless, the system has to be changed. Naval and military men in the future should be given a general education in all the arts of war, and our inadequate joint boards should be at once replaced by a supreme General Staff similar to that of Germany. With the appearance of commanders competent to direct operations in more than one field, divided command and responsibility can be made a thing of the past. The haphazard organization of both the Department of the Navy and the Department of War, especially the latter, is knotted in red tape and would make a shining target for any efficiency expert. Promotion systems of both services need to be overhauled, and civilians, afflicted by neither intra-service nor inter-service jealousies, should help in the process. Pearl Harbor should have removed much of the smug complacency not only of the services but of the public as well. If it has not done so, our case is hopeless.

Jesse Jones, Reluctant Dragon

BY DWIGHT MACDONALD

I

> My whole working philosophy is summed up in a simple rule. If you buy something for a dollar and sell it for a dollar and a quarter, you can't lose.—JESSE JONES.

THE Texas millionaire whom President Roosevelt, after two months of hesitation, made chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the spring of 1933 has received a good deal of journalistic attention recently. By now almost everybody knows that Jesse Jones, as Secretary of Commerce, Federal Loan Administrator, and boss of the RFC, is probably the third most powerful individual in the country (or the second, if Nelson turns out to be a flash in the pan); that he is the mightiest state capitalist we have yet produced, an economic emperor who rules over one-third of the nation's home mortgages, 30 per cent of all railroad securities issued since 1932, 7 per cent of the stock of the country's insured banks, and about half of the total new war plant built since May, 1940; and that his RFC at the end of 1941 had war commitments totaling five and a half billions. By now most people are also beginning to realize that Jesse Jones has made an appropriately gigantic mess of the vital sectors of the war program intrusted to him, that he has played in with big business in financing—or rather in not financing—plant expansion and has failed disastrously to build up the stockpiles of rubber and tin he was supposed to amass. What I want to consider in these articles is not so much the fact of this bungling as the reasons for it, and especially what these reasons indicate about our present war-production program as a whole.

For all the multiplication of his titles, Jesse Jones still draws his power primarily from his autocratic control of the RFC. The development of the RFC, in peace and in war, is the history of a paradox: on the one hand, the breakdown of post-1929 American private capitalism has reached such proportions that the RFC has been forced—and I think "forced" is the word for it—to expand its sphere enormously, to assume the most unheard-of powers; on the other hand, Jones has administered the RFC within the framework of the old system, and thereby altered the balance of financial power within that framework, but has made a surprisingly small dent in the status quo in general. Jesse Jones may be a dragon, but he is a reluctant dragon when it comes to making any positive use of his vast powers. And like most dragons he exists chiefly to guard a pile of gold.

The RFC began, under Hoover, as a pure lending agency. Under Roosevelt, it soon also assumed the role of investor, buying the stock of banks—instead of lending them money which they, in their enfeebled condition, might have found hard to repay—and thus getting a voice in their management. Nor was it long before the RFC became a competitor of the private banks, using the threat of its huge lending power to drive interest rates down. Finally, since August, 1940, the RFC has been forced to become an entrepreneur, investing its own money in its own war plants. This extension into one field of finance after another has not been because "we planned it that way." Quite the contrary; so far as the record shows, the White House has been as wary of the explosive potentialities of the RFC as has Jones: in 1937, when the economic system seemed to be staggering to its feet again, Roosevelt ordered the RFC to wind up its affairs as speedily as possible, an order he had to rescind early in 1938 after the economy returned to a prone position; and it is significant that Roosevelt has never appointed a New Dealer as director of the RFC.

One way the RFC might have altered the status quo, for instance, would have been by providing capital for small business. Jones has not only refused to let the RFC do this but has managed to prevent anyone else from doing it. In 1938 William O. Douglas, then head of the SEC, proposed a chain of federal loan banks to provide funds for small enterprises. Correctly scenting in this plan an attempt to by-pass the RFC, Jones headed it off by lobbying through Congress the Glass-Steagall bill broadening the RFC's lending powers. He used these powers with such restraint, however, that a year later Senator Mead introduced a bill which would have practically forced the RFC to make loans to little business. Jones used his considerable influence with Congress to get the Mead bill killed. "A great majority of the people who came to us after Secretary Roper's little-business conference," he told the Senate committee studying the bill, "were people with ideas and promotion schemes." In a more innocent age of capitalism, ideas and schemes were considered quite respectable, but from his long experience in the RFC Jones has found that men with ideas and no capital are not such good credit risks as men with capital and no ideas; and his inflexible resolve has always been to keep the RFC on a "sound," that is, a profitable, basis—whatever "profit" may mean when all the money is government money. Jones has pushed Wall Street around on occasion, as in the recent Arkansas state-bond issue, which the RFC took away from a private syndicate. But these are the struggles of competitors, not of radically different systems. Jesse has never challenged the rules of the game.

The conflict between the RFC's powers and opportunities and the philosophy of its master has been sharpened by the war to a point that would be comic were it not so terribly serious for all of us. For the most significant difference between our present war economy and that of 1917-18 is not to be found in price controls, priorities, baby bonds, or one-man control of production, all of which had their parallels in the last war, but in the little-publicized fact that this time it is largely government capital that is financing the enormous plant expansion in steel, aluminum, aircraft, and other war industries.

This financing was handled almost entirely by Wall Street in the last war. The government's Capital Issues Committee, set up by the Federal Reserve Board early in 1918, was a sort of financial priorities board, regulating the flow of new security issues but supplying no funds itself. The only even remote parallel to what is happening in this war was the War Finance Committee—on which, by the way, Hoover modeled the RFC—which was founded May 20, 1918, partly to take over the functions of the Capital Issues Committee and partly to extend government credit where private funds were not available. But this second power was scarcely exercised: by the end of the war the WFC had lent less than $50,000,000, of which $20,000,000 went to Bethlehem Steel, then as now an Oliver Twist for government money. In the three years 1917-19 all branches of the federal government spent only $500,000,000 on new war plant, and this when $2,500,000,000 was spent on new plant throughout the country in the single year 1918.

Contrast these statistics: from May, 1940, to date the government has spent or earmarked $8,600,000,000 for new industrial plant. This is 80 per cent of the total capital going into such expansion and 40 per cent of the value placed by private industry on its entire plant in 1939. This war is clearly public property, and as state capitalist No. 1, Jesse Jones figures prominently in the process. The RFC's Defense Plant Corporation accounts for about $3,000,000,000 of the government's new plant. And in addition Jones has been in charge of certain other vast undertakings without any parallel in the First World War. By November, 1941, various Jones corporations had made commitments of over a billion and a half for the purchase of reserve stockpiles of tin, rubber, chrome, manganese, cork, silk, nitrate of soda, etc., while another half-billion of RFC money had gone to England in loans on British-owned American securities. In the last war loans to England and accumulations of raw materials were strictly private property.

No doubt many a Republican is convinced this is all a New Deal plot to socialize industry. Unfortunately it is not. The Administration has encroached on the domain of private enterprise—the preservation of which Roosevelt has formally announced is one of our war aims—with the utmost reluctance, yielding grudgingly to bitter necessity. "The government has hesitated to invest huge sums in new plants," comments the conservative United States News for January 23. "Both at the White House and in industry there was a wish to create as small a government-owned plant as possible. This explains, in part, the slow motion with which the defense program got under way." The result is a policy which has been timid, provisional, aimless, planless—a policy whose fitting executor is a man like Jesse Jones.

When the defense program was launched, the Administration and business both apparently assumed that plant expansion would be financed, as in 1917, by private funds. The whole summer of 1940 was consumed in the argument over terms, an argument that has turned out to be largely meaningless. When capital's sitdown strike finally forced through Congress in October the five-year-amortization provision, everyone expected a flood of private funds to pour into war plant. President Houston of the American Bankers' Association estimated at the time that the banks had available more than five billions for defense lending. Congress made defense contracts assignable as collateral for loans, the first government contracts so privileged in over a century. Still the borrowers hung back. In November, 1940, the RFC announced it would make loans to defense manufacturers at 1½ per cent interest. The banks were indignant at this cut-price competition, but they might have saved their emotions. Industry has shown no more eagerness to borrow from the government than from the banks: to date the total loans made by the RFC under this arrangement have only reached the relatively trifling sum of $300,000,000. The difficulty went too deep to be cured by either liberal amortization terms or low interest rates. The plain fact was that private business hesitated to invest capital in new war plants because of its quite justified fear of the post-war effects of this expansion on private capitalism.

The formula which solved the problem was worked out by Emil Schram, who took the chairmanship of the RFC when Jones resigned to become Federal Loan Administrator. On August 20, 1940, the formation of an RFC subsidiary named the Defense Plant Corporation was announced, its purpose being vaguely and modestly defined as to "perform miscellaneous financing tasks for which there is no other provision." The formula is a simple one: the DPC advances to private corporations the funds with which to erect new steel mills, machine-tool shops, or what not, or to build additions to existing plants; the plant thus built is the property of the DPC and is leased by the DPC to the private corporation in question, which generally has an option to buy the plant after the war if it wants to. Thus the state assumes all the entrepreneurial risk, and the private corporation can buy the plant later on if it looks profitable. The bulk of construction in steel, aluminum, and other basic industries has gone up under the DPC formula.

Jesse Jones

Nor is this all, or even the half of it. The scale on which the RFC has so far intervened in the workings of the American economy is nothing compared to the scale on which it could intervene if it exercised the powers granted it since the war began. The RFC act signed by the President on June 25, 1940, gave the RFC authority (1) to lend money for war purposes to any corporation; (2) "when requested by the Federal Loan Administrator, with the President's approval," to buy, lease, or itself build plants for producing war materials; and (3) "if the President finds it necessary for a government agency to engage in such manufacture, to engage in such manufacture itself." A year later another RFC act was passed and signed which permits the RFC to form government corporations "to take any action deemed necessary to expedite the defense program." Just that, without qualification. Jones, who suggested this wording himself, testified that the act would give the RFC "the power to do whatever it lacked the power to undertake heretofore." The decision as to what activities are necessary "to expedite the defense program" is left in the hands of two men: the President—and the Federal Loan Administrator. "If we pass the bill," said Representative Wolcott, ranking Republican on the House Banking Committee, "the Congress might as well fold up as far as any direction of defense activity is concerned." Indeed, the power of the purse, traditional safeguard of parliament against the encroachment of the executive arm, has rarely been more completely surrendered than in these two RFC acts. From its inception the RFC has been free of direct Congressional control, getting its funds from the Treasury; in 1938 it was empowered to finance itself by selling its bonds and notes direct to the public, and has not since then been included in the budget; it has its own accountants and is "entirely free from audit by the General Accounting Office." The last two RFC acts have struck the remaining Congressional shackles off this giant of state capitalism. "This bill," said Mr. Wolcott, "would make it possible to establish a fascist state in America."

Republicans are not the only people who have seen in Jesse Jones and his RFC a potential base for fascism within the Administration. There is no question that his vast powers could be used in that direction, and that certain of his traits—his autocratic methods, his preference for personal government, his itch to expand his sphere of influence—are not reassuring. But I should say that there is a good deal more of Chamberlain than of Schacht in Jones, that he is a prime example of what Guenter Reimann calls "the conservative man," neither a reactionary nor a fascist but rather "a lover of the status quo," a rentier type whose interests are "the maintenance of property rights, especially the value of money" ("Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences"). He has not used his war-time powers in a socially progressive way, but neither has he used them to extend political control over the economy in a fascist direction. He has, in fact, not used them positively at all. He is a very reluctant dragon.

[In a second article Mr. Macdonald will discuss Jesse Jones as a person, the sources of his power, and the effect of his policies on the war program.]

Leaders, Not Ghosts

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

CONTRADICTORY as it may seem, at no time since the fall of France has the possibility that the war could be lost been so seriously considered as during the last few weeks. Military critics, known for their cautious judgment, are warning the public against the danger of assuming that the democracies, in the very nature of things, are already assured of victory. It sounds contradictory because this rude awakening comes just two months after America's entrance into the war and when, for the first time since the opening of hostilities in Europe, the German armies are retreating under the impact of Russia's lunging drive. Instead of experiencing a new feeling of security and confidence, people of sensitive political perceptions are beginning to fear that within three months the democracies may find themselves in the most difficult position they have faced since the Germans entered Paris.

It is not so much the anticipation of precise military events that creates this concern as the conviction that between next spring and autumn Hitler will employ the whole power of the Axis to establish himself in a position from which it will be infinitely harder for the Allies later to dislodge him. Suppose, for instance, that he flings against Russia the last man and machine that he can muster, and that Japan, having completed its task in the southwestern Pacific, strikes at the same time at Siberia. All the immense advantage achieved by the Russian counter-offensive this winter and by the entry of the United States into the war would suddenly be largely neutralized. The situation would then be like that of 1941: the bulk of Europe lost, and the possibility of effective action reduced to an effort to save England from a Nazi invasion. Should Hitler succeed in crushing Russia, thus eliminating the threat of a powerful enemy in his rear, the Allies' hope of opening a second front in Western Europe would vanish. An entire year would have been lost.

No doubt a year seems only a minute in the complacent imagination of some of the lesser statesmen intrusted with the task of guiding the democracies to victory. With delight they have embraced the theory that a long war is inevitable. It is like giving themselves a blank check in order to make up for their inability to act rapidly and intelligently.

In the mouths of such people the argument that the war must be long becomes one of the greatest obstacles to victory. Why, for instance, grow excited because in the field of political warfare months and months elapse without any serious attempt to accomplish something worthy of the seriousness of the issue? With a long war ahead everything can be organized with moderate speed. There is time for every kind of experiment. Broadcasts to Europe can still be casual and ineffective. The subjugated people of the Continent can continue their pathetic daily struggle against the Nazi invaders, living on hope until the hour shall at last arrive when the democracies can offer them something more heartening than eulogistic phrases in occasional official messages and speeches. Dukes and archdukes can be encouraged in their dream of monarchical restoration. The most fanciful plans for a restored balance of power can be worked out in collaboration with the Eckhardts of every nationality. Acting President Castillo of Argentina can be left quietly to himself until by some natural process he falls under the spell of hemispheric unity and decides to recompense the democracies for their benevolent attitude toward pro-Axis dictators. In the course of a long war every momentous mistake can be rectified. It is comforting to be provided with so much time that one may indulge one's political inclinations, combine a dislike for Hitler with a tolerance of Franco or Pétain, and wait placidly until the world is finally freed from the totalitarian menace but also secured against the threat of any really progressive social trend.

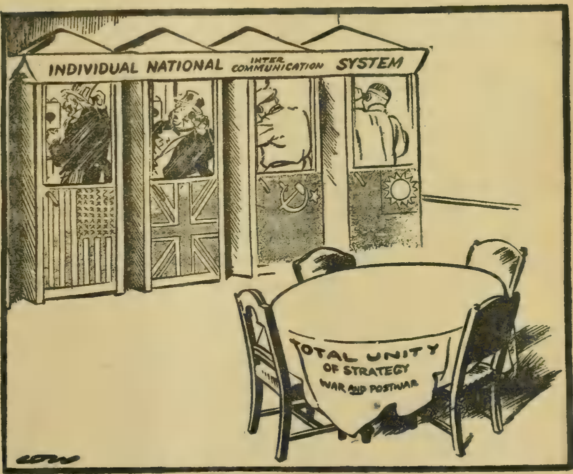
So think the saboteurs of victory whom this life-and-death struggle has incomprehensibly left in positions from which they can powerfully influence the outcome of the war. Appeasers from the bottom of their hearts but finding every day fewer outlets for their talents as one by one the reactionary regimes enlist on the side of Hitler, they now try to appease time. The best of them quiet their consciences by telling themselves that since the democracies have a vast superiority to the Axis in industrial resources and in men, it is merely a question of awaiting the year when the Allies will outdistance Hitler in the air, on land, and on the sea to such a degree that a mechanical solution will finally impose itself. They overlook the fact that the Axis fully understands the crucial value of time and may well be prepared to prolong the war for its own purposes.

Through lack of democratic initiative the theory of a long war may become a graver reality than some of those imagine who have accepted the idea of defeating Hitler by the mid-forties. To illustrate this danger, one can do no better than recall two modern examples of resistance long maintained in spite of inadequate means—China and Spain. The case of Spain is especially suited to our argument since the heroism and determination of the Loyalist army were thwarted by the limited extent of its territory. In Spain we did not enjoy the infinite spaces of China which make the loss of a few hundred miles an insignificant setback. But in spite of these limits the Spaniards demonstrated that when a people is determined not to surrender, even the worst air attacks will not bring defeat. What reason, then, to suppose that the Nazis could not hold out for many years in their own country and some of the occupied lands if next spring, with the help of Japan, they should inflict a major defeat on Russia?

The only victorious approach to the still tremendous problem of crushing the Axis is to face the possibility of a long war if it is necessary but at the same time to work with initiative and decision to prevent the waste of a single hour that might help the enemy intrench himself in positions from which it will be an almost superhuman task to dislodge him. The only victorious attitude is to understand the revolutionary character of the war and to be ready to risk anything except a Hitler triumph.

Unhappily, up to the present there is not a single decisive indication that the revolutionary character of the war has been understood, or that the necessity for countering the revolutionary strategy of the Axis with democratic revolutionary strategy has been seriously considered. In the last two months I have spoken to two men on their return from Europe who, owing to their positions, had opportunities to talk to high German officials and to feel out the reaction to the so-called democratic propaganda in Germany and the occupied countries. One, Gabriel Gonzales Videla—I may name him because he is not returning to his post—was the Chilean Minister to Vichy. He passed through New York on his way to his own country, where for a time he was a candidate for the presidential nomination. The second, whom I had better not name because he may return to Europe, besides being in France had visited Berlin and Rome. Both agreed on two things: first, that there are immense possibilities for immediate political warfare in Europe; second, that the political strategy used by the democratic agencies in charge of propaganda has been so inadequate and so unoriented that the Nazis comment on it with open amusement.

It is unfortunate that up to now, for various reasons, the field of political warfare has been abandoned entirely to the Axis powers, whether in Europe, Latin America, or Africa. But it is still worse that some of the men who have shown great courage and vision in vitalizing their respective countries in the present crisis do not yet realize that it is as important to fight Hitler and his associates on all fronts, with all possible means, and to encourage the subjugated peoples to rise, as it is to create a powerful industrial and military machine. Even some of the best democratic leaders are inclined to look upon political warfare as an invention of a few anti-



INDIVIDUAL NATIONAL INTER-COMMUNICATION SYSTEM
TOTAL UNITY OF STRATEGY WAR AND POSTWAR
Low

SIT DOWN TO IT, LADS

fascist refugees obsessed with a vision of themselves mounted on a steed ready to lead their countrymen in a dramatic attempt to gain liberation.

Political war means more than blowing up a German train in France or sending machine-guns to the Yugoslav guerrillas. It means understanding that the battle between the fascist forces and the democracies can only end with the total destruction of the enemies of democracy wherever they are found. Political war may mean tearing from Franco the mask of a fictitious neutrality which for so long has played its part in preventing the Allies from planning the invasion of Europe through Spain. Political war may mean helping the Argentine democrats in their struggle against an administration that betrays the will of the nation and serves only Nazi ends. It may mean, for the sake of victory, opposing a group of capitalists or industrialists who have a vested interest in slowing up production. It may mean elaborating a program of post-war organization which allows for the substitution, if it proves necessary, of a Socialist economy for the old regime of private capitalism; it may mean planning the economic and political organization of the world on principles so large-minded that millions of men and women now in the midst of the struggle will be inspired with the conviction that they are fighting for something higher than the preservation of an obsolete and contradictory way of life.

Conceived in these long-range terms, political war cannot be left to men incapable of bold initiative and hostile to the use of genuinely popular methods, men who year after year have carried out a policy of capitulation, who think only in terms of preserving the old order. You and I would be amazed to find any of the few remaining liberals or democrats in Germany or Italy employed in the Foreign Office or in any other agency engaged in political warfare. But it seems perfectly natural and proper to find in corresponding departments in the democratic governments men who, before Italy was involved in the war, adored Mussolini, who now like Pétain, and who before 1939 would have been delighted to make a deal with Hitler. The Englishman in the street, and the Englishman in the House of Commons, cannot understand why a democracy at war can break with a hundred traditions, accept the most radical system of taxation, dismiss admirals, replace generals, and yet be unable to throw out the half-dozen presumptuous foreign-policy "experts" who have succeeded in paralyzing Britain's political action abroad; or why a Sir Samuel Hoare cannot be replaced by someone who at least would not excite the cynicism and mockery of a Serrano Suñer.

The world has gone to pieces, not because the so-called experts in foreign policy were not given a chance to prove their ability to avert a clash between the Axis and the democracies, but because they were permitted year after year to attempt an impossible reconciliation. If on the eve of Munich Sir Horace Wilson, Neville Chamberlain's adviser, and indeed the whole technical staff of the British Foreign Office, had disappeared overnight and been replaced by a coal miners' leader who had had no experience whatever in foreign affairs but who would have said "No" to Hitler, Great Britain's interests would have been better served.

The first requisite for successful political war is a leadership with political vision. Some sort of high command should be established to deal directly with all matters relating to political strategy; the paralyzing influence of officials who can think only in terms of departmental routine should be ended forever. Then, if the question of ending the scandalous farce of Spanish neutrality should arise, the agency to decide what course to follow would not be the British ambassador at Madrid or the "experts" of the Spanish Division at the Foreign Office but the special council intrusted with the conduct of political war. If it were found necessary to send one or a hundred political agents to the Continent or to Latin America, no routine official of the Visa Division would be allowed to decide whether or not the required documents would be provided. The decision would rest with the council for political warfare. If ten additional radio stations were required for broadcasting to occupied countries, negotiations concerning them would not drag out for months. The council for political warfare would have the authority to requisition such facilities immediately, and for twenty-four hours a day, if necessary.

After reading even the summarized accounts of the recent debate in the House of Commons, one cannot doubt that in the end the people will impose the revolutionized conception of the war that a democratic victory requires. The people cannot run the risk of losing to Hitler, and at any moment they may react with unsuspected energy. In spite of the admirable British calm and the remarkable sense of responsibility of British public opinion, politically educated as nowhere else in the world, the people are demanding that the government cleanse itself of the appeasers left with it from the epoch of great errors. Not even the immense prestige of a Churchill will suffice to silence them. The clamor for a shake-up in the Cabinet decreased a little when anxiety about the fate of Moscow and Leningrad gave place to the satisfaction of seeing the Russian armies take the initiative and throw the enemy back, but it has increased again with the aggravation of the situation in Singapore. It is a state of mind which rebels against the idea that while the nation is required to make the greatest sacrifices of all time, men whom people of liberal spirit do not trust are kept in posts of responsibility.

On the other hand people have not forgotten what has happened in Europe during the past two years. The example of France is there, alive, as a terrible warning.

Generals and admirals, politicians who had claimed a monopoly of patriotism, sold out the French people in a gesture of capitulation as useless as it was shameful. People do not want to have even as the head of a post office a vulgar rascal like Laval, capable by temperament of betraying his trust, or a man of the type of Neville Chamberlain, capable of ruining his country out of stupidity. People want to see directing the war men able to win it, if possible in one year, if not, in ten years —but able to win.

On the other hand, people, and I refer to the great majority of the men and women enlisted in the cause of democracy, want to see at the head of their country men who they need not fear will betray the peace after they have won the war. Everybody who goes around today in the United States or who has contacts with the people in Europe knows how passionately the public is interested in the social, economic, and international organization of tomorrow, perhaps even more than in the day-by-day progress of the war. This interest has nothing to do with our heritage from the last war. It is a mixed feeling of hope and of fear, of doubt about the stand of the democratic governments on those problems and of savage determination not to allow themselves to be robbed of the peace. Never before did the Napoleonic theory that every war brings its own revolution find such clear confirmation. And the people in England and everywhere else ask themselves what kind of peace they can expect from all the Sir John Simons who still survive politically. I shall never forget hearing, the other day, an intelligent American woman say that if by touching an electric button the Nazi armies could be annihilated tomorrow and Hitler and his gang destroyed, the peace for which we are fighting would in that moment be lost.

This uneasiness is shared by millions of people in every continent—in Latin America by the masses that suspect a monstrous marriage between democracies and reactionary dictatorships, in Europe by everyone who has seen the democracies courting the worst accomplices of Hitler. The sinister shadow of appeasement reaches out beyond the war and darkens the outlook for a real peace.

To the degree in which the military situation again deteriorates, the clamor for vigorous democratic leadership will be heard with increasing vehemence. It is not an empty demand. It is a demand for action, for matching at last the revolutionary character of the Nazi strategy by those great, audacious plans and enterprises that in the end must mean just one thing: to take away the initiative from Hitler; to attack and, without neglecting a single front, military or political, to bring the war to the battlefield on which it must finally be won—the battlefield of Europe. It is the invasion of Europe by the armies of the democracies sustained by the revolt of the conquered peoples, invasion through Spain, through Italy, wherever it is possible, without any hesitation or scruple regarding regimes which are in the service of Hitler; that is what the people demand, determined not to sacrifice the will to victory to the complacent acceptance of a long war.

Ogpu at Work

BY RICHARD H. ROVERE

TWO weeks ago The Nation published a letter from Dr. Frank Kingdon urging that the Soviet government be called upon to explain its action in spiriting away two respected leaders of the Polish Socialist Party, Heinrich Ehrlich and Victor Alter. From reputable sources in Mexico comes further evidence that Stalin's foreign agents, unlike the Red Army, are less eager to fight Nazis than anti-Communist radicals. An atmosphere of imminent attentat hangs over a refugee colony in a remote quarter of Mexico City, where five men who fled Hitler's terror in Europe are being shadowed and threatened by Stalin's secret police. They are Gustav Regler, a German novelist who fought valiantly for the Loyalists during the Spanish Civil War and was for some time political commissar of the International Brigades; Victor Serge, French author and former editor of several Anarchist and Communist publications; Marceau Pivert, once secretary to Léon Blum, an official in the Popular Front regime, and the head of a small socialist party in pre-war France; Julian Gorkin, a leader of Spain's P. O. U. M.; and Grandiso Muniz, an obscure Spanish journalist. They are men of varying character, prominence, and ideas, but each, according to his lights, has played some part in the fight against fascism.

The campaign that has put these men in daily fear of their lives began a few months ago when one André Simone returned to Mexico from the United States. In Mexico, as in this country, Simone represents himself as a noted French journalist who has recently published two books on the war. Actually, he is Otto Katz, an Ogpu agent who once bought up European newspapers for the Communist International. He is working in Mexico as an Ogpu agent, and his present assignment, apparently, is to stir up public sentiment against Regler, Serge, and the others. Having started an inflammatory press attack upon them, Katz has now organized "vigilante committees" to deal with these men, whom he calls "the leaders of the Nazi fifth column in Latin America."

Character assassination in the press of Mexico, where political passions are easily touched off, is a matter to be taken far more seriously than it is in this country. Katz's campaign has been unusually violent and provocative. First there appeared a few articles in the official Communist press describing the men as Hitler agents. The same description, in fatuous detail, was printed in El Popular, a trade-union daily of wide circulation, in the form of a report from the Communist Party. Then, on January 15, the most daring fraud of all appeared in Excelsior, the largest and most respected paper in Mexico. Under a Washington date line, a writer who signed himself John Willes claimed that some sort of secret-police meeting held in Washington had singled out Gorkin, Pivert, and Serge as "tools of the Nazis" and "dangerous obstacles to hemisphere solidarity." Mr. Willes, who may exist but cannot be located in Washington or Mexico, reported further that "in Washington" it was believed that the task of checking these men and their followers demands "the reciprocity and cooperation . . . of the police forces of the North American continent." He went on to say that the Rio conference, then about to start, should, in Washington's view, decide just what measures were needed to stop these leaders of Hitler's pre-invasion army.

No official circles in Washington have been known to express an opinion about any of the five devils of Mr. Willes's piece. Fiction from beginning to end, the story was an attempt to use the prestige of the United States government for partisan purposes in which this country has no interest whatever. It was, moreover, so clearly an incitation to violence that if unusual precautions were not being taken, the Ogpu would hardly need to bother itself further about the matter: it would be difficult to blame any ordinary Mexican patriot for dealing directly with men accused by United States authorities and a responsible Mexican newspaper of being active traitors.

If these five men, falsely charged with being fascist agents, are saved from assassination in Mexico, they still have death from another source to fear. For, on the basis of the Excelsior story and others like it, a resolution to deport them, sponsored by a Communist deputy, is making headway in the Mexican legislature. If they are forced to leave Mexico, they can only fall into the hands of the Nazis in Europe or elsewhere, for our State Department will not grant them entry here.

It is important that these men be saved from death or deportation, and the Mexican government will soon have in its hands demands from many prominent Americans that they receive full protection. But the incident raises another important issue. Russia has built up over the years an international force of gangsters to deal with real and imagined enemies. It is still functioning, not only against Nazism but against honest men and women who have at one time or another incurred the displeasure of the Russian dictator and his petty bureaucrats. If, as Ralph Bates and others have recently argued, the Soviet Union now deserves the full cooperation and trust of the liberal movement, it can go a long way toward winning respect by turning the efforts of its agents against the real foes of democracy. It will be a good deal easier to accept Russia as a genuine ally when the Russians have the good sense to call off their Otto Katzes.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Have We Enough Power?

AMONG the basic factors of our war potential, electric power ranks with steel-making capacity, oil resources, and the supply of skilled labor and machine-tool equipment. Nor does its importance nowadays lie only in our dependence on it to turn the wheels of industry; more and more the metal and chemical industries are absorbing huge amounts of power in electrolytic processes. Aluminum is extracted from bauxite by these means, magnesium conjured out of sea water. The normal method of producing chlorine gas, an essential raw material for a host of industries, is by passing an electric current through cells containing brine. Important by-products of this process are caustic soda, which the rayon industry uses in large quantities, and hydrogen. Tinplate can be manufactured electrolytically, and since this method economizes the use of tin it may be widely substituted for the usual hot-dip process.

It is fortunate that in the matter of electric power we have a big edge on our enemies. Just how big this is, it is difficult to say, however, as the last reliable figures of German, Italian, and Japanese installed capacity are for the year 1936. Since then, information on this subject has been treated as a military secret. The United States today has something over 44 million kilowatts of installed capacity in public utilities, and industrial undertakings possessing their own power plants account for at least another 10 million. German capacity in 1936 was a little over 15 million kilowatts, Italian 5.36 million, and Japanese 6.77 million. Both the Germans and the Japanese are known to have made very considerable additions since, but allowing generously for this expansion, the total capacity of the three Axis powers is almost certainly less than 40 million kilowatts.

The question can also be approached from the angle of total annual power production. In this country in 1941 total production was in the neighborhood of 205 billion kilowatt-hours, and if we add estimates for Canada and Britain we have a figure for three of the United Nations alone of 273 billion kilowatt-hours. Here again figures for the Axis nations can only be guessed at on the basis of very incomplete data. But giving them the benefit of every doubt, and including a very substantial amount for the power output of the occupied countries, we arrive at an estimate of 200 billion kilowatt-hours.

The fact that we can outdistance our enemies in the matter of power does not mean, however, that the needs of our gigantic armament program are amply covered. For some months the Federal Power Commission and some OPM experts have been warning that a power shortage is on the horizon. In a report issued last September the Federal Power Commission pointed out that peak demands for power were proving well above anticipations and continued:

> It is significant that the major part of these underestimates occur in important war-material areas. Since capacity additions are scheduled on the basis of forecasts made two or more years > in advance of experienced loads, it is obvious that serious power shortages may develop in some areas if the longer-range forecasts contain cumulative errors of the magnitude that have occurred for three-month periods.

After the United States entered the war and the greatly expanded production program was announced, Thomas R. Tate, director of the National Defense Power Staff, told a Congressional subcommittee that there would be a power shortage of around 2 million kilowatts this year and between 3 and 4 million in 1943. As a remedy he proposed reconditioning of existing equipment, expediting of new installations, and rapid construction of interconnecting transmission lines so that resources can be pooled and no capacity allowed to remain idle while other plants are overburdened.

This expectation of shortage is not shared by the electric-power industry, whose spokesman C. W. Kellogg, president of the Edison Electric Institute, stated on January 22 that the outlook was reassuring with a present surplus of 9 million kilowatts of generating capacity above the greatest demand for power and with the construction of an equal amount in prospect during the next three years. In support of this view Mr. Kellogg quoted a recent report of the Federal Power Commission which found that the energy consumed in the filling of government orders during 1941 totaled 7,257,913,975 kilowatt-hours while the total disbursements for national defense were $12,531,000,000. This indicates a ratio of six-tenths of a kilowatt-hour per dollar of defense expenditure. Thus, assuming total war expenditure reaches the budget figure of $56 million in 1943, the increase in electric output directly for the increased war load should run from 32 to 35 billion kilowatt-hours.

One possible objection to this calculation is its underlying assumption that the ratio of energy consumed to war goods produced will remain unchanged. This seems unlikely. During 1941 a great deal of our defense expenditure was for building new plants and new camps. Now those plants are getting into production, and it seems probable that a million dollars spent on manufacturing shells or tanks or planes is going to give rise to a greater consumption of energy than the expenditure of the same sum on building; where the ratio of labor costs to total value is high. Moreover, a significant part of the new production will be in industries employing electrolytic processes with a larger than average consumption of power. It takes 10 kilowatt-hours to produce a pound of aluminum, 12 for a pound of magnesium. With aluminum now costing 15 cents per pound, the production of one dollar's worth of this metal requires 66⅔ kilowatt-hours. A total production of 200 million pounds—the latest program—will call for 20 billion kilowatt-hours annually.

It is certain, in any case, that last year the percentage growth in output of energy for public use was more than twice the percentage increase in installed capacity. For the twelve months ending November 30, 1941, total production was up 15.5 per cent over that for the twelve months ending November 30, 1940. Installed capacity in publicly and privately owned electric utilities rose last year by 2,850,000 kilowatts, according to the Wall Street Journal, or an increase of under 7 per cent. Scheduled construction of new capacity for 1942 is somewhat greater, but unless there is a sharp reversal in the present trend of consumption, the industry's reserve margin will be much narrowed, if it does not disappear altogether. Already there is talk of rationing domestic and trade consumers, and should this become necessary the private utilities are going to feel the effect in their earnings, for while the wholesale users of current may provide their bread it is the householder and the shopkeeper who spread the butter and jam on it.

In the Wind

WHEN THE PRESIDENT issued his order against racial discrimination in government and defense work, a great many Negroes sought employment in Washington's new and expanded agencies. Those whose abilities passed muster were notified that they were in the employ of the government and on its pay roll, but that they would have to wait for a definite assignment before starting work. Like all other successful applicants, they were sent to "pools" throughout the city to await selection by department heads. Almost none of the Negroes have been selected, however, and most of the pools now have far more Negroes than whites. Last week a War Department executive asked for a secretary of specified abilities from the department's pool. No white girl qualified, but three Negroes did. The post has not been filled and presumably will not be until a white girl is found for it.

A CLERICAL CORRESPONDENT has written America, the Catholic weekly, inquiring why the rubber priorities which prohibit the manufacture and sale of tires to civilians have not been applied to other goods, of whose use the church disapproves.

SOCIALISTS IN SWEDEN have raised three million kroner to start a new anti-Nazi evening paper, Aftontidningen. The paper will attempt to counter the influence of Aftonbladet, Stockholm's only evening paper at present and a supporter of close relations with Germany.

FROM AN International News Service (Hearst) story in the Santa Barbara News-Press: "California newspaper publishers demanded at their fifty-fourth convention Saturday that all enemy aliens be removed from the West Coast as a defense precaution. Another resolution adopted urged the federal government to advertise in Eastern metropolitan newspapers that hysteria has not gripped the West Coast because of war."

AN ORGANIZATION called the Anti-Monroe Doctrine Society has been formed in Texas. Its policy is to open North and South America to free "white" European immigration; its motto is, "The whole Western Hemisphere must be inhabited by white people."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. The $5 prize for the best item received in January goes to R. B. of San Francisco for his story of the Associated Farmers' lobby published last week.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Rumors Are Symptoms

DON'T fault me if I'm scunnered," old fishermen say on the sand banks back of Hatteras. And sportsmen, who come every year to the village of bright-painted houses among the stunted live-oak trees and waterbushes for deep-sea fishing, understand that in the language of the shore they mean, "Don't blame me if I'm disgusted." I am not saying that. But a lot of rumors from beyond the beak of Hatteras, where enemy submarines have been engaged, began recently to filter through America. I am testifying that at least in that country which runs from Hatteras to the first mountains you cannot stop rumors by command.

It has been energetically attempted. Sharp words about the wickedness of rumors have come from people presumably in authority in army and navy and civilian forces. The good American, we are told, quickly turns a cold and challenging eye upon the neighbor who comes pouring out an exciting tale of an unannounced happening. On the West Coast, which is as far as you can get from Hatteras, legionnaires are flashing on such talkers a button bearing the inscription, "How do you know?" The button may temporarily silence the chagrined talker. But my observation is that he will find plenty of other listeners. Indeed, both the talk and the listening seem to be as prevalent among the multitude of officials in Washington as in any gossiping over any back fences anywhere in America—and generally just as unfounded and irresponsible.

Of course by this time it ought not to be necessary to prove to anybody that loose talk may be dangerous talk. The movie star standing in a real hole in a real ship dramatizes fact and not merely propaganda when she reports through the picture caption that it was talk which sent the torpedo accurately to its mark. Undoubtedly not all listeners are idle ones even if vastly more talking is done by conversationalists than by spies. There is real need of intelligence in the use of tongues. But I don't think all the danger comes from the silly people who just won't shut up. The first necessity is to keep facts which might aid and comfort him from the enemy, but another is the maintenance of the faith of the American citizen that he is getting all the facts he can be allowed to have from the standpoint of national safety, and that he is being kept informed about the worst news as well as the best.

News has become a necessity to him. No other people in the history of the world were ever taught to count upon it so much. But in war the American is not opposed to censorship. Indeed, he is enthusiastically and devotedly in favor of guarding his country's secrets from the Germans, the Italians, the Japs. The only problem in America for both the censors and the people is the terrifically difficult one of drawing the line between giving aid to the enemy and destroying confidence at home. Draw it an iota too far in the direction of news freedom, and the enemy may sink a ship. Draw it a mite too far in the direction of news suppression, and the people will cease to count on their newspapers and radios while the grapevine finds credulity.

I am no psychologist. It may be valuable in psychological warfare to keep the Germans in the dark about what happened to those submarines off Hatteras. But the Germans are not the only people subject to psychology. And secrecy about sinking submarines may work strangely around in the mind of America to suspicions of secrecy about sugar, to hoarding, and beyond sugar and hoarding to the whole realm of possibility in whispering. Indeed, it may lead to the loud rumoring which already has brought condemnation from those in command. Beyond the condemnation the fact remains that in America today no one else is quite so eagerly listened to as the man with the inside story that did not get into the papers—which in fact may have come out of thin air. He may be a fool, a menace, a loud-mouthed saboteur. His audience gathers in the hope of getting news which is denied.

Of course, some of it should be denied. But the prevalence of the rumors is the measure of the problem of maintaining confidence in a free press in the midst of the task of defending a free country. I am condemning nobody. Nobody should expect those who have the job to have solved the problem so soon. It is only important that we recognize that it is not solved. Slapping on essential censorship is one thing—the easiest thing. Preserving confidence in the agencies of information at home under censorship is another—the more difficult thing. We shall probably always have cockeyed rumors. But now is the time to recognize rumors as symptoms requiring treatment and not merely condemnation. Nothing could give more aid and comfort to the enemy than loss of confidence in news about their country and their war among the people of the United States.

BOOKS and the ARTS

J. P. Popo, Esquire

BY GILBERT HIGHET

SO LITTLE has happened in my life, and most of it has been so boring, that I scarcely feel like writing it down. Only I have so few occupations now, with the house burned down and Agatha in the asylum, that it seems like a good way of filling in time. Besides, it will do something to complete the records of the Simpkin family, so far as they go. My cousin Slug likes to laugh at me because I think it is something to be a Simpkin; but he is a decent fellow in his way, and he can't mean it. After all, he is practically a Simpkin himself, although his mother did marry exogamously—she was the Duchess of Yeominster, or something like that. We seldom speak of it any more.

Anyhow, I was going over my scars the other day, and it struck me that after I was gone nobody would really know how I had got them, and how the Erickson creed had been lived by at least one of its fellows. Naturally I went to Erickson. It was quite old—founded by Leif Erickson, they said, although it was Dr. Mumbudget who really built it up, starting in 1885. I don't know what I should have done without Erickson, both in youth and afterward. The only real people I ever knew were Old Budgers, as we called ourselves. Of course, after I got thrown about the world a bit, I had to meet some people out of my own class. Two or three times, for business reasons, I was compelled to dine with a man who had been to some place called Princetown, but the deal didn't go through, and it is easy to see why. Then I used to hear a college at Boston spoken of, but there are so many such institutions there it is hard to differentiate between this, that, and the other. I once met a man from one of them who used "intimate" to mean "hint" and said things like "Whom is it from?" and that rather discouraged me from associating with people who were not Budgers. I always tried to be a Budger myself, and some thought I succeeded.

Father wasn't a Budger. He wasn't anybody, really. But he invented a thing called the automobile, which became very popular, almost a necessity in many households. I never cared about it myself. After I stroked the crupper of my first horse, I knew that was what I was meant for. I was to be a horseman, and a horseman I have remained. But I became chairman of the board after Father died, and it pays me a million or two every month; enough to make me forget Roosevelt, almost, and all he has done to what was once a half-decent country. Still, there's no use crying over spilt millions, is there? Funny, that's about the only thing I actually remember Father saying.

After he died I went on living as quietly as before. Most of my relatives were in private nursing-homes here and there, or working for America First, the Ku Klux Klan, and other earnest organizations. I was playing Eton fives three or four hours a day, which kept me busy, along with signing the checks my secretaries had ready for me every morning. But I knew I wasn't really living. I didn't begin to live until Mr. Popo took over the management of my affairs, and then of my private life, and at last of my horses and myself, so far as they were separate.

He was recommended to me by a pretty good Eton-fives player who had trimmed me a couple of times at the club; some odd name like Van Aschenhausen, and they said he was attached to the German legation, but I never paid much attention to gossip. He could certainly play Eton fives—his buttress work was almost miraculous. Anyhow, Mr. Popo turned up at my house next day. I was having some difficulty in talking, and I could get only one eye open at a time. He soon solved that. He massaged me a bit, all around the skull—one lobe of my brain has been missing since my first term at Erickson, and it sometimes gives me a little trouble—and over the right eye and round both gums. Then he gave me some special tea he brewed. I believe it was called sake, and it certainly made me feel better.

After that Mr. Popo, with his close-cropped accent, became an essential part of the household. Agatha, who had married me five or ten years earlier, soon learned that he had to be tolerated. Once I came home early from the club and found him in her room, but of course there was nothing in it. I asked him about it myself.

"I am so very, very sorry," he said. "I was teaching Mrs. Simpkin the rumba."

"Then why was she struggling?"

"Correction, please. She was not struggling." Mr. Popo sizzled so hard that a rainbow appeared in front of him. "She was mixing a rumba with a samba, excuse me. She does not yet know all the movements."

Naturally I understood, and I told him so. Agatha was rather touchy about it for a time, but quite soon she began to go in for the rumba seriously, and left home to study it professionally. I never liked dancing personally. Only scugs danced at Erickson.

Another interesting thing that happened was when Mr. Popo fired all my servants. I could never quite gather what was wrong with them, but he kept saying "very, very nice" and smiling and inhaling as if I had hurt his feelings. I didn't want to do that. However, fired the servants were, and he brought in some new ones whose names I could never get straight. There was one called Mtoto with very long arms, and another called Bojo, about eight feet high, and a third with some name like Hojotoho or Hirohito, who used to boss the others around. They all looked the same to me, but they were decorative, and they saved me a lot of trouble. My cousin Slug said it looked like a Mototalitarian state, but I never sympathized with his attitude. I laughed gently, and said "Hello, Slug, how's your lug?" That shut him up. Still, I was sorry to be rude, so sorry, so very, very sorry.

I found I was beginning to leave my investments to Mr. Popo, too. For some time I tried to save him the trouble of all that.

"My boy," I would say, "you are too fragile to handle these huge steel and manganese trusts."

"If you please," he would reply, "Mr. Popo is Manganese himself, and he understands every kind of steel. Thank you so much, indeed to goodness. So desu-ka." I never knew what that meant, but evidently they said it in Mr. Popo's circle.

He had been teaching me wrestling and various other exercises for a month or two. He knew I was keen about keeping fit. I generally spent the summer in Maine—it was a state which the Simpkins always rented for the summer, and I didn't see why I should give up the custom—but in the autumn of 1941 I was so worried by things I heard at the club that I came home early.

"You are home quite, quite early, and I am trying to help you," said Mr. Popo.

"I am sure you are doing your best, Mr. Popo," I answered. There was a curious noise from my study, a kind of rhythmical popping. Probably it was Tojo with his new vacuum-cleaner. I tried not to notice it.

"Thank you so terribly much. Will you deign to try a new exercise, especially designed for Simpkin-san by Mahatma in Tibet?" That is what he said, although I didn't properly follow him. I was listening to the Morse from my study, a thing I had learned at Erickson and somehow remembered. But it didn't make sense. The only words I could make out were Nichi Nichi, which sounded like the name of one of the maids. I judged it wasn't important and got down to the new exercise.

It was rather complicated. First I signed a paper he gave me. Then I took off all my clothes and put on a dressing-robe. Then he made me squat down in front of Father's picture, as if I'd been a Buddha, which I'm not. He gave me a kriss, one of those Oriental ornaments Mother hung around everywhere—some of them were very handsome. Then he showed me how to put it into my stomach and pull outwards. It felt rather strange, but more interesting than most exercises. I was just getting the feel of it when old Slug happened to drop in.

After that I didn't follow the trend of events. Slug shot Mr. Popo, though I can't think why. He was always an admirable servant, never tired, never in the least disorderly. Slug took the sword out of my stomach and ran me down to the hospital, saying he was so very, very sorry. I hope he was. He still has not told me why he deprived me of Mr. Popo's services. The affair is a mystery to me, in toto. An Old Budger would never have done anything so abrupt. If everyone were only Budgers, it would be so very, very nice.

Notes by the Way

NEW DIRECTIONS recently issued "The Real Life of Sebastian Knight," by Vladimir Nabokov ($3.50), in as pretty a package as I have seen for some time: a stout binding of glowing red burlap, attractive though rather fancy type, a jacket both clever and smart. The note on the jacket informed me that the author had "things deep and important to tell about the role of creative artists in a modern world that is basically hostile to art," and though that last phrase struck me as a crude and rather smug description of a subtle and ambivalent relationship, I turned eagerly to page 1.

The book tells the story of the narrator's attempt to discover the truth about his half-brother, Sebastian Knight, son of a Russian father and an English mother, who had become a famous British novelist. To this end the "I" of the story sets out to find the people who were intimate with Knight, particularly the two women in his life. As foil for his conception of a true biography he poses the official account by Knight's secretary and agent—a worthless book, full of misinformation and written only to exploit the fame of its subject. An excellent idea, an ingenious device, giving scope for profound and wide-ranging commentary on the artist and his relation to the world.

I'm sorry to report that through two readings I looked in vain for the "things deep and important" the author had to tell about an absorbing problem; moreover, I was so intent on having the publisher's promise fulfilled that I became increasingly annoyed at the incorrigible and, as it seemed to me, irrelevant cleverness of Mr. Nabokov. I learned of various episodes in the life of Sebastian Knight; the trouble was that they might have been incidents in the private life of any human being, and that for all its air of intimacy the tale dealt only with externals. Of the interior creative life of Sebastian Knight and of his relation to the world as artist—which we are led to believe is the point of Mr. Nabokov's story—I knew as little as before I opened the book. I felt as if I had been chasing a firefly—which lights up but does not illuminate.

At this point I learned that the story was supposed to parallel a chess game. I thereupon put the jacket note to one side and began all over again. As a tour de force, as an essay in cleverness for cleverness's sake, the story obviously demanded to be judged by quite other and less weighty standards.

Mr. Nabokov is a skilful writer; his pages rain conceits as numerous—and as perishable—as those thrown off by a Fourth of July rocket. But I personally find his cleverness, even as cleverness, a little over-ripe. It will bear one quick reading, not more, and a good deal of it seems, in cold print, as pretentious and dead as the quips of the fashionable writer-about-town whose conversation seemed so brilliant in the charged atmosphere of last week's cocktail party. Consider this typical sentence on page one—which first aroused my annoyance. It tells us that the name of the old Russian lady who is the first of the people canvassed by the narrator "was and is Olga Olegovna Orlova—an egg-like alliteration which it would have been a pity to withhold." The fact that 000 has a meaning in chess does not make the conceit or its elaborate wrappings—"was and is," "which it would have been a pity to withhold"—any the less pretentious. And it is only the first of many such.

If Mr. Nabokov intended his tale to be no more than a high-class detective story, the playing out of an intricate and sophisticated game, he has achieved moderate, though only moderate, success. If it was his intention, as the title implies and the jacket note proclaims, to explore and define the relation between the artist and the world, he has only proved that cleverness—which he not only possesses but seems to be possessed by—is not enough. As for Sebastian Knight, he remains unexhumed, and his hypothetical mound is heaped even higher with fake subtleties, pretentious curlicues, and the dazzling shards of Mr. Nabokov's conceits.

MARGARET MARSHALL

War Is Hell

FROM THE LAND OF SILENT PEOPLE. By Robert St. John. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

MR. ST. JOHN'S moving and honest book is perhaps the grimmest piece of reporting yet to come out of the war. An eyewitness of the invasion of Yugoslavia and the evacuation of Greece, the author has put down "all that I saw and heard and smelled and just a bit of what I thought," and his story has the same quality of nightmare reality which makes unforgettable Ambrose Bierce's sketches of the Civil War. It is no book for people with weak stomachs.

Robert St. John was an Associated Press correspondent in Belgrade when Prince Paul's government signed the Tripartite Pact only to be thrown out by a coup d'état organized by the air force. The author calls it, however, "the diaper revolution," for the first manifestation was a strike by school children who expressed openly the anger they had heard muttered behind closed doors in their homes. The first days of regained freedom to voice hatred and contempt of the Axis were exhilarating, but doom was approaching. St. John was in the midst of the first air attack on Belgrade, which came simultaneously with von Ribbentrop's announcement of a state of war. Wave after wave of bombers came over and, opposed only by ground defenses, devastated the capital of the Yugoslavs with a thoroughness only comparable to that employed in the infamous raid against Rotterdam.

The Yugoslav government moved south, and the American correspondents tried to keep up with it, hoping thus to find the communication facilities which would enable them to get their story out. They never did succeed, and thus in the midst of a hell of bombs, machine-gunnings, wounds, hunger, and sleeplessness, they endured the newspaperman's peculiar inferno: they had a story of world-shaking proportions and no way of getting it to their papers.

Wherever St. John and his companions went, the Stukas followed. Through Sarajevo they made their way to the Adriatic coast and there, as unnautical a bunch as ever put to sea, procured a leaky fishing boat and set a course for Corfu. In spite of storms and Italian patrols they made it by some miracle. But in Corfu there were no communications, only more bombs. A small Greek ship took them to Patras, where almost as soon as they arrived the Luftwaffe swept down again. The huddled masses of refugees on the waterfront made a fine target. At Corinth the story was repeated. There Göring's men shot up and set on fire a hospital train crammed with wounded, and the smell of burning flesh hung heavily over the city as the author and three other newspapermen, one of them severely wounded, moved south to Argos to join the retreating Anzacs.

Finally they got to Cairo, and that, in a different way, was a nightmare too. Here was a desperately unreal world of international hotels, bowing flunkeys, old-fashioned military

AMUSEMENTS

"Buoyant, Giddy and Funny . . . Ought to make everyone very happy."
—Atkinson, Times

Max Gordon presents
JUNIOR MISS
A New Comedy by Jerome Chodorov and Joseph Fields
Based on the stories by Sally Benson—Directed by Moss Hart
LYCEUM Theatre, 45th St. E. of B'way. CH 4-4256
Evenings, 8:40; Mats., WEDNESDAY & SATURDAY, 2:40

"A PERFECT COMEDY"
—Atkinson, Times
LIFE WITH FATHER
with HOWARD LINDSAY
DOROTHY STICKNEY
EMPIRE, B'way & 40 St.—269 seats $1.10
Evgs. 8:40 Mats. Sat. & Lincoln's B'day

CHERYL CRAWFORD presents
George Gershwin's
PORGY AND BESS
"Go see 'Porgy and Bess' if you go to nothing else"
—Kronenberger, PM.
●
PRICES:
Evgs. . . . $3.30 to 55¢
Mats. . . . $2.20 to 55¢
MAJESTIC THEATRE, W. 44 St. Eves. Incl. Sunday. Mats. Wed., Sat. & Feb. 12

Theatre Guild Production
★ MARY BOLAND ★ BOBBY CLARK
★ WALTER HAMPDEN
In Sheridan's Greatest Comedy
THE RIVALS
SHUBERT Theatre, 44th St. W. of B'way. Cl 6-6699
Evenings, 8:40; Matinees, Thursday & Saturday, 2:40

MID-WINTER BOOKS

- The Editors of The Nation will publish a Mid-Winter Book Number on February 21. Coming at the peak of the post-holiday sales upswing, this issue offers advertisers a timely oportunity to present meritorious new books to a nation-wide audience of book-lovers.
- The size of the magazine will probably be increased to forty pages for the Mid-Winter Book Number, permitting considerably greater space devoted to books than is usually available in an issue of The Nation.
- An early deadline—February 11 for final OK's or complete plates, is necessary where forward position is requested, since the central pages of the magazine will be printed on February 13. The usual deadline applies to space taken for the body of the magazine, with final copy required by February 16.
- A number of representative publishers have already reserved space in this literary issue. For information or to make reservations, write, telephone or wire the Advertising Department.

THE Nation
55 Fifth Avenue New York, N. Y.

etiquette, a world where immaculate Englishmen "were still trying to fight a war in the Kipling tradition." Here, too, at last, were communications, but with them censors who felt it their duty to protect American and British readers from the brutal truth about the Balkan débâcle.

Thus a story which compared the Greek evacuation with that of Dunkirk and explained why it was incomparably worse was blue-penciled until it conveyed exactly the opposite impression. St. John was glad to get away from Cairo, but he wasn't any more comfortable back in complacent New York, where the lecture chairman asked him not to make the war seem too horrible, not to upset the digestions of his audience.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Mr. Jolas

VERTICAL. Edited by Eugene Jolas. The Gotham Bookmart Press. $2.75.

THIS truly remarkable publication, a "romantic, cosmological, and mystic theory of ascent," is or is not worth the price of several zombies depending on whether or not you like zombies. If you find them too much, then this anthology should adorn your bookshelf, because it bears a positively extraordinary resemblance to the Zombie Proper, in both senses. It is tall—"poetry," Mr. Jolas announces, "is vertical." It is composed of such exotic combinations as Guillaume Apollinaire, Paul Claudel, Patrice de la Tour du Pin, Kay Boyle, Eugene Derwood, and Eugene Jolas. Also it is about as posthumous as the League of Nations and quite as internally internecine. I cannot think that there is anything more than a purely accidental explanation of the presence of a poem in imitation of William Blake by Richard Eberhart or a sonnet by Gerard de Nerval—yes, it's the good old Prince of Acquitaine.

Personally I suspect Mr. Eugene Jolas of an irresponsibility of vocabulary that could be mistaken either for charlatanism or pretentiousness. I ask Mr. Jolas what is a Romantic-Mystic Three-Fold Ascension, and if so how can he bring himself to use the English language as though it were hamburger? "Poetry," he continues, "must emphasize the creative urge toward a communal feeling for living . . . toward a liturgical-ritual renascence. Poetry must become a medium for the emancipation of the human personality by accentuating its voyage toward the invisible." I would like to tell a story. It is about a man who met a poem, and the poem was wearing an orange wig and gold-plated suspenders and was to all appearances inebriated and on the make. The man said to the poem: "Good poems must go home and go to bed." So the poem went on down the street still inebriated and still on the make because its aural faculties were not adjusted to that kind of language.

Surely Mr. Jolas knows that poems can be described and, sometimes, defined—by writing one—but they simply cannot be dictated to. Hitching poems to mystagogical stars discredits the poem and degrades the mystic. Thus the principal difficulty about most of the contributors to this anthology is that they are camelopards whose camel is not really mystical and whose leopard is not really poetical. I myself observe nothing memorable about such writing as: "Asteroids shot color-inebriated across the Milky Way. We saw a comet." Nor can I discern in Paul Claudel's austere and ecclesiastical condemnation of the Teutonic in his verses entitled "Thus Once More . . ." any element that elevates it above the commonplace in thought: nor is it any the less admirable a poem. For it is salutary that someone should point out to Mr. Jolas that poems demonstrably do not need superlative or even penetrating philosophies behind them in order to make them good: very few poets are also respectable philosophers; "nor," in the words of T. S. Eliot, "do I see any need for this thoroughgoing schizophrenia."

I can respect Mr. Jolas's determination to systematize his own speculations into a philosophy, even with an aeronautical nomenclature, but I cannot respect his efforts to ride this philosophy into public prominence on the backs of other writers. For what conceivable reason can there be for the inclusion, for instance, of a passage from The Cloud of Unknowing or an excerpt from Richard Jefferies in a Yearbook for Romantic-Mystic Ascension?

I can only suspect that Mr. Jolas is capitalizing on a category of ecclesiastical literature that has so far been able to keep its skirts clean of secular theory, and especially of secular theory with such pretentions as: "A mystical will is needed to ruin the fraudulent romanticism of totalitarian imperialism." The presence of orthodox Roman Catholic writers here does not detract from the general air of cosmological gesticulation. "We stand," Mr. Jolas concludes, "before the Era of the Paraclete." I wish to correct Mr. Jolas. We stand before the Era of Apollyon.

GEORGE BARKER

The Strategy of Planning

NATION AND FAMILY: THE SWEDISH EXPERIMENT IN DEMOCRATIC FAMILY AND POPULATION POLICY. By Alva Myrdal. Harper and Brothers. $4.

I HOPE that this book will be read by every American interested in any phase of the strategy and tactics of social planning. It appears at a time when the United States is making what will in all likelihood be a permanent changeover to large-scale planning of its economic and social institutions, but when long-range social planning is in danger of being smothered in the vortex of planning for war. Dr. Myrdal, a leading Swedish social scientist familiar with American problems, describes "with American problems in mind" the work of the Swedish Population Commission of 1935-38. It is the record of a successful national attempt to redirect national life to the needs of the people.

Sweden has been over-sold in recent years as a national Wunderkind where "the middle way" by-passes all the troublesome problems of monopoly capitalism and the looming red shadow of communism. There has been loose and unwarranted advocacy of its cooperatives and social legislation as pat panaceas for the United States. Dr. Myrdal makes no such claims. Quite the contrary, she believes that "some of the favorable publicity recently bestowed on the country has been exaggerated," and she is careful to point out in detail the special case Sweden presents—free from imperialistic ambitions, content to be small and make the most of what it has, devoid of a problem of minorities or of regional differences, socially well organized, and with adult education persuasively sponsored by the labor movement and the women's movement. "If democracy could not develop successfully in Scandinavia, given by historical chance quite exceptionally advantageous conditions, it will probably not work anywhere else." If such a geographically small and homogeneous nation presents a different situation from that found in a continent-wide domain ruled by clotted economic power, this may alter materially the tempo and ease of planning, but it does not alter the goal. The lesson of Swedish planning for us lies not so much in its cooperatives and other specific institutions as in the goal sought, the methods of planning employed, and the extent to which, in an admittedly simpler situation, manifestly desirable human ends have been demonstrated to be directly achievable.

Faced with the threat common to industrial societies of a falling birth rate, the Swedish Population Commission concluded after study of the problem that economic forces tend to develop adversely to the family if left to their own evolution, and that population decline would not halt itself but could only be stopped by a positive reorientation of social policy; and it set to work to remake society to fit children, rather than allowing children to be abolished to fit society. The strategy employed to this end deserves careful study by American planners. It has been demonstrated over and over again that society will tolerate social change in behalf of its children which it would reject out-of-hand for its allegedly free, rational, responsible adults. Avoiding the more difficult step of the head-on socialization of power over production, the Swedish policy approaches from the consumption side. It contents itself with asking: How much socialization of goods and services is necessary to encourage the having and the effective rearing of children? Such a proposal cuts deep and ultimately involves the fundamental clash foreseen by the Marxians. But one has only to review the relative ease with which Milo Perkins's food-stamp plan has been put over here to recognize the wisdom of this general strategy. As Dr. Myrdal remarks, nationalization from the consumer side is tactically far easier than from the production side.

The book falls into two parts. The first nine chapters present one of the best summaries of the problem of fertility in families available anywhere. Without sentimentality Dr. Myrdal marches straight into the facts all parents wrestle with: "children have become more and more cumbersome to parents and to society at large"; "voluntary choice of poverty for the sake of children is what young couples now are asked for"; "the circle which presents itself to prospective parents is a vicious one. Quality may be secured, but only by controlling quantity. Quantity can be secured only by sacrificing quality." The entire factual analysis proceeds from an explicit set of value premises regarding the purposes of democratic society. In the second section of the book Dr. Myrdal presents, with the insight of a technical participant in the work of the commission, the programs and substantial achievements to be noted, even this early, of the seventeen reports prepared between 1935 and 1938. The book is a triumph of exposition, demonstrating the fact that solid material need never be dull.

Two final points are worth stressing: the basic honesty and candor of this Swedish planning, and the harnessing of the entire resources of the nation to its fulfilment. In an area of behavior so markedly characterized by double-dealing, private and public, as that of family life and sex, the commission faced squarely the need for "clearing the ground of the public dishonesty in all that relates to sex and marriage and parenthood. No population program could be democratic with that task left undone." And we Americans, with our radio so tightly pegged down by private ownership and our adult education so meager, have plenty to learn from the Swedes when it comes to putting over change in things more important than brands of soap and cornflakes.

ROBERT S. LYND

PUBLISHED THIS WEEK

Japan's Dream of World Empire: The Tanaka Memorial. Edited with an Introduction by Carl Crow. Harper. $1.25.
The Art of Reading Poetry. By Earl Daniels. Farrar. $2.50.
People Under Hitler. By Wallace R. Deuel. Harcourt, Brace. $3.50.
From the Hunter's Bow. By Beatrice Edgerly. Edited by Borish Erich Nelson. Putnam's. $3.50.
Falling Through Space. By Richard Hillary. Reynal. $2.50.
The Dickens World. By Humphry House. Oxford. $3.
National Income and Its Composition, 1919-1938. By Simon Kuznets. National Bureau of Economic Research. 2 vols. $5.
Americans 1942: 18 Artists from 9 States. Edited by Dorothy C. Miller. Museum of Modern Art. $2.
Convoy. By Quentin Reynolds. Random House. $2.
The Flickering Torch. By William West Tomlinson. Putnam's. $1.50.
Return to the Future. By Sigrid Undset. Knopf. $2.50.

THE POWERFUL MAN
(With Two Laugh-and-Cry Plays)
by
THEODORE G. MITCHELL

A PREDICTION: Science will develop infants to manhood in twenty minutes and rejuvenate old age in one hundred and twenty minutes. Would these discoveries be of any advantage to the society? Indeed, they did not help Hale to win his war.

HAS OUR SCIENTIFIC WAY of doing things very much advantages over the slow course of Mother Nature? Hale does not think so and destroys both discoveries. Is he justified, as a layman, to pass a final judgment on the merits of scientific discoveries?

HALE'S POLITICAL CAREER comes to a dramatic ending and he commits suicide when he is challenged to defend his own life in a military fashion. This fact reveals that behind his verbal bravery was hidden a feeling of weakness and inferiority

214 PAGES — PRICE $2.00

At bookstores, or

DEARBORN PUBLISHING COMPANY
727 So. Dearborn St. Chicago, Ill.

Kermess in Munich

MUNICH PLAYGROUND. By Ernest R. Pope. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.75.

ONE of the first surprises invasion brought to France was the discovery of the wholesale venality of Nazi officials. Anything from an Ausweis to a war prisoner could be bought, provided one had the price. It came as a shock to the average Frenchman, who had been taken in more than he realized by Nazi propaganda—Nazi railing against the "rotten democracies" and their corrupt servants, as opposed to the "Nordic purity," the "moral renaissance," and the Spartan uprightness of the New Order. After all the ponderous talk about the "noble and traditional" status of women, our Breton postwoman, who had worn men's clothes for years, actually put on skirts when the Germans came for fear of offending the Nazi puritans. She had yet to hear German soldiers say, apropos of cosmetics, short hair, trousers, and cigarettes for women (and even "race-shaming," provided the victim was a Jewess), "Ach, das ist nur Propaganda!"

In "Munich Playground" Ernest Pope gets behind the "propaganda front" of the Nazi leaders. He sets out to explode "the myth that Hitler and his disciples are an awe-inspiring group of ascetic, fanatic, and inhuman supermen." Taking the war lords one by one, he shows what happens when the goose-stepping Nazi lays aside his military belt and steps out als Mensch for a little diversion. Power politics and grim decisions belong to Berlin. Munich is the pleasure capital, the happy hunting ground for marshals, ministers, Gestapo chiefs, Gauleiters, and the Führer of them all. In Munich Hitler and his disciples turn playboy, setting an example for all Nazis at play—a pattern that for all its license is as definitely oriented as the Nazi pattern of conquest. As newspaper correspondent in Munich for many years, Mr. Pope had a close-up view of both play and pattern. He gives a faithful—and appalling—picture.

As the soldier represents the ideal citizen according to Nazi notions, so Nazi play confines itself to the traditional diversions for weary warriors, Wein, Weib, und Gesang—with the emphasis put on the first two. In the foreground are the leaders, Hitler included. (Since the Anschluss he has "softened" noticeably, says Mr. Pope.) They lead the dance against a back-drop of banquet tables, champagne bottles, naked dancers, and love nests. Abetted by local Nazi racketeers, these parvenus from Berlin have transformed the pleasant city by the Isar into an unholy kermess of wine-bibbing, food-guzzling, and woman-hunting—with looting and Jew-baiting thrown in for spice—while the mumbo-jumbo of Himmler's Teutonic rituals adds its sinister accompaniment and the flames of Streicher's "purifying" bonfires stream high in the Bavarian night sky.

All moral barriers are down. Art, of which Hitler is the self-styled supreme dictator, and even music pander to the "healthy eroticism" that aims to fill countless cradles and breed new generations of Nazi soldiers for world conquest. For this is the orientation and the plan.

The native Bavarians, dear to Mr. Pope, take half-hearted part in the Nazi kermess. They are the "works," like the underpaid extras at the super-opera—paid ten cents an hour in their thousand-dollar costumes or their nakedness. The Bavarians are aware that a popular uprising is impossible; they pay lip-service to Hitler while waiting for a chance to "turn the Third Reich inside out" and "put the Führer and the Prussians in their place." They secretly hope that a stronger neighbor will beat the bully who has taken over their peaceful city for his pagan, though joyless, carnival, and they long for the time when they can return to their traditional Gemütlichkeit.

The moral of Mr. Pope's unpleasantly revealing book is his hint that Munich, the cradle of National Socialism, may one day become the cradle of the Fourth Reich.

IDA TREAT

Conquistador

HERNAN CORTES. By Salvador de Madariaga. The Macmillan Company. $4.

THIS book is rich in scholarship and superior writing. It would be still better if Señor de Madariaga had been able to make up his mind whether he was writing as a man of faith or a man of wit. Writing as a man of faith he would have us believe that the Spanish conquerors and discoverers actually believed what they said, that they subjected the Indian lands mainly to implant the Catholic religion. But writing as a man of wit he slyly slashes at this thesis until it is in tatters. The man of wit is the victor, not only because his wit is generally of a high order, but also because it lies much closer to the truth of history. The Cross was merely another weapon of conquest. Hernán Cortés made good use of it in Mexico, but he also knew exactly when to supplement it with guile, a bribe, or a salvo from his primitive artillery. The conquest of Mexico, writes Señor de Madariaga, was the most economical use of military power in history. This is true only in a limited sense, for at bottom the conquest was not a military but rather a diplomatic victory. Cortés was able to induce the Mexican tribes to conquer each other, and his own greatest military victory was not over the Tlaxcatecs or the Aztecs but over his fellow-Spaniards under Narváez, who were trying to steal the spoils.

At first view the conquest of Mexico seems miraculous, but it becomes somewhat less so when one understands, first, that the Aztec empire was rotten with oppression, and, second, that it had little real faith in its own institutions. The first made it easy for Cortés to enlist the subject tribes in a revolt against the dominant Aztecs. But the revolt would doubtless have failed, and with it Cortés himself, if the Aztecs had believed in themselves. The Aztecs fell not to superior military force but to a superior faith. The tragedy of the conquest was not so much in the fall of the Aztecs as in the inability of the Spaniards to direct the building of a new Mexican civilization, fused from the Aztec and the Spanish. The Spaniards were sufficiently superior to conquer, but not to construct. The result was an almost complete stagnation which was to endure 400 years, and was not to be broken until the vitality of the Mexican tribes began to reassert itself in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Señor de Madariaga has appended a valuable bibliography.

CHARLES CURTIS MUNZ

IN BRIEF

DRAGON'S TEETH. By Pearl S. Buck. The John Day Company. $2.50.

The family of Ling Tan lived near a tiny village on the outskirts of Nanking, and when the first Japanese flying ship dropped a bomb in a neighbor's back yard they all thought how lucky the man was to have a pond suddenly dug for him when he had for years been trying to find time to do that very job himself. They learned a great deal in the course of the next year. Pearl Buck tells the story of the rape of Nanking with the same meticulous, sometimes almost plodding, attention to the details of daily life that has marked her other novels about China.

THUS SPEAKS GERMANY. By W. W. Coole and M. F. Potter. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

This anthology of Nazi and pre-Nazi moral and political theory, culled from the speeches and writings of Hitler, his forerunners, and his disciples, is a valuable compendium despite certain uncritical assumptions which determine the choice of material. The Nazi theories of race and nation, of international law and lawlessness, of the rights of victors and the lack of rights of the vanquished, and all the other elaborations of moral nihilism are presented in the form of succinct quotations. The similarities between traditional Prussian and modern Nazi theories are emphasized, but significant differences between them are not understood. The thesis of a consistent German cynicism and frightfulness, underlying all periods of German life, is pushed to a ridiculous conclusion when the Weimar Republic is presented as the conscious disguise of the German wolf, assumed for the purpose of fooling little Red Riding Hood and discarded when no longer needed. Innocent statements by Gustav Stresemann, which could be matched from the writings of any British or American statesman, are quoted as if they substantiated this thesis.

BOOK BARGAINS
Order now! U. S. A. mailing free.
Moment in Peking: Lin Yutang
the original 3.00 edition ....only $1.39
My Life: Autobiography of Havelock Ellis
the original 3.75 edition ....only 1.49
The Letters of T. E. Lawrence: D. Garnett. Ed.
the original 5.00 edition ....only 1.49
The Wounded Don't Cry: Quentin Reynolds... 1.00
America & the World War: Samuel T. Moore .50
Married Love: Marie C. Stopes............... .50
Enduring Passion: Marie C. Stopes.......... 1.00
Best Known Works of Plato (Republic, etc.).. 1.00
How Green Was My Valley: R. Llewellyn.... 1.39
Sixteen Famous British Plays: includes The Corn Is Green; Victoria Regina; Journey's End; Cavalcade; What Every Woman Knows; The Second Mrs. Tanqueray; The Barretts of Wimpole St.; Loyalties; etc., complete, unabridged 1.98
DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR
212 Broadway New York City

IMPORTANT NEW BOOKS are listed every week in
The NATION
Consult the listing on page 171 for a current selection of publishers' offerings.

DRAMA

Culture and Anarchy

LAST season's play about William Saroyan was neither very convincing nor very funny. Now, however, Samson Raphaelson has attacked the same intriguing subject with far better results. In fact, his "Jason" (Hudson Theater) is a good deal better than merely the best play so far about the Daring Young Man; it is also, in my opinion at least, Mr. Raphaelson's best work to date—adroit, amusing, shrewd, and as close to life as artificial comedy of this sort really needs to be.

Naturally the whole thing would be doomed from the start if the cocky young playwright did not seem a possible person and if—what is harder—he was not also endowed with that disarming charm which is difficult to describe but which the original indubitably has. On both these counts—but particularly on the second—the hero of the previous play failed lamentably; on both, Mr. Raphaelson's Mike Ambler is more than merely acceptable. He will seem quite a possible person to those who have not the pleasure of Mr. Saroyan's acquaintance, a very good likeness indeed to those who have; and once this character is accepted as fundamentally real, the spectator is perfectly willing to accept along with him the artificial situations out of which the play is built up.

Mr. Raphaelson imagines that Ambler forces his way into the home of a rather anemically cultured drama critic, teaches the latter to play craps, very nearly steals his wife, and, what is worse, very nearly destroys his critical detachment. For the critic, having already changed his opinion two or three times, is just dictating his enthusiastic review of Ambler's first play when he learns about his wife. He starts another denouncing the playwright, and he finally ends with a third—very nicely phrased, by the way—in which, one may presume, Mr. Raphaelson is giving his own balanced conclusions concerning romantic egotists who do, rather exasperatingly, sometimes have something to say quite worth the hearing. Jason's culture has a few things to learn from Mike's anarchy.

Good as it is, the play as a whole is, nevertheless, what we members of the profession like to call "contrived." By that we mean, of course, that it is not, like the plays of Mike Ambler Saroyan, merely the product of genius letting itself go in order to see what will happen. But we mean more than that. We mean also that it is not inevitable once the situation has been stated; that the various turns of events are manipulated by a playwright who decides at every instance what turn he will give the action. We mean that it is the kind of play "not written but rewritten," the kind that might end in any one of two or three ways and that ends as it does because the author, having considered different possibilities, finally determines that the balance of various considerations makes this particular one the most feasible. But we do not mean that all such plays are completely trivial or that there are not levels of contrivance. For contrivance may be adroit or clumsy, and it may also sacrifice either all or none of the playwright's intellectual conviction.

Mr. Raphaelson's successful plays have always been contrived—that is obviously the way he works; but the contrivance has tended to grow more adroit and to serve better and better to express a more and more mature intelligence. A decade and a half ago "The Jazz Singer" expressed a sincere but crudely sensational sentimentalism by means of contrivances on the level of cheap melodrama. More recently "Skylark" seemed to sacrifice both sincerity and clarity of thought to slickness of writing which made it a very successful vehicle for a star. That play, indeed, marked a decided regression from "Accent on Youth," which preceded it, because it was obviously less sincere. But "Jason" is the best of the lot. Mr. Raphaelson has something he believes and wants to say about a certain kind of writing and a certain kind of man. He contrives a story, and that contrived story says very pointedly and amusingly what he wants to say.

There is a good deal more to the plot than I have indicated, and I shall go no farther into that, but perhaps it should be stated for the sake of the public that Jason himself does not seem to be intended as a recognizable portrait of any individual member of the Drama Critics' Circle, and it is quite certain that none will be anxious to claim himself as the original. Nicholas Conte does a quite remarkable job as Mike Ambler, and the whole production is cleverly managed.

What one thinks of "Cafe Crown"

(Cort Theater) will depend largely upon how much very obvious contrivance one is willing to put up with for the sake of some flavorsome dialogue and a picturesque character or two. Like "Jason" it is topical, since the cafe in question is unmistakably the Cafe Royal on Second Avenue, where Jewish actors, playwrights, and journalists have congregated for generations. Obviously the author knows his scene, his characters, and the way they talk. With the help of Sam Jaffe as the proprietor-waiter and Morris Carnovsky as the less successfully drawn veteran of the stage he presents some racy moments. But the story of egotism and sacrifice, of the rising star seduced by Hollywood, is told in such a way that none of its banality and none of its sentimentality can possibly be missed. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

THE best jazz performances issued on records since I last wrote on the subject, in September, are the Sidney Bechet "Texas Moaner" (Victor 27600) and "Rose Room" (Victor 27707), with Shavers's work on trumpet; the Allen-Higginbotham "Indiana" (Okeh 6357), mostly for the playing of Higginbotham and Hall; the Cootie Williams "West End Blues" (Okeh 6370). Good are the Teddy Wilson Orchestra's first chorus of "I Can't Believe That You're in Love with Me" (Columbia 36335); the Allen-Higginbotham Orchestra's accompaniment of Ida Cox's rhythmically powerful but tonally threadbare singing of "I Can't Quit That Man" (Okeh 6405); Mildred Bailey's "Lover Come Back to Me" (Decca 3953); Maxine Sullivan's "Loch Lomond" (Decca 3954); and, in Victor's "Hot Piano" (Set P-75, $2.50), Earl Hines's performance of "On the Sunny Side of the Street" (27562), Duke Ellington's of "Dear Old Southland" (27564), "Fats" Waller's of "Carolina Shout" (27563)—but not the performances on the reverse sides, and not those of Jelly-Roll Morton on 27565. The Kirby Orchestra's "Tweed Me" (Victor 27667) and "Fifi's Rhapsody" (27598) offer about an inch of fairly good free-style playing between slick arranged introductory and concluding choruses; and as a piece of composed jazz the Benny Goodman Orchestra's "The Earl" (Okeh 6474), with Mel Powell's piano-playing, is enjoyable.

That is very little for so long a period; but in recent months small-band jazz improvisation has virtually disappeared from the companies' announcements. The reason is that it does not sell in large quantities; and a point which might be made about that is that if one campaigns for the high-powered arranged jazz of Benny Goodman one helps to create a demand for the high-powered arranged jazz of Benny Goodman, not for small-band improvisation. Nothing new is being recorded; and the old things are no longer being reissued: Columbia has announced no further hot jazz classics since its September "Louis and Earl" (Set C-73, $2.50), devoted to 1927 and 1928 Louis Armstrong performances with Earl Hines at the piano. Like the others in the series this set gives us two outstanding performances, "West End Blues" and "Muggles" (both on 36377), and three good ones, "Heah Me Talkin' to Ya?" and "Tight Like This" (both on 36378), and "A Monday Date" (36375); and like the others it wastes precious sides on "Weather Bird" (36375), and on two previously unissued performances discovered in the Columbia archives that should have been left there—"Chicago Breakdown" and "Don't Jive Me" (both on 36376). With the series at an end one is aware of the fine things that were reissued; but one is bound to think of the others that were not, and that now probably never will be, and that would be available if the sides had not been used for pretentious discoveries and for things which provided excuses for equally pretentious discussions of styles and developments and influences. One is bound to think of the superb early Armstrongs, for example, that might have been included in this last set if the purpose had been simply to reissue the best out-of-print jazz performances, and not to provide the occasion for a wild piece of phrase-slinging about the relation of Louis and Earl.

Decca's "Blackstick" (Set 240, $2.25), devoted to performances with outstanding clarinetists, offers three that are very good, the Johnny Dodds "Melancholy" (3864), with Shavers on trumpet and Bunn on guitar, and the Danny Polo "Blue Murder" and the Jimmy Noone "I Know That You Know" (both on 3863), the second with Shavers and an excellent pianist. Fairly good, also, are the Bud Freeman "Sunday" (3865), for Kaminsky's cornet rather than Russell's clarinet, and the Rollini "Davenport Blues" (3862), with Jack Teagarden and Benny Goodman.

Columbia issued no Masterworks last month; but the set (473, $3.50) of Chopin's Etudes Op. 25 that was announced two or three months ago has arrived. Kilenyi's performances haven't the technical or musical finesse of Bachaus's in the regrettably withdrawn Victor set; and imperfect recording makes them occasionally not clear; but for the most part—except for the mannered performances of No. 1 in A flat and the middle section of No. 10 in B minor—they are technically adequate and musically acceptable. My copy has a couple of bad surfaces.

Questions keep coming in about a low-priced ($100-$150) machine; and all I can answer is what an engineer I talk to about such matters tells me he would do if he were looking for one for himself. He would go to a Montgomery Ward outlet and look at the license labels on the backs of the larger machines; he would listen to the machines which had in the lower left-hand or right-hand corner of the label the initials "W. G. Co." or "B. R. Co.," which are those of the Wells Gardner or the Belmont Company; if one of these machines sounded good he would take it; if none sounded good he would consider the search hopeless.

B. H. HAGGIN

Speak . . . read
SPANISH
PORTUGUESE, RUSSIAN, JAPANESE
Quickly, Easily, Correctly
The Linguaphone Method enables you to speak any of 29 languages—by LISTENING to voices of native teachers in your own home. Amazingly simple, thorough, sound; no smattering. SEND FOR FREE BOOK. ●
LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
61 R.C.A. Building, N. Y. C. • Circle 7-0830

Nation readers are invited to attend L.I.D. Conference on Maximum Production - Warfare & Welfare
Saturday Morning & Noon, FEB. 14, 1942
Hotel Commodore, New York City
Speakers at Luncheon and Panels on Labor, Social Services and Economic Planning include Charles Abrams, Willard E. Atkins, John Bauer, B. Braatoy, Lucille J. Buchanan, E. J. Coil, Michael M. Davis, Abraham Epstein, Ethel S. Epstein, Arthur Feller, John Green, Hiram A. Jones, Abraham Lefkowitz, Alfred Baker Lewis, Lewis Lorwin, Nathaniel M. Minkoff, Joseph Schlossberg, Mary K. Simkhovitch, Mark Starr, Michael Straight, Anna Lord Strauss, Patricia Strauss, Norman Thomas, Ashley L. Totten and others.
Apply to Harry W. Laidler
LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
112 East 19th Street New York City

REST, RECREATION,
WINTER SPORTS
available at nearby resort establishments advertising in
The NATION
For information, turn to the resort columns on the inside back cover.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Letters to the Editors

Liberty in War Time

Dear Sirs: Reinhold Niebuhr in your issue of January 24 argues for restrictions on civil liberties in war time by setting up straw figures named "absolutists" and "relativists." In the name of relativism he proceeds to dispose of the absolutists who would sacrifice national unity to unrestricted liberty.

This might be a very useful distinction if the two groups existed, but there just ain't any such animals as absolutists. The most extreme champions of civil liberty draw a line somewhere—at "clear and present danger" or incitements to illegal acts—let alone making many qualifications in the field of obscenity and libel. And all of them are compelled constantly to balance one right against another in developing public policy: to take a minor example, the divergent rights of pickets, of the public, and of non-striking workers. In war time all recognize the need for regulating the use of military information, for censoring communication with foreign countries, and for putting restrictions on certain enemy aliens.

The plain fact is that all libertarians are "relativists." Dr. Niebuhr is simply a more cautious relativist than those whose policies he scores. His thesis, reduced to a simple statement, is that a democracy in war time must insure unity by a reasonable degree of regrettable coercion. He regards coercion as too dangerous to risk much of it; so he urges that criticism of government be kept inviolate and that even anti-democratic movements be allowed except when there is a "clear and present danger" of acts.

The "absolutists" he creates would not disagree with that. They would only be less inclined than he to justify possibly wider coercion by taking refuge in a vague "total situation." And they would affirm loudly and insistently that a democracy can fight a war and keep its liberties intact. They would buttress his questioning faith by practical examples far ahead of his relative conservatism—the experience of England, the more recent decisions of the Supreme Court, and universal condemnation of national "unity" by suppression in the World War. And they would recall the words of Attorney General Biddle, who said after the declaration of war: "If we care about democracy, we must care about it as a reality for others as well as for ourselves; yes, for aliens, for Germans, for Italians, for Japanese; for those who are against us as well as those who are with us. For the Bill of Rights protects not only American citizens but all human beings who live on our American soil, under our American flag."

This is not the rhetoric of an "absolutist." Happily, it is the professed policy of an Administration which appears to comprehend the essential obligations of democratic liberty in war time.

ROGER BALDWIN, Director,
American Civil Liberties Union

New York, January 28

The People Speaking

Dear Sirs: The campaign that has been conducted by Freda Kirchwey and I. F. Stone in the case of the Free Peoples of the World vs. the United States State Department is a most gratifying bit of journalism. It is astonishing that not more people in this country are alive to the tragic division that exists between the White House and Mr. Hull's department. The indifference of the people as a whole to the monstrous policies of the State Department set can be ascribed possibly to an ancient American conviction that diplomacy is an esoteric business, circuitous at best, which can be engaged in only by the select, without interference from the voting public.

What did we gain by recognizing Vichy? The State Department and its apologists say we maintained the delicate balance of Pétain's France and prevented it from toppling over to the Nazi cause. But what did we lose? The respect and admiration of millions of Frenchmen inside and outside France. We have betrayed the great bulk of Frenchmen who hate Vichy as they hate Berlin because they are one and the same.

The State Department protest in connection with the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon carries the whole matter to a ludicrous extremity The war had already begun for us. Vichy was, as it is now, as much an enemy of the United States as the Quisling government of Norway, the Rome government of Mussolini, the Berlin government of Hitler. Yet our State Department "regrets" that our friends and allies, the Free French, have so far forgotten the amenities of appeasement as to remove the threat of enemy bases from our coastline. What's more, the State Department tells Vichy—our enemy—that the people of the United States are sorry.

We are not sorry! We are glad! Glad that some Frenchmen have not forgotten Lafayette and liberty. We indorse, with a thousand amens, tributes such as The Nation paid to the Free French leaders in its telegram. We who are fighting for liberty and are not appeasing dictators want desperately to tell the Free French that their cause is not lost, as they must sometimes think it is. We want to assure them that it is we the people speaking and not the State Department.

Yes, I agree with you: Mr. Hull must go, and our State Department must be reorganized. This is essential to the unity of anti-fascists throughout the world. We must tell the peoples in dark Europe, the bitterly confused Chinese, the disillusioned, almost forgotten Loyalists of Spain, that we are awake now —really alive to the danger—and that we regret what has gone before. President Roosevelt must be free of influence that would make a travesty of the Atlantic Charter and the pact of the United Nations of the World.

NORMAN A. KAHL

Washington, D. C., January 10

Dear Sirs: You are right in your protest against the attitude of our State Department toward the liberty-loving people of St. Pierre and Miquelon. The State Department committed the same blunder when the Spanish Republicans fought for freedom. If we had supplied munitions to them, Hitler and Mussolini would never have dared to pursue their ruthless warfare.

SAMUEL A. CARLSON

Jamestown, N. Y., January 12

Dear Sirs: Freda Kirchwey's article with the flaming headline Mr. Hull Should Resign, in The Nation for January 23, seemed ungenerous and unwise at a time when we are trying so hard to unite all of the many forces that must be united if we are to win this war. I feel indignant personally about St. Pierre and Miquelon, but I do not think we should speak against the government at a time like this. As a pacifist I have to be so muzzled about the war at best, but we must win a war in order to gain peace and I believe action more important than thoughts. I have read The Nation for fifty years!

GERTRUDE H. FRIEDLANDER

Cincinnati, Ohio, January 9

Dear Sirs: Congratulations on your editorial Mr. Hull Should Resign. I have followed Mr. Hull's course of action, along with your comments, from the time of the Spanish civil war, and I believe there is a growing feeling that Mr. Hull has served his time and should resign. I only hope that you will continue along this same line until you succeed in forcing his retirement. One cannot get up very much enthusiasm over the defense program with Hull doing everything possible to appease the aggressor.

A. B. COULTER

Tacoma, Wash., January 10

Dear Sirs: Each week I read The Nation with eagerness and admiration. Just now I cannot refrain from telling you that I am thrilled by the courageous attitude the editors took in regard to the Free French occupation of the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. My heartiest congratulations to you and my very best wishes in all your good work.

EDNA SKINNER

Amherst, Mass., January 16

Dear Sirs: Marvel if you must at the "unawareness" of London and Washington. "Unpreparedness," however, denotes at least a recognition of the fact that there is something to prepare against. Such a recognition would be far beyond the comprehension of the State Department, which has proved that it will recognize no nation as a foe until it whacks us in the head with a blackjack we have sold it.

T. A. TENOR

Beaver Falls, Pa., January 24

The Oklahoma Book Trials

Dear Sirs: Over a year ago a letter of mine appeared in the columns of The Nation describing the arrest and conviction of a number of persons in Oklahoma for the alleged possession of "subversive literature." That letter was written just after my release from the Oklahoma County jail. Since that time the Oklahoma "book trials" have become a national scandal, and as a result no further trials have been held since the sentencing of Ina Wood to ten years in the penitentiary in June, 1941. All the defendants, including those convicted, are free on bond supplied through the International Labor Defense.

However, the people of our country should not forget about the Oklahoma prosecutions. Four individuals still have sentences of ten years hanging over them; eight others still face trial. The Oklahoma American Legion has announced that it will file a brief as friend of the court in behalf of the prosecution when appeals come up on the four "criminal-syndicalism" convictions. The Knights of Pythias have already filed such a brief, describing as "communistic" the American Civil Liberties Union and all other organizations which have shown an interest in maintaining the Bill of Rights in Oklahoma. When the librarian of Dartmouth College wrote for a list of the books still held in the Oklahoma County jail, the Oklahoma City Times reported that John Eberle, the assistant county attorney credited with main responsibility for the prosecutions, said: "If Dartmouth wants them, Dartmouth can have them. I don't care who reads them in New Hampshire. I'm interested in their effect in Oklahoma." There can be no doubt that the prosecution would take advantage of the slightest lack of vigilance on the part of the American public to resume its book-burnings.

I am therefore very glad to be able to report that in December, 1941, 279 prominent social scientists of the country wrote to the Governor of Oklahoma expressing the belief that "at a time like the present, when millions are suffering and dying to defend their freedom and national independence, we in the United States dare not allow our own democratic processes to be weakened." The social scientists pointed out that "many of the books upon which the convictions were based can be found in school and public libraries throughout the country. When appropriate, we assign them to our students and discuss them in our classes. The important point is not that we do these things but that we must continue to do them if we are not to betray our trust to the youth of America."

To this protest was added last week that of 145 leading social workers and educators from 33 states. Their letter followed an appeal sent out by Eduard C. Lindeman, Helen Hall, and Harry L. Lurie and signed by the heads of some thirty leading settlement houses and numerous agency heads, both public and private, including Mary Anderson, Head of the Women's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor.

I feel sure that many of your readers will want to do their part in defeating the Oklahoma witch-hunters by writing to Governor Leon C. Phillips, Oklahoma City, expressing their hope that he will bring these prosecutions to an end.

ELIZABETH Z. GREEN

New York, January 29

A Negro College Teacher

Dear Sirs: In your issue of January 10 there appears this statement from the Committee for the Advancement of Negro Studies in New York: "But only the University of Chicago has given a teaching job to one of these qualified Negro American intellectuals." This is no doubt true with regard to the special group of Ph.D.'s referred to. However, it should be pointed out that Harvard University has at least one Negro on the teaching staff of its Medical School. This is the eminent syphilologist William A. Hinton, M.D., instructor in bacteriology and immunology and in preventive medicine and hygiene. Dr. Hinton developed the widely used diagnostic serum reaction for syphilis which bears his name.

LYTT GARDNER

Boston, Mass., January 20

Scrap-Collecting on Farms

Dear Sirs: I was interested in the item in your issue of January 24 regarding the scarcity of scrap and our failure to organize any campaign to get it. I suppose you know that the greatest repositories of scrap in the country are the farms, where it is estimated there is enough, when mixed with the proper quantity of new steel, to make as many battleships as now exist. The Department of Agriculture through its Food for Freedom Program is carrying on an active campaign for the repair of farm machinery and through its state and county war boards a scrap-collecting campaign. This campaign is quite well organized, is improving daily, and is bringing results.

T. SWANN HARDING

Falls Church, Va., January 30

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Pric 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: On year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide t Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Inde to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Informatio Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice an the old address as well as the new are require for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 154 · NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 14, 1942 · NUMBER 7

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 177

EDITORIALS

- We Can Lose This War 179
- The Rake's Progress 180
- Sea Story by Freda Kirchwey 182

ARTICLES

- Cool Heads or Martial Law by Robert Bendiner 183
- The Plight of the Nisei by Howard Costigan 184
- If Singapore Falls by Donald W. Mitchell 186
- Jesse Jones, Reluctant Dragon. II. by Dwight Macdonald 187
- Hitler's Shanghaied Volunteers by Joachim Joesten 191
- In the Wind 193
- A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels 194

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Concert Hall. A Poem by W. R. Rodgers 195
- Obituary Page in War Time. A Poem by Oscar Williams 195
- The Negro's "Cultural Past" by E. Franklin Frazier 195
- Private Life in Nazi Germany by Ruth Norden 196
- The Philippine Commonwealth by Catherine Porter 197
- Balkan Journal by Rustem Vambery 198
- An Unknown Land by Maxwell S. Stewart 199
- American Folkways by Charles Curtis Munz 200
- In Brief 201
- Drama: Mice in Modern Literature by Joseph Wood Krutch 201
- Music by B. H. Haggin 202

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 203

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER · Washington Editor I. F. STONE · Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON · MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor RICHARD H. ROVERE · Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN · Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL · JONATHAN DANIELS · LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR · J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX · Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

THE BATTLE FOR SINGAPORE HAS REACHED a crucial stage with the landing of Japanese troops on Singapore Island proper. Although the British claim to have driven back the first of the invaders, it is obvious that more landings will follow. It is now a race against time. The Japanese are trying to overwhelm the defenders before the substantial reinforcements known to be on the way can arrive. But although they have rendered the huge naval base useless, a tenacious defense may still rob them, as in the Philippines, of final conquest. In Burma the situation has improved. The Japanese have made little or no progress toward Rangoon in the past week, and the entry of veteran Chinese troops into the front lines would seem an effective guaranty against further Japanese progress in the sector they control. Burma remains the one battle zone in which the United Nations have been able to achieve supremacy in the air. Elsewhere in the Pacific the picture remains clouded. General MacArthur still holds part of the Bataan Peninsula, but it is evident that he is being forced steadily back. And with the acknowledged loss of Amboina Island and Samarinda, the Dutch position has become increasingly serious.

*

THE SHIPPING RESOURCES OF THE UNITED Nations are still very large, but they are being strained to the uttermost by the demands of the Battle of the Pacific, the huge import needs of American war industries, and the constant call for supplies for Russia and Britain. Thus every U-boat torpedo which finds a mark deals a heavy blow, and we must recognize that Hitler has scored a success by sending his submarines to operate on this side of the Atlantic. How dearly that success is costing him we do not know, since the navy, as a general rule, does not mention successful attacks on enemy submarines. We must be content with Mr. Knox's assurance that the raiders are not getting off scot-free, and the curve of ship sinkings will soon reveal whether the German navy is able to stand the pace. British sources report that ship losses in the Atlantic as a whole in January were above the average for the last six months but below the figure for January, 1941. Off the shores of the United States fifteen vessels have been attacked and fourteen sunk. The fact that many of these ships were tankers again raises the possibility of gasoline and fuel-oil rationing along the Eastern seaboard. Should that prove necessary, we hope there will be better organization than was in evidence last summer. The most tragic side of the U-boat campaign is the loss of 400 seamen. We wonder about the efficacy of the life-saving equipment with which they were provided. The Norwegian mercantile marine has adopted a special life-saving suit which keeps men not only afloat but warm and dry. The Maritime Commission and the seamen's unions would do well to investigate this invention.

*

BY NAMING LORD BEAVERBROOK MINISTER of War Production Mr. Churchill has done something to meet the critics of Britain's industrial effort, but the accompanying reshuffle of minor ministers does little to increase confidence in the strength and ability of the government as a whole. The old gang of appeasers cling limpet-like to their posts, and the inner War Cabinet remains untouched, still representing party leaders rather than the best available brains. Moreover, most of its members are burdened with departmental duties and are not free to concentrate on broad questions of policy. The appointment of Lord Beaverbrook to a position analogous to that occupied by Donald Nelson may cut the red tape and curb the atavistic business practices that now keep British production below its potential maximum. But it remains to be seen whether Beaverbrook's notorious lack of tact may not cancel the beneficial effects of his equally notorious energy. When the Ministry of Supply was instituted early in the war, it was supposed to do the job now handed to the Ministry of War Production. But it ended by looking after army needs alone, for the Admiralty continued to insist on bossing naval production, while lack of cooperation from the Air Ministry led to the creation of a separate Ministry of Aircraft Production. Sir Stafford Cripps is reported to have been offered the Ministry of Supply but to have refused because it did not carry membership in the War Cabinet. Returning to the House of Commons "with an open mind," he will occupy a strategic position in the event of a future ministerial crisis as the one man of front-rank reputation now outside the government.

*

WE HOPE SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS'S APPEAL FOR a closer and more cordial association between Russia and the Western democracies will not go unheeded. Since Hitler struck at the Soviets last year there has been a gradual improvement in relations, but they still rest on a basis of immediate expediency. There remain influential people in Britain and America who are more worried by the prospect of a Russian victory over Germany than of a German victory over Russia. There are others who fondly hope that the future will be made safe for respectable reaction by a mutual throat-cutting on the part of Hitler and Stalin. Such political psychopaths, as Cripps has pointed out, offer the perfect medium for the culture of Goebbels's deadly bacteria. Admittedly, the Kremlin's frequent resort to Machiavellian tactics did much to assist the Nazis in building up the "red menace." But we can now see that Russia for nearly ten years has been preoccupied by preparations to meet a Nazi onslaught which it realized was inevitable once Hitler had been allowed to establish his regime. When the danger of German imperialism to Russia has been permanently removed, there is some reason to expect a reorientation of Soviet policies. Sir Stafford Cripps, who as Britain's ambassador in Moscow until recently had excellent opportunities for exploring the minds of the Soviet leaders, declares that Russia is "anxious and most willing to work in association with Great Britain and America after the war and to prepare now so as to make that work as effective and valuable as possible." He points out that the three countries have all signed the Atlantic Charter. If they could get together in an effort to translate that rather vague document into concrete terms, they might discover that their post-war aims are not as incompatible as is feared and so do much to banish the suspicions now hindering the growth of mutual confidence.

*

BRITISH ANXIETY OVER EGYPT SEEMS TO have been at least temporarily allayed by the formation of a new National Union government headed by Mustapha Nahas Pasha, leader of the Wafd, the largest of Egypt's political parties. Although the previous government resigned ostensibly because of the ill health of Premier Hussein Sirry Pasha, it is known that Axis, particularly Italian, agents had been at work stirring up discontent. The Wafd Party has hitherto refused to participate in the government on the ground that the elections to the present Egyptian Chamber were unfair. Its acceptance of power now is generally regarded as a rebuff to Axis agents, who had sought to provoke serious political disturbances. Axis prospects were also dealt a heavy blow recently when the Egyptian government broke off diplomatic relations with Vichy, thus eliminating the source of much pro-Axis propaganda. Although the new Premier is expected to continue his predecessor's policy with regard to the war, the British have definite misgivings about King Farouk. And it remains to be seen how staunch the new government's loyalty will be in the event of an invasion of Egypt by General Rommel's powerfully augmented forces.

*

LITTLE BETTER USE OF THE PRODUCTIVE resources of small business enterprises throughout the country has so far been made by the War Production Board than by its predecessors, the SPAB and OPM. According to the report of the Senate's Small Business Committee, 56 of the country's 184,230 manufacturing plants have received more than 75 per cent of army and navy contracts. Only 6,000 plants—or one out of thirty—have received defense orders of any kind. Responsibility for this situation is placed squarely on Donald Nelson by the Senate committee. The report points out that Mr. Nelson not only is a representative of big business himself but has chosen big-business executives to head the four most important divisions of his organization. Furthermore, practically nothing was done to spread contracts to small business men during the months when Mr. Nelson was director of the Office of Small Business Affairs under the National Defense Advisory Commission. That the enlistment of small business in the war effort can be achieved where there is a will to do it is indicated in a survey of the Philadelphia Ordnance District recently printed in the New York Times. In this area, largely through the efforts of the chief ordnance officer, 598 prime contracts and some 7,500 subcontracts have been let. One large tank manufacturer uses 211 subcontractors, who in turn are assisted by 1,056 subsubcontractors. Among these is an automobile service garage which uses its lathe to turn out a small rod that props open a door of a piston porthole in a tank. The results of this subcontracting have been excellent, and there is no legitimate reason why the same methods should not be used throughout the country.

* * *

THE BUSINESS DOMINATION OF THE WAR effort came in for further stringent criticism when R. J. Thomas, president of the United Automobile Workers, placed the blame for the delay in shifting to all-out war production primarily upon the shoulders of Knudsen, who he declared has represented the automobile industry and not the people of the country in his service at Washington. He predicted that the WPB, like the OPM, would fail unless it was reorganized to give labor a bigger voice in the conduct of the arms program. Some business spokesmen complain that Thomas's statement and the U. A. W.'s demand for higher wages violate the spirit of the war-time truce accepted by labor after Pearl Harbor. This is, of course, a smoke screen deliberately set up for the purpose of covering up the ways in which a business-controlled OPM has obstructed all-out production. For if there is any justification for placing representatives of big business in strategic posts on the War Production Board, there is at least equal reason for giving adequate representation to labor.

* * *

ELEANOR ROOSEVELT SHOULD HAVE KNOWN better. She should, in other words, have known that the appointment to defense posts of a movie actor and a dancer who also happened to be her friends would arouse as much fury in the House of Representatives as the disaster at Pearl Harbor. Instead, she provided a perfect opening for attack—though as usual the violence of the storm was hardly justified. If there were any use discussing the merits of the case we could point out that public entertainment may be a vital factor in the morale of citizens and that Melvyn Douglas might be as useful as some of the dollar-a-year men from big business—whom Congressmen never, never object to. We could also point out that the strain of air raids on children is a proper study for a civilian-defense organization and that dancers are also human beings and not automatically disqualified for such work—some Congressmen can't even dance. But we may be sure that the enraged legislators will not let such considerations prevent them from seizing a golden opportunity to attack the Administration and Mrs. Roosevelt. They have inserted a clause in the appropriations bill for the OCD forbidding the use of funds for "instructions in physical fitness by dancers, fan dancing, street shows, theatrical performances, or other public entertainment." What we need now is a clause prohibiting Congressmen from making spectacles of themselves at the taxpayers' expense.

We Can Lose This War

A GOOD many of our daily newspapers seem to have instructed their headline-writers to use the right end of the telescope when viewing successes for our side but to reverse it when looking at Axis achievements. That is one reason why the general public lacks full appreciation of the extremely serious position in which the United Nations are at present placed. The remedy is not lectures on the folly of complacency; it is less distorted news, more facts, and above all more authoritative explanations of what the facts which can be published mean.

In this connection we should like to support the recent plea of Walter Lippmann that greater efforts be made to help the American people "to exercise their inalienable right to understand the war." As Mr. Lippmann says, it is only the President and his chief colleagues who can tell the story, the good with the bad, and explain it; "the people can take it and they will like it, and there will be laid down in this way, as in no other way, the foundations of confidence."

We hope the President will take up this task in his promised broadcast this month. The need is urgent, for there is every sign that a testing time for our nerves is rapidly approaching. Everywhere except in Russia the United Nations are on the defensive. In the Far East, after two months of war, we really have our backs to the wall. Malaya, Borneo, and the Philippines have been lost, even though General MacArthur's little army is still doing yeoman service by immobilizing a considerable Japanese force. Singapore is closely besieged, and Rangoon and Java are seriously threatened. If these key positions are lost—and there is no use disguising the fact that they are in grave danger—the opportunity for a counteroffensive against the Japanese will be long postponed. China with its huge resources of man-power would be cut off from the supplies with which a powerful offensive against the Japanese flank could be developed. Australia and India would both be exposed to attack, and the Indian Ocean would come under Japanese control.

In North Africa the situation is less serious because no absolutely vital point is yet endangered. But what has been lost is the initiative, the early prospect of clearing the Axis out of North Africa and launching an offensive against Italy itself. Nor can the British afford to treat General Rommel's advance lightly. The strategic importance of Egypt as a link between East and West has been enhanced by Japan's entry into the war, and it must be defended at all costs. It is hardly likely that the British will be able to divert more forces from the Middle to the Far East, and it may be necessary to strengthen the army under General Auchinleck. If reinforcements of men and equipment have to be hurried to both the eastern Mediterranean and western Pacific areas the prospects of a new front in Europe this year will grow dim.

Russia, as we have said, remains a bright spot, but we need to guard against the danger of making too heavy a psychological investment in Russian successes. The Red Army has made a magnificent recovery after its long retreat and has made significant advances in its present counter-offensive. But as Sir Stafford Cripps has just warned, the Nazis have not been routed. They have suffered heavy losses of men and equipment; they have been driven out of a number of valuable positions; but they still hold a line from which a spring offensive could be launched when weather conditions again favor the use of mechanized armies. About six weeks of real winter remain; then will come a period of thaw and mud likely to hamper the Russians almost as much as the Germans. Everything, then, depends on whether the Soviet forces can press home their offensive sufficiently to push the Germans out of the eastern Ukraine and out of such strategic centers as Vitebsk, Smolensk, Bryansk, and Kharkov. That would mean a major Nazi defeat and would probably force Hitler to throw into the battle the reserves he is training for the spring campaign.

Reports from a number of European centers suggest that German preparations for that campaign have been on an impressive scale. Factories are turning out masses of tanks and planes for the use of reorganized Panzer and Luftwaffe units. Not only is Germany itself being combed for men, but tremendous pressure is being put on the puppet allies to supply huge numbers either for service in Russia or to replace Nazi troops in conquered territories. Some of the German dispositions suggest that a dual offensive may be planned—a grandiose pincer movement with its southern arm striking through Turkey and its northern arm through the Caucasus. The objectives would be oil and the breaking of British imperial communications in the Middle East so as to permit the forging of a link with Japan by way of the Indian Ocean. If this is Hitler's program, Rommel's drive in North Africa may be regarded as a preliminary phase. Another revealing fact is the particularly stubborn defense which the German army has conducted in the Donetz Basin area since the loss of Rostov.

All these plans could be frustrated by a major Russian triumph in the next few weeks, but it is still uncertain whether the Red Army can achieve the essential follow-through. Thus it is particularly disturbing to learn that shipments from this country of vitally needed equipment for Russia have been lagging behind schedule. The main difficulty is said to be shipping. Somehow this obstacle must be removed, for it is Russia that is holding down the largest and most efficient of the Axis armies and thus giving us some freedom of action in the Far East. Should the Russian dyke give way, our situation, already unhappy enough, would indeed become desperate. It is acknowledged that the Russian requests for equipment which we have promised to meet are not exorbitant. Let us break our backs rather than our word.

The first step toward winning this war is a realization that we have a good chance of losing it if, as William L. Batt said last week, we fail to bring to the task anything less than "the constant, driving, unflagging will to win." And that will must be fortified by the kind of intelligent understanding that grasps the connection between sending arms to Russia and beating off the Japanese menace in Asia. None of the many duties of the President is more urgent than the promotion of such understanding.

The Rake's Progress

ON DECEMBER 8, the day after the attack on Pearl Harbor, the Hearst chain of newspapers, which stretches from New York to California, printed prominently the following declaration of editorial policy:

> Our main concern now is about England. This attack by Japan upon us is largely to create diversion. We must not be diverted any more than is necessary for our own protection. The war is our war now—not only in Asia but in Europe.

On January 2, however, the same newspapers printed with similar prominence these words:

> Mr. Churchill's address was most eloquent, and it may truthfully be said in praise of democracies that they do unerringly select their best talkers for the conduct of their wars. However, it might interest Mr. Churchill to know that the average American . . . does > not think it makes a lot of difference in the eventual issue of this war who owns the sand dunes of the Libyan desert. . . . Is it not about time that the United States thought less of the Atlantic Ocean and the Mediterranean and more of the Pacific Ocean . . . and even more about the United States of America?

And on January 28 they followed with this:

> England has systematically sacrificed her Allies to her own safety and her own immediate objectives. She sacrificed Norway—withdrew from the battle front without informing the Norwegian forces, with which she was in physical contact, what she was doing and why. She sacrificed Belgium in identically the same manner. . . . England abandoned France at Dunkirk and executed a masterly retreat to England. The French term it as "masterly" desertion of the Allied cause. . . . England's plain policy seems to be to have allies, but not to be an ally. A nation can render any aid or service to England it pleases, but it must not expect any aid and service in return.

Articles of similar purport, with many letters to the editor emphasizing the same points, are continually appearing in the New York Daily News, the Washington Times-Herald, and other papers. The Washington Times-Herald recently referred to the string of Atlantic bases acquired in the destroyer deal as "a lot of time bombs which will one day blow up in our faces," because they were only leased (for ninety-nine years) and not permanently annexed. And all the same points are daily emphasized by the German radio in its efforts to prevent support of the Allied cause by the people of France, Norway, Belgium, and Holland, and to sow distrust in the minds of the people of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and all the colonial territories. Similar expressions of American opinion are quoted in the German broadcasts to Britain in order to foster anti-American feeling in that country.

The Nation has always assumed the sincerity of the great body of isolationists—"the blinder the prejudice the more passionate the conviction." And because of their sincerity, and because their opinions were often backed by firmly intrenched interests, it was obvious that as soon as the honeymoon of "national unity" which began with the Pearl Harbor attack was over, they would once more play a vital part in the public's attitude to the war. They represent forces which might quite conceivably undermine that unity among twenty-six nations through which alone victory can be won. It is axiomatic that if Hitler can cause divisions among this country, the British Empire, Russia, and China, he may beat them. The bitter experience of other countries proves to us that this problem cannot be complacently ignored, especially since this first year of war happens to be a Congressional election year, when politics will inevitably play a heavy part in Congressional action.

Just as isolationism affected foreign policy before the war, so it affects public judgment of the appropriate strategy in war itself—as the isolationist section of the press is now proving.

We know now by the experience of other countries—which also believed that their national unity, in war time at least, would stand up against all assaults—that the enemy strategy counts enormously upon the divisive and disruptive elements in popular feeling: upon nationalist hostilities, racial prejudices, historical animosities, economic rivalries. Such ferments, working actively enough in France before the war to destroy the alliance with Russia, continued after the declaration of war to such degree as to undermine the ties with Britain and prepare the way for a separate peace. They did this by creating first of all that "Maginot mind" which goes with a nationalism that has become hostile to cooperation with foreigners and is compelled therefore to fall back upon purely "defensive" strategy.

But there are two points in France's tragic story which should concern us now. The first is that the divisive forces by which Hitler profited did not come to full fruition until after war had begun. While anti-Semitism, anti-Sovietism, Anglophobia did exist before the war, they were regarded as relatively harmless. Plenty of persons in France were ready enough to pass on the slogan, "Britain will fight to the last Frenchman" (the German radio now sends out daily the slogan, "Britain will fight to the last American"), but had you suggested to one of those Frenchmen that he was preparing the way for a government of surrender that would one day allow France to be used for the German conquest of Britain, he would have been not merely completely incredulous but profoundly shocked.

The second point we should recall is that the decision to carry on the war from Africa with a government in Algeria supported by the French navy was defeated only by a margin of three votes in the French Cabinet. A slightly better morale among the leaders, a little less defeatism and Anglophobia, and today the whole of Africa would be unquestionably an Allied bastion, an Anglo-French fleet would command the Mediterranean, Dakar would be an American outpost, Indo-China would never have been handed over to Japan by a Vichy government, immense forces would have been liberated for dealing with Japan, and the lives of tens of thousands of Americans who must die this year or next would have been saved.

The military authorities tell us that wars are won by a final margin of military power which may perhaps be quite small. It is clear that that is true of morale as well. Let us face the facts of American isolationism. In these last few years there has probably been more dislike and fear of Russia in this country than there was in France. The fear of communism has been more hysterical. Distrust of "Europe"—which usually means Britain—goes deeper here than Anglophobia went in France. How could it be otherwise? For years the view has been hammered into the minds of Americans that this country was swindled into participation in the last war; that our participation was achieved mainly by the cunning, lying propaganda of the British and of cynical financial interests; that the character of the peace proved America's costly intervention to have been completely futile. Add to this an aversion to war which found support about equally in materialist cynicism and Christian idealism, and you get some idea of the strength of the feelings to which the American isolationist—and the German propagandist—could appeal.

And to those feelings both are still appealing with undiminished vigor. For the American isolationist the honeymoon of national unity, which is supposed to have begun at four o'clock on the Sunday afternoon of December 7 at Pearl Harbor, is over.

The average American liberal will accept that statement with considerable skepticism. This is partly because it is not his habit to read the isolationist press, which consists mainly of newspapers owned by William Randolph Hearst, Joseph M. Patterson, and Robert R. McCormick, whose publishing enterprises stretch across the entire continent. Their papers have a combined circulation larger than that of any other newspaper group in the United States, and they are able to present to tens of millions of readers the same idea, voice the same prejudice, make the same attack, at the same moment from one end of the country to the other. Do we really assume that such an instrument, used in such a way and appealing to forces like those just described, in a Congressional election year, has no bearing at all on the war effort?

Sea Story

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

A CARGO ship set sail from New York the other day. I saw her go. She pulled out of her slip on West Street and moved down the river, loaded almost to the gunwales. I had watched her load, day by day, as I drove down the highway. Barges and lighters had lain alongside for more than a week while all sorts of crates and sacks were lowered into her hold.

You couldn't help noticing her. She didn't wear the dirty gray coat that covers all the Allied boats docked along West Street. She was trim in black and white; her name was on her bow and a flag was painted on her side. And she steamed out into the North River with the nonchalance of a cruise ship in peace time.

Don't worry—I'm not telling anything that Secretary Knox will object to. Not one word of this information would be useful to the enemy even if I published the ship's name and the date she sailed. You see the enemy knows about her already; in fact, the enemy approved her departure, and his submarines operating off our coast let her pass unmolested. Dressed in her civilian garb, she moved through them unafraid. For she is a Vichy ship carrying a cargo to Casablanca or some other Vichy port with the permission of the American State Department and of the German Armistice Commission.

American ships and British and Norwegian ships and Free French ships and the ships of many other fighting nations are crawling out of American harbors in the dark, crossing the ocean in huddled convoys, hiding their identity as best they can under smoke-colored paint or camouflage. Many never reach port but carry their crews and cargoes to a cold death in the winter sea. Some come bravely through the infested waters to deliver loads of food and guns on all the fronts where men are fighting against an even more horrifying fate.

But my fine neutral merchantman faces no risks. Don't worry about her. The Nazis have agreed that she shall deliver her cargo safely into the hands of the Vichy authorities in Africa. It is a happy arrangement all round; only a boor would be so crude as to ask Mr. Hull or Mr. Welles why the Nazis have agreed so kindly, so magnanimously. And only a boor would suggest that the reports of supplies of all sorts being delivered in Vichy ships to the Nazi forces in North Africa have any relation whatever to the ship that left New York harbor the other day. Since Vichy has promised that American goods will be kept out of the hands of the Nazis, any doubts would obviously be unworthy. And even if those goods should take the place of other goods which are delivered into the hands of the Nazis, that would be one of those coincidental happenings into which gentlemen and diplomats prefer not to look too closely.

It is true that the British government has presented to Under Secretary Welles detailed evidence that French ships have carried French war supplies from French North Africa to Field Marshal Rommel, and that Vichy is negotiating with the Japanese to turn over French naval units in Indo-China for use against the United Nations in the attack on the Dutch Indies, and apparently Mr. Welles is worried. But whether he is worried enough to consider an immediate break with his neutral friend at Vichy remains to be seen.

Meanwhile it is to be assumed that the Nazis have no motive beyond general benevolence in permitting cargo ships to sail in safety from New York to French North African ports. Any other assumption would reflect on the good faith of a so-called government whose role in this struggle may not become clear to the gentlemen in the State Department until the day that American troops in the Far East are bombarded with shells from Vichy ships manned by Japanese sailors.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

Cool Heads or Martial Law

BY ROBERT BENDINER

Washington, February 7

IF THE nerves of the Western Congressional bloc can be soothed, if inflammatory commentators on the "enemy-alien menace" can be diverted to more harmless pursuits, and if the press now working on Martin Dies's "Yellow Book" happily breaks down, we may yet be spared a disaster on the West Coast. With both the Department of Justice and the army threading their way through a veritable minefield, the last thing that is needed is dogmatic advice—from any quarter. What might be helpful, however, is a wider understanding that dangers can come from more than one direction and that there is no simple solution to the problem posed by the presence of some 112,000 Japanese and Japanese-Americans in the three Pacific Coast states.

The first inclination of the military, not unreasonably, is to "Remember Pearl Harbor." While sabotage actually had little to do with that débâcle, Secretary Knox to the contrary notwithstanding, there is no doubt that unrestrained espionage paved the way. Neither is there any doubt that Japanese agents have been doing a similarly systematic job on the West Coast. Upward of 2,000 alleged agents of the Tokyo government have already been arrested, including in their ranks members of the armed services of Japan and of secret military societies. More than one humble fisherman has turned out to be an officer of the imperial navy, and it is highly probable that the coast has been carefully charted all the way from Seattle to San Diego. Propagandists too have long been at work, greatly aided by the 248 Japanese-language schools that flourish on the Coast. Although not more than a third of the country's Japanese racial population is alien born, roughly half of the Nisei, or American-born Japanese, have, either under threat or by conviction, registered with Japanese consuls as "dual citizens." Some 15,000 of them have in fact been educated in Japan and have returned to this country, most out of preference but some, no doubt, in line of duty.

Given these facts and figures, the most phlegmatic will admit the probability that in the event of an attack on the Coast, whether by sea or air, a certain amount of aid and comfort would await the enemy. In the circumstances the army mind moves inevitably toward a radical solution: clear all "enemy aliens" out of the coastal region and take no chances.

Here the enormous complexities of the problem begin to crop up, and they are by no means restricted to the field of civil liberties. In the first place, those who would be affected by such a move are limited to Japanese who came to this country before the Exclusion Act of 1924 and whose average age, I am told, is something like sixty-three; some 20,000 Germans, many of whom are anti-Nazi refugees; and 50,000 Italians, whom almost nobody regards as enemies, much less as a menace. Clearly, then, if a sweeping approach is in order and is to make sense, it would have to take into account the native-born generation as well as the alien. And that is precisely what is being demanded in many quarters of the Far West, with heated Congressional echoes in Washington.

If General De Witt, in command of the Ninth Corps Area, should insist on such a measure as a military necessity, it will be hard for the Department of Justice, which is technically charged with the enemy-alien problem, to refuse. But in that case Attorney General Biddle is prepared to step out of the picture entirely and turn full jurisdiction over to the army. He would almost have to do this, in fact, since the forced migration that would result could never be handled by a handful of lawyers in Washington and a corps of FBI men. Such a solution, moreover, involving suspension of the writ of habeas corpus and a score of other fundamental civil rights, would come with better grace from the military than from the Department of Justice.

There is no jurisdictional squabble over this hot potato. On the contrary, Justice officials do not conceal their distress over the difficulties involved. Nevertheless, the Attorney General is not ready to surrender the problem to the mercies of martial law; first, because he is not convinced of the necessity and, secondly, because he is fully convinced of the extensive evils in such a solution.

The worst of these evils, from the standpoint of national defense, is economic rather than legalistic. Aside from those in domestic service and a handful of business and professional men, a great proportion of the Japanese on the Coast are either fishermen (as are many of the Italians) or truck gardeners. From 30 to 40 per cent of California's truck gardening is in Japanese hands, and in some parts of the state the raising of green vegetables is virtually a Japanese monopoly, with stores and markets wholly dependent on their production. Important at any time, the yield of the Japanese truck farms is vital with the sudden quartering of something like half a million troops in California. Nor is it feasible to supplant these Japanese farmers in a hurry. Trained in a tradition of intensive cultivation, they have learned to make their few acres yield down to the last square foot. As a rule, moreover, an entire family works a farm, so that even on a strictly numerical basis it would take more than one Okie to replace a Japanese farmer. Complicating matters still further is the fact that for the most part these garden plots are naturally located near the centers of population, in the vicinity of which most of the newly built defense plants are to be found.

Almost as serious a problem as what to do about the farms is the question of what to do with the evicted farmers. No arrangements whatever have been made, and as far as I can gather, nobody yet knows exactly what is to be done, if anything, with those who are scheduled to be expelled from their homes and farms in the prohibited areas already prescribed, though the matter of resettling them is being studied by the Federal Security Administration. There has been some informal toying with the idea of setting up voluntary camps, but it seems all too probable that vigilante pressure would soon remove the optional aspect of this solution, and while it is true that many loyal aliens would be a lot safer in a camp than on the streets of a bombed San Francisco, "protective custody" has too ugly a ring to be readily adopted.

For the time being the Attorney General's office is satisfied to tack and haul, with three main objectives in view. It is cooperating closely with the army in clearing aliens of the enemy countries from limited areas of military importance; it is vigorously tightening the net about enemy agents through curfew regulations in large areas and through the institution of alien certificates throughout the country; and finally it is endeavoring, with increasing success, to convince worried Congressmen and the country itself of the dangers of hysteria and ill-considered administrative extremes. How long it will be able to pursue this restrained and probably nerve-racking course will depend in part on the country's capacity to keep its head. If the first regional exodus, scheduled for February 24, goes through in good order and the jittery are convinced that they can be protected without wholesale expulsions, we shall probably be over the worst hump. If there is a military "incident" on the Coast before then, or some sudden and spectacular act of sabotage, it will be almost impossible to avoid an explosion that will blow away the last shreds of moderation and good sense.

The Plight of the Nisei

BY HOWARD COSTIGAN

EARLY in the evening of the first blackout at Portland, Oregon, the Smith family were belatedly tacking blankets across the dining-room windows and wishing they had eaten dinner earlier. There was a knock at the door and a shouted command to "Open up!" When a Japanese soldier stepped in his front door, Mr. Smith didn't look twice or wait for any explanations. He knew what had happened. As he bolted through the dining-room and out the back way he shrieked a warning to his family: "The invasion is here!" The fact that the soldier was an American and that he wore a United States army uniform wasn't nearly as apparent at first glance as the fact that racially he was Japanese.

Here, essentially, is the problem of the West Coast Japanese. His physical characteristics make his position at present almost unbearable. No matter what he does he is regarded with suspicion. A young Japanese student riding on a bus in a Los Angeles suburb was so upset by the rest of the passengers staring at him that he burst into tears. Suspicion of all Japanese, including Japanese-Americans, has reached a danger-point on the West Coast. Mayor Fletcher Bowron of Los Angeles—elected as a liberal on a fusion ticket—recently fired thirty-nine American-born Japanese on the the ground that it was impossible to prove that they had not registered at the Japanese consulate as "dual citizens." Congressional mail, man-on-the-street interviews, and letters to the editor indicate a crescendo of alarm which threatens to evolve into something ominous. "If there's an air raid here, a lot of those Japs are going to get killed. Throw them in a concentration camp and work it out after the war is over!"

Almost since the first Japanese emigrated to our Pacific Coast there has been bitterness against them. Proverbially thrifty, they soon displayed an irksome tendency to save their money and establish businesses of their own rather than work for other people. The suggestion, a few weeks ago, that they be removed from pension and relief rolls aroused little interest because so very few cases were involved. In the city of Portland, Oregon, for example, with a Japanese colony of only 1,680, the local Chamber of Commerce lists "330 professional men and women and business firms of Japanese ownership." More than a hundred hotels and apartment houses there were Japanese-owned. Employees of the Northern Pacific Railway at Seattle and Auburn, both with large Japanese populations, have had to work for fairly low wages because of the competition of Japanese contract laborers. Now they have delivered an ultimatum that "either the Japs go or we will." The defense value of the railroad, they explain, is such that it cannot be jeopardized by allowing potential saboteurs to work on it.

The Nisei, American-born Japanese, have been quick to volunteer their services for America's defense, but Japanese-Americans in the army have been moved away from coast camps and Japanese-Americans doing civilian defense work are barred from air-raid service. For, as one local observer put it, "what householder could look with equanimity at a Japanese face at the door when the sirens are screaming for an air raid?" The Japanese-American Citizens League, organized in 1930, is rallying its 10,000 members to activity in civilian defense work. A third of the Japanese community in Seattle attended a meeting sponsored by the league and earnestly pledged themselves to do everything possible, from volunteering in the army to buying defense bonds, to aid a "victorious prosecution of the war." But a population which regards Japanese sea and air raids on its coast as imminent isn't soothed by pledges. The morning papers on December 9 carried statements of loyalty by three prominent Japanese. That evening two of them were arrested as alleged subversive agents.

Stories which began to leak out concerning fifth-column activity in Hawaii, some accurate and others completely unfounded, were such as to alarm even those who had kept their heads before. Some of the Japanese pilots shot down at Pearl Harbor were said to be wearing Honolulu High School and Oregon State College rings. Extremely detailed spy information was indicated by the fact that empty hangars were ignored, those with planes bombed. Officers' quarters near the field and roads leading to it were machine-gunned to prevent pilots from reaching their planes. Other roads were effectively blocked by trucks driven across them from side to side. Japanese agents were able to judge from reports on the supplies ordered by the navy from various local vegetable dealers just when the major part of the fleet would be at Pearl Harbor. Unlicensed short-wave stations were found to have been operated by Japanese residents during the raid. Directing arrows were discovered cut in the sugar cane.

As soon as war broke out, FBI agents on the Coast started arresting those suspected of subversive activity or regarded as potentially dangerous. All financial transactions with enemy aliens were immediately banned. (Licenses have now been worked out under which those Japanese who have not left the country since June 17, 1940, can continue to do business as usual with only periodic reports to the Federal Reserve Bank. Others are allowed by their banks amounts under $500 a month for living expenses.) All cameras and short-wave radios had to be surrendered to the police. No traveling was allowed without police permission. Identification cards had to be carried by all enemy aliens.

These measures meant real hardship. Tenants were told to withhold rents due Japanese landlords. Employers discharged persons they were not allowed to pay. Blue food stamps indorsed by a Japanese were not honored at local banks. Seattle, mostly dependent on Japanese truck gardeners, found itself with only 10 per cent of its normal supply of fresh vegetables, and when Italy joined the war a few days later, most of that tithe disappeared. Housewives laid in huge supplies of canned vegetables, leaving those stores which weren't boycotted with almost empty shelves. In Seattle, which ranks first in amount of coast-defense expenditures, there has been a 60 per cent decline in Japanese retail business since the war, and more than twenty Japanese business firms have closed down. When a local Japanese leader who had been held three weeks on charges of subversive activity asked that he be permitted to pledge property in lieu of cash for his $25,000 bail since all his funds were frozen, the judge refused. He spent in jail the additional month the government said it needed to prepare its case. Health Department offices were swamped by Japanese-Americans who needed birth certificates to prove their citizenship so that they could keep their jobs or continue in business.

Undoubtedly the rapid and widely publicized measures taken by the federal government against enemy aliens helped to prevent race riots. It wouldn't have taken much to turn against the local Japanese the mob of 2,000 that broke twenty-six plate-glass windows of stores left lighted during Seattle's first blackout. Newspaper accounts of the murder of a Seattle Chinese during a blackout on December 12 were written on the assumption that the man had been mistaken for a Japanese. Local Chinese and Filipinos felt it advisable to start wearing identifying buttons and putting emblems on their cars. It was suggested that all Japanese be interned for their own protection. The fire that broke out on December 14 in Seattle's public market, in which many stalls are tended by Japanese and Italians, was put down as of incendiary origin.

As the suspect list grows and the FBI becomes increasingly overburdened, faith in its power to shadow effectively more than 100,000 first- and second-generation Japanese is called into question by panic-minded vigilantes, who would, old Western style, take the law into their own hands. Although there is no record of any sabotage so far, the government's establishment of "prohibited areas" and curfew regulations has been roundly denounced as "short of protection." A committee of West Coast Congressmen has unanimously agreed that all Japanese, aliens and citizens alike, should be moved from the West Coast. A feasible compromise would be to leave on the Coast those Japanese whose businesses are essential and have them carry on under surveillance of the FBI, which, while constantly on the alert against possible sabotage, would also, and equally for the sake of war efficiency, suppress the ancient Western curse of vigilante rule.

If Singapore Falls

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

IN A campaign whose quick triumphs must make Hitler envious Japan has greatly weakened its opponents and seized nearly everything that the military experts had predicted would be lost. The price it has paid in men, ships, and planes has been considerable; yet its conquests have been cheap in proportion to their ultimate value.

The key to Japanese success has been largely air and sea superiority in the vital theater of operations. Much of this superiority rests in turn upon favoring geography. Japan's targets are isolated and lie at the end of what are for us fantastically long lines of communication. Hence they are hard to reinforce, and Japan can bring against any one of them all the strength at its command in sufficient superiority to achieve victory. The full exploitation of these natural advantages has been greatly aided by the blunders of the Allies.

For the gains which can be attributed largely to unfavorable geography we may spare all tears. Most of them are not vital and can ultimately be recovered, provided the war runs sufficiently in our favor in other fields. Save for Luzon's iron, which is badly needed by Japan but is insufficient to make up for the Anglo-American embargo on scrap, no significant additions to the Japanese economy have been obtained. Far more serious both economically and strategically are the gains in Malaya, Borneo, Celebes, Tarakan, and the islands near New Guinea. They constitute breaches in the outer ramparts of vital Allied defense lines. But the Japanese, though now within close striking distance of points absolutely vital to the United Nations, have not yet won their campaign.

The important question at present is whether we have learned enough from our defeats to turn them into later victories. Immediately before December 7 most Americans were overconfident to the point of smugness. For thirty-five years prior to 1941 the possibility of a war with Japan was never absent from American calculations, and during most of this time Japan was Potential Public Enemy Number One. Seldom in this long period did responsible students of war underestimate the Japanese. But in 1940 and 1941 the sharp successes of Hitler turned our eyes in his direction. With a navy thoroughly adequate only for an offensive in one ocean at a time, the Administration tended to concentrate attention on Europe and the Atlantic. Hence during the period that Americans were becoming convinced of the menace of Nazi Germany they made the mistake of underestimating the Japanese. Even plans for a total war prepared after July, 1941, were based on the invalid assumption that we could win in the Far East without undertaking an all-out offensive.

In the absence of definite information it is difficult to know what is now passing through the minds of our war planners and whether they are still underestimating Japan. But Secretary Knox's insistence that Germany is our main enemy and the lack of alarm in Senator Connally's admission that we were quite likely to lose Singapore are not reassuring. Overconfidence seems to have survived in the form of a belief that Japan's gains in the Far East are not vital and that it will be relatively easy to regain lost ground once we have beaten Germany.

Actually, neither of these assumptions is a safe guide for conducting the war. Japan has now made all the gains it can make without gravely jeopardizing our chances of winning the war or, at best, of achieving victory without a long, exhausting struggle. Its every advance has made it less possible for us to bring land-based air power to bear against Japan's homeland. At the same time Japan's acquisition of air bases has greatly increased its own offensive capacities. Singapore must be held for its value as a stronghold, even though its value as a naval base has been temporarily destroyed and the United Nations now have no seat of operations within the war zone capable of supporting the naval power required for an offensive. Conquests already made have greatly increased Japan's supply of rubber, oil, tin, and iron. Additional gains in the Netherlands Indies will further diminish our ability to use economic deprivation as an important weapon. Simultaneously, loss of access to tin and rubber threatens to weaken our own economy. And with every piece of ground given up, our chances of ultimately taking the offensive from nearby bases are diminished.

But would Japan stop with the Indies? Certainly not, unless sufficient force is made available to stay its progress. Gestures at weakly guarded Australia and a flank attack on the Burma road are already occupying its attention. India is the next objective, and if the Japanese can attack it successfully they will be in position to carry out a gigantic pincers movement with the Germans against the British in Mesopotamia and the Near East. Once past Singapore they will be able to send raiders into the Indian Ocean and disrupt not only sea communications with Australia and India but the supply line to British armies in Libya and Syria. The British Isles would then be more dependent upon the United States than ever before, and shipping needed to transport man-power to fight against Germany and Japan would have to be diverted to carrying food and other supplies to England. We should then be fighting a bitter defensive war in which regaining what we had lost would be a thousand times harder than we should have found sparing the force necessary to defend it successfully in the beginning. Japan has only to extend its present conquests far enough in order to win the war.

LIBRARY

The first step toward victory must be a realization that the defensive strategy envisaged prior to December 7, if followed, will only lose the war. Our leaders should also recognize that the most pressing problem is that of defeating the Axis where it is offering the greatest threat, namely, in the Far East. Nazi Germany may be a greater menace to the American way of life than the war lords of Japan, but this fact, if true, does not imply that Hitler should have complete priority in our war plans. The United States, the Soviet Union, and the British Empire were and are the greatest obstacles to the realization of his dreams of world domination, but Hitler did not begin his career as a conqueror by attacking them.

Our immediate military task is to stop Japan. To do this we should first of all get command of the air. The Administration apparently realizes this and is devoting considerable energy to reinforcing air squadrons in the Far East. Both our planes and our personnel have already demonstrated their superiority over their opponents and have inflicted heavy losses, but we have not had enough planes for them to constitute a decisive factor. Pursuit planes must be transported very largely aboard ship since they lack radius for long flights. This necessity is not proving a serious handicap, however, for bombers able to fly to the Far East under their own power have in actual fighting often been more than a match for enemy interceptors.

The second step, and one almost essential to ultimate victory, is the relief of Singapore. Naval aid is probably out of the question, and air reinforcement is not enough. A land offensive from southern China and Burma into Thailand and Malaya is badly needed to relieve pressure. Time may be required to transport large forces to the scene of hostilities, but it must be cut as short as possible. If this offensive is not practicable, Singapore's defenders must hold their position at all costs and, if ultimately forced to yield, must so completely demolish the base as to prevent its easy utilization by Japan.

These two steps will not in themselves win the war, but they are necessary preludes if an all-out offensive is to operate under reasonably good conditions. Whether victory will still be possible if we are unable to carry them out is something nobody knows. It will certainly be long and difficult of achievement.

Jesse Jones, Reluctant Dragon

BY DWIGHT MACDONALD

II

IN GENERAL, the personalities of public men affect the course of events less than journalists pretend. But in the case of Jesse Jones, personality is closely integrated with policy. The kind of a man he is explains both how Jones has managed to intrench himself so firmly in power and why his policies have been sterile in peace time, ruinous in war time. As Fainsod and Gordon put it in their recently published "Government and the American Economy," "the confidence which RFC has engendered in both Congress and the country at large is a function of the cautious manner in which it has administered its duties. The record has been closely associated with the personality of Jesse Jones."

Jesse Jones is sixty-seven years old, and his personal fortune has been put as high as $100,000,000 (pre-1929). He is a heroic model of the traditional American business virtues, suitable for adorning the façades of post offices: six feet three, with a handsome silvery head and a commanding presence; works twelve hours a day; plays bridge and poker for relaxation; spends hours every day on the long-distance phone, his end of the conversation being pretty much limited to "Yes" and "No." Like the elder Morgan, he shone in only one subject at school—arithmetic. Jesse never went beyond grade school, not because of poverty—his father was a moderately prosperous tobacco farmer—but because he wanted to start making money. ("How the hell do you spell 'through'?" he is said to have asked, in the agonies of composing a recent speech.) His scorn for theorists, intellectuals, and such odd fish is huge, and he makes no secret of the fact that he has read only one book in the last ten years. The book was "Gone with the Wind."

But Jones is a business man of a special kind. He is, first of all, a Southerner of the breed of his close friends Jack Garner and Carter Glass, which means he combines provincial small-town conservatism with a dislike for "Wall Street." The dislike, being based simply on the struggle between the local banker and his big-city competitor, is superficial compared to the more general right-wing philosophy, and for all his baiting of Wall Street on interest rates Jones can be depended on to stand firm with the Street on any crucial issue. Jones is, secondly, a real-estate operator and banker; his wealth is notable among Texas fortunes for being based on neither oil nor cotton. Banks, hotels, insurance companies, utilities, and real estate in Fort Worth, Dallas, and especially Houston—these are the components of his private empire. It takes quite different qualities to make money in those fields than in either speculation or entrepreneurial risk-taking, qualities with which Jones seems to be well endowed—secretiveness, caution, diplomacy, patience, acquisitiveness, and the instinct for sitting tight and waiting for interest payments. The nicknames his enemies give him are complimentary noms de guerre—"Jesse James," "Ten Per Cent Jones." Thirdly, Jones has always been a good deal of a politician. He has taken care to own newspapers and radio stations as well as real estate. He has long been a power in the Democratic Party; it was his personal check for $200,000 that brought the 1928 convention to Houston. He is a formidable negotiator and intriguer, expert in getting on with people he wants to get on with. His extraordinary hold over Congress—he has been called the most influential lobbyist in Washington—is partly based on his finesse in handling Congressmen. He makes a point of always receiving a Congressman who wants to present a petitioner for a loan; if the loan goes through, the Congressman gets the credit; if it doesn't, at least the petitioner feels his Congressman has done everything possible for him.

Jesse Jones

But it was more than Jones's diplomatic adroitness that made Senator Vandenberg recently declare, "I think Mr. Jones more generally holds the confidence of Congress than any other member of the Roosevelt Administration"; or that made Senator Byrd say, after the defeat of Roosevelt's "lend-spend" bill in the summer of 1939, "I would have voted for the bill if Jesse Jones had been put in charge of the money"; or that made Representative Ham Fish comment, during the debate on extending the RFC's powers last spring, "I believe that this fund is in safe hands. I would bet on Jesse Jones to outguess and outbargain Hitler and Mussolini." Representative Fish has long since lost his bet, but he was right about the "safe hands," from his point of view. Congressmen trust Jones because they think he will not "abuse" his powers, that is, use them to alter the economic status quo. Their faith is not misplaced.

The Jones policies have been pleasing to Congress, and disastrous to the war program, because they are based on two premises: (1) the RFC must be conducted in a "businesslike," that is, a "profitable," manner—or, more generally expressed, the RFC is an end and not a means to an end; (2) the conduct of the war must not be such as to disturb the existing balance of class and economic forces.

Defending his stewardship of the RFC before the Truman committee, Jones said, "We are negotiating contracts . . . as rapidly as good business permits." As recently as last August, therefore, Jones was spending—as against earmarking for future commitments—his vast funds at the rate of a mere fifty millions a month. This is perfectly sound policy if one regards, as Jones evidently does, the RFC as a corporation analogous to United States Steel, with the people of the United States in the role of stockholders and Jones in the role of the manager who must show a profit. In that case it becomes Jones's duty to hold back for months, as he did, a $9,000,000 loan for a new magnesium process, until he was sure it would work—and this in the summer of 1940 when the whole plane program was imperiled by a shortage of magnesium; and to say, as he did, to those who urged him last summer to finance 100,000 tons of synthetic-rubber capacity, "Why put all that money into plants making rubber that would cost 40 cents a pound when you can get it for 18.5 cents in the Far East?" But from the point of view of an effective war program, in which the RFC's "stockholders" are perhaps even more vitally interested than in the "profit" their corporation may show, these two decisions of Chairman Jones, like most of his other decisions, were excruciatingly mistaken; as mistaken, for instance, as was another state-capitalist enterprise, the Maritime Commission, which according to Fortune "showed a tendency to fill its ships' holds with high-paying cargoes like tapioca and sugar while manganese and chromite waited on the docks of foreign ports." If the United States loses the war, it will go down to defeat in a thoroughly solvent condition.

Just as the chairman of United States Steel is always talking about his sacred obligations to his stockholders, so the chairman of the RFC talks, no doubt with entire sincerity, of his obligation to see that the public gets full value for the money intrusted to him. And in truth he is ever vigilant against petty raiders of the public purse; it is only the really big fellows that he has trouble keeping an eye on. Like other watchdogs he is death on tramps but is liable not to open his mouth when a well-dressed gentleman enters by the front door and walks off with the family silver. There was the now notorious aluminum contract he negotiated last fall in a series of man-to-man talks with President Davis of Alcoa, talks so intimate that neither the OPM nor the War Department nor even the two participants' own lieutenants were let in on them. The contract aroused such protests when it was made public that Jones was forced to revise it in several important respects. A little later he did some more man-to-man "trading" with President Grace of Bethlehem Steel, and once more left the conference room without his pants. The Bethlehem contract hasn't been made public yet, but it is rumored to be even more remarkable than the Alcoa agreement. Even Jones seems to have been a little worried about this deal, but his hands were tied. "He might have cracked down on Bethlehem publicly," explain the editors of Fortune, "but to Jones that would be coercion. 'After all,' he observes, 'this is still a democracy.' "

The interesting concept of the democratic right of big business to remain unmolested by public opinion leads us to the second premise behind Jones's policies—the sanctity of the status quo. His respect for the present order of things goes far beyond any vulgar national interests, as his "trades" with the Anglo-Dutch tin and rubber cartels demonstrate. After a year and a half of negotiating Jesse has emerged with half the Bolivian output of tin, enough to supply about one-fifth the country's normal peace-time needs, plus a smelting plant in Texas—no one ever accused him of slighting his native state—which was originally scheduled for completion early this year and is now postponed until the middle of the summer. The other half of the Bolivian ore still crosses the Atlantic to be smelted in England and then reshipped here, in the good old-fashioned way. The Texas smelter is to be run by the Dutch firm of N. V. Billiton, an influential member of the tin cartel. The record in rubber by now is painfully clear to everyone. The RFC set up the Rubber Reserve Company on July 1, 1940. A full year later the RRC had acquired—in the open market, as the cartel saw to it—just 218,000 tons of rubber from the Far East, about four months' normal peace-time supply. By the time the war broke out, this had increased to 600,000 tons, a year's supply. According to the United States News of January 2, the Anglo-Dutch rubber cartel "limited the amount to be sold, in fear that excessive stocks in the United States might break the price if the war ended." Big business—American, British, or Dutch—speaks the same language everywhere. Although his funds happen to be government and not private money, Jesse Jones speaks in that idiom also. In the world of 1942 it is the language of defeat.

Jones is responsible not only for strengthening the clutch of big business on our productive mechanism but also for delaying the whole plant-expansion program in order to do so. Soon after the Defense Plant Corporation was set up in August, 1940, a disagreement on policy arose between Schram, then RFC chairman, and Jones, nominally completely out of the RFC but actually still its boss. Schram had worked out, after some trial and error, a standardized contract which greatly simplified and speeded up the negotiations between defense manufacturers and the DPC, and which also had the effect of giving everybody equal treatment. Jones objected strongly to these standard contracts; he wanted to "trade" individually in each case, partly because he liked to show his prowess at bargaining, partly because he had always done it that way, and no doubt partly because Schram in the whole DPC affair had shown more independence than Jones likes in his lieutenants. Schram, however, was able to carry his point—until Jones, by skilful maneuvering inside the RFC, made his position impossible and pushed him out and into the presidency of the New York Stock Exchange. After that Jones took over completely, and the standard contract went out the window, though it apparently had been popular with most of the manufacturers. Every contract was the result of interminable "trading" in Jesse's office. The result, whether Jones consciously intended it or not, has naturally been that the more powerful the corporation the better the "trade" it gets out of Jones, so that the RFC's vast plant-building activity simply reproduces on a larger scale the present balance of forces in the economy. This orderly dispensation was quite impossible with Schram's egalitarian standard contracts.

The tempest of war has already laid low Stettinius, Biggers, and many a lesser dollar-a-year man, while that ancient oak, Knudsen, creaks in the gale. But Jesse Jones still stands firm and will not be easily uprooted. We have already noted his hold over Congress. He also commands the confidence of Wall Street and business generally; as the master of the most powerful financial institution in the country, Jesse Jones bridges in his own person the chasm that usually divides the conservatisms of small town and big business. He has, thirdly, created an invisible empire of personal followers. Time calls the RFC "Washington's No. 1 big-money employment office," and "Jesse's boys" are as famous as Frankfurter's "happy hot dogs" were in an earlier period. A spectacular early coup was getting the chairmanship of Chicago's biggest bank, Continental-Illinois, at $75,000 a year, for Jesse's good friend Walter J. Cummings, at the time treasurer of the Democratic National Committee. Silliman Evans, publisher of Marshall Field's Chicago Sun, is an old Jones man and beneficiary, as is Bascom Timmons, the Sun's Washington correspondent. A few recent Jones placements may be noted: Roger Whiteford as president of Associated Gas and Electric; Leo Crowley as president of Standard Gas and Electric; W. B. Yeager as president of the International Utilities Corporation; Stewart McDonald as chairman of the Maryland Casualty Company; and, of course, President Schram of the New York Stock Exchange.

The fourth base of Jesse Jones's power is his control of the RFC. In his nine years as chairman he has built a bureaucratic hierarchy which has no parallel in Washington. "We think Jesse Jones is God around here," is the simple way Sam Husbands puts it. Husbands is one of the five directors who, in legal fiction, run the RFC. (Who can name another?) These gray anonymities—"expert hint-takers" is the best characterization of the species—are simply extensions of the personality of Jesse Jones. It has been years since Jones has bothered to attend an RFC board meeting; he knows there will be no shadow of disagreement since he has decided everything in advance himself. Jones took care to see that the recalcitrant Emil Schram's successor as RFC chairman was a sixty-eight-year-old Democratic politician named Charles B. Henderson, who gives the impression he will stand without hitching. In running this well-oiled machine Jones exhibits the classic traits of bureaucracy: a constant push to expand his domain, in competition with other governmental agencies; a tendency to make the preservation and good health of the RFC an end instead of a means; a preference for personal methods of administration, for a government of men, not laws; and, above all, the concentration of such power in his own hands that criticism from within or without his organization can have little effect on his policies.

There should be several lessons for us in the case of Jesse Jones.

It should raise serious doubts, or rather strengthen the doubts being expressed more and more widely, as to the ability of this country to win the war—and to win the peace—if the productive effort at home is to continue to be dominated by big business and the conservative elements in Congress and the Administration. As for winning the peace, here is what Chairman Henderson of the RFC has to say about what will be the major domestic issue after the war, namely, the disposition of the vast productive plant now being built with government funds: "Whatever loans we make for new plants we shall never use to make those plants into government plants in competition with private ones. . . . We seek always to make private enterprise stronger because we believe in it. . . . Our policy is based on the conviction that this will always be a country of free enterprise." It must be noted also that President Roosevelt is on record as a believer in Chairman Henderson's "free enterprise."

It should demonstrate that the mere appointment of a war-production "czar" with wide powers is not a solution of the problem. In his field Jones has had undisputed one-man authority, signed and sealed by the United States Congress; he is not averse to the exercise of authority; yet his record is as bad as anybody's, perhaps a little worse.

It should knock on the head the idea that state intervention is of itself necessarily efficient. Throughout these articles I have called Jones a "state capitalist," and yet I agree with Hilferding that "the concept of 'state capitalism' does not stand any analysis from the economic point of view": since "the capitalist economy is a market economy," an economy in which the state, not the market, determines production is not in any real sense capitalist. Thus "state capitalism" is a theoretical impossibility, a monster uniting mutually irreconcilable principles. Yet it does exist today in this country, this mythical monster, and it is the cause of most of our difficulties with war economy. Our problem is similar to England's, as described recently by the Oxford economist, T. Balogh: "In Britain the Civil Service sees its function at most in a control which is superimposed on a basically unchanged economic structure. It refuses to take the initiative. Thus a permanent negative character is given to the war economy" (New Republic, December 8, 1941). So, too, over here we are finding that if state corporations like the RFC merely compete with private corporations within the same capitalist framework, and if the authority of the state is merely superimposed on the old pattern of monopoly capitalism, the result is less productive efficiency than you get under either complete "free enterprise" or a basically changed economy such as exists in Germany and Russia. In this war unreconstructed Neanderthal capitalists like Henry Ford and Tom Girdler have a better record of war production than their more docile colleagues who have played in with the Administration. Either the profit motive or the social motive may be a spur to economic effort, but a compromise between the two seems to take the dynamism out of both. What we see in the RFC is a combination of the vices of private capitalism and state bureaucracy.

Finally, the case of Jesse Jones should be one more indication of the falsity of a thesis which should have been pretty well discarded by now anyway: that there is any particular virtue, from a democratic, progressive point of view, in state enterprise. The RFC and the other government corporations under Jones's control have been run in the most bureaucratic and dictatorial manner, and their policies have had the effect of strengthening all that is undemocratic in our economic system. A shift of power toward state capitalism of this kind cannot be called an advance toward democracy. It is true that Jones himself is a conservative and not a potential fascist. But his policies, by blocking the road to any democratic solution of our social and economic war problems, are making straight the path of some future native totalitarian movement.

[Part I of this article was published last week.]

Hitler's Shanghaied Volunteers

BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

AMONG the hundreds of thousands from the ranks of the invading army who have fallen before Moscow are not only Germans who died for Führer and Fatherland but "crusaders" whom Adolf Hitler's agents had recruited from every corner of occupied or unoccupied Europe to "fight against Bolshevism." In this motley force were a sprinkling of genuine volunteers, seeking adventure or burning to drive the Reds from Europe, large numbers of mercenaries willing to fight anywhere for pay, and regiments of hapless serfs sold by their Quisling governments to the Führer, as the princes of Hesse used to sell their subjects to the kings of England.

Less than a week after Hitler's surprise attack on Russia the German press began to beat the drums for the "holy war" against Bolshevism. The call was echoed in local Nazi papers all over Europe. Varying according to local temperament and circumstances, appeals of many kinds were used to arouse the crusading spirit. In Norway, Denmark, Holland, the Flemish parts of Belgium, and other so-called Germanic countries, racial solidarity was played up. The Swedes were reminded of their old feud with Russia, and the hoary bogy of pan-Slav expansion toward the Atlantic was again paraded. In all the Scandinavian countries brotherly feelings for "poor little Finland" were skilfully manipulated. Spanish Phalangists were called upon to avenge Soviet intervention in the civil war. In France, occupied or unoccupied, Switzerland, Hungary, and some other countries, anti-Communist feeling and religious sentiments provided the best platform. Finland and Rumania were easily dragged into the war on national grounds: recovery of lost territory and further expansion to the east were promised to them. Vassal Mussolini received orders to join up.

Wherever the Germans found that racial, social, or religious motives were insufficient to assure the success of the recruiting campaign they resorted to promises and threats. In occupied France, for example, the recruiting agents promised each man who joined the volunteer legion that one or more of his relatives held as prisoners of war would be set free. In Denmark the chief recruiting officer, Johannes Haavrad, asserted that the future independence of the country hinged on participation in the "crusade." The text of his announcement read:

> For each battalion of the Nordland Regiment or Free Corps repatriated to Denmark [after service in Russia] one regiment of occupation troops will depart, and the last occupation troops will leave when the whole corps is established here in Denmark.

Perhaps the most barefaced pressure was applied in Norway. In the first days of July, 1941, all Norwegian newspapers received these confidential instructions:

> All newspapers in Norway must carry daily, throughout this week, in a conspicuous place, the announcement regarding enlistment in the Norwegian Legion which was first published in the morning papers of July 1. The announcement, which must be printed free of charge, shall contain the address of the recruiting office or offices within the area of circulation of the paper or in the vicinity. Oslo newspapers need only indicate recruiting offices in Oslo. The papers shall also carry every day this week either an article or a pictorial feature on the subject of "Fight Against Bolshevism."

In the same month the Quisling-controlled "Civil Administration for the Army and Navy" in Oslo sent out circulars urging all Norwegian officers to enlist as volunteers in the fight against Bolshevism or, the circular added ominously, to explain their failure to do so. One of the recipients sent the following reply by return mail:

> In answer to your letter dated July 10, 1941, urging me to explain my refusal to accept service with the German forces in Russia, I have to inform you that my negative reply was motivated by the consideration that Norway since April 9, 1940, has been, and continues to be, at war with Germany.

How many foreign volunteers did Hitler manage to rally to his flag in this way? Very few authentic figures are available, and private advices have been extremely conflicting on this point. It seems fairly certain, however, that at the height of the Nazi advance into Russia upward of 50,000 foreign legionaries were fighting at the front or garrisoning the rear. This estimate does not take into account the Italian troops, or the Finns, Rumanians, Hungarians, and Slovaks, who were in the field as allies of Germany.

By far the largest contingent of "volunteers" against Russia was the so-called "Blue Division" from Spain. After a singularly unsuccessful attempt to draw enough genuine volunteers from his starving people to form a major army unit, General Franco last August decided to requite the Führer's services during the civil war by placing a full-dress division of regular troops at his disposal. Being ill-equipped for service in a Russian winter campaign, the "Blue Division" gave a very bad account of itself and finally met with disaster in the great Soviet counter-offensive around the turn of the year. According to latest reports, more than 8,000 Spaniards lost their lives in the retreat from Moscow.

A French Volunteer Legion was organized last September by the famous Cagoulard chief Eugène Deloncle, with Laval and Déat as sponsors and with the blessing of Marshal Pétain. One of its officers was Jacques Doriot, the ex-Communist leader who became one of France's leading fascists. This French legion was one of Hitler's pet creations. It enjoyed many privileges and received better pay than the other foreign units. Privates drew between 2,400 and 3,000 francs a month, officers as much as 6,000 to 8,400 francs. According to its sponsors, the legion had gathered, by the middle of October, more than 30,000 recruits, though it is doubtful whether more than one-fifth of that number ever reached the front. It served in Russia under the command of Colonel Jean Labonne and was crushed in the Mozhaisk sector by General Antonov's combined tank and cavalry attacks. Doriot vanished mysteriously after the Battle of Mozhaisk.

Numerically inferior to the Spanish and French contingents, the Swedish volunteers were vastly superior in terms of military efficiency. Exactly how many of them have been fighting at any given time I cannot say, for the Swedish government has taken great care to keep the figure secret. But a correlation of items in the Swedish press indicates that from 4,000 to 5,000 saw service last year. Most of these volunteers enlisted with the Swedish Volunteer Corps formed at the outbreak of the Nazi-Soviet war under the auspices of Major Nils Palme, Finland's military attaché in Stockholm. While nominally attached to the Finnish army, this corps was financed, equipped, and officered by Swedes. It took a prominent part in the fighting before Leningrad and in eastern Karelia. After the fall of Hangö, the corps was ostensibly disbanded, having "accomplished its task," but not all of its members went home.

Whereas the Swedish Volunteer Corps was formed with at least the tacit approval of the Swedish authorities, another contingent of volunteers was not so favorably regarded in Stockholm. This was the Swedish section of the famous "Viking Division," a German military unit made up partly of Swedish, Danish, Norwegian, and Dutch regiments, partly of Nazi troops formerly stationed in those countries. The "Vikings" fought in the Ukraine and suffered a crushing defeat when the Russian armies recaptured Rostov. Recruiting of Swedish citizens, and even of Swedish military personnel, for service with this German army division went on for more than two months in Sweden before the authorities at last intervened to stop what had become a public scandal. The chief recruiting agent was Captain Bertram Schmiterlöw, a high-ranking officer of the Swedish General Staff who worked in close association with the German military attaché in Stockholm. The two men used particular insistence in urging Swedish officers and privates to enlist. Volunteers were instructed to submit, through the agency of the German legation, an application to the King for exemption from Swedish military service.

Other units of the Viking Division were the Standarte (regiment) Nordland, made up of Norwegian Quislings, the Standarte Westland, recruited from Dutch and Belgian Nazi parties, and the Danish Free Corps.

Norway's tragic cleavage is reflected in the formation of the Nordland Regiment. While many loyal Norwegian officers and men are fighting with the Allied armies and thousands of others are in German concentration camps, a by no means negligible fraction has accepted service with the enemy. General Frölich-Hansen, Colonel Sten, Lieutenant Colonels Eggan, Berkak, and Numedal, Majors Kjelstrup, Bjerkelund, Kielland, Omdahl, and Knudsen, Captains Sverre Gröner, Odd Grahm, Lorentz, and Hagen are only a few outstanding names on this roll of dishonor.

Last October the Oslo radio station broadcast, rather unwisely, 350 names of Norwegians serving with the Viking Battalion, then undergoing training in Germany. Most of the names on the list were clearly understood in this country, and a Norwegian-language weekly, the Nordisk Tidende of Brooklyn, published about 120 of them in its issue of October 30, 1941. The legionaries some day may not feel too happy about this publicity, for in the meantime the Norwegian government in London has issued a decree making deserters and traitors liable to the death penalty after the expected Allied victory.

It appeared from this same broadcast that Vidkun Quisling himself had shortly before inspected the Vikings' training camp near Hanover and passed the men in review. The ceremony ended with a speech by the battalion commander, Major Jörgen Bakke, and this oath spoken in chorus by the volunteers:

> I swear to God this holy oath that I shall always be ready to give my life in the fight against Bolshevism like a brave and faithful soldier of Adolf Hitler. Heil Quisling!

The story of how the Danish Free Corps was organized and is being used provides a good illustration of what Hitler meant when he extended his "protection" to the Danes two years ago. It is a long story of pressure and threats, belying time and again Germany's solemn pledge, made on the day of the invasion, that Denmark's independence would be respected and that there would be no interference with the country's internal affairs.

Immediately after the outbreak of the Nazi-Soviet war the Danish Nazi paper Faedrelandet began to urge all men between seventeen and forty to enlist with the newly set-up Danish division of the Nordland Regiment. This propaganda was unlawful, for Danish citizens are explicitly forbidden by law to enlist in a foreign military service. The Danish government, however, under Nazi pressure, not only refrained from enforcing the law but expressly authorized the formation of a Danish Free Corps and appointed a high-ranking Danish officer, Lieutenant Colonel P. C. Kryssing of the Holbaek artillery, to head it. Press and radio were directed by the chief censor, Karl Eskelund, and his unofficial boss, the German "press attaché," Dr. Meissner, to support the recruiting campaign with editorials, feature articles, advertisements, and broadcasts.

The first battalion of the Danish Free Corps departed for Germany on July 19, and a large motorized contingent followed on September 23, en route to a training camp "somewhere in eastern Germany." According to Faedrelandet, a total of 3,000 Danish volunteers had been recruited by the end of the year, but nothing has been heard yet of their exploits, if any, in Russia.

To obtain cannon-fodder for his Russian adventure was not Adolf Hitler's only object in calling on Europe's youth to join his "crusade against Bolshevism." Another, hidden purpose played perhaps a greater part in the scheme. The chief backers of the recruiting drive in every country were the local Nazi parties and affiliated organizations, like the Rexists in Belgium and the Cagoulards in France. This meant that each volunteer corps had a nucleus of staunch Nazi sympathizers around which were gathered adventurers, careerists, and plain thugs—just such a mixture as made up the original Nazi storm troops, the S. A. and S. S. And in accordance with the same pattern the Norwegian, Danish, and similar units were incorporated not into a regular Wehrmacht division but into a division of the so-called Waffen S. S., made up of élite S. S. troops. The resemblance of their internal structure to that of the Blackshirts, plus their incorporation in Hitler's praetorian guard, indicates the ultimate purpose for which these volunteer units were created. After the final victory the men of the Nordland Regiment and Free Corps are to go home and take over the control of their respective fatherlands from the hands of the occupation army.

That this is the role the Führer has planned for his foreign legion appears also from the frank statement of the Danish recruiting officer Johannes Haavrad which I quoted above. Further evidence is found in the disclosure recently made by a loyal Norwegian newspaper that some of the Swedish volunteers recruited for the Waffen S. S. were never sent to Russia, or even to Germany, but were ordered to Norway instead, to help subdue the rebellious patriots there. Late reports from the conquered countries indicate that a new recruiting drive has been started to fill the gaps in the German divisions on the eastern front, but that it is meeting with little success. The news of the slaughter in Russia is getting about.

In the Wind

A CADILLAC DEALER in Boston, A. L. Danforth, has sent the following printed notice to his customers: "I think the smart thing for you to do would be to pick out a new car and let us hold it for you in the hope that between you and ourselves we could help you secure a priority for same. If we can secure a priority and you want the car you picked out, you can have it, but if you don't want same—okay."

THE NAZI BUND of New Hyde Park, Long Island, a center of pro-fascist and Coughlinite activity, has become the New Hyde Park Fishing and Hunting Club. On a recent outing the club raided the local synagogue and Hebrew school.

THE STATE DEPARTMENT has been placing stories critical of the various "free" movements in many newspapers. Walter Winchell, who often writes on tips from the department, recently reported that the government was planning to crack down on "racketeering" free groups.

YOU PAYS YOUR MONEY: An American just back from Mexico City reports peddlers on the streets who carry one tray full of swastika emblems, another full of V-for-Victory pins.

A PROBABLE REASON for the Dies committee's special animosity against Goodwin Watson is to be found in a study Watson prepared for the Federal Communications Commission just before Congress voted him out of a job. The report, which has never been officially released, showed Martin Dies among the five Americans who received the largest number of favorable mentions over the Berlin radio in 1941.

PETITIONS bearing thousands of names and demanding that the famous "Oklahoma book trials" be dropped have reached Governor Leon C. Phillips. The Governor has turned the petitions over to the FBI with the recommendation that all signers be promptly investigated.

ALTHOUGH AMERICAN CENSORSHIP has been in force since Pearl Harbor, practically no mail from countries in the Western Hemisphere has been opened. Now, however, the censorship is being applied to all mail from Lower California, where there is a large concentration of Japanese.

HARPER AND BROTHERS, which recently withdrew Leon Trotsky's biography of Stalin, has decided not to publish G. E. R. Gedye's book on his experiences as New York Times correspondent in Moscow; and Doubleday, Doran will not issue the reminiscences of Alexander Barmine, former Soviet representative in Greece who fled to this country during the Moscow trials. Both Barmine's and Gedye's books were completed, but the publishers felt that the times are unpropitious for books critical of Russia.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Portrait of America's Strength

WASHINGTON has sometimes seemed to me to be a very odd place in which to look at America. It is hard to see the country for the capital. There is one place in Washington, nevertheless, in which you can look at America and see it tough and strong, seeking and humorous, not too optimistic and not at all afraid. This is in the huge collection of photographs taken during the last decade under the direction of a gray, nearsighted man named Roy Stryker for the Farm Security Administration. All the pictures add up to the fact that America is people, and the good and the bad, the tough and the whipped, among them, looking up from the glossy prints, are better proof of the American strength than are the classic buildings along the landscaped streets.

I wish America could see its picture as Stryker's photographers have made it. The collection is by no means restricted to farms or to men on farms. And though it goes under the name of the Historical Section of the Farm Security Administration, there is nothing historical about the photographs except that they will show to tomorrow America's picture today. Undoubtedly some who want America in the pictures to look like America in the advertisements might not approve of a collection which includes migrants and slums as well as green pastures and Palm Beach. Maybe a lack of bathing beauties destroys the over-all coverage of the collection. But there are Negroes and ranchers in it, fishermen, mechanics, wise old women, and children like confections even if they stand before huts. There are men at work and men laughing. There are also wanderers, and people who look as if they had less hope than fear. The whole procession of the American years is in their faces. Every American problem and every American promise is in their eyes. Not many of the women are so photographed as artfully to display their legs. But men and women are so photographed as to show their continuing strength in the midst of an America which has not always been easy and is not easy now.

Not everybody who has seen these pictures is as enthusiastic about them as I am. Indeed, I know that an American advertising man, seeking, as a patriot, for pictures with which to serve America in war time, looked through a lot of them and then pronounced his verdict. "Too sordid," he said.

It would not do to show America with a face which could stand shaving, or sometimes washing, and with hands more accustomed to the machine than the manicure. Given this man's training, it is easy to understand his view. But I prefer the opinion of a man from one of the countries that the advertising man wanted to impress with American pictures. He was a Chilean. He looked through the pictures, too. Though his searching was not censored, he was still not led by the clerks in charge to the photographs which showed American difficulties at their saddest. But at last he came to pictures of Americans who have not had the easiest time in this land. Then the stranger from South America began to grow enthusiastic. "These pictures," he said, "would be useful to the United States among my people. They could see from them that Americans have not always had it easy—they could see that Americans have suffered, too."

That, I suppose, must be heresy among the propagandists. For all I know, it may be pure folly. Perhaps in convincing other peoples how strong we are it is essential to prove to them also that all of us are rich, that none of us have problems pushing hard behind us, that our strength is gymnastic and our smiles cinematic. But I wonder if that makes other people love us more dearly. I couldn't say. But I think I can say that however much it may profit us to try to fool other peoples in the name of patriotism, there is not any profit in a similar effort to fool ourselves. Of course, I don't expect a cadaverous tenant farmer to be set up as the typical American. But I do think that we can look at America everywhere, as it is, with our eyes closed to no difficulties, and still see so much strength that we can take more courage from the whole picture than we could possibly take from the half-picture which we know is the half-truth.

America is people. All kinds of them. And the amazing fact is that they seem heartier and more durable when they stand against an America which is a tough proposition for most of them though still the land best loved by all of them. I went slowly through the pile of their photographs. Reformers had used some of them before, and they stared up at me like reminders of old causes. But they looked up also like Americans who had not had it easy in peace and did not expect to have it easy in war. I saw the picture of a people who have suffered undoubtedly but who have never even begun to recognize the possibility that any nation could overcome America or push such Americans as themselves off their feet.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Concert Hall

BY W. R. RODGERS

Still as lizard on stone,
Whose color skids from the eye,
They sit with startled hearts
And watch the weasel-lean voice
Twisting its way, soft and deft,
Through the stuttering stones
Of notation, neat-footed,
Steel-tight and pistol-instant.

Thin and pauseless as wind
Threading through holes, and easy
As ice sliding on heat,
It flows piecelessly on!
The bold deliberate voice
Lovely as dolphins leaping
In caterpillar loops,

Quick as hawk flickering
Or swallow sweeping
Its whip-end over eaves,
Smooth as the water-ribbon
Brimming the slippy lip
Of the full mountain pool.

But jerked as broken stick,
Sudden as jagged spark,
It jumps from peak to peak
Of the high rocky air,
Till like ecstatic lark
Or rocket it reaches
Its last and topmost note.
And silence falls in the hall.
Like a fresh-gutted glove
That still retains the shape
Of the informing hand.

Obituary Page in War Time

BY OSCAR WILLIAMS

As I arise like Samson in the mist of falling walls
Into the upper strata of forty years I hear
Great sounds, the waters of the world eating away
The unmeasurable ever-deepening groove of time.

I hear also the skull-grenades out of the endless
Cup of the loins, the faces on the obituary page,
That hung unexploded on the century's bald air
Break into the bright of death, the noiseless light.

All were friends, I knew of their names, knew
That they devoted lifetimes to their public lives,
But shattered thus against the invisible at last
They spill down, minor fireworks in an age on fire.

Authority on turf, the Expert on horses for fifty years
Falls, and on a day stampeded by the world's values;
On the same day the Mexican Envoy; and the noted Chemist
Follows leaving a trail of four wives and properties.

The insurance Head of the international corporation,
The Secretary of the seaside company, makers of foam,
The Lawyer from Atlantic City, all in a hurry;
None of these could wait till the end of the story.

Now I hear the bells of prosperous Christendom
Huddling in their niches and the voices that run
Down the rumorous veins of the aggregate conscience;
The mourning takes place behind private mountains.

I look through the bright cross cut into the door
And watch the mighty nightsky, the storm of stones;
The church is still intrenched among the living ones,
The acrobatic traffic crossing swords of horns.

The harbor whistles like fountains arch the mind
As the city pours itself quickly around the survivors:
The heart facing heavily into its dénouement, asks
What is the sum of all these implacable subtractions?

The Negro's "Cultural Past"

THE MYTH OF THE NEGRO PAST. By Melville J. Herskovits. Harper and Brothers. $4.

THIS volume is the first published result of a general study of the Negro in the United States sponsored by the Carnegie Foundation and directed by Dr. Gunnar Myrdal, a Swedish social economist. However, as a matter of fact, this study embodies Professor Herskovits's latest and most comprehensive reply to students of the American Negro who do not accept his views concerning the survival of African culture among Negroes in the United States. In revealing the "ignorance" which other investigators have exhibited concerning African survivals, the author believes that he will show that the Negro has a "cultural past" which was not blotted out during slavery and that knowledge of this fact will undermine the assumptions that bolster race prejudice.

It is probably because Professor Herskovits conceives his task in this dual aspect that in the first pages of his study he confuses the issues involved. In his outline of the myth of the Negro's past he lumps together the conclusions of competent scholars and the opinions of obviously prejudiced writers on the cultural background and racial characteristics of the Negro. The conclusions of such scholars as Robert E. Park, Edward B. Reuter, and Guy Johnson may be wrong, but they are not the result of race prejudice and should not be classed with the opinions of men who think that "Negroes are naturally of a childlike character." Moreover, the fact that competent Negro scholars do not find African cultural survivals in every phase of Negro life is no evidence that, unlike the Jew, they are ashamed of their past. Contrary to Professor Herskovits's statement concerning the attitude of educated Negroes toward their African heritage, it may be pointed out that many race-conscious educated Negroes with little regard for scientific knowledge ascribe the Negro's contributions to his African background.

For scholars and even educated laymen the real interest of this book is not its effort to prove that the Negro had a cultural background in Africa but its analysis of the extent to which African culture survives and still influences the behavior and institutions of the Negro. Professor Herskovits agrees on the whole with other students of the American Negro that African culture has not survived to the same extent in the United States as in Brazil, Dutch Guiana, and the West Indies. His description of the process by which the Negro lost his cultural heritage does not add anything to what other scholars have written. His criticism and modification of the work of other scholars are due to his central thesis—namely, that traces of African culture can be discovered in nearly every phase of Negro life. In order to support this thesis he has consulted practically every available source of information and has been able to provide adequate documentation for it by data gathered in the field of language and the arts.

The author's analysis of African survivals in the religious life of the Negro is also well grounded, though he indulges in a type of speculation that cannot be regarded as scientific proof of his thesis. For example, he holds that the large number of Baptists among Negroes is not to be explained by the proselyting among the slaves and the opportunity that the Baptist church provided for self-expression, but is due primarily to the fact that river priests were unpopular in Africa and were sold to slavers. When Professor Herskovits is unable to discover African culture patterns in the American Negro's behavior, he contends that the "spirit," the "feel" or "generalized attitudes," characteristic of African culture is present. Likewise, the "diplomacy," the "indirection," and the "pliability" of the American Negro are traced to his African background. These conclusions, based on speculation, are the logical consequence of the author's belief in the "toughness of culture." In some cases this belief leads him to ascribe diametrically opposed social phenomena to African backgrounds. For example, according to his analysis, both the family disorganization noted among lower-class Negroes, together with the important position of the mother in the family, and the stability of closely knit patriarchal families of acculturated mulattoes, indistinguishable from white, are ascribed to African culture. According to Professor Herskovits's analysis, spontaneous responses, imagination, and the acquisition of new habits and attitudes are ruled out of the Negro's effort to adapt his behavior to American civilization.

In making these rather severe criticisms of Professor Herskovits's book, it is not the intention of the reviewer to imply that the book is without merit. In fact, the book is in a number of respects a distinct contribution to our knowledge of the American Negro and should certainly provide a corrective to facile generalizations concerning the survival of African culture in the United States. First, the author has shown that it is necessary to have a sound knowledge of the culture of the regions in Africa from which the slaves came before one can discuss intelligently the influence of African survivals on the behavior of American Negroes. Second, in the chapters dealing with the tribal origins of the American Negroes and their African cultural heritage he has presented the best succinct treatment available. Third, his treatment of the reaction of the Negro to slavery should destroy forever the prejudiced belief, which was given scientific authority by Sir Harry Johnston, that the Negro, having been fitted by nature for slavery, offered no resistance to enslavement. Fourth, in the sections dealing with Africanisms in the religious life, the language, and the arts of the Negro in the United States the author has provided on the whole the best critical analysis of the available data on the subject yet published. An appendix contains an excellent outline of directives for further study, comprising investigations to be carried on in areas of Africa from which Negroes were brought as well as in areas of Negro concentration in the New World.

Nevertheless, the reviewer cannot agree with the author that to establish the fact that the Negro had a "cultural past" and that the Negro's "cultural past" still influences his behavior will alter his status in American life. It is generally recognized by white Americans that the Chinese, Hindus, and Japanese have a cultural background, but this fact does not affect their status in the United States. Moreover, when Professor Herskovits says that the Negro problem is psychological—that African patterns of thought prevent the complete acculturation of the Negro—as well as economic and sociological, is he not saying that even more fundamental barriers exist between blacks and whites than are generally recognized?

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

Private Life in Nazi Germany

PEOPLE UNDER HITLER. By Wallace R. Deuel. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

GERMAN artists are forbidden to use the word "family" in the title of any picture showing fewer than four children. Such a picture may be titled "Herr und Frau Müller and Their Two Children," for example, but it may not be called "The Müller Family." Nor can bereaved relatives choose the kind of tombstone they wish to mark the grave of their beloved, for in Nazi Germany the dead are coordinated just as efficiently as the living. These are but two minor items culled from "People Under Hitler," but they convey more strikingly than many an elaborate exposition what life in the Third Reich is like. Mr. Deuel, who is well known to many for his news dispatches in the Chicago Daily News and the New York Post, has written an indispensable study of present-day life in Germany.

Deuel dissects Hitler the failure and Hitler the political genius; he attempts anew to explain the ancient phenomenon of the two souls in the German breast; he has studied the men who surround the Führer and the extraordinary aggregate of evil that has poisoned everything German. But what sets his book apart is the degree to which he conveys the effects of Nazi depravity on the average human soul, on the everyday life of the little man and his family.

Deuel thinks that "Hitler's preposterous mustache has been more responsible than any other single factor for the world's inability to take him seriously in time." It deceived people about the true stature of the man behind it and about the depths of evil that propel him. And this has been true not only of observers in foreign countries; the Germans themselves found him preposterous—at first. Nor was it recognized in time why Hitler could become a symbol to millions, the symbol of their failures and their dreams.

The most alarming fact emerging from Deuel's account, and one to which inadequate attention has been devoted hitherto, is that the Nazis have actually succeeded, by fair means and foul, in perverting Germany into a mammoth breeding farm, where only prize stock, to wit, the Nazi élite, may breed—indeed, must breed, to populate the future Lebensraum. Those to whom the Nazis deny the right to have children may be sterilized. A large number have actually been killed as unfit, and others have been castrated. Deuel devotes a major part of his book to the Nazis' endeavors to achieve their "Brave New World," largely by changing and controlling procreation. What a shocking and sordid picture it is! As the author points out, the Nazi race theory is arming German foreign policy with a powerful weapon—the dazzling vision of world mastery achieved by virtue of "superior blood and superior numbers."

The lives of Germans are invaded and subordinated to this goal to such a degree that no vestige of privacy remains. According to Dr. Ley, "there is no such thing as a private individual in National Socialist Germany. The only person who is still a private individual . . . is somebody who is asleep." If, for example, a number of persons share the belief that a child is not the offspring of the man professing to be its father, the authorities may institute proceedings to establish paternity, even though the man may be quite willing to overlook his wife's infidelity. The state refuses to allow the child's origin to be concealed.

Miscegenation, of course, has been the Nazis' bête noire from the outset. Thirty-one legal decrees regulate marriage between Jews and "Germans or persons of similar blood." Here the complex concept of "race defilement," one of the worst crimes under Nazi law, enters the picture—it means that in a sexual union the Jewish partner racially defiles the Gentile partner. The Gentile partner does not commit "race defilement" but only "race treason," since according to Nazi logic a Gentile cannot defile a Jew.

Deuel shows many flashes of humor in discussing even this unlovely and unhumorous subject. In his chapter on feminine glamor he tells of the desperate Nazi campaign against powder and lipstick, which was reversed after five years when the authorities discovered that female drabness clashed with their population policy.

Deuel's book is a treasure-trove of information—an ideal combination of clean thinking, painstaking research, and brilliant journalism. RUTH NORDEN

The Philippine Commonwealth

THE PHILIPPINES: A STUDY IN NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT. By Joseph Ralston Hayden. The Macmillan Company. $9.

THE appearance of Professor Hayden's book at this time is strangely reassuring. Manila may be temporarily under a Japanese puppet government; American and Filipino defense forces may be falling back to the last line of resistance; the civilian population may be feeling the first harsh blows of Japan's military rule; in the days ahead the supreme test will come for the institutions which Professor Hayden describes so thoroughly. In the light of his analysis there can be little doubt that the aspirations of the Filipino people, encouraged and developed under forty years of American control, will survive. In these lies the doom of the Japanese invader.

This "Study in National Development" ought to be required reading for the kind of citizenship that must be developed not only in the Philippines but also, and perhaps more urgently, in the United States. The Japanese, too, might well take a lesson from these pages. For an understanding of the progress of the Philippines and of America's share and responsibility therein, no better guide could be found than Professor Hayden. As a visiting professor, as Vice-Governor and Acting Governor General, as Secretary of Public Instruction, he knew the country both before and during the early years of the Commonwealth. To his own personal experiences and observations in the Philippines have been added years of

THE FREE WORLD ASSOCIATION

Presents

The Voice of Freedom

A recital by

MARIANNE LORRAINE

"The Sarah Bernhardt of Song"

Saturday, February 28, at 8:45

TOWN HALL

113 West 43RD Street

Tickets: Orchestra, $2.75, $2.20, $1.65
Balcony, $1.10, $.83, $.55
Loges (seating six) $16.50

Now on sale [illegible] Town Hall Box Office

Use this coupon to order tickets

Bert Lown, William Morris Agency, Inc.
1270 Sixth Avenue, New York City

Enclosed is my check for $.................... for .... tickets at $.................... each for the Marianne Lorraine recital Saturday evening, February 28.

Name..
Address..

Please make checks payable to William Morris Agency.

continuing study of the island's problems. His judgments are those of a competent, forthright, but friendly critic.

A wide range of subjects is covered in this book: the people themselves, the evolution of the Commonwealth form of government, all the departments of government, the party system, education, the language problem, health, and external relations, with particular attention to China, Japan, and the United States. For the most part, the author views with approval the institutions that have been developed in the islands, although he points out various weaknesses and dangers against which the Filipinos themselves must guard. Among these are the growing power of the presidential office, the lack of a sturdy opposition party, the evils in local government, the trend toward an unhealthy fiscal position.

Time and again, however, Mr. Hayden warns his readers not to measure the accomplishments of Americans or Filipinos in terms of perfection or to estimate the worth of political institutions in the Philippines against the background of America.

> Knowledge of the handicaps which this people has overcome arouses admiration. Comprehension of the difficulties which they still face creates understanding. All told, there is little room for doubt that the Philippines possess the basic elements from which nations are created.

Of particular interest is the chapter on the defense of the islands, written of course before the outbreak of war in the Pacific, in which the actual and potential strength of the country is measured and the whole scheme of defense is weighed. Mr. Hayden outlines a possible invasion of the southern islands which might leave Manila and northern Luzon isolated and powerless, lacking control of the air and sea. He is skeptical about the effectiveness of the country's defenses and realistic about the increasing expense of adequate fortifications, but he recognizes that a country desiring to be free must take what steps it can to defend its independence. Here he makes a point that may be as valid in post-war reorganization as it was when it was written:

> The financial problems connected with the present national defense program, as virtually all other problems of the Philippines, can be solved only if a degree of prosperity comparable to that which the Filipinos now enjoy can be maintained in the islands after 1946. No convincing evidence has been given that this can be accomplished except by the continuation of preferential trade between the United States and the Philippines for many years after the date now set for independence.

The following words, written before December 7, are of even greater significance in the light of events since that date. They have been given added weight by President Roosevelt's promise that the independence of the Philippines will be redeemed and protected.

> Upon the conclusion of the present upheaval the United States will be unable to escape its share of the task of reorganizing the world for peace, in Asia as elsewhere. In this reorganization the Philippines will necessarily be considered not merely vis-a-vis America but as an essential element in the post-war order in East Asia. In that order the interests and the aspirations of the Philippine people, who in the time of the crisis unhesitatingly ranged themselves with the United States and the principles of human freedom, will not be disregarded.

CATHERINE PORTER

Balkan Journal

BALKAN CORRESPONDENT. By Derek Patmore. Harper and Brothers. $3.

IN THE current war most Balkan countries have belied their bellicose reputation, and have got into trouble precisely because they attempted to avoid it. Only Greece and Yugoslavia were "wicked" in the sense of the French jingle: C'est un animal méchant; quand on l'attaque, il se défend. Since World War I Italy and Germany have become the rowdies, and they have, indeed, lived up to the best Balkan traditions. Nevertheless, a journalistic invasion of the Balkan capitals did precede the Fascist and Nazi armies.

Unlike some of his colleagues Mr. Patmore does not pretend to impart the "scientific" explanation of all Balkan mysteries and enigmas. His is rather a personal story—hence the title—interwoven with gruesome and thrilling adventures and distinguished by frankness and candid modesty. Being himself an author and a successful playwright, his keen observation and subtle sense of psychology throw a clear light on the dramatic sequence of events in the Rumanian tragedy. Occasionally, led astray by fairness, he attempts to exculpate the villains in the play. He has an excuse even for Codreanu, who was in his view honest, and for the Iron Guard, which he calls intensely patriotic. Even for King Carol, "who in reality was responsible for the political confusion in his country," an apology is found partly in his dictatorial inclination, inherited from the Romanov ancestry (why not from the Hohenzollern?), partly in a Freudian explanation of "his obstinate and loyal love for Madame Lupescu." Most interesting is the account of German intrigues, both in Rumania and in Bulgaria. In spite of the cautious policy of King Boris, the outcome was the same in both countries—enslavement by the Nazis. Writing of the ferocious reprisals taken against the Iron Guard, the author says, "I felt that perhaps this Oriental justice was the right course." Maybe, but genuine Oriental despots are wise enough not to alternate cruel revenge with appeasement.

It is a pity Mr. Patmore could not have stayed long enough in Bulgaria to revise his opinion "that most Bulgarians, despite their good qualities, are both envious and stupid." They are neither, of course, to any greater extent than any other people on the same cultural level. Nor are they cowards, as G. B. S. in his "Arms and the Man" made the world believe. Regrettable as it may be that Bulgaria through its resistance thwarted the Balkan Federation, we must not forget that after the murder of Stamboliski the Military League controlled both the country and its royal dictator, who eventually fled into the deadly embrace of the Nazis. The Bulgarian people are as little responsible for their predicament as the Hungarians or the Rumanians for theirs.

Whether the active resistance of the Yugoslav guerrillas and the passive resistance of the Greeks justify the author's optimistic view that "the Balkans are on the brink of revolt against the Nazi oppressors" is as hard to tell as how long the Turkish key to the Middle East will keep the gate locked. There can be, however, no reasonable dissent from Mr. Patmore's optimistic outlook for a Balkan confederation in the end, provided the intense nationalisms can "be destroyed once and for all." On this point the problem of the Balkans merges with that of all Europe, but nationalism, like any other faith, persuasion, or religion, cannot be successfully destroyed unless some adequate substitute is offered. Internationalism seems still to be a poor Ersatz for the multitude.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

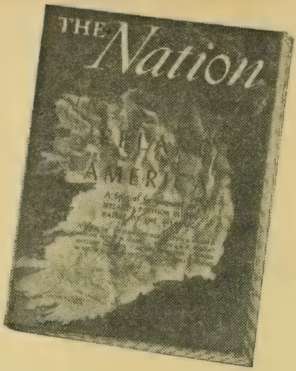
An Unknown Land

THAILAND: THE NEW SIAM. By Virginia Thompson. The Macmillan Company. $5.

THAILAND'S declaration of war against the United States finds most Americans almost completely without information regarding the history and background of this new enemy. No complete history of the country has been written since its revolution, and little day-to-day information has been available except from government handouts and the censored press. Considering the difficulties involved in getting facts, Miss Thompson has done a remarkable and timely job. Her 800-page book covers every aspect of the country's history, present-day politics, economics, finance, culture, education, and international relationships. Practically all of this information is new to the average reader; and practically all of it has a bearing on the crucial political struggle which culminated in this ancient kingdom's entry into the world conflict on the side of the Axis.

So comprehensive is the picture that it is difficult to give even an impression of it in a short review. Generally speaking, it may be said that Thailand has been going through the same sort of national revolution as the other Oriental nations. As is frequently the case in small and weak states, this nationalism has taken some rather ugly forms. Its chief victims in this instance have been the Chinese—despite the fact that they had contributed very largely to Thailand's modernization in the years since World War I. Chinese business activities have been subjected to severe restrictions in recent years: thousands of Chinese were arrested and deported on framed-up charges; ten of Bangkok's eleven Chinese papers were suppressed. Other foreign business men, with the notable exception of the Japanese, have also been withdrawn from Thailand, though not under the same compulsion.

Japanese influence in Thailand, according to Miss Thompson, has been more recent and less complete than is ordinarily thought to be the case. Japanese trade with Siam was never large until 1933, when Siam's imports from Japan attained the high level of about 19 per cent of its total imports. This was the year in which Siam gained notoriety as the sole nation to abstain from censuring Japan's invasion of Manchuria. Although this action led the outside world to believe that Japan had a secret alliance with Siam, Miss Thompson casts doubt on this assumption. Most of the wild rumors of the period, including the persistent one that Japan had agreed to advance money to build a canal across the Malay Peninsula at Kra, proved to be groundless. Nevertheless, Siam was gradually drawn more and more into the Japanese orbit. But whatever the attitude of certain military factions, the Siamese people were never pro-Japanese. Even the award of parts of Indo-China to Thailand by Japan after their recent war seems to have done little to enhance Japa-



"Hats off to The Nation!"

Said the noted radio commentator, Quincy Howe, in a recent news broadcast over Station WQXR, saluting the appearance of The Nation's 52-page issue of January 31, containing the special supplement on

IRELAND
Its Position in the Battle of the Atlantic

This well-timed issue, which came off the presses just as the first American troops landed in Northern Ireland, contains articles by such well-known writers as William L. Shirer, Senator George W. Norris, Lewis S. Gannett, and many others.

Our supply of this issue is rapidly being exhausted by requests from schools and organizations which want it for group use, and from individuals who want additional copies for their friends. Place your orders at the following rates:

10 or more copies—10c each
50 or more copies—8c each
100 or more copies—7½c each
Single copies 15c

USE THIS CONVENIENT COUPON TODAY

THE NATION ▪ 55 Fifth Avenue • New York, N. Y.

Please send me .... copies of The Nation's special Irish issue, for which I inclose $..................

Name..................
Street..................
City..................
State..................

2-14-42

nese popularity outside of military circles. Siam's participation in World War II, we assume, was accomplished largely by bribing the corrupt military clique, who in no sense represent the Siamese people. MAXWELL S. STEWART

American Folkways

SHORT GRASS COUNTRY. By Stanley Vestal. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.

OZARK COUNTRY. By Otto Ernest Rayburn. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.

WHEN a writer sets out, as Mr. Vestal and Mr. Rayburn have done, to tell the story of one of the minor regions of the United States in terms of the customs of the people, he has given himself a large and difficult task. Mr. Vestal's book is the third and Mr. Rayburn's is the fourth of the American Folkways series, edited by Erskine Caldwell. Although both books have moments of considerable interest, they also offer evidence that the authors have taken their great task too lightly.

The United States is not easily divided into cultural sub-regions that will suit the convenience of writers and editors and publishers. Even some of our major regions are not easily defined in terms of folkways. For example, the Anglo-Saxon mountaineers of the Southern highlands form a reasonably distinct folk group, but in the course of 150 years they have dislodged so many migrants from their stony acres that their folkways have spread through all the South and spilled over the Mississippi far to the West. The process continues apace in all cultural regions, large and small, and it is increasingly difficult to draw sharp boundaries between them.

Thus Mr. Vestal's effort to make a cultural region of the short-grass country is not very successful, not only because he does not work hard enough at it, but mainly because the short-grass country is scarcely a cultural region. Lying in the Texas and Oklahoma panhandles, with additional areas in Kansas, Colorado, and New Mexico, the short-grass country could be described as a geographic, topographic, or even a floral region, but its culture is greatly mixed, and is shared with all the Western plains and mountains. There is scarcely one of Mr. Vestal's stories, unless it be about a dust storm, but could be told, and indeed has been told, of a score of other places in the Southwest, and especially in Texas.

Mr. Rayburn is somewhat more successful, both because he seems to have worked harder at his job, and because the Ozark plateau, occupying the southern half of Missouri, the northwestern part of Arkansas, and a few counties in eastern Oklahoma, is more genuinely a cultural region. Yet the life of the Ozarks is almost an exact reproduction of the life of the Southern highlands. The people have sprung from the same racial stocks and have preserved about the same customs. Moreover, these customs are not confined to the mountains. Mr. Rayburn describes a number of Ozark games. They are played with equal pleasure in the Mississippi delta and the Piney Woods of Alabama. This can be said also of Ozark food, Ozark religion, and Ozark superstition. The heritage of the mountaineers, for good and for ill, is spread far.

This is not to say that there can be no such thing as a good book about these rather shadowy sub-regions. But to make such a good book it is not enough to set down, in a casual way, the customs of the people, with a few anecdotes and tall stories for spice and garnish. That has been done too often already, and there is no longer much charm in it, and even less information. The inquiry now must be broader, and deeper; it must include economics, politics, religion, climate, the soil, everything that belongs to the regional life. What is necessary is that the author shall cultivate this regional soil intensely, and if the soil be thin, then all the more intensely must it be cultivated to grow a good book. There is still something to be said about the sub-regions, perhaps a great deal, but it will not do to scratch the surface with a crooked stick. The author must equip himself with modern tools and plow a deep furrow.

CHARLES CURTIS MUNZ

Next Week in The Nation

Midwinter Book Issue

Articles and Reviews by Randall Jarrell, Odell Shepard, Franz Hoellering, Joseph Wood Krutch, Morton D. Zabel, Samuel Eliot Morison, Reinhold Niebuhr, George Barker, Jacques Barzun.

AMUSEMENTS

"Buoyant, Giddy & Funny"
—Atkinson, Times

JUNIOR MISS

LYCEUM Theatre, 45th St. E. of B'way. CH 4-4256
Evenings, 8:40; Matinees, WED., SAT. & FEB. 23, 2:40

"A PERFECT COMEDY"
—Atkinson, Times

LIFE WITH FATHER

with HOWARD LINDSAY
DOROTHY STICKNEY

EMPIRE, B'way & 40 St.—269 seats $1.10
Evgs. 8:40. Mats. Sat. & Wash'ton's B'day

CHERYL CRAWFORD presents

George Gershwin's

PORGY AND BESS

"Go see 'Porgy and Bess' if you go to nothing else"
—Kronenberger, PM.

PRICES:
Evgs. . . . $2.75 to 55¢
Mats. . . . $2.20 to 55¢

MAJESTIC THEATRE, W. 44 St. Eves. Incl. Sunday. Mats. Wed., Sat. & Feb. 23

Theatre Guild Production

★ MARY BOLAND ★ BOBBY CLARK
★ WALTER HAMPDEN

In Sheridan's Greatest Comedy

THE RIVALS

SHUBERT Theatre, 44th St. W. of B'way. CI 6-6699
Evenings, 8:40; Matinees, Thursday & Saturday, 2:40

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Readers' Service Division

The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

IN BRIEF

NORTHBRIDGE RECTORY. By Angela Thirkell. Knopf. $2.50.

For those who prefer to take the war with a grain of salt and a dash of Angostura, Mrs. Thirkell dishes up another of her ambling, amiable caricatures of Britishers at work and play—this time showing the matrons of Northbridge on air-raid duty but with their minds undistracted from the really important things of life, like menus, marriage, and decorum. Mrs. Thirkell is a combination of Puck and Anthony Trollope.

BREAKFAST WITH THE NIKOLIDES. By Rumer Godden. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

This exotic novel, morbid and poetic, concerns a group of people in Bengal and the death of a dog—nothing more than that, but it probes certain raw nerve ends and psychological abscesses with such weird finesse as to make this event a turbulent crisis. Its lopsided, tormented characters and its narrative mannerisms are often exasperating, but the author's sensitiveness and good taste never let these peculiarities get entirely out of hand. In her explorations of the dark broodings and memories of neurotic folk she reminds one sharply of Carson McCullers.

SEVEN TEMPEST. By Vaughan Wilkins. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

Set in the robust early days of Victoria's reign, this semi-historical romance follows the fortunes of Anne Louise, niece of King Leopold of Belgium, and the seventh illegitimate son of a rapacious English financier. It is apparent that the author enjoyed writing it quite as much as a great many readers of light popular fiction will enjoy reading it. There is no pretense of fine writing, no fretting over any problems other than those of heart and hand; it is a bright and colorful picture of high adventure, by the writer of "And So—Victoria."

LATIN AMERICA. By William Lytle Schurz. E. P. Dutton. $3.75.

To call this a one-volume encyclopedia of Latin America would give some idea of its comprehensiveness and authority but would hardly do justice to its informal readability. With map, glossary, index, and full bibliographical notes for those who wish to delve deeper, it is an ideal introduction for the student. It is also all the North American general reader needs to obtain a clear, unified picture of the background of present inter-American relations, political, economic, and cultural.

PUBLISHED THIS WEEK

The Newspaper and Society. Edited by George L. Bird and Frederic E. Merwin. Prentice-Hall. $5.35.

The Negro Caravan. Edited and Selected by Sterling A. Brown, Arthur P. Davis, and Ulysses Lee. Dryden Press. $4.25.

The Kentucky. By Thomas D. Clark. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

Robert Bridges. By Albert Guérard, Jr. Harvard. $3.50.

Farm for Fortune and Vice Versa. By Ladd Haystead. Putnam's. $2.

They Taught Themselves. By Sidney Janis. Dial. $3.50.

Westward the Course! By Paul McGuire. Morrow. $3.75.

The Pragmatic Test. By Henry Bamford Parkes. Colt Press. $3.

The Mind of the Maker. By Dorothy L. Sayers. Harcourt, Brace. $2.

Music and the Line of Most Resistance. By Artur Schnabel. Princeton. $1.50.

The Economics of Total War. By Henry William Spiegel. Appleton-Century. $3.

The Destiny of Western Man. By W. T. Stace. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

Color, Class, and Personality. By Robert L. Sutherland. American Council on Education. $1.25.

Modern Battle. By Major Paul W. Thompson. Norton. $2.75.

Print, Radio, and Film in a Democracy. Edited by Douglas Waples. Chicago. $2.

The Language of Poetry. By Philip Wheelwright, Cleanth Brooks, I. A. Richards, and Wallace Stevens. Edited by Allen Tate. Princeton. $2.

DRAMA

Mice in Modern Literature

I CAN'T be accused of prejudice, for I'm an animal lover myself. What's more, I have an especially high opinion of the mouse and his relatives. He's a "wee slikit timorous cowering beastie," and he's cute. But I do think that the rodent is being rather overdone as a symbol of something. Perhaps Micky doesn't really count, since there isn't much aboriginal mouse left in him. But there was Mr. Steinbeck's Lennie, who liked them very dead; Mr. Saroyan's recent heroine, who constituted herself protectress of the whole tribe; and now comes the philosopher-tramp of "Solitaire" (Plymouth Theater), who keeps a Brother Rat in a home-made cage, and is therefore to be recognized immediately as a good man. I don't want to accuse Mr. Corle of imitating, but it does look as though he had taken "bigger and better rodents" as his motto.

Right at the beginning I should say that this new play, dramatized by John Van Druten from a novel by Edwin Corle, has the advantage of an extremely painstaking production and at least two extraordinarily well-acted roles—one by Victor Kilian as the philosophical vagabond and the other by Pat Hitchcock, the little daughter of the well-known movie director. Production and acting alike do all that could possibly be done to take the curse off the sentimental story and the frequently gooey writing. But you can't fool me. "Solitaire" is still a play about a poor little rich girl discussing the nature of ultimate reality with a philosophical tramp who talks as if he were not only thoroughly familiar with Bishop Berkeley but had probably read Bradley and other modern defenders of Absolute Idealism as well. Mr. Saroyan can get away with this sort of thing—at least he can get away with it so far as I am concerned—by keeping everything carefully on the level of unreality. But when a playwright doesn't himself seem to know on what level he is operating, when he drifts back and forth between some sort of hard-boiled realism and pure fantasy, then what you

ANNA FREUD REPORTS

A monthly report on the psychological reactions of children to wartime conditions. Prepared by Anna Freud, eminent psychoanalyst and daughter of Sigmund Freud, and Dorothy T. Burlingham, American psychologist, co-directors of the Hampstead Nurseries in London. Based on work being done with war-torn children.

The reports are indispensable to teachers, social workers, parents, church and other groups, psychiatrists, workers in civilian defense.

Subscription: $10 per year.

The following coupon is for your convenience.

———— ORDER FORM ————

The Foster Parents' Plan for War Children, Inc.
55 West 42nd Street, New York, N. Y.

Enclosed is $10 in payment for a one-year subscription to Anna Freud's reports on her work with war-torn children.

Name..

Street Address..............................

City & State................................

N

get is that special kind of sentimentality of which the essence is a failure to distinguish between fact and fancy, between what you literally believe and what you find it irresponsibly pleasant to imagine. I am very fond of Alice and her Wonderland, but that does not mean that I can put up with either Little Nell or Little Eva. And it is with the two last that Mr. Van Druten's "Little Virginia" unmistakably belongs.

Ostensibly "Solitaire" is a socio-humanitarian document about a group of unemployed migrants living temporarily hidden at the bottom of an arroyo (Californian for gully) near an upper-class residential district. A little girl has discovered them, and from one she gets a kind of understanding she had never had at home. But when her parents learn where she has been they can think only of driving the riffraff out, and they summon the police, who do a thorough job, even to setting the squatter camp ablaze and quite possibly burning the rat alive in his little wire box.

Now I am, I hope, capable of sympathy for men as well as for mice, but I have my doubts about sentimentalism even as a humanitarian force. There is something suspiciously Victorian about a renewed tendency I have been observing to discover all sorts of rather unlikely virtues among the dispossessed, and I am far from sure that the tendency bodes well for either humanitarianism or literature. I thought that we had wisely got over talking about the "worthy poor" and had come to the realistic conclusion that one of the worst things about destitution is just the fact that it does not have a tendency to develop in its victims the gentler virtues. I wonder about the soundness of the theory that we should hesitate to exterminate the Okies chiefly because some of them are philosophers and kind to animals besides. I remember Bernard Shaw's declaration that the trouble with the poor is poverty, his implication that we should do something about them not because they are such nice people but because, being very poor, they probably are not. I also remember William James's famous story about the Russian aristocrat who allowed her coachman to freeze to death on his box while she was inside a theater weeping over the sufferings of the poor. The coachman, you see, wasn't "worthy," like the poor in the play. And I wonder just what the reaction of a spectator at "Solitaire" will be when he rushes out to help the destitute only to discover not a single ideal companion for his daughter in the whole bunch.

At the Longacre Theater a Greek star named Katina Paxinou is appearing in a revival of "Hedda Gabler." According to the program Miss Paxinou has been very famous in Athens, and one may guess that she is probably an actress of considerable ability, but she struggles with an accent which seems to me particularly unfortunate in this particular role, despite the fact that Nazimova used to play it while laboring under the same handicap. Hedda is a strange and dangerous woman who, nevertheless, has managed up to the time of the play to be accepted as a member of the society in which she lives. But the play is thrown completely out of balance and the whole initial situation becomes completely incredible when Hedda is an obvious foreigner, totally unlike the people around her in appearance, in accent, and in gesture. It then becomes impossible to think of her except as a creature so obviously exotic that Tesman could not possibly have married her and Tesman's friends and relatives could not possibly have attempted to treat her as one of themselves.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MUSIC

AARON COPLAND'S writing is fluent but not orderly or precise—which makes it difficult to deal with. As I understand the open paragraph of his book "Our New Music" (Whittlesey House; $2.50), he thinks that the lay listener has been antagonistic or apathetic to recent music because its new styles and tendencies have bewildered him, and that they have bewildered him because he has not known how and why and out of what they have developed. Mr. Copland, then, undertakes to inform this listener of the "change in expressive ideal" and the extension of vocabulary that produced modern music; and he does this to remove from the listener's mind the "fantastic notions . . . concerning the nature of so-called 'modern music' " which "incredible as it may seem . . . are still being circulated by newspaper writers and radio commentators who ought to know better"—to remove, that is, the notions that the music lacks emotion and melody, is rhythmically over-complicated and harmonically cacophonous—and to enable the listener to recognize the emotion that is merely changed in quality and intensity, the melody, rhythm, and harmony that are merely enriched. And as I understand him, Mr. Copland believes that when the listener recognizes in modern music "the expression in terms of an enriched musical language of a new spirit of objectivity, attuned to our own times . . . the music of the composer of today—in other words—our music," he will find this music as significant, interesting, and valuable as listeners fifty and a hundred years ago found their music.

Lay readers of Mr. Copland's book who have actually heard Schönberg, Bartók, von Webern, and the other modern extremists may be amused by his reference to "an enriched musical language," and his wide-eyed, incredible-as-it-may-seem, how-can-such-things-be talk about the "fantastic notions" with which newspaper writers, apparently for the sheer hell of it, have misrepresented the music; or they may be irritated by all this; but they won't be fooled by it. For they will know that those newspaper writers have described what is plain to hear in the music. Even these readers may, however, accept Mr. Copland's contention that when they understand the aesthetic and procedures of the music they will be able to hear in it the value they have not heard. And if my experience means anything that contention is wrong. At the same time as I began to listen to the music, after the last war, with mind and ears that were open, receptive, eager, I began to read discussions and explanations of it, in the hope that with them I would perceive the new artistic beauty or potency in what impressed me as hideous or feeble; but nothing I have learned from reading about Schönberg, Bartók, and the rest in the past twenty years has changed the impression I have got from listening to them.

Nor is it different with Mr. Copland's book. A reader who learns from it that there is emotion in Schönberg's music may find that he doesn't like the emotion or the music it is communicated in. He may learn that the emotion and the vocabulary it utilizes make the music "ours," and discover that what is "ours" is impressive and valuable to him when it is Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" or Bloch's Quintet or Prokofiev's Violin Concerto No. 1—to say nothing of Picasso's Guernica studies and postscripts—but not when it is Schönberg's "Pierrot Lunaire."

Mr. Copland's treatment of the American part of his subject is also open to objection; but this requires more time and space than I have left now.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Thomas's Inconsistency

Dear Sirs: Norman Thomas's letter explaining his stand on Russia, in your issue of January 31, throws a good deal of light on the reasons for the intellectual decline of the Socialist Party under his leadership. For he either has repudiated the plain implications of his position or would repudiate them.

Thomas denounced the Soviet government for making the non-aggression pact with Hitler and thereby agreeing to remain neutral in the war, which by then was obviously just around the corner. The only logical basis for such denunciation was that Soviet Russia, in making the pact, deserted the somewhat inchoate collective-security front of the anti-Nazi nations against the Axis and thus helped to encourage aggression by making it easier for the Nazis to seize their victims one by one. But Mr. Thomas steadily insisted that the neutral position in the war which he denounced Stalin for taking should be maintained by the United States. He accordingly opposed modification of the Neutrality Act, the destroyers-for-bases deal, the Lend-Lease Act, and every other step which the Roosevelt Administration took to keep the anti-Nazi forces from being overwhelmed.

At the Socialist Party's national convention in 1940, for example, he opposed, and by his influence got the majority of the convention to oppose, resolutions favoring aid to the anti-Axis countries and also one demanding an embargo on goods to Japan. Thus Thomas and the Socialist Party under his influence opposed aid to Britain in fighting the Axis and opposed stopping the aid we were giving to Japan in its war with China, and took this position after having denounced Stalin for giving aid to Hitler through the Soviet-Nazi pact.

Of course real security against war for any nation can only be obtained through genuine international collective security. Thomas clearly perceived that when he was considering Soviet Russia's foreign policy but could not admit it in connection with our own foreign policy, although as a Socialist he was supposed to have an international viewpoint.

Thomas states that his present position on Russia and the war is that he "does not want the war to continue indefinitely till Stalin is lord over most of Europe." If this means anything at all, it means that he wants the war to stop before the Nazis are defeated and overthrown so that Germany, still powerfully armed and in possession of some of its conquests, can be used as a counterweight against Soviet Russia.

This of course is merely another example of the old balance-of-power policy which has been pursued for generations by the British Conservatives. That is the logical implication of Thomas's position, though he would bitterly denounce the British for pursuing such a policy in the past (in fact, it was exactly Chamberlain's policy), and he would probably denounce balance-of-power politics in any other form. Yet the policy of collective security against aggression, the only possible alternative, except the imperialist rule of one country, to balance-of-power politics, Thomas has likewise opposed in every one of the actual issues in which the principle of collective security has been presented to the American government and public opinion.

ALFRED BAKER LEWIS

New York, February 6

The Truth Will Arm Us

Dear Sirs: Such articles as Mr. Mitchell's How to Lose the War in The Nation of January 24 go to the heart of the grim, harsh realities of the war since December 7. If only those articles got as much attention as a Hearst headline, or a Saturday Evening Post article such as Demaree Bess's specious The Axis Is a Myth, or a New York Times cartoon, we might hope for a quick, active awakening all over America.

Too many American cartoonists fall back on the easy device of mere ridicule of the Japs. Sinister, ruthless, and menacing aggressors cannot thus be "cartooned" into weakness or impotence. In a recent Sunday New York Times were two cases in point: (1) a grinning Jap diplomat figure-skating "victories" on ice, after which he is seen plunging blindly into the black open water of "Allied plans"; (2) a moronic Jap shooting at a bull's-eye, the Dutch East Indies, but only managing to pepper Thailand, the Philippines, Singapore—the cartoon captioned "A miss is as good as a mile."

Such cocky-confident interpretations of the Japanese threat do not condition Americans for eventualities or steel their wills to grim, all-out efforts. Rather, these cartoons tend to lull us into a dangerous complacency comparable to the French before May, 1940, or the British before Dunkirk, or some commanders at Pearl Harbor before December 7.

Let our cartoonists ponder Owen Johnson's great letter which also appeared in the Times: "It is the responsibility of the great free press of America to tell the people the truth. . . . Tell them again and again and again that the stake is our own survival. Prepare them now for the disasters that may come. Stiffen their backs, toughen them, steel their courage to fight it out. . . . Believe me, the truth will double their strength and awaken the moral grandeur of a free people."

Nothing less than the forthright dramatizing of challenging realities—not wishful anticipations—can hope to arouse and sustain our national morale.

CARLTON F. WELLS

Ann Arbor, Mich., January 30

Aliens—Friends and Enemies

Dear Sirs: A re-registration of all "enemy aliens" in the United States and its possessions has been ordered by the President for the month of February. Would this not present a splendid opportunity to demonstrate the sense of justice which is the very spirit of democracy by dividing the so-called "enemy aliens" into different categories, as was done in England shortly after the outbreak of the war? A genuine refugee from Nazi oppression in England today is officially considered a "friendly alien" if he has been able to prove his identity. It should be even easier for him to prove this in the United States, where refugees have been admitted as immigrants, for American consulates abroad have been required to examine each would-be immigrant most carefully. In addition, American citizens have had to submit full guaranties as to the political and moral integrity of the future American citizen.

At the present time thousands of racial and political refugees from Axis countries have taken the necessary steps to become American citizens, and many of them have lost their former Axis citizenship by expatriation. A great number of these "enemy aliens" were hunted all over Europe by the agents of the Gestapo before they were finally able to enter the United States—often with the assistance of the very American government which now classifies them as enemies.

The sense of bitterness and disillusion in the minds of these people, who, before they became "enemy aliens," were proud to call themselves loyal immigrants and future citizens of the greatest democracy in the world, is by no means helpful in building morale among the foreign-born in America.

IRENE POPPER

New York, January 30

Rose Stein

Dear Sirs: Just as I was about to start a letter to Rose Stein I received a cutting from The Nation of November 27 announcing her death. I hope it is not too late for an Englishman to pay a tribute to her memory.

We met but seldom—first during a two weeks' stay I spent in Pittsburgh in 1934 and later for one day in Washington in 1937, but she admitted me, I am proud to say, to her friendship from the first, and her letters for the last half-dozen years, with their acute and realistic analysis of the American labor situation, were a perpetual delight and stimulus.

In the Current Issue of

THE PROTESTANT

formerly "The Protestant Digest"

PIERRE VAN PAASSEN

The Soviets Saw It Coming

The noted author of 'Days of Our Years" and "That Day Alone" describes how the Soviets outplanned, out-produced and outfought the Nazis.

KENNETH LESLIE

God's Red Army

A powerful article by The Protestant's editor, a consistent advocate, since before Munich, of rapprochement with the Soviets as the way to stop Hitler.

A. V. H. HARTENDORP

The Jesuit Plan for the Philippines

An article by the editor of The Philippine Magazine sent on the last boat leaving the Philippines before the outbreak of hostilities.

ALSO IN THE SAME ISSUE:

Falangism, Sinarchism and Ultramontanism H. R. Southworth
Love's Strange Work.................Paul Tillich
Protestants and the Anti-Soviet Front Harry F. Ward
Religion Under Soviet Rule......James Maynard
The Great Synthesis.................David Lord
Rev. Claude......................Alva W. Taylor
Giant Pope and Giant Pagan....H. D. A. Major
Dawn Over Dixie.................Harold Preece
The Bulgar Peasant Hates Hitler..Alfred Werner
Terrorist and Tiara....................Il Mondo
Vital Literature and Other Departments

Special Offer

$1.00 for next five issues

THE PROTESTANT, 521 Fifth Avenue, New York
I enclose $1.00 for 5 issues.

Name ....

Address ....

Latterly, as was perhaps inevitable, we tended to discuss rather the international position of the United States and, as no doubt was equally inevitable, did not always see eye to eye. Rose Stein had a deep aversion from war with all that it would mean for the workers of her country, while I was more inclined to urge that effort short of war was not enough to vindicate America's position as a champion of democracy. But while I fear that from time to time my arguments caused her distress, her friendship and interest never flagged.

With her passing there leaves us a valued interpreter of the American scene, a valiant champion of American labor, and a staunch friend.

E. M. HUGH-JONES

Oxford, England, January 9

Scandalous Coddling

Dear Sirs: I am a gentleman of the old school, and I beg leave to protest against the way Congress is preparing to coddle the millions of automobile workers who will be out of jobs for a few months while factories are being retooled for war production. It appears that these unemployed workers are to be paid enough to live on while they train for new jobs in war work.

That is all wrong. That is not the way to treat the unemployed. First, we should tell them that there is a job somewhere for every worker who really wants one. We should insist upon their tramping the streets looking for work until their shoes are worn out, their savings entirely spent, and their children crying for food. Then we should let them apply for relief as paupers.

Only then, if at all, should we give them work-relief jobs at ditch-digging and road-mending. But we should make it clear to them that the work they are doing is utterly useless and that they are only a bunch of bums and shovel-leaners. And finally we should decide that their so-called work is a luxury that the nation cannot afford and drastically reduce our appropriation for it, so as to throw at least half of them back on the dole.

That is what we did in the past. Are we going to start in now treating the unemployed as though they were useful and important—actually as though we could not win this great war without their help?

It is true that these automobile workers were fine, upstanding, hard-working citizens when they were still employed manufacturing Fords, Chevrolets, Cadillacs, Oldsmobiles, etc. But the minute the factory closed down they joined the ranks of the unemployed, which means that they promptly became incompetent, shiftless chiselers. "They wouldn't work if you offered them a job." Anyone who has been reading the newspaper editorials of the past few years knows how to deal with the unemployed.

PRO BONO PUBLICO

New York, February 4

CONTRIBUTORS

HOWARD COSTIGAN, news analyst and radio commentator for Station KOL, initiated the campaign to block scrap shipments to Japan from Seattle.

DWIGHT MACDONALD was formerly on the editorial staff of Fortune and is now an editor of the Partisan Review.

JOACHIM JOESTEN, for six years a correspondent in the Scandinavian countries, is now editor of Background, a weekly news letter on foreign affairs published in New York.

W. R. RODGERS, a young poet of County Armagh, Ireland, will soon bring out in this country a book entitled "Awake! and Other Wartime Poems."

OSCAR WILLIAMS is the author of a book of poetry entitled "The Man Coming Toward You."

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER, head of the Department of Sociology at Howard University, is the author of "The Negro Family in the United States."

RUTH NORDEN, together with Heinz Norden, has edited and translated a number of German books for publication in this country.

CATHERINE PORTER, editor of the Far Eastern Survey, published by the Institute of Pacific Relations, will soon bring out a volume called "Crisis in the Philippines."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 154 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 21, 1942 NUMBER 8

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 205

EDITORIALS

Wages, Prices, Profits 208
Demagogy as Usual 209
New Leaders for Old by Freda Kirchwey 210

ARTICLES

Four Freedoms (Jim Crow) by Alvin E. White 213
Jews After the War. I. by Reinhold Niebuhr 214
Guns for Europe's Guerrillas by H. A. DeWeerd 217
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 219
In the Wind 220
A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels 221

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The End of the Line by Randall Jarrell 222
Homage to Ezra Pound by Gilbert Highet 228
American Dream vs. Nightmare by Reinhold Niebuhr 230
Dr. Vespucci by Samuel Eliot Morison 230
Shakespeare and His Audience by Joseph Wood Krutch 233
Mme Undset's Report by Bjarne Braatoy 234
Dwight of Yale by Odell Shepard 235
Germany's "Lost Generation" by Betsy Hutchison 236
James Joyce, Heretic by George Barker 236
How to Woo a Jury by Jerome H. Spingarn 237
Aesthetic Theology by Jacques Barzun 238
Films by P. H. Rye 239
Records by B. H. Haggin 240

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor
RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL ▪ JONATHAN DANIELS ▪ LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

THE SHELLS AND TORPEDOES THAT BURST on Aruba should jolt into wakefulness the dimwits who still look upon the Atlantic as a better Maginot Line. This daring foray into the Caribbean brought the enemy within 700 miles of the Panama Canal and struck a damaging blow at the supply lines of the United Nations. From the great refineries at Aruba, Venezuelan oil flows across the Atlantic to keep the R. A. F. flying above the British fortress. Fortunately, the shore installations appear not to have suffered important damage, but the sinking of half a dozen or more tankers in the harbor represents a serious loss. We should like to know whether any precautions had been taken against a night attack on such a vital point. British and American troops are garrisoned on the island, and bombers took off which may have sunk one or more of the raiders. But prevention is vastly more important than reprisal, and that necessitates night patrols and the defense of the harbor with mines and nets.

*

THE FALL OF SINGAPORE IS A DISASTER comparable only to the capitulation of France in 1940. As we go to press, many of the details are still unavailable. It seems probable, however, that the British lost not only the city and its great naval base but almost its entire defending force of some 60,000 men. So far as is known, only the wounded and part of the R. A. F. personnel were evacuated before the fall of the city. It is not even certain whether the naval base was destroyed before its seizure by the Japanese. There is a tendency in this country to place blame for the defeat on British complacency and on the obvious defects in the Empire's colonial policy. This view has been strengthened by Cecil Brown's remarkable broadcast from Sydney pointing out the undeniable laxity of the British in preparing for the defense of Singapore and their failure to adopt an effective scorched-earth policy. It is desirable that Americans recognize the shortcomings of British—or of Chinese or Russian—war policy, but it must not be forgotten that the United States shares full responsibility with Britain for the Singapore defeat. The base was as essential to the United States as to the Empire, and only the United States had the men and supplies needed to save it. We had two months in which to get these to the battle front; yet not a single American soldier aided in Singapore's defense. Our failure was apparently due primarily to lack of advance planning. But it may also have been due in part to the same regrettable nationalism which now holds Britain responsible for a failure that was equally our own.

*

HYSTERIA OVER THE WEST COAST JAPANESE appears to be unabated despite the stringent steps now being taken to prevent sabotage or effective espionage activities. Even so sober an analyst as Walter Lippmann has contributed to the public's uneasiness by charging that there has been communication between the Japanese navy at sea and enemy agents on land—a charge which has been challenged by the coordinator of enemy-alien control for the Western Defense Command. The excitement would be understandable if there were any indications of laxity on the part of the FBI or the local defense authorities. Actually, these agencies seem to have dealt with the situation with commendable energy and realism. Enemy aliens have already been moved out of the first of the "prohibited" zones, and evacuation from other zones is under way. American-born Japanese are to be "invited" to move to non-strategic areas in the interior, where work projects will be provided for them. The FBI has been conducting raids on Japanese aliens who were believed to have failed to conform with the regulations regarding short-wave radio sets, flashlights, and reflectors. Admittedly the dangers are real. Espionage activities doubtless still continue in our large German colonies and among American-born Japanese. But the government is right in taking the position that the methods used to eliminate these activities shall not be of such a nature as to alienate the overwhelming majority in these groups who have remained loyal to the United States.

*

THE COURT WHICH IS INVESTIGATING THE Normandie's loss will presumably, on the basis of existing information, find that the fire which destroyed the huge ship was accidental in origin. Although a PM reporter rather conclusively demonstrated that the ship could have been destroyed by sabotage, the evidence so far divulged strongly indicates that the fire was due to carelessness rather than to purposeful destruction. So far as the ship is concerned, it makes very little difference. The destruction was as thoroughgoing as any incendiarist would have desired. Nor does the origin of the fire in any way affect the responsibility of the navy. It is evident from the press reports of the disaster that the precautions against sabotage or accident were grossly inadequate. No one has even sought to explain why electric welding was permitted in the vicinity of bales of mattresses. But it is obvious that it is the sort of thing which no responsible private shipping firm would permit under any circumstances. There is a rather natural tendency, to be found equally in high and low places, to regard government property and enterprise in impersonal terms. This tendency is at the root of much of the inefficiency and waste which have thus far characterized the war effort. It can be effectively counteracted among the rank and file of workmen and enlisted personnel only if the brass hats and high government officials demonstrate that they fully understand and accept their responsibilities.

*

THE TRIAL OF LAURA INGALLS THREW A revealing light on the operations of Nazi propagandists in this country and the agencies through which they worked. Miss Ingalls admitted the offense of which she was convicted—acting as a paid agent of the Reich without registering at the State Department—but insisted that she was guided by purely patriotic motives. According to her counsel, her intention was to conduct counterespionage, and her acceptance of German money and expressions of warm enthusiasm for Hitler were merely a misguided attempt to ingratiate herself. Her own testimony was confused: one minute confirming her counsel's story, the next making it clear that the "subversive influence" she was really excited about was that of supporters of aid to Britain. Whether one rejects Miss Ingalls's plea, as the jury did, or accepts it together with the explanation that she is a "crackpot," it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the trial was a severe indictment of the America First Committee. No one suggests that Baron von Gienanth, second secretary to the German embassy and Gestapo chief in America, was another crackpot, and the record shows that he told Miss Ingalls, "The best thing you can do for our cause is to continue to promote America First." In other words, the "patriotic" organization which was the chosen platform of Lindbergh, Wheeler, Nye, et al., was also the vehicle preferred by our enemies for promoting division in our ranks. Senator Wheeler, instead of trying to cash in politically on our setbacks in the Far East by saying, "I was right all along," might have the grace to blush and explain, if he can, why America First accepted the services of a paid Nazi propagandist given to spouting Nazi sentiments at its meetings.

*

THE STATE DEPARTMENT IS STILL IMPALED on those pin-points of Free French soil—the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon—and the sight of its wrigglings is far from edifying. Some weeks back Mr. Hull expressed the informal but firm opinion that the Act of Havana applied to the transfer of these islands from the control of Vichy to that of the Free French, particularly Section 6, which declares that "acquisition of territories by force cannot be permitted." On Friday, February 3, Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles told his press conference that in his judgment the act did not apply. Correspondents not unnaturally drew the inference that Mr. Hull and his second-in-command had disagreed and that the President had backed Welles. Next day, however, the State Department had a rather different story. Mr. Welles canceled his press conference, but a "spokesman" who seems to have consulted him stated that none of the American republics had invoked the Act of Havana in regard to the St. Pierre situation but that they reserved the right to do so if it impaired their security or the independence of this hemisphere. As not even a State Department official could be humorless enough to claim that a handful of French fishermen who had voted to join the Free French and follow the laws of the French republic were a menace to any nation on this continent, these conflicting statements may indicate simply a squirming effort to "find a formula." The difficulty is to reconcile the objectives of mollifying Vichy and saving the State Department's face with the fact that the island people have chosen their path and will only yield to force.

* * *

CANADA HAD A POLITICAL SENSATION OF the first order when Arthur Meighen, newly selected leader of the Conservative Party, was defeated by a comparatively unknown Cooperative Commonwealth Federation candidate in a Parliamentary by-election. Mr. Meighen, twice Prime Minister of Canada, had been called from retirement to take over the helm of the once powerful Conservatives. South York, the Toronto district in which he chose to stand, has been so overwhelmingly Conservative for the last forty years that the Liberals did not even run a candidate against him. But the C. C. F., previously unable to gain a foothold in Ontario, felt that Meighen's reactionary policies should be opposed even though there seemed little hope of victory. Meighen received enthusiastic support from Mitchell Hepburn, Premier of Ontario, who was read out of the Liberal Party for his constant sniping at the Dominion government's war efforts. Hepburn, foe of the C. I. O. and a Canadian counterpart of Martin Dies, recently achieved considerable notoriety by declaring that the United States fleet was in hiding from the Japanese, and his support probably did Meighen more harm than good. Another candidate whom he backed was defeated in the Welland by-election by Humphrey Mitchell, Labor Minister in Mackenzie King's Cabinet. Although the conscription issue was uppermost in the campaigns, it seems to have had little effect on the results. Mr. Meighen urged immediate conscription of man-power, but his opponent countered by advocating conscription of wealth and industry as well. The victory of government candidates in Quebec constituencies suggests that opposition to conscription is not as strong there as was feared.

THE CHART REPRODUCED ON PAGE 212 IS AN antidote to defeatism but not an encouragement to complacency. It shows that the economic resources of the United Nations are enormously greater than those of the Axis powers, but before we can command victory those resources must be turned into weapons. Our enemies achieved that conversion long ago, and they have proved themselves adepts in obtaining maximum military results from minimum means. We, on the other hand, as Donald M. Nelson said last week, have "lost a lot of time because industry was fearful of what might happen after the war if all our productive facilities were overexpanded." There is, happily, some reason to believe that the task of turning the automobile industry into a great arsenal is at last getting rapidly under way. The financial controllers of the industry are resigned to the fact that ordinary commercial business is finished for the duration and know that, if dividends are to be paid, they must be earned from war production. So the technicians have been given their heads, and we have much confidence that they will speedily accomplish the job which their bosses swore, twelve months ago, could not be done.

* * *

MAYOR LAGUARDIA HAS GIVEN UP MOST of his duties in Civilian Defense to become a full-time mayor of New York again, but there is no evidence that less work has made him less irascible. In his dispute with the New York Civil Service Commission, LaGuardia has been contemptuous not only of good political manners but of elementary democratic rights. In a dispute between the state and city civil service commissions, Paul Kern, city commissioner, asked Corporation Counsel William Chanler to represent the city group in court. Chanler refused. Kern and another member of the three-man board issued a statement criticizing Chanler. Forty-eight hours later, without any hearings, Mayor LaGuardia suspended the city commission; Kern and his colleagues were denied access to their files and desks. When reporters asked his reasons for the suspension, the Mayor said only that he could not tolerate an attack on Chanler. The suspension has been followed by a final dismissal of Kern and Wallace Sayre, signers of the statement about Chanler. Regardless of the issues between the two commissions, or between Kern and Chanler, LaGuardia has abused executive power and has short-circuited the legal processes which guarantee a measure of justice.

* * *

JONATHAN DANIELS BRINGS SPECIAL AND valuable gifts to his new job of helping to organize the volunteer services of civilian defense. Not the least of his qualifications is his concrete knowledge and sympathetic understanding of American communities and the people who live in them—which have kept his weekly page both vivid and fresh. During the twenty months of his association with The Nation, he has been truly a Native at Large, reporting the hopes and fears, the angers and the issues with which the average American community is preoccupied. As he points out, "It has not been a perfect America. . . . It has plenty of faults now not to be neglected in the midst of war"—and he has been quick to advertise its faults. "But America as it is now is still worth all we've got to give." We are gratified that another genuine democrat has been enlisted in defense; but we shall miss his weekly letter from America.

Wages, Prices, Profits

THE War Labor Board will shortly render decisions in two wage disputes of such far-reaching importance that its findings will, in effect, constitute the general wage policy for which some of its critics have been clamoring. It has been called upon to adjudicate demands made on "Little Steel" by the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee and on General Motors by the Automobile Workers' Union, in both cases for wage increases of a dollar a day. The verdict in these cases will undoubtedly set wage standards throughout the steel and automobile industries, and since automobile manufacture is now closely linked with that of airplanes, the airplane industry, too, will be indirectly affected. In other words, the War Labor Board is being asked to declare whether or not a general increase in wages for the bulk of the workers engaged in armament production is desirable at this time.

The Nation believes that a widespread upward revision of wages would undermine our war economy and be contrary to the interests of the working class as a whole. Leon Henderson has pointed out that this year consumer incomes are likely to total around $95 billion, while the supply of consumer goods will not exceed $65 billion. Unless this $30 billion of surplus purchasing power which cannot possibly be satisfied is mopped up by taxation and savings, competitive bidding for scarce goods will endanger the whole price-stabilization effort. Should any strategically placed group, whether labor or capitalist, be permitted to add appreciably to its buying power, the inevitable result will be to widen what has been called the inflationary gap. Favored groups might be able to keep their incomes in step with the rise in prices, but all the many millions unable to secure such adjustments would find their purchasing power curtailed.

Since August, 1939, wages in the better-organized industries have more than kept pace with the cost of living. The Bureau of Labor Statistics reports that from the outbreak of war in Europe to November, 1941, average weekly earnings for workers in all manufacturing industries increased by 33.9 per cent, while the cost-of-living index rose from an average of 99 in 1939 to 111 in December, 1941. At the end of November average weekly earnings in the all-manufacturing group were $32.81, and it will not be disputed, we believe, that the average for the steel industry is somewhat above this figure and that for the automobile industry it is considerably higher. We do not suggest that such wage levels represent luxurious standards or even—in peace time—satisfactory ones, but they do provide for the maintenance of health and efficiency, and that is about all we can expect so long as the bulk of our resources must be devoted to smashing the Axis.

A policy of stabilizing wages, except for the removal of anomalies and differentials, is absolutely dependent, of course, on the prevention of further increases in the cost of living. The efforts of the Administration toward this end are threatened by more than one special interest. On page 219 Keith Hutchison discusses the demand of the railroads for increased freight rates which, if granted, must give a forward thrust to costs of all producers. Again, the Congressional farm bloc, not content with its mutilations of the Price Control Act, is now trying to hamstring the stabilization policy by denying power to the government to dispose of its crop surpluses at prices under 110 per cent of parity. We suspect that many Congressmen forget that they represent consumers as well as producers, and we would suggest that the housewives among their constituents write to them more frequently.

Instead of positively encouraging inflation Congress ought to be combating it, and the most urgent task in this direction is the passage of a new tax bill. If swollen purchasing power is to be prevented from running amuck in a denuded market-place, there must be a further increase in income taxes, particularly in the upper and middle brackets, and much stiffer excess-profits taxes. Union spokesmen arguing in favor of pay rises naturally point to large profits and insist that the corporations can pay more. Unfortunately this is not just a matter of subtracting from capital and adding to labor, particularly as a growing volume of government contracts carry "escalator" clauses protecting the contractor from rising costs. It is true, however, that until more stringent measures are taken to curb profits, the moral case for placing a ceiling on wages will remain weak.

Last year industry as a whole was able to absorb increased costs and taxes and come out ahead of 1940. United States Steel, despite a fourfold expansion in its federal tax bill, was able to tuck away a nest egg of $25 million and still show a net profit of $116 million against $102 million in 1940. The heavy industries and the railroads, which experienced lean times in the thirties, appear to think they have a right to make up on the swings of war what they lost on the roundabouts of depression. On the other hand, those industries which were prospering in the years immediately before the war claim that they should be now allowed to remain at least as prosperous. These notions must be dispelled. We have got to realize—workers, managers, professional people, officials, and stockholders alike—that in order to devote to war production enough of our resources to achieve victory, all of us but the very poorest must accept for the duration a lower standard of living. If we want to know the alternative, we need only ask the peoples of the conquered countries.

Demagogy as Usual

IT IS nearly four years since a hitherto obscure Texas Representative found in "subversive activities" the highroad to fame. In that time the country has seen more than a dozen nations softened by genuinely subversive activities until they were ripe for military conquest by Nazi Germany. It has seen within its own borders the ominous rise of these same forces of appeasement, violence, and treason. In Hawaii spies and subversive agents grew thicker than pineapples. The poison of Father Coughlin spilled over into the streets of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston. The dormant Ku Klux Klan, sensing a favorable climate, stirred itself and invested in new robes. Princes of decay like Winrod, General Moseley, Gerald Smith, Pelley, and McWilliams crept out of their holes, and thought of themselves as Gauleiters of a Nazi-dominated America. The Bund goose-stepped in Jersey and Long Island, Japanese "fishermen" and consuls gave the Pacific Coast a thorough going-over, and errand-boys for Mussolini taught fascist doctrine in private schools in New York. The Communists, as always, carried on in their peculiarly blatant fashion, applying to America whatever might be the current policies of the Soviet Foreign Office. And then came the America First Committee, to give respectable shelter to the criminal along with the misguided, to the spy and the agent along with the dupe and the politically illiterate; the committee that in two months of war has already given the country's criminal courts an Ingalls, a Townsend, a von Clemm, and a George Hill.

And where were Martin Dies and his committee while all this subversion was coming to a boil? Certainly he wasn't sounding the alarm about Japanese espionage in Hawaii. He is just preparing to issue a "Yellow Paper" on that subject now—more than two months after Pearl Harbor. Did he summon Coughlin to Washington and force him to disgorge details of the best-organized effort to stir up racial hate since the Civil War? On the contrary, Dies himself shared the platform with such staunch followers of Coughlin as Merwin K. Hart and George U. Harvey. He addressed the American Coalition of Patriotic Societies, headed by James True, fanatic anti-Semite and pro-Nazi. Christian Fronters received free tickets to a rally addressed by Mr. Dies in November, 1939, and Social Justice was sold throughout the meeting. Fritz Kuhn and James Wheeler-Hill, Bund leaders and now convicts (no thanks to the committee), attended a luncheon in honor of Mr. Dies given by Hart, one of the few witnesses permitted by the committee to testify in secret session. The activities of Pelley and Moseley were given a cursory airing and quickly forgotten, while Winrod, Smith, and other workers in the fascist vineyard were not even asked to appear. A promised exposure of a plot by Italian Fascists "more important than the Nazi" never developed, and anti-fascists who asked to testify on the subject were refused on the ground that the inquiry might "irritate the Italian government."

It would be a mistake, however, to assume that because the Dies committee allowed subversive activity to flourish without let or hindrance it was inactive or that it failed to get rid of the $385,000 Congress had given it to smoke out "un-Americanism." In its four years of existence the committee has given the nation the considered opinion that Mrs. Roosevelt, Vice-President Wallace, Supreme Court Justices Jackson and Murphy, Secretary of the Interior Ickes, James Cagney, and possibly Shirley Temple are all fellow-travelers of the Communist Party, though Cagney and Temple were subsequently cleared. Frequent allegations were made that the New Deal was honeycombed with Communists, though in no case was any proof adduced. In 1940 the committee got out a "White Paper" on Nazi activities of a minor sort, inspiring the New York Times to comment: "There is nothing surprising in the evidence . . . the 'White Paper' seems to tell chiefly of little schemes and little men." And in the same year it got out a "Red Paper" about Communist activities between 1920 and 1935—all rehashed from previously published material.

More recently the committee has busied itself with trying to keep the Office of Facts and Figures from falling under the spell of a left-liberal editor; with saving the navy from the threatened presence of a young man whose dislike of Communists is as great as the committee's and whose dislike of the enemy is a lot greater; and with exposing the presence of an ex-Technocrat on the staff of the OPM. In the meantime George Deatherage, Knight of the White Camellia, who only a few years ago tried to create a fascist army under the leadership of General Moseley, has emerged as chief engineer of a $7,000,000 naval construction project at Norfolk, without so much as a growl from the hired watchdog of Americanism.

Why should a Congress which in four years has not seen fit to pass a single bill introduced by the Dies committee (there have been at least nine) now appropriate another $100,000 to keep it in existence? These are dark hours to be spending the Republic's money on demagogy-as-usual.

New Leaders for Old

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

TO UNDERSTAND what has been happening in these last disastrous days, a person must turn away from maps and figures and look at men. The defeats suffered by the Allied nations have been political defeats before everything else. That they can also be measured in terms of territory and materials and strategic points lost is a fact that must not be allowed to divert attention from the failure in political leadership that lies behind them. The United Nations are today losing the war, not only in Singapore or Burma or the English Channel, but in Washington and London. And it is in Washington and London that they will have to win it if it is to be won, since those capitals handle the controls. One is tempted to wonder why they do, why the direction of the war is not centered in Moscow and Chungking, which alone seem to know the secret of successful resistance. But the explanation of this apparent anomaly is immediately obvious. Britain and the United States still hold that preponderance of political and economic power which determines ultimate control. It is the failure of the political as well as the military strategy of those two proud governments which both calls into question the capacity of their present leaders and raises doubts as to their basic fitness for their leading role in the high command of the United Nations. The challenge is clear. The two chief Western powers must justify their position by developing swiftly, in the face of overwhelming danger, the sort of direction that will win the war. If they fail to do so, the war will be lost. Neither the vast potential output of American industry nor the incredible bravery of Britain's soldiers in the field can compensate for timid, fumbling leadership.

Today the British Prime Minister faces the anger of the Empire. The millions who heard his speech on Sunday must have been shaken with a sense of loss that defeats alone could not bring. Here indeed was a sample of that "stupefying magic" against which Robert Willis, secretary of the London Trades Council, had protested only the previous day. For the first time Mr. Churchill seemed to be using his eloquence and his great qualities of personal leadership to defend a record of incompetence. By implication he accused his critics of lack of patriotism and an inability to face up to harsh reality. This was as unworthy as it was unfair .The British people can face facts and accept reverses better, perhaps, than any people on earth; but they must have confidence in their leaders. On Sunday Winston Churchill offered them no reason for confidence. He merely demanded it. He cited the unity of the Russians as a model for Englishmen to follow. But if this was more than mere oratory, it was a thoroughly disingenuous suggestion. The unity of the Russians is founded in their faith in the tough, realistic, fighting qualities of their leaders. It is not for Mr. Churchill to hold up Russian unity as an example for the British people, but rather for the British people to point to Russian leadership as an example for Mr. Churchill and his government. The Russian army in retreat burned not only its bridges but houses, factories, dams, and standing crops; the British signed the terms of their surrender in Singapore in an undamaged Ford assembly plant and, so far as is known, turned over the vast facilities of their Far Eastern base intact save for the inevitable destruction from the war itself.

The British people are not demanding victories of their leaders; they are demanding leadership. They will not, I know, be satisfied with explanations and exhortations in place of action. I hope Mr. Churchill's oratorical magic will not silence them even for the moment. Now if ever is the time to insist on a change, for delay may mean final defeat. Japan's troops in Burma will not wait until the slow processes of muddle and compromise that characterize British party politics finally retire the old appeasers and fumblers responsible for Britain's political defeat.

One is more and more forced to the conclusion that only men who understand the nature of this war can fight it effectively. Churchill, in spite of his superb political talents, does not understand it. He is still an old-fashioned British imperialist, completely free from the commercial fears that corrupted the ministries of his predecessors, but also unversed in the complex political and social struggle that forms the center of the Nazi drive for world dominion. If he had understood its nature, he would not have lent himself to the succession of political compromises which, since before the war began, partly vitiated his wise counsels of military and diplomatic preparation. If he had understood it, he would never have supported Chamberlain's betrayal of Republican Spain. He would, after the war began, have accepted Franco as the open Axis ally that he is and treated Fascist Spain as enemy territory. (Today London dispatches discuss the probability of an early attack on Gibraltar and note that Franco newspapermen are scuttling out of England.) He would have insisted on a consistently vigorous policy toward Vichy on the part of his own government and urged the same attitude in Washington.

He would have understood, above all, that in this international civil struggle a democratic front had to be created as a war measure and held against the political front of fascists and reactionaries. Understanding this, he would have known better how to distinguish friends from foes, at home as well as abroad, and would have realized the demoralizing effect of permitting key posts to be occupied by men whom every democrat distrusts.

And by the same token he would have realized the military value of creating throughout the world a belief that the war against Hitler is, in fact as well as in oratory, a war for freedom. The débâcle of British power in the Far East illustrates the failure of his government to grasp this most elementary political truth. For four years, against odds which Americans and Englishmen can now finally imagine, the Chinese people have successfully grappled with a Japanese army of invasion. The same strategy and the same mechanized weapons that have brought the United States and Britain to the verge of defeat were loosed on China. But China has not been defeated. Instead, it has strengthened its resistance and developed its internal political institutions; and today, if India is to be saved at all, it may be saved only through Chinese intervention. China has held out because it is a self-governing country defending its soil and its freedom.

Suppose India had been free; suppose it had been a self-governing dominion instead of a sullen, unhappy colony. Would Burma today have to depend for its defense on a handful of Australians, a small professional Indian army, and a Chinese expeditionary force? How fantastic to think that Australia, with a total white population of some seven millions, itself threatened with invasion, should be expected to defend the high road to China and the borders of India, while India itself remains aloof, its 350 millions virtually untapped, its leaders bound to an anxious neutrality! The visit of Chiang Kai-shek to India and his conferences with Nehru and other leaders may help to win the reluctant sympathies of the Indian people; but it is a commentary on British leadership that only the personal intervention of China's Generalissimo offers hope of broader cooperation on the part of India. When one recalls that Nehru was held in prison until three days before the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, one is able to measure even more accurately the political sagacity displayed by the British government in dealing with a subject people to whom today it desperately turns for help. This war will not be won until Mr. Churchill and his ministers realize that freedom is a weapon, not a prize for good behavior.

Hope for the future lies not in a sudden awakening of the dead, but in the introduction into the British government of new men who, without loss of face or agony of mind, can institute new policies. One such man is Stafford Cripps. It should not be hard to construct a Cabinet, with Mr. Churchill at its head, that would put new heart into the British people and into democrats everywhere.

But the war is being lost in Washington, too. As we point out editorially on another page, the United States is jointly responsible with Britain for the loss of Singapore. This is one war, not several. And even if the Far East were to be looked upon as a separate battlefield, it is surely ours as much as Britain's or Holland's. Yet apart from MacArthur's magnificent stand on Bataan and the recent naval raid on a group of Japanese islands, American power has yet to make itself felt.

What is wrong with our effort? Is our failure not essentially the same as Britain's—a failure bred of conservatism and complacency coupled with stubborn unawareness of Hitler's purposes?

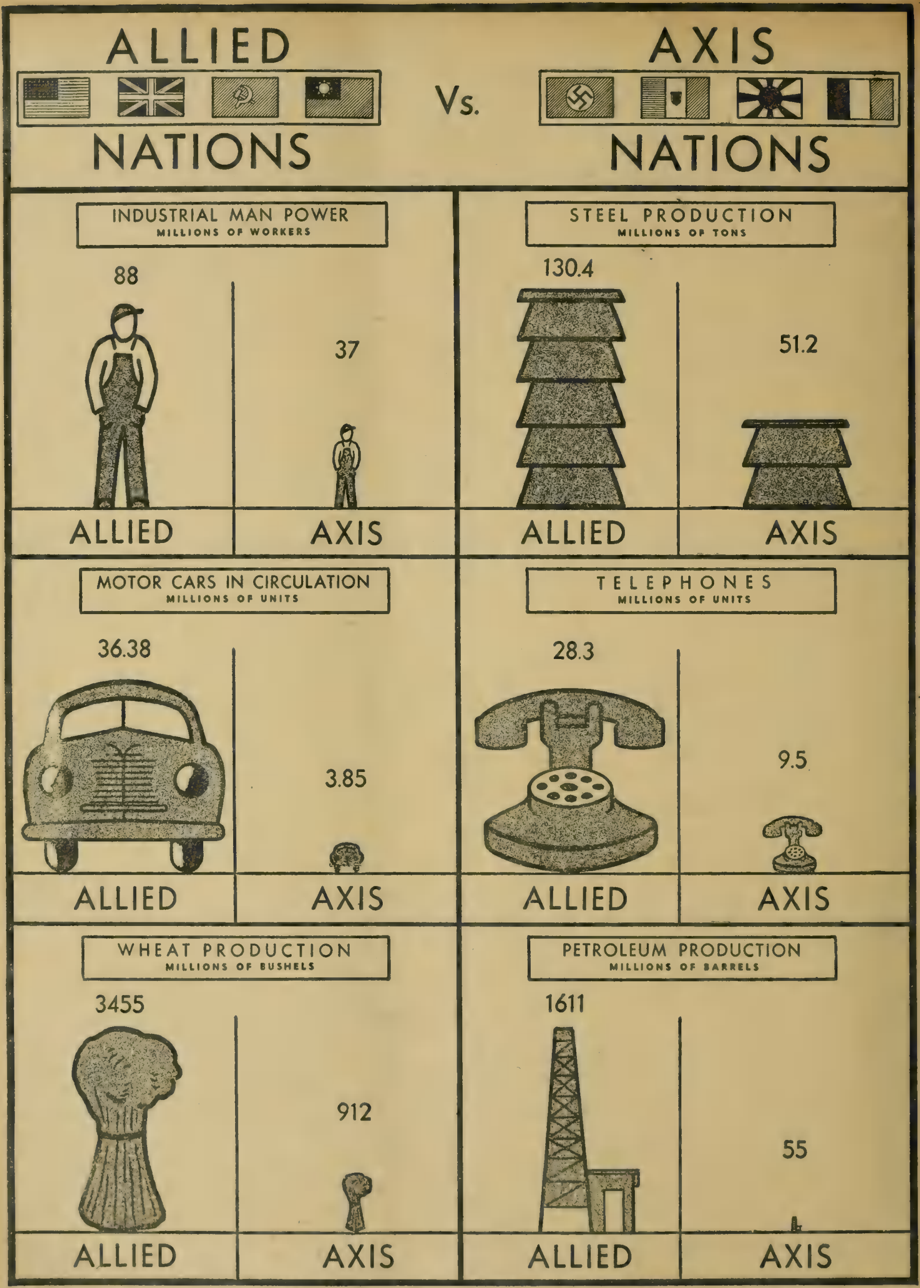
It is useless to repeat again the sorry record of concessions which year after year took the place of resistance, until at last war came on the aggressors' own terms. The record is written in history. Some of it our President has admitted, regretfully. He has several times categorically announced the end of appeasement. But he has not dismissed the men responsible for the failures he cited or forced a change in the policies that failed.

Where is the spirit of fighting, courageous democracy? Has it left Washington for the jungles of the Philippines? Or is it still here, struggling to make itself effective through confusion and politics and intrenched smugness? I know it is here; but it is no exaggeration to say that the key posts, with a few exceptions, are in the hands of men who fear democracy almost as much as they dislike Hitlerism.

The President, in spite of his uneven course in the fight against fascism, has indispensable qualities of leadership and vision. Backed by men who know what the war is about, he can still turn defeat into triumph and confusion into concentrated force. But nothing effective will be done until the appeasers in the State Department—and in other departments and agencies as well—are bundled out of office and replaced by tough democrats with a fierce contempt for tradition and private or party interests.

The tragic fact at this moment is that most of the criticism leveled at the Administration comes from those least qualified and with least right to speak. One can listen with respect to the criticisms and proposals of Wendell Willkie. But the Wheelers and Vandenbergs, who opposed even the inadequate steps taken before Pearl Harbor, who did their best to hamstring defense and promote appeasement—let these men be silent today. Every word they speak is suspect. If the country must choose between the counsels of the isolationists and the efforts, however faltering, of the Administration, it will know where its best hopes lie.

But in Washington, as in London, a reveille must be sounded by those who know what odds we face and what will be the penalties of further retreat. The political forces of democracy must rally, in both capitals, and take over the controls. Before it is too late.



Graph by Pic-S

Raw Materials for Victory

Four Freedoms (Jim Crow)

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Calif.

BY ALVIN E. WHITE

Washington, February 14

WHILE the nation fights an all-out war for the Four Freedoms, little men in Congress and elsewhere are working with insidious persistence to see that these freedoms shall be for whites only. Not only do these men attack the whole concept of nondiscrimination in government, but through control of Congressional appropriations they have succeeded in ousting liberal administrative officials who have sought to translate into reality the democratic policies of the Roosevelt Administration.

To accomplish their ends, this clique of Southern Democrats and reactionary Northern Republicans has developed a definite technique. The chosen victim may have incurred the disfavor of certain Congressmen for any one of a number of reasons. If he is an agency head whose work has in any way improved the status of Negro Americans or threatened the institution of Jim-Crowism, the attack is held in abeyance until the agency stands in need of an appropriation. Then the administrator is assailed in committee meetings and Congressional cloakrooms as a "nigger lover." The real issue need never be mentioned. The agency is given an ultimatum: the victim must go or funds will be withheld.

This technique was used effectively against Clark Foreman, who recently "resigned" his post as Director of the Division of Defense Housing, Federal Works Agency. Foreman, a Georgian, had incurred the wrath of the powerful Southern bloc by his active participation in the attempted "purge" of 1938 and also by his alleged refusal to "cooperate" in the award of defense-housing contracts and the appointment of personnel. A review of his record revealed that Mr. Foreman had long been interested in improving the status of the Negro through the work of the Southern Interracial Commission. He had also worked with the Julius Rosenwald Fund in the South. Because of his experience and interest in this work, he had received an appointment in the Department of the Interior as adviser on the economic status of Negroes early in the New Deal. And while in government service he had committed the unpardonable sin, at one time, of employing a Negro as secretary. All that was needed was a propitious moment for attack.

The occasion was provided when the Lanham bill appropriating an additional $300,000,000 for defense housing came up for final approval by the joint House-Senate conference committee. The Federal Works Agency, through Mr. Foreman's division, had developed a 200-unit housing project for Negro defense workers in Detroit. As the project neared completion, white workers protested against Negro occupancy and demanded the housing for themselves. The protesting whites enlisted the support of Congressman Rudolph Tenerowicz, in whose district the project is located. More responsive to the demands of his white constituents than to the claims of those for whom the project was originally intended, the Congressman carried the protest to Baird Snyder, III, acting FWA administrator, and gained the support of certain Negro-hating members of the conference committee. Mr. Foreman remained adamant and approved a proposal that the project should be named Sojourner Truth Homes, in honor of the slave-born Abolitionist. By wire he instructed the Detroit Housing Committee to proceed with the leasing of dwelling units to Negroes.

The moment was now at hand. Federal Works Agency officials were informed by influential Southern members of the joint conference committee that the $300,000,000 appropriation bill would not be released unless the "nigger lover" was fired and the project converted to white occupancy. Mr. Snyder promptly wired the Detroit Housing Commission to disregard the instructions received from Mr. Foreman three hours earlier. Mr. Foreman "resigned." At the present moment, the homes are completely unoccupied.

A routine speech by Robert C. Weaver, special assistant to Nathan Straus, Administrator of the United States Housing Authority, was used as a smoke screen behind which race-baiting Congressmen succeeded in denying to that agency use of an $800,000,000 development fund. Mr. Weaver's speech, delivered in April, 1940, innocuously pointed out that the government's public-housing program had "made an initial demonstration . . . that the Negro is a responsible tenant in a decent home; and that the two races can live harmoniously together in the same project." At a time when this country was trying to convert the Latin Americans, the majority of whom are not white, into good neighbors, various Representatives were alarmed at the prospect of Negro and white families living as good neighbors in slum clearance projects—even in New York City and Chicago. As a consequence the bill was not allowed to pass, and the USHA has not since received any funds for slum clearance. This year the crusade was carried farther. The House refused to approve funds for the development of defense housing by the USHA until assured of the resignation of Mr. Straus. Now Straus is out, and Weaver has been transferred to another agency.

The same Southerners, often operating behind a "front" of Northerners with few Negro constituents, are determined to maintain Jim-Crowism in government and to restrict participation of Negroes in responsible positions. The attack on Martin Carpenter, Director of the United States Employment Service, is a case in point. In keeping with the spirit of President Roosevelt's order banning discrimination, Carpenter attempted to consolidate the two Employment Service offices in Washington, and to abolish the Jim Crowe office which had failed to offer equal opportunities to Negro job-seekers. His proposal brought immediate protests from Southern Congressmen. Carpenter was supported by his administrative superior, Ewan Clague, Director of the Bureau of Employment Security. Before the consolidation could be effected, however, the annual Social Security Board appropriation came before Congress, and it is alleged that Chairman Arthur J. Altmeyer was brusquely informed that the allocation would be held up indefinitely unless the project were abandoned. The appropriation was finally approved, but the separate employment offices have had to be maintained.

The following excerpt from the hearings before the House Appropriations Subcommittee on the Independent Offices Appropriation Bill for 1943 is enlightening:

> REPRESENTATIVE RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH (R., Mass.): Now, have you a racial-relations setup?
>
> JOHN EDY (Executive Assistant and Budget Officer, FWA): We have a man on racial relations identified with the Personnel Division. . . .
>
> REPRESENTATIVE JOE STARNES (D., Alabama): Why was that necessary?
>
> MR. EDY: It seemed to the Administrator to be desirable in view of the fact there were claims of race discrimination, especially against Negroes, and this racial-relations person is a Negro and very competent. . . .
>
> MR. WIGGLESWORTH: I confess I do not see why we need racial-relations setups in all of these agencies. We have never had them before; we have always handled it on the American plan.
>
> MR. STARNES: I think . . . they are put in there to promote . . . the idea that racial discrimination is being practiced. . . . I think it is spotlighting something, and these people are special pleaders. . . .

Recently seventy-three leaders of Negro organizations met in New York City to discuss morale and felt obliged to recognize the fact that as a result of such attacks and discrimination Negroes are not "all-out 100 per cent" for the war. As Pearl Buck recently said, "The colored American, thanks to an education in democracy, really wants to see his country a democracy. . . . He has grown up a good deal since the World War. He is willing to fight and die again, but not for something he does not possess anyway."

Jews After the War

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

I

THE position of the Jews in Europe and the Western world is by no means the least of the many problems of post-war reconstruction which must engage our minds even while our energies are being exhausted in achieving the prerequisite of any reconstruction, that is, the defeat of the Axis. It is idle to assume that this defeat will solve the problem of the Jews; indeed, the overthrow of Nazism will provide no more than the negative condition for the solution of any of the vexing problems of justice which disturb our consciences.

Millions of Jews have been completely disinherited, and they will not be able to obtain the automatic restoration of their rights. An impoverished Europe will not find it easy to reabsorb a large number of returned Jews, and a spiritually corrupted Europe will not purge itself quickly of the virus of race bigotry with which the Nazis have infected its culture. It must also be remembered that the plight of the Jews was intolerable in those parts of Europe which represented a decadent feudalism—Poland and the Balkans—long before Hitler made their lot impossible in what was once the democratic world.

The problem of what is to become of the Jews in the post-war world ought to engage all of us, not only because a suffering people has a claim upon our compassion but because the very quality of our civilization is involved in the solution. It is, in fact, a scandal that the Jews have had so little effective aid from the rest of us in a situation in which they are only the chief victims. The Nazis intend to decimate the Poles and to reduce other peoples to the status of helots; but they are bent upon the extermination of the Jews.

One probable reason for the liberal world's failure to be more instant in its aid to the Jews is that we cannot face the full dimensions of this problem without undermining the characteristic credos of the democratic world. Even the Jews are loath to bring the problem to our attention in all its tragic depth. We will not face it because we should be overwhelmed by a sense of guilt in contemplating those aspects of the problem which Hitler did not create but only aggravated. Some Jews have refused to face it in dread of having to recognize that the solutions provided by the liberal Jewish world have failed to reach the depths of the problem.

The liberal world has sought to dissolve the prejudice between Jews and Gentiles by preaching tolerance and good-will. Friends of the Jews have joined the Jews in seeking to persuade their detractors that the charges against them are lies. But this does not meet the real issue. The real question is, why should these lies be manufactured and why should they be believed? Every cultural or racial group has its own characteristic vices and virtues. When a minority group is hated for its virtues as well as for its vices, and when its vices are hated not so much because they are vices as because they bear the stamp of uniqueness, we are obviously dealing with a collective psychology which is not easily altered by a little more enlightenment. The fact is that the relations of cultural and ethnic groups, intra-national or international, have complexities unknown in the relations between individuals, in whom intelligence may dissolve group loyalties and the concomitant evil of group friction.

American theories of tolerance in regard to race are based upon a false universalism which in practice develops into a new form of nationalism. The fact that America has actually been a melting-pot in which a new amalgam of races is being achieved has given rise to the illusion that racial and ethnic distinction can be transcended in history to an indeterminate degree. Russian nationalism has the same relation to Marxist universalism as American nationalism has to liberal universalism. There is a curious, partly unconscious, cultural imperialism in theories of tolerance which look forward to a complete destruction of all racial distinctions. The majority group expects to devour the minority group by way of assimilation. This is a painless death, but it is death nevertheless.

The collective will to survive of those ethnic groups in America which have a base in another homeland is engaged and expressed in their homeland and need not express itself here, where an amalgam of races is taking place. The Finns need not seek to perpetuate themselves in America, for their collective will to live is expressed in Finland. But the Jews are in a different position. Though as an ethnic group they have maintained some degree of integrity for thousands of years, they are a nationality scattered among the nations. Does the liberal-democratic world fully understand that it is implicitly making collective extinction the price of its provisional tolerance?

This question implies several affirmations which are challenged by both Jewish and Gentile liberals; it is therefore important to make these affirmations explicit and to elaborate them. One is that the Jews are really a nationality and not merely a cultural group. Certainly the Jews have maintained a core of racial integrity through the ages. This fact is not disproved by the assertion that their blood is considerably mixed. There are no pure races. History develops new configurations on the bases of nature, but not in such a way as to transcend completely the natural distinctions. Who would deny that the Germans have a collective will to live, or think that this simple statement can be refuted by calling attention to the admixture of Slav blood in people of German nationality?

The integrity of the Jews as a group is of course not purely biological; it has also a religious and cultural basis. But in this Jews are not unique, for there are no purely biological facts in history. The cultural and religious content of Jewish life transcends racial particularity, as does the culture of every people, though never so absolutely as to annihilate its own ethnic core. The one aspect of Jewish life which is unique is that the Jews are a nationality scattered among the nations. I use the word "nationality" to indicate something more than "race" and something less than "nation." It is more than race by reason of the admixture of culture and less than nation by reason of the absence of a state. The Jews certainly are a nationality by reason of the ethnic core of their culture. Those Jews who do not feel themselves engaged by a collective will to live have a perfect right to be so disengaged, just as Americans of French or Greek descent need feel no responsibility for the survival of their respective nationalities. But Jews render no service either to democracy or to their people by seeking to deny this ethnic foundation of their life, or by giving themselves to the illusion that they might dispel all prejudice if only they could prove that they are a purely cultural or religious community.

The fact that millions of Jews are quite prepared to be spurlos versenkt, to be annihilated, in a process of assimilation must affect the program of the democratic world for dealing with the Jewish question. The democratic world must accord them this privilege, including of course the right to express the ethos of their history in purely cultural and religious terms, in so far as this is possible, without an ethnic base. The democratic world must resist the insinuation that the Jews are not assimilable, particularly when the charge is made in terms of spurious friendship, as it is by Albert Jay Nock. They are not only assimilable but they have added to the riches of a democratic world by their ethnic and cultural contributions. Civilization must guard against the tendency of all communities to demand a too simple homogeneity, for if this is allowed complete expression it results in Nazi tribal primitivism. The preservation of tolerance and cultural pluralism is necessary not only from the standpoint of justice to the Jews but from the standpoint of the quality of a civilization.

The assimilability of the Jews and their right to be assimilated are not in question; this conviction must prompt one-half of the program of the democratic world, the half which consists in maintaining and extending the standards of tolerance and cultural pluralism achieved in a liberal era. But there is another aspect of the Jewish problem which is not met by this strategy. That is the simple right of the Jews to survive as a people. There are both Jews and Gentiles who deny that the Jews have such a survival impulse as an ethnic group, but the evidence of contemporary history refutes them, as does the evidence of all history in regard to the collective impulses of survival in life generally. Modern liberalism has been blind to this aspect of human existence because its individualist and universalist presuppositions and illusions have prevented it from seeing some rather obvious facts in man's collective life.

One proof of the Jews' will to survive is, of course, that they have survived the many vicissitudes of their history. They have survived in spite of the fact that they have been a nationality scattered among the nations, without a homeland of their own, since the dawn of Western European history. They are a people of the diaspora. Modern assimilationists on both sides sometimes suggest that the survival of the Jews through the centuries was determined on the one hand by the hostility of the feudal world and on the other by the toughness of an orthodox religious faith; and they suggest that the liberal era has dissipated both the external and the internal basis of this survival. They assume that the liberal ideals of tolerance are infinitely extensible and that the breaking of the hard shell of a traditional religious unity will destroy the internal will to live.

The violent nationalism of our period proves the error of the first assumption. While we need not believe that Nazism or even a milder form of national bigotry will set the social and political standards of the future, it is apparent that collective particularities and vitalities have a more stubborn life than liberal universalism had assumed. The error of the second has been proved by the Jews themselves. For Zionism is the expression of a national will to live which transcends the traditional orthodox religion of the Jews. It is supported by many forces in Jewish life, not the least of which is an impressive proletarian impulse. Poor Jews recognize that privileged members of their Jewish community may have achieved such a secure position in the Western world that they could hardly be expected to sacrifice it for a Zionist venture. But they also see that for the great multitude of Jews there is no escape from the hardships a nationality scattered among the nations must suffer. They could, if they would, be absorbed in the Western world. Or they could, if they desired, maintain their racial integrity among the various nations. But they know that the price which must be paid for such survival is high. They know from their own experience that collective prejudice is not as easily dissolved as some of their more favored brothers assume.

These poorer Jews understand, out of their experience, what is frequently withheld from the more privileged—namely, that the bigotry of majority groups toward minority groups which affront the majority by diverging from the dominant type is a perennial aspect of man's collective life. The force of it may be mitigated, but it cannot be wholly eliminated. These Jews, therefore, long for a place on the earth where they are not "tolerated," where they are neither "understood" nor misunderstood, neither appreciated nor condemned, but where they can be what they are, preserving their own unique identity without asking "by your leave" of anyone else.

It is this understanding of a basic human situation on the part of the less privileged portion of the Jewish community which has given Zionism a particular impetus. There are of course individuals in the more privileged groups who make common cause with the less privileged because they have the imagination to see what their more intellectualist brothers have not seen. But on the whole Zionism represents the wisdom of common experience as against the wisdom of the mind, which tends to take premature flights into the absolute or the universal from the tragic conflicts and the stubborn particularities of human history.

The second part of any program for the solution of the Jewish problem must rest upon the recognition that a collective survival impulse is as legitimate a "right" as an individual one. Justice, in history, is concerned with collective, as well as with individual, rights. Recognition of the legitimacy of this right must lead, in my opinion, to a more generous acceptance of the Zionist program as correct in principle, however much it may have to be qualified in application.

The Jewish religionists, the Jewish and Gentile secularists, and the Christian missionaries to the Jews have, despite the contradictory character of their various approaches, one thing in common. They would solve the problem of the particularity of a race by a cultural or religious universalism. This is a false answer if the universal character of their culture or religion demands the destruction of the historical—in this case racial—particularism. It is just as false as if the command "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" were interpreted to mean that I must destroy myself so that no friction may arise between my neighbor and myself.

The author, who happens to be a Christian theologian, may be permitted the assertion, as a postscriptum, that he has his own ideas about the relation of the Christian to the Jewish religion. But he regards all religious and cultural answers to the Jewish problem which do not take basic ethnic facts into consideration as the expressions of either a premature universalism or a conscious or unconscious ethnic imperialism.

[In a second article Dr. Niebuhr will discuss a twofold solution for the problem of anti-Semitism.]

Guns for Europe's Guerrillas

BY H. A. DeWEERD

WHILE most facile comparisons between the careers of Napoleon and Hitler are invalid and misleading, there are some that can be drawn with great profit at the present stage of the world crisis. Amid our rejoicing over Hitler's reverses in Russia, it would be well to remember that the disastrous campaign of 1812 was not alone responsible for Napoleon's downfall. A far greater if less spectacular contribution to that result was the fact that Europe turned the forces released by the French Revolution against him. The most important of these was nationalism. Generated in the Revolution and brought to full development under the empire, the spirit of nationalism made Napoleon's armies invincible on countless battlefields. At length it made the armies of his enemies equally formidable. Under its influence the Spanish rabble fought heroically; Prussians rose from the humiliation of Jena with new strength and spirit. In the end French bayonets were not sufficiently numerous or Napoleon's genius sufficiently versatile to overcome the aroused nationalism of Europe's conquered peoples. The time is now approaching when the revolutionary implications and techniques of Hitler's system must in like manner be turned against the Nazi conqueror.

A great measure of Hitler's astounding military success has been due to the fact that he is making use of a military-revolutionary movement. Allied efforts to combat the appeals of National Socialism early in the war by a half-hearted propaganda program—not based on an impressive military position—were as ineffective as the effort to deal with Hitler by orthodox military methods. Up to the beginning of the Russian counter-offensive of December, 1941, the Reich was not only "blockade-proof"; it was "propaganda-proof" as well. When the hitherto invincible Wehrmacht was defeated in front of Moscow, the Reich's immunity to psychological attack ended. It remained for the United States, however, to provide the final material basis for a successful counter-revolution against Hitler by framing a program of military production which assures his final defeat.

There has been a great deal of talk about freeing the victims of Nazi conquests, but no one has come forward with a definite program. The proposals advanced in this article may have their flaws, but the urgency of the situation justifies their presentation. The conquered peoples of Europe constitute a vast untapped reservoir of military power. Ways and means of sustaining their hopes, of arming them, and of employing them in direct military operations when the state of Allied preparations and Axis exhaustion permits an invasion of the continent of Europe should be one of the prime concerns of Allied grand strategy.

A revolt of the conquered countries could not possibly succeed alone; it must be timed to coincide with an Allied invasion of the Continent. The formulation of plans for utilizing this huge army, now without weapons or banners, will call for great elasticity of mind on the part of our military staffs and our State Department, but the advantages to be won are incalculable. All timidity and half-measures, all conventional textbook ideas, must be ruthlessly cast aside. If the Allied military leaders try to conduct a formal invasion of Europe in the textbook manner without benefit of a major strategical surprise or without utilizing every potential ally, we shall probably have to pay for each inch of liberated ground on something like the scale of our losses in the First World War. Mere superiority in planes and tanks will not bring immediate and decisive results; in fighting Germans the maximum attention must be paid to out-thinking them. Utilization of the conquered peoples of Europe in an invasion program holds the promise of a major military surprise.

How can the discouraged Europeans be shown that they have a part to play in their own liberation? How can the fires of their resistance be kept burning? Fortunately the Germans have provided the background for a successful counter-revolution by their treatment of the conquered peoples. Had the mercifully swift strokes of the victorious Wehrmacht in Poland, Holland, Belgium, France, Norway, Greece, and Yugoslavia been followed by an intelligent program of decent treatment for the conquered areas, the beaten men of Europe might have allowed their admiration for the brilliant planning, bold execution, and harsh efficiency of the Nazi war machine to rise above their hatred for the conqueror. But the stupidity, cruelty, and rapacity of the Gestapo-controlled occupational authorities removed this possibility. Instead, there arose the kind of desperate anger which has prompted an endless record of forlorn-hope assassinations and acts of violence. The peoples of occupied Europe have come to recognize that "peace" in the traditional sense of the word is impossible if the military revolution of National Socialism prevails. We must be prepared to exploit this conviction by arming the forces of counter-revolution against Hitler.

The technique of distributing weapons can be determined later. The essential requirement now is that the United States and Great Britain decide on the main outlines of the program. The following articles of agreement would cover the principles involved:

1. The United States and Great Britain jointly recognize that a state of war exists in the conquered areas of Europe.

2. The United States and Great Britain will undertake to distribute weapons on a scale great enough to insure the effectiveness of an uprising in conjunction with the invasion of the Continent.

3. The United States and Great Britain will recognize as members of an army of freedom all persons in the occupied areas who accept the weapons delivered.

4. Plans for the employment of these weapons in the most effective manner will be worked out and communicated to the occupied areas by radio and pamphlets.

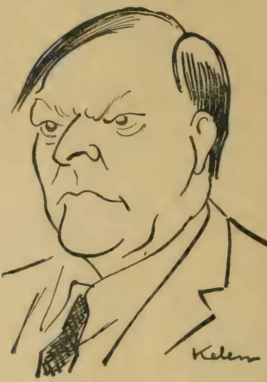
5. The men who accept these weapons will provide themselves with an identifying symbol to constitute the "uniform" of the army of freedom.

6. If Axis governments refuse to recognize such men captured in the course of military operations as bona fide members of an army and execute them summarily as armed civilians, adequate reprisal executions of Nazi officials, officers, prisoners, and agents will be carried out.

Though the main military advantages of this plan will not be attained until the time for the invasion of the Continent arrives, its adoption will bring great secondary advantages immediately. The period between the announcement of the program and its execution can be utilized for more systematic psychological attacks on the Nazis than the present ineffectual and sporadic attempts to undermine enemy morale. The air waves of Europe can be filled with talk of the arms-distribution plan, the certainty of freedom for the oppressed peoples, and the inevitable retribution to fall upon the Nazis. It must be repeated endlessly that this is a people's movement to restore freedom to Europe. The enemy must be told everything about the program except when it is to be put into effect. For the first time the war of nerves will thus be turned against the Nazis; it will grow in intensity as Allied military production increases and Axis reverses occur.

When the time for invasion comes, no German company will march through a forest, no platoon will move through a village, without fear; no sentry will feel safe. Quislings will be terrorized. Soldiers at the front will feel that every possible route of retreat may be filled with murderous surprises.

The weapons supplied must be simple enough for untrained persons to operate and effective enough, when employed with surprise and stealth, to give the men operating them temporary equality with German soldiers. The rifle does not possess the shock power required. The ideal arms for counter-revolution are the submachine-gun and the high-power fragmentation grenade. Both are relatively simple to manufacture, easy to operate, and deadly at close range. Both are essentially weapons of surprise. The physical courage and effectiveness of a man armed with a submachine-gun is roughly four times that of a man armed with a rifle. The high-power fragmentation grenade is admirably suited for attacking troop formations in city streets. The present rate of manufacture of these two weapons in the United States alone gives promise that at least fifty thousand submachine-guns and a million or two grenades could be allocated for this program without embarrassing the major military plans of the Allies.



Vidkun Quisling

The arms to be furnished can be fully described in radio broadcasts. Simple instructions in their use accompanied by charts and diagrams showing methods of effective employment under given circumstances can be given in pamphlets. The rest can be left to the men who will get the weapons. They can pass the long hours of waiting by perfecting traps for the conquerors. They can work out plans for exploiting their familiarity with the ground. They can make certain that arms are given only to reliable men and that the Quislings are the first to die. The liquidation of Nazi agents and local Quislings will contribute to the breakdown of the German system of control in the conquered areas and place additional strain on the German supply and transport system. For the first time since their defeat the men of subject Europe will be able to do something more useful than secretly scrawling V's on the walls of darkened houses.

The airplane must be used to distribute most of the weapons, although the ability shown by the British commando parties to land at various points on the coast of Europe may suggest other ways of handling the problem. The places where arms are to be landed can be worked out with the advice of the governments-in-exile, which know the sentiments of the population. Since their distribution must not be allowed to weaken the military air power of the main Allied movement to which the whole plan is ancillary, non-military or obsolete aircraft and civilian pilots must be employed. There were some 17,000 certified private planes and 63,000 licensed civilian pilots in the United States on January 1, 1941. The number has increased since that time, and a civilian air corps of 20,000 pilots is in process of formation. This pool of non-military pilots should be able to provide the men required to fly ten thousand weapon-carrying planes into the occupied areas of Europe when the time for the invasion arrives. If each plane carried five submachine-guns and from twenty to fifty grenades, the transportation problem would be solved.

At present Britain is the only base from which such planes can operate, but the situation may change. Holland, Belgium, and northern France are within range of private planes based on Britain—Corrigan made his non-stop trip to Ireland in such a plane. Norway, which offers unusual promise of effective cooperation on the part of the population, is within range of obsolete bombers and transport planes operating from Iceland. Yugoslavia is outside the range of private planes or obsolete bombers, but it would be worth while to sacrifice a few heavy bombers in order to transport weapons to the bold and rebellious Serbs. In fact, members of the British Middle East command have recently advocated this kind of aid to Serb guerrillas. Some losses will have to be anticipated, but the percentage of deliveries should be fairly high. By the time the program is launched it can be operated under an "umbrella" of Allied military air power. With the enemy concentrating his anti-aircraft fire on attacking planes, the widely dispersed flights of small carriers should enjoy relative immunity.

The diversion created by Lawrence in Arabia is said to have saved the lives of thousands of Allenby's soldiers. And even if the plan for distributing weapons in Europe is only partially successful, it will save many thousands of lives in the Allied armies. But there are other immediate if less tangible results to be attained. The mere adoption of a plan for the distribution of weapons for use in conjunction with a future invasion of Europe will have immense political repercussions. Wavering agents of Vichy, for example, will hardly dare risk further concessions to Hitler if they know that some day large numbers of Frenchmen will have dangerous weapons in their hands. The men of Vichy may have misread some of the lessons of history, but they cannot be ignorant of the relentlessness with which the men of the Revolution hunted down those of their countrymen whom they identified as enemies of liberty.

It does not matter much what plan for arming the anti-Nazi revolution is adopted, but it is imperative that a decision as to policy be taken without delay. We have heard the tragic words "too late" repeated after a dozen heart-breaking Allied failures. Here is one field in which there is still time to act.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

War Profits for Railroads

IMMEDIATELY after the settlement of the railroad wage dispute last December, a petition was filed with the Interstate Commerce Committee by the railroad companies asking permission to increase both passenger and freight rates, with certain exceptions, by 10 per cent. They had been encouraged to take this step by the report of the Emergency Fact-finding Board appointed by the President in connection with the wage dispute. "We feel obliged to say," this body declared, "that our recommended increases in railroad wages have been made on the assumption that the railroads can secure needed relief from resulting inadequate net revenues by obtaining permission to increase their transportation rates."

In making their request to the ICC the railroads estimated that their increased wage bill would be about $312,000,000 annually, and they also stressed rising material costs and the expense of precautionary measures against sabotage. On the basis of 1941 traffics they calculated that the 10 per cent increase in rates would roughly cover these additional charges. Acting with unusual celerity, the ICC has already granted the desired revision in passenger fares, and it is expected shortly to give its blessing to a 6 or 7 per cent rise in freight rates.

The increase in passenger fares has not gone unprotested by the traveling public, and a rise in freight rates will probably produce still more criticism. It is not surprising, therefore, that the Eastern railroads have been buying considerable advertising space in the newspapers in order to put their case before their customers. Their story dwells heavily on the increase in labor and other costs, stresses the huge capital outlay required to meet war demands for transport, and winds up by pointing out that the increase in fares is only a fraction of a cent per mile, which reminds me of the extenuating circumstance urged by the girl who produced an unauthorized baby: "After all, it's only a very little one." Ten per cent means quite a lot to commuters caught between fixed incomes and rising living costs. The railroads' argument is illustrated by a chart showing that the new coach fares are 39 per cent less than during the depression years. Is it, I wonder, altogether tactful to remind the public that from 1929 to 1936, when so many people's incomes were depleted, when prices of all unmonopolized goods and services were tumbling headlong, the railroads blithely held fares at the level of the mad twenties? It was a policy with a sharp recoil, for it gave the long-distance buses a chance to provide the rails with a real competitive headache.

Now war has soothed them with an undeserved aspirin, although mention of this fact is not considered good taste by railroad spokesmen, who prefer to talk about the burdens rather than the benefits of war. But these benefits are very definite and substantial. Rail revenues are always closely linked to the index of industrial production, now at an all-time high. And traffics are being enlarged still further by the operation of additional war factors. For instance, the shortage of shipping has meant that goods formerly sent from coast to coast by sea are being routed by rail. Again, normally the flow of goods is heaviest from west to east, involving an expense in sending empties back to California. Now the growth of armament industries on the West Coast provides profitable round trips. Another added source of revenue is troop movements—all the more profitable because of the recent abolition of land-grant rates for government traffic. Then there is the rubber shortage, which is deterring millions of motorists from using their cars for trips which can be made by rail, and may soon curtail bus and truck competition.

The fact is, the railroads have all the traffic in sight that they can possibly handle; perhaps more, for in 1940, when it was easier to buy new equipment, railroad executives were shortsightedly deprecating the possibility of a strain on the transport system. Today Joseph B. Eastman, Director of Defense Transportation, has warned that priorities for passengers will be necessary, and a shortage of freight cars may develop later this year.

Capacity or near-capacity operations for the railroads mean an increase in net profits far greater proportionately than the increase in gross revenues. The more intensive use of equipment means a thinning out of fixed charges, which form so large a fraction of total rail expenses, so that while receipts from passengers and freight rise, costs per passenger-mile or per ton-mile decline. The experience of the New York Central last year illustrates this point. Freight revenues rose 24.6 per cent in comparison with 1940, passenger revenues 12.3 per cent, and gross revenues 20.8 per cent. But after higher operating and maintenance costs and much bigger tax charges were met, net operating revenues increased 30.7 per cent, and net income per share of capital stock jumped from $1.75 to $4.09.

Reports from 135 Class I railroads showed an estimated aggregate net income in 1941 of $500,545,071, which was more than two and a half times the profit earned in 1940. These results were achieved by increasing gross revenue by not much over 25 per cent. It is true that this prosperity was not entirely evenly spread, for 28 Class I roads were still unable to earn full interest and rentals. But most of the big roads did very well indeed and were able either to decrease their indebtedness or increase their dividends, or both.

For 1942 rail prospects are bright. During the first five weeks of the year carloadings increased by 11.7 per cent despite the slowing down of the automobile and other consumer industries. Later in the year, when conversion to war production becomes fully effective, a still greater increase in freight traffics seems certain. Provided that the ICC complies with the railroads' request for higher freight rates and thus takes care of their increased wage and other costs, profits will surely make another leap forward. And since transport charges enter into practically all costs, a new inflationary influence will be operating.

Spokesmen for the industry may say: "Well, what of it? Haven't the railroads suffered enough since 1930? Isn't it time they put on a little fat to compensate for the lean years?" The answer to that is that the objective of this war is not to compensate anyone for past deprivations. On the contrary, it is high time we started tightening our belts instead of expanding our corporations.

In the Wind

WASHINGTON DEBUTANTES last week gave a party to raise funds for various civilian organizations aiding the war effort. One of their number gave a talk on the problems they faced and ended her oration on this militant note: "And let us always," she said, "remember Bar Harbor!"

THREE BOOKS by George Sylvester Viereck, who is now under indictment as a Nazi agent, will be reprinted this spring by Gold Label Books of New York.

THE FAMOUS street-corner racks from which the people of Baltimore were accustomed to get their newspapers are no longer being used. The Sunpapers, which owned the devices, fired the crew that operated them after the Wage-Hour Board informed the publishers that their employment standards would have to be raised.

AMERICA FIRST still keeps its Chicago headquarters open. Reporters visiting the offices in the Board of Trade Building have been unable to learn precisely what business the committee is now engaged in, but most of the old staff is on hand and some committee officials can still be reached by telephone at the office.

THE AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY is so sensitive to charges that it impeded the defense program in the pre-Pearl Harbor days that it is sponsoring a huge publicity campaign to clear itself. Dozens of the country's leading journalists have been visiting Detroit in the past three weeks at the invitation of the Automobile Manufacturers' Association. Reprints of dispatches by these correspondents have been distributed daily by the association to all newspapers, sometimes as many as fifteen stories being sent out in one mailing.

THOMAS R. AMLIE, former Congressman from Wisconsin, has been appointed Washington representative of the Union for Democratic Action. Amlie, whose office will serve as a clearing-house for non-government liberals in Washington, was one of the leaders of the La Follette Progressives before the present war and was at one time head of the Farmer-Labor Federation. He split with the La Follette group two years ago on the issue of American intervention in the war, which he supported.

FROM A RECENT ISSUE of the London Times: "Every effort should be made to keep sport going in this country on as big a scale as possible, for if there is to be no sport there will be no results to send out to our poor fellows in Germany, many of whom probably do not yet know that Owen Tudor won the New Derby at Newmarket."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Native at Large

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

For the Duration

A GOOD many people are saying goodby these days—and certainly mine is not the most difficult farewell. But it is bad enough. I have been happy on this page. I don't want to leave it. I have been aware that it has been a sort of country product in the company of the intellectual and the erudite. I would not have had it otherwise. I wanted to be a "native at large." But in such company, if I was not always wise, I was always free. I said what I wanted to say. I hope I may have said some things that needed to be said. And there are still so many things—there always will be so many things—that need to be said, in freedom, in America.

A man about to try to do a job in this great business which is still too often and too softly called defense can be surer that America is worth defending because it contains such free journals for the free mind as The Nation. Maybe the best place for a man who wants to be a patriot without trimmings in this emergency is on such a page. I am still not sure that I cannot do more at a typewriter than at a defense desk. But choices have to be made. I chose Washington. But I should like to make it clear in departure that I am not claiming any credit for making a sacrifice. I am going to do a job I want to do, even if I want to do it because I believe in this country. I am not going into danger or dramatics. I hope I am not going to be a bureaucrat in that Washington I have so often reported on this page as too big and bewildering. I still find it big and bewildering. The first four nights I spent in Washington I slept in four different beds. I have not yet eaten a meal at the same table twice. I'm not in Washington as one of those dollar-a-year men I've inveighed against on this page. I'm going as a working man with a chance to take part in the work most worth doing in my lifetime in America. As far as I am concerned, it is the only job on earth.

I believe the work I am going to have a chance to help with—the volunteer services of Americans in defense of America—is important. Indeed, I feel that the entirely non-military functions of civilian defense may grow more important as the months go by. Last year, as a nation, we bought more consumers' goods than were ever before produced in America, or in any other country. That is the best indicator I know that we were still rich and getting fatter in a world at war. In such a year it was hard to make it apparent that savings in terms of people or materials meant patriotism. Civilian defense seemed appealing only in the limited terms of the work of the air-raid wardens, filter-center workers, and fire fighters. We shall soon begin another year, with an income tax which digs down deeper than ever before into the pockets of taxpayers. We have begun to have rationing and shall have more, as both consumers and salesmen are beginning to discover. But if times become tougher, as war times are expected to be, they may teach us also that in total war that civilian service is greatest which saves the most hands and resources to throw into total aggressive war. The civilians in the air-raid services which seemed so dramatic last year may have to wait a long time for air raids. We can hope so. The rest of us cannot delay the activities which will make it possible for us to save materials and man-power and turn them into the strength which will support our determination on victory. The undramatic services and sacrifices add up to the dramatic hope of success in total war.

I believe in the certainty of that success. I believe in it because I have no doubts about the quality of America. But I want to get out of government as soon as we are successfully out of war. It is not a little thing to me that success will mean a chance for a man to write on a free page such as mine has been in The Nation. I hope I can come back to it. Indeed, Freda Kirchwey has been good enough to suggest that I continue writing it from Washington. But I know she agrees with me that, even for such a bureaucrat as I may turn out to be in Washington, this is not a part-time war to be worked at in part-time jobs. Indeed, it seems to me to be the one job of any importance to us all.

Even if I cannot come back to the full freedom given me on this page, at least I have had it. For some twenty months I have had a chance to have my say. I have had my chance in America, too. It has not been a perfect America. In it trooped people who found it a long way from perfection. It has plenty of faults now not to be neglected in the midst of war. I do not expect America to be perfect even when we shall have made that best possible peace after victory. I do not expect us to reach the ideal even with mechanized equipment produced according to the best American standards of production. But America as it is now is still worth all we've got to give. I'm hoping—along with more Americans than any of us can count—that what I've got will be worth something to that America.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE END OF THE LINE

BY RANDALL JARRELL

WHAT has impressed everyone about modernist poetry is its differentness. The familiar and rather touching "I like poetry—but not modern poetry" is only another way of noticing what almost all criticism has emphasized: the violent separation between modernist poetry and the essentially romantic poetry of the preceding hundred years. This separation was enough to discredit modernist poetry with "conventional" poets, critics, and readers, who were satisfied with romantic poetry; and more "advanced" poets and critics—who usually disliked romanticism with all the fervor of converts—were delighted to find modernist poetry as different as possible from romantic poetry. "Romantic," once again, after almost two centuries, became a term of derogation; correspondingly, there grew up a rather blank cult of the "classical," and poets like Eliot began to hint that they were the new classicism for which we—or perhaps I should say they—had been impatiently searching.

In this essay I want to develop a different theory of the relationship of modernist and romantic poetry. But if the reader understands me to be using "romantic" as an unfavorably weighted term, most of what I say will be badly distorted. A good many romantic tendencies seem to me bad ones, and some of the better tendencies, if exaggerated enough, become vicious; but a great deal of the best poetry I know is romantic. Of course, one can say almost that about neo-classicism, metaphysical poetry, modernism, or most other tendencies in English poetry; if the reader brings up that superior tendency, classicism, let me answer that I have never heard of two people who could agree on any English "classical" tradition. It is not strange that any real movement, compared with this wax monster, comes off nowhere; but it is strange that anyone should take the comparison for a real one. I shall pay more attention to unfortunate or exaggerated romantic tendencies because these are the most characteristic: the "good" tendencies of movements are far more alike than the "bad" ones; a proof that two movements are essentially similar needs to show that their bad or exaggerated tendencies resemble each other. People often condemn critics for using terms like "romantic" or "neo-classic"; but this is like condemning them for having legs instead of wheels.

Modernist poetry—the poetry of Pound, Eliot, Crane, Tate, Stevens, Cummings, Moore, MacLeish, et cetera—appears to be and is generally considered to be a violent break with romanticism; it is actually, I believe, an extension of romanticism, an end-product in which most of the tendencies of romanticism have been carried to their limits. Romanticism—whether considered as the product of a whole culture or, in isolation, as a purely literary phenomenon—is necessarily a process of extension, a vector; it presupposes a constant experimentalism, the indefinite attainment of "originality," generation after generation, primarily by the novel extrapolation of previously exploited processes. (Neo-classicism, in theory at least, is a static system.) All these romantic tendencies are exploited to their limits; and the movement which carries out this final exploitation, apparently so different from earlier stages of the same process, is what we call modernism. Then, at last, romanticism is confronted with an impasse, a critical point, a genuinely novel situation that it can meet successfully only by contriving genuinely novel means—that is, means that are essentially non-romantic; the romantic means have already been exhausted. Until these new means are found (they have not been, and I am reluctant to imply that they can be found, at will, without the social changes that are their concomitant), romanticism operates by repeating its last modernist successes or by reverting to its earlier stages; but its normal development has ended, and—the momentum that gave it most of its attraction gone—it becomes a relatively eclectic system, much closer to neo-classicism than it has hitherto been. (A few of these last romanticists actually go over into neo-classicism). If this account seems odd or unlikely to the reader, let me remind him that the same course of development is extremely plain in modern music.

A good many factors combine to conceal the essentially romantic character of modernist poetry. 1. A great quantitative change looks like a qualitative one: for instance, the attenuation or breaking-up of form characteristic of romanticism will not be recognized or tolerated by the average romantic when it reaches its limit in modernist poetry. 2. The violent contrast between the modernist limits of romantic tendencies and the earlier stages of these tendencies, practiced belatedly and eclectically by "conventional" poets, is an important source of confusion. 3. Most of the best modern criticism of poetry is extremely anti-romantic—a poet's criticism is frequently not a reflection of but a compensation for his own poetry; and this change in theory has helped to hide the lack of any essential change in practice. 4. Modernist poems, while possessing some romantic tendencies in hypertrophied forms, often lack others so noticeably that the reader disregards the ones they have, especially since these may be too common for him to be conscious of them as specifically romantic. (Most of the romantic qualities that poetry has specialized in for the last 150 years seem to the average reader "normal" or "poetic," what poetry inescapably is.) 5. Romanticism holds in solution contradictory tendencies which, when isolated and exaggerated in modernism, look startlingly opposite both to each other and to the earlier stages of romanticism. 6. Both modernist and conventional critics have been unable to see the fundamental similarities between modernist and romantic poetry because they were

The making and remaking of America

As urgent as any foreign correspondent's record is the story of ten years' significant development in America —

Remaking America

BY JAY FRANKLIN

is that story.

- "Anyone who reads him will begin to understand what the 'remaking' of America has involved, and why the program of national defense should be measured not only in terms of planes, ships and guns, but also in terms of land, lives and resources."—Ralph Thompson in the New York Times.
- "The book contains a great deal of information that would be worth having at any time, but at this particular moment is doubly worth while." — New York Herald Tribune.
- "He leaves the reader with a high hope in his heart for the future of America." — Sterling North in the Chicago Daily News.

$2.75

Independent Vermont

BY CHARLES MINER
THOMPSON

- "A mellow, leisurely record of the explosion of Vermont . . . The best study yet made of the period with which it deals." — New York Herald Tribune.
- "'Independent Vermont' is the work of a truly skilled hand, and it should become a classic history of the Yankee character and the making of a state . . . We choose 'Independent Vermont' as the outstanding non-fiction book of January, 1942." — John Cournos.
- "Fat, easy-gaited . . . handled with humor and broad comprehension." — New Yorker.

$4.50

Just published

When it's the low-down they want on how the war came to the world, give them —

Ten Years

European diplomacy from 1930 to 1940. By DWIGHT E. LEE.

When it's excitement they're after, give them

Action at Sea

The saga of the Sydney. By GEORGE H. JOHNSON.

Just reissued

The Great Pacific War

By HECTOR C. BYWATER. A historic prophecy now being fulfilled. "The most current book of the week."— Life Magazine.

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY · PUBLISHERS unwilling to see anything but differences: these were to the former a final recommendation, to the latter a final condemnation.

We can understand modernist poetry better by noticing where and how it began. The English poetry that we call fin de siècle—the most important tendency of its time—was a limit of one easily recognizable extension of romanticism. These "decadent" poets were strongly influenced by Baudelaire, Verlaine, and similar French poets. Rimbaud, Laforgue, and Corbière—who had already written plainly "modern" poetry—had no influence on them. Why? Because a section of French poetry was developing a quarter-century ahead of English poetry: Rimbaud wrote typically modernist poetry in the '70's; in the '90's a surrealist play, Jarry's "Ubu Roi," scared the young Yeats into crying: "After us the Savage God!" France, without England's industrial advantages and enormous colonial profits, had had little of the Victorian prosperity which slowed up the economic and political rate of change in England. And—if we stick to a part of the culture, literature—the rate of change could be greater in France because romanticism was more of a surface phenomenon there. English poetry was not ready to be influenced by French modernism for many years. Meanwhile there were two movements so beautifully suited to criticism that I can hardly bear to neglect them. Accompanying the triumph of prose naturalism there was a prosy, realistic, small-scale, and extremely limited reaction against "decadent" poetry (it included Robinson, Frost, Masters, Masefield, some of the Georgians, etc.); it had about it something rather safe, small, and dowdy that reminds one of the last fictitious lull that was its political and economic counterpart. The other movement, imagism, carried four or five romantic tendencies to their limits with the hot-house perfection of a mathematical demonstration.

French modernist poetry first influenced poetry in English through Americans, who lacking a determining or confining tradition of their own, were particularly accessible and susceptible. Pound and Eliot were expatriates in both space and time; their methods have always been those of a Picasso without much talent for organization. (But both, to a European, must seem peculiarly American; one could with justice call Pound the Henry Ford of culture, or say that both Pound and Eliot represent the successful application of American industrial methods to literature.) Pound, that great source of modernist influences, is the plainest example of the shift from late romanticism into modernism. After many years of Browning imitations, of Pre-Raphaelite pastiches from the Middle Ages, he passes through imagism into modernism. Another fine example is the Irish expatriate Joyce, who, beginning with fin de siècle lyrics, goes on to the modernist poetry of "Ulysses" and "Finnegans Wake"—as Edmund Wilson has observed, parts of these are plainly poetry.

Since I have no space to talk chronologically or in terms of individual poets, I am going to support my theory with a list of the general characteristics of modernist poetry. 1. A pronounced experimentalism; "originality" is everyone's aim, and novel techniques are as much prized as new scientific discoveries. Eliot states it with surprising naivete: "It is exactly as wasteful for a poet to do what has been done already as for a biologist to rediscover Mendel's discoveries." 2. External formlessness and internal disorganization; these are justified either as the disorganization necessary to express a disorganized age or as new and more complex forms of organization. This tendency is extended to language, syntax, punctuation. Meter becomes irregular or disappears; the rhythmical flow of verse is broken up into a jerky half-prose collage or montage. 3. Heightened emotional intensity; violence of every sort. 4. Obscurity, inaccessibility: logic, both for structure and for texture, is neglected; without this for a ground the masses of the illogical or a-logical lose much of their effectiveness. The poet's peculiar erudition and allusiveness (compare the Alexandrian poet Lycophron) consciously restrict his audience to a small, highly specialized group; the poet is a specialist like everyone else. He intimidates or overawes the reader with a professional pose that may be unkindly paraphrased as "Even if I try to talk down to you, I'm so cultivated, so really different, that I can't help talking about all these things you never heard of, in a way too complicated or subtle for you ever to understand." Epater les bourgeois is a policy that adds to the popularity it had enjoyed with earlier romantics. 5. A lack of restraint, order, proportion: all tendencies are forced to their limits, even contradictory tendencies—and not merely in the same movement but, frequently, in the same poet or the same poem. Some modernist poetry puts an unparalleled emphasis on texture, connotation, violently "interesting" language (attained partly by an extension of romantic principles, partly by a more violent rhetoric based on sixteenth- and seventeenth-century practices); but there has never before been such prosaic poetry—conversational-colloquial verse without even a pretense at meter. 6. A great emphasis on details—on parts, not wholes. Poetry is essentially lyric: the rare narrative or expository poem is a disorganized collocation of lyric details. Poetry exploits particulars and avoids and condemns generalizations. 7. The typical romantic preoccupation with sensation, perceptual nuances. 8. A preoccupation with the unconscious, dreams, the stream of consciousness, the thoroughly subjective and irrational: this surréaliste emphasis might better have been called sous-réaliste.

9. Irony of every type, Byronic, Laforguian, or helplessly sentimental. Poetry is noticeably negativist; it rejects rather than accepts, is embarrassed at any affirmation. 10. Fauve or neo-primitive elements. 11. Modernist poets, though they may write about the ordinary life of the time, are removed from it, have highly specialized relations with it. The poet's realism is employed as indictment, as justification for his own isolation; prosaic and sordid details become important as what writers like Stevens and Williams somewhat primitively think of as the anti-poetic. Contemporary life is condemned, patronized, or treated as a rather disgraceful aberration or special case (compared with the past); the poet hangs out the window of the Ivory Tower making nasty but unintelligible remarks about what is happening below—he accepts the universe with several volumes of reservations. What was happening below was bad enough; but it was the poet's material, his world, all he had; and his rejection or patronizing acceptance on his own terms—and what terms they were!—was a grave limitation. 12. Individual-

NEW MACMILLAN BOOKS

SPRING 1942

The Philippines

A Study in National Development

by Joseph Ralston Hayden

"Its appearance at this time is strangely reassuring. In the light of his analysis there can be little doubt that Filipino aspirations will survive."—The Nation. Illustrated. $9.00

Something Went Wrong

by Lewis Browne

"A summation of modern history" from a new viewpoint: an effort to determine, where, when, why and by whom civilization was "side-tracked" from the main line of progress. $3.00

Thailand: The New Siam

by Virginia Thompson

"A source book of great value, written with high skill. Immense pains have gone into its preparation."—New York Times. $5.00

Seven for Cordelia

by Catherine M. Maclean

A human and tender book about seven children refugees from Scotland's great cities to a Highland farm. "As sturdy and fresh as a sprig of heather."—Rachel Field. $2.50

The Panama Canal

In Peace and War

by Norman J. Padelford

Another book of utter timeliness. It deals with the canal of today; the rights and powers of the United States, administration, economic and strategic import. With maps. $3.00

Jews in a Gentile World

by Isacque Graeber, Steuart Henderson Britt, and others

Seventeen experts in the field of the social sciences combine their studies of the problem of anti-Semitism. $4.00

Timothy Dwight:

A Biography, 1752-1817

by Charles E. Cuningham

The first full-length portrait of Jonathan Edwards' noted grandson: writer, minister, Yale's great president, and a vital national figure of his day. $3.75

Windswept: A Novel

by Mary Ellen Chase

Still the national favorite in fiction, because: "It is a pattern of truth, not only for one time and place and group, but for America in the world."—New York Times. $2.75

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

60 5th Ave.,
NEW YORK CITY

AMERICA
IN WORLD AFFAIRS
By Allan Nevins

In this volume we have a brief compressed narrative of the principal events in American foreign relations between World War I and the present day, and an analysis of the traditional, geographical political, and economic forces involved. It is the author's view that the United States has a definite share of the responsibility for the catastrophe of the present war, and that in the light of our present knowledge certain follies and blunders of the years 1919-1940 can be clearly identified. This scholarly and graphically written work is more than a reference book; it is a stimulating and persuasive interpretation of history. $1.00

SOUTH AMERICA
WITH MEXICO AND CENTRAL AMERICA
By J. B. Trend

The attitude of the Spanish republics of South America is of growing importance today, and it is essential that an understanding of their history should be widespread. This compact volume gives in readable outline the main facts necessary to such an understanding. Written in terms of "people" rather than mere statistics it enables us to appreciate their achievements and their attitude toward hemisphere cooperation. Illus. $1.00

THE WAR
SECOND YEAR
By Edgar McInnis

"This second volume of 'The Oxford Periodical History of the War' is as complete, as compact and as well written as the first, which appeared here a year ago."—N. Y. Herald Tribune "Books." "With the index and maps and a fine chronology that makes the war's steps from 1940 to 1941 easy to follow and keep in mind, McInnis' book is vastly important to Americans who want to know what happened and when, how it happened and precisely why."—Los Angeles Times. $2.00

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
114 Fifth Ave. ▪ New York

ism, isolation. The poet is not only different from the rest of society, but as different as possible from other poets; all this differentness is exploited to the limit—is used as subject-matter, even. Each poet develops an elaborate, personalized, bureaucratized machinery of effect; refine your singularities is everybody's maxim. 13. These poets dislike and condemn science, industrialism, humanitarianism, "progress," the main tendencies of Western development; they want desperately to return to the past, to an essentially literary-philosophical-theological world view.

This complex of qualities is essentially romantic, and the poetry that exhibits it is the culminating point of romanticism.

It is the end of the line. We can go back and repeat the ride; we can settle in little atavistic colonies along the street-car track; we can repudiate the whole system, à la Winters, for some neo-classical donkey caravan of our own. But Modernism as We Know It—the most successful and influential body of poetry of this century—is dead. Compare the current copy of Poetry with a ten-year-old one. Who could have believed that modernism would collapse so fast? Only someone who realized that it was impossible for it to go any farther; that it was a beyond-which-not. How can poems be written that are more violent, more disorganized, more obscure, more—supply your own adjective—than those that have already been written? But if modernism could not go any farther, it was equally impossible for it to stay where it was; even if the development of our whole society had not been forcing it on, how could a movement completely dynamic in character, as "progressive" as the science and industrialism that accompanied it, manage to become static or retrogressive without going to pieces? Fifteen or eighteen years ago there were a dozen good young American poets—all, with animal certainty, pouring out experimental verse. What has become of them? Where are the poets to take their place? Today there is an embarrassment of choices: young poets can choose—do choose—to write anything from surrealism to imitations of Robert Bridges; the only thing they have no choice about is making a choice. The Muse, forsaking her sterner laws, says to everyone: "Do what you will." But first-rate romantic poetry, unlike neo-classic, is almost always produced by poets who are at that moment "advanced," carrying tendencies to their limits; if we eclectically reproduce earlier stages of romanticism we get Benét—how delighted I am with the ambiguity that makes this refer both to William Rose and Stephen Vincent—plaster casts. Just now poets are in a bad spot—one which a few will escape from, one which a great many will never even hear about.

For a long time society and poetry have been developing in the same direction, have exploited certain tendencies to their limits: how can anyone fail to realize that the individualist excesses of modernist poetry are the necessary concomitants of the individualist excesses of late-capitalist society? (The absurdly perfect example is Jeffers, caught up in the throes of an individualism so exaggerated that he despises any bonds—society, people, life itself. Old Rocky Face, perched on his sea crag, is the last of laissez faire; Free Economic Man at the end of his rope.) Modernist poets—aggressively experimental, isolated, anti-social, individualist—rushed toward the limits of tendencies, alongside their society, with

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

What Is All This Talk About

STOLPER*

RAYMOND GRAM SWING

in The Nation

"It is of great service to have someone debunk the debunkers, and in so doing to picture the world once more in perspective, with a line drawn between reality and illusion. This Mr. Stolper has undertaken with clarity, vigor, and great persuasiveness . . . the value of his book is its contribution to the solution of the problems of this crisis."

WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN

in The Atlantic Monthly

"This is a work of exceptional and enduring quality, a strong, lucid, plausible and realistic presentation of the gigantic crisis of our age. It cannot be recommended too warmly to that very large number of readers who must be seeking for clues as to the past and present trend and the future prospects of world politics and economics. This Age of Fable is a distinguished achievement of the liberal spirit, the kind of lucid, temperate, yet thoroughly vigorous commentary on the state of civilization that John Locke or John Stuart Mill might have offered if they had lived in the twentieth century."

THURMAN ARNOLD

in the New York Herald Tribune

"With keen analysis, a lively and attractive style and moving at a blitzkrieg pace, Dr. Stolper tears our two chief myths to shreds and tatters . . . Dr. Stolper not only dispels current illusions in the domestic scene; he also covers the political structure of the whole world. . . . The book is a critical achievement of real merit. It is also entertaining and readable."

JOHN CHAMBERLAIN

in Harpers

" . . . a warm, vivid, challenging personality . . . if he isn't a good long-term prophet, then Heaven help us all. . . . Enormously stimulating . . . his book is an extremely cogent tract for the times."

P. W. WILSON

in the New York Times Book Review

"Here is an important book. It is written by a man who has kept his head amid the chaos and crisis of the twentieth century. It is intended for those who, with illusions dispelled, have to find their bearings and set their course toward a hazardous and speculative future. . . . This is a stimulating and, indeed, entertaining volume. . . . It opens the door out of the past into the future."

ROGER DOW

in the Boston Herald

"It would be easy enough to review this book with the usual critical claptrap 'extremely important,' 'required reading,' 'stimulating,' and all the rest—but it would be a signal disservice to the public and to a remarkable book to do so. The cliches would be true enough, but long use has so eroded them that This Age of Fable would be classified as another ephemeral masterpiece to be read this month or not at all. Let me only say, most earnestly, that if you can read only one book in 1942, This Age of Fable is the one to read."

ALBERT HUBBELL

in the Chicago Sun

"A decade ago, the Spanish philosopher Ortega y Gasset, wrote a brilliant book called The Revolt of the Masses which, by an unforeseen set of circumstances, reached a fairly wide public in this country and shook up a lot of dearly held notions. This week, there is published a book that might just possibly bring about the same result, This Age of Fable."

HANS KOHN

in the Boston Post

"It is a book full of critical acumen, sound judgment and deep faith in political and economic democracy . . . a sound study of the background of the present war and its complexities."

THE HARTFORD TIMES

"A powerful defense of democracy is contained in this book. It rings out as clearly as churchbells on a frosty night; it is as refreshing as a clean draft of air in a smoke-filled room; and it is as forceful as the blows of a trip-hammer."

JOSEPH HENRY JACKSON

in the San Francisco Chronicle

"Dr. Stolper examines what he thinks are the most dangerous of 'stereotyped formulas.' To them he applies the acid test of scholarship and bitter experience, of logical thought and keen sense of paradox . . . by all means read him."

CLEVELAND PLAIN DEALER

"If you will read the preface to this book, I have little doubt that you will read the rest of the book. . . . The chapters are actually exciting. . . . For the average intelligent citizen, there is a whole education in this book—and it is imparted in the most vivid and readable way." $3.00

Just Out—Second Big Printing

THIS AGE OF FABLE

The Political and Economic World We Live In

*By GUSTAV STOLPER

REYNAL & HITCHCOCK : Publishers : New York

the greatest confidence; when, by the '30's, these limits are reached, what becomes of the individualists of the '20's? They reach desperately for any collectivist emphasis: Catholicism, social credit, agrarianism, fascism, communism. Their work changes: they write neo-classic criticism and verse, or write political criticism and verse, or stop writing; one or two heartlessly or helplessly repeat the old, to the uncomprehending dismay of the others—remember the reception of Cummings's last book, everyone's genuine astonishment at his being able to keep on almost as before.

Auden has been so influential because his poetry is the most successful and novel reaction against modernist romanticism; very few of the modernist tendencies I have listed are important in his work. (The youngest English poets, who react against Auden's reaction—Thomas, for instance—have been forced to return, with a different emphasis, to the semi-surrealist excesses of some modernist poetry.) But Auden, though moving in the direction of a solution, soon goes past it into didacticism and abstraction.

I am afraid that my hypothesis, without the mass of evidence that makes a theory plausible, or the tangle of extensions and incidental insights that makes it charming, may seem improbable or unpleasant to many readers. But I hope no one will dislike it because he thinks it an attack on romanticism or modernism. This has been description, not condemnation; Burke said you can't condemn a whole people, and I hope I am not such a fool as to condemn a century and a half of a world. (Besides, I liked it—a lot of it, anyway.) Let me ask the reader, if he disagrees with my theory, to look once again at the poems of Pound or Eliot or Crane or MacLeish—the proof or disproof of it is there.

Homage to Ezra Pound

BY GILBERT HIGHET

AND so depart into dark long in limbo, hornet-stung and following battered flags and then manufacturing various hells for his own enemies all stamped EZRA POUND (Phoebus, what a name to swill the speaking trump, gloriae futuris) though ole T. S. E. proclaimed his maestro and in such prose, my God constipated but dignified like an elderly cat
"trying his technique so that it will be ready like a well-oiled fire-engine when the moment comes to strain it to the utmost," ooh, my God, splendeur Dex!

But the Criterion folded (good old Criterion many a happy hour have I spent at the bar watching the lovelies shantih
shantih?
No, 'e shan't!)
and the Cantos went not with a bang but a fizzle didn't even get ther ber-luddy reviews and the expatriate adorers all came running back to mamma's womb so there was no one left to visit the shrine. . . .

We have observed, quoth Plinius, that sacrifices hitherto popular in many provinces of the empire have now almost ceased, to the great impoverishment of butchers, graziers, and the like. Dabam Romae prid. III Kal. Iul.: that's June 1, buddy, in their dago lingo. . . .

And there sat the well-oiled fire-engine all ready to strain its gutmost eek ow ouf honk honk unable to think, but ready to quote and paraphrase in six languages including Provençal. . . .
ei didl didl
li chat e li fidl
it took a man like Ezra to kill Provençal poetry for us. . . .

And he had learnt all he could not a hell of a lot στεῖϱαν βοῦν = sterile bulls, that was a good one, Canto I a significant bit of bull
Cimbrorumque minas = Welsh coal mines, meant to be funny, maybe?
pretty damn funny, anyway
QUAINT like all his Chinese and Greeks and Romans they appear QUAINT to Homer Pound's boy from the backwoods the Idaho poeta. . . .

And his temper was never good, you get eccentric living in Rapallo and loving BEAUTY
the Emperor is at Ko
but No
silken strings shiver no longer, clashing of smilax, dark nuts on the dry bough, nuts on wet earth, nuts it's lonesome too being the only one who understands Caius Properzius,
'Alkaios,
Li Pu,
all great guys,
an' I know 'em, see?
Uncle Ezry on the Acropopopoulos, the rube at his grocery stove gignetei colon
:
SO?
So he took to damning his own country, living in Rapallo and Rome among the blackshirted brownbottomed yellowhearted Heroes the gallant macaronis that ran from the Greeks, 3 to 1 aera!
aera!!
whoosh!!!
—sure, Ezra loved 'em:
the lover of the third-rate loving fascist Italia e l'IMPERO pfft
the bogus aristocrat wanting Discipline and no Lower Classes

A Great* NATION *Correspondent Probes Victory and Peace

DAWN OF VICTORY

by Louis Fischer

All the skill at looking behind the surface of events, the objectivity of approach, and the world viewpoint which thoughtful readers have found in Louis Fischer's twenty years of writing for The Nation and in his revealing autobiography, Men and Politics, are here concentrated in Dawn of Victory which weighs the chances for victory in both war and peace . . . and presents a daring forecast of the peace which will be widely and heatedly discussed on both sides of the Atlantic.

Last summer Louis Fischer flew to London and remained there for three months, conferring with key men in the Cabinet, the Labor Party, and the Government. He studied Britain's vast victory machine and saw how it worked, saw the industrial problems and their solutions, caught the spirit of the common people as only a highly trained and sensitive correspondent could.

★

More recently, in interviews and conversations with our leaders and people, in Washington and in cities and towns throughout the country, he has similarly caught the American slants on victory and peace.

★

His discussions of Churchill and British policy are masterpieces of realistic and concise interpretation. His survey of what is right and wrong with Britain today will arouse vigorous support and vitriolic criticism. Louis Fischer's fascinating analysis of Stalin and the Russo-German war is a brilliant study of an amazing situation. Sections on America's new role in the war and on the strategy of victory likewise focus clear and probing light on situations daily growing more complex.

★

In Dawn of Victory Louis Fischer once again writes the book that goes back of the firing lines and the headlines. Although this is a sober and hard-hitting story of the men and motives behind day-by-day events, the author is optimistic about the final outcome. Dawn of Victory is indispensable for an understanding of the world scene. It is a book for today; it is also a book for tomorrow. Get it today at your booksellers. $2.75

DUELL, SLOAN & PEARCE, Inc., NEW YORK

So Ezra attacked the ole USA and pluto-bolsho-Britain Jews, & negroes, & Roosevelt, & armament trusts, & usurers melodious swill-pipe for Goebbels (Frank Sullivan says Gayda is the only newspaperman that can write the way a Pekinese barks. . . He shd read Ezra's XIVth Canto. . . . tender . . .
like a centaur's asphodel . . .)

And so to his own hell, the last hell, the ninth hell, Antenora of ice for traitors
teeth gnashing like the chattering of storks

American Dream vs. Nightmare

AMERICA AND WORLD MASTERY. By John MacCormac. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.

AMERICA IN WORLD AFFAIRS. By Allan Nevins. Oxford University Press. $1.

WHILE these two books, one by a thoughtful journalist and the other by a historian, are not identical in purpose, they supplement each other admirably and arrive at fairly similar conclusions. Both of them deal with the curious mixture of isolationism and imperialism in American foreign policy, of the impulse to withdraw from the world and the impulse to dominate it. MacCormac examines with real penetration the search for a "synthesis for the isolationism which the United States has always preached and sometimes practiced and the expansionism which it has frequently practiced but seldom admitted." He recognizes that the combination of youth and power, of a youthful nation's immaturity in foreign relations and a great nation's sense of power, helped to generate this inconsistency and the self-deception which accompanied it. "Americans," he writes, "had achieved a continental imperialism as inevitably as a boy stretches his limbs in growth. But they had always felt the uneasy necessity to justify or to glorify it under such pleas as natural right, propinquity, paramount interest, political affinity, the need of self-defense, etc." It must be noted of course that this kind of moral pretense is not uniquely American, not even uniquely Anglo-Saxon.

In his chapter on the History of a Neurosis MacCormac presents the climax of this ambivalence in the World War and the post-war period, when the rather spiritualized sense of power and world responsibility of Wilsonian internationalism gave way to the impulse of withdrawal: "The dream was overpowered by the nightmare. The revolt was led by Senators Lodge and Beveridge, who twenty years earlier had been imperialists."

Mr. Nevins sheds added light upon this inconsistency of American foreign politics by showing to what degree the President and the Department of State have always been inclined to accept the more positive and responsible attitude toward world affairs, while the great power of the Senate in treaty-making permitted isolationist impulses, particularly those of the agrarian states, to introduce contradictory notes into American foreign policy. The persistence of this inconsistency in our foreign relations is really quite remarkable, and Mr. Nevins traces it with skill.

Mr. MacCormac is convinced that future world organization must be within the framework of a new League of Nations, but that if it is to be implemented by power it must have a stable Anglo-Saxon hegemony. He therefore regards the elimination of political misunderstandings and economic tensions between the two great Anglo-Saxon powers as of paramount importance. For this reason he gives special attention to the various causes of misunderstanding between the two peoples. In contrasting our more bourgeois and egalitarian democracy with the amalgam of feudal-aristocratic and bourgeois elements which we know as British democracy, the author proves himself a really wise and understanding friend of both nations. He discusses the differences with wit as well as wisdom. Yet despite his great appreciation of British achievements he comes to the conclusion that the British have "been long wretchedly represented and lately have been disastrously led by a ruling class which seems to have outlived its historic mission. . . . Some of the proconsuls it has lately dispatched to the United States could not have been more exquisitely unfitted for their mission if they had been chosen by Adolf Hitler himself." Does he mean Lord Halifax?

Mr. MacCormac comes to the rather astounding conclusion that if the impulse of isolationism should overtake us once more after this war, Britain would have no other recourse than an Anglo-German control of Europe.

Mr. Nevins does not give advice in regard to the future. He contents himself with the more modest task of historical analysis. But it is the kind of analysis which illumines the future and points unmistakably to the necessity of the United States assuming responsibilities commensurate with its preponderant power.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Dr. Vespucci

AMERIGO: A COMEDY OF ERRORS IN HISTORY. By Stefan Zweig. The Viking Press. $2.

STEFAN ZWEIG deserves a prize for writing a book about Amerigo Vespucci without losing his temper. True, he does not tell us anything more about America's eponym than E. G. Bourne did in one chapter of his "Spain in America," less than Diego Luis Molinari does in his recent "Nacimiento del Nuevo Mundo," and neither lost his temper; but they were historians, not biographers. The biographers of Vespucci either have been angrily cocksure that he was an impostor who never went to sea or claim that he was a greater navigator than Columbus. Stefan Zweig presents the genial hypothesis that Vespucci was mainly a clever writer who profited unconsciously by a series of literary errors. His letters to his old friends in Florence were so amusing that they got into print; because the voyage of 1499 with Alonso de Hojeda along the Pearl Coast was redated 1497 by the Florentine scribe or printer, people inferred that Vespucci reached the mainland before Columbus; and as Florence was only interested in her home-town boy, the name of Captain Hojeda was not mentioned.

To the reviewer this seems plausible. He once shipped at

UPTON SINCLAIR

Says . . . . .

"I take the liberty of telling the critics and book-readers of my country, that this volume is one of great importance to our time: it deserves to be read and studied carefully by all who have to fight Hitler, whether with guns, tanks and airplanes, or with words, ideas and ideals. And that includes just about every adult man and woman in the Western hemisphere."

INSIDE HITLER

by KURT KRUEGER, M. D.

Hitler's Doctor from 1919 to 1934

Introduction by UPTON SINCLAIR • Preface by DR. K. ARVID ENLIND, U. S. MEDICAL RESERVE

TOM COLLINS in The Kansas City Journal: "If the personal physician of Hitler came and sat in your front room, and for three hours told you the intimate things his patient told him in his effort to get his tortured mind cured by psychoanalysis, you'd count it quite an experience, wouldn't you? I've had what amounts to that experience (in reading INSIDE HITLER) and it's left me bothered, shaken, and decidedly more thoughtful."

A. L. S. WOOD in The Evening Union (Springfield, Mass.): "A startling book. Hitler's mental works are taken down like those of a watch on a jeweler's stone. . . . The early emotional crisis that made the child love his mother and hate his father; the deep-seated reasons for his hatred of the Jews; the cruelty of a frustrated and impotent man, are discussed. The pieces fit together like the pieces of a well-cut jig-saw puzzle."

The Baltimore Sun: "It has undeniable fascination . . . should prove valuable to historians."

JOHN GRAY in The St. Paul Dispatch: "It is indeed a very shocking account that is given us of a degraded human spirit. The story follows the classic pattern of the psychopathic personality, beginning with a mother fixation, proceeding to a painful struggle with a variety of sexual abnormalities, and ending in a set of maniacal delusions and obsessions."

The New York Post: "As a shocking document it certainly can claim parity with The Confessions of St. Augustine."

JOHN MCHUGH in The Boston Herald: "There is nothing like it in the abundant literature written around this man. INSIDE HITLER helps us realize what is ravaging the world. . . . The reader is supplied, literally, with the naked truth."

ROBERT FRANCIS in The Brooklyn Eagle: "He has compiled one of the most bizarre records of infantilism, sadism, messianic fury and frustration existing in a human mind. Some of it is shockingly incredible . . . but Dr. Krueger writes with the ring of unchallenged truth."

ROBERT S. STARRETT in The Chicago Sun: "There have been many books written about Hitler, but none of them approaches this one in factual knowledge. Dr. Krueger for 15 years ministered to the mental and physical welfare of the Munich mobster. . . . His failure to affect a cure has changed world-history, but not the value of his book."

The San Francisco Chronicle: "Dr. Krueger's points are well made. . . . Their most important quality lies in the fact that they present Hitler as a man rather than as the myth he is inclined to become in the minds of those who try to think of him. The element of surprise is abundant. . . . "

The Trenton Times: "Of the countless books which I have read about Adolf Hitler, I have found none which compares with Dr. Krueger's history of his notorious patient. The contemporary drama pales into insignificance, for there could not be a stage-play so lurid in detail, so shocking and revolting in character."

"The most sensational book in a decade!"

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL OFFER

to the Readers of this Issue of

THE NATION

INSIDE HITLER is published at $3.75. But by arrangement with the publishers we are enabled to offer it on all orders which come in before March 15th at $2.98

Order from

PSYCHIC RESEARCH PRESS
122 East 25th Street New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $2.98 for a copy of the $3.75 edition of "Inside Hitler," to be sent to

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY & STATE....................................

CHECK HERE IF YOU PREFER IT C.O.D. ☐

the Azores a local seaman named Henrique who was a good sailmaker but illiterate and with no pretension to be anything but a foremast hand. After our Capitana had reached Lisbon, and the Portuguese newspaper correspondents had interviewed the crew, we were amused to read in the paper that "Captain Henrique joined the Capitana at Ponta Delgada and took command." But I am not so easily convinced of the innocence of Vespucci as of Henrique; for Vespucci never mentions captain or shipmate on any one of his four voyages. He was "All Alone in Cubia," as Mr. Dooley said of Theodore Roosevelt's book. It is possible that a publisher of 1504, when confronted with Vespucci's account of his first voyage, might have said, "Hey! There's enough material here for two voyages!" and told his devil to make it two, dating No. 1 a couple of years earlier. An instance of similar garbling in these early travelogues is the voyage to the Pearl Coast in the Thacher or Sneyd Codex, which Dr. W. J. Wilson is endeavoring to build up into a new voyage of Columbus but which I think is made up from bits of this Hojeda-Vespucci voyage and from Columbus's third. Before Amerigo's death in 1512 he had ample opportunity to correct these omissions and errors, but he simply "sat pretty" while his fictitious reputation increased.

Stefan Zweig believes that Amerigo did after all deserve to have something named after him, on the ground that, if he was not the discoverer of the Continent, he was the first to call it Mundus Novus, Columbus having insisted that it was Asia. "By so doing he disperses the fog clouding the great discoverer's eye to his own feat." "Vespucci actually completes the discovery of America." Now this is plain hokum, as Mr. Zweig might have learned by consulting the works of Bourne and Nunn. Peter Martyr d'Anghiera hailed Columbus as Novi Orbis repertor in 1493; so by Mr. Zweig's principles America should have been named Angleria. Moreover, Columbus on his 1498 voyage declared he had found an Otro Mundo, unknown to the ancients, which occupied the same position relative to China as Australia does. There is nothing in Vespucci's writings to suggest that he had any other conception of his New World than Columbus had of his Other World. Plenty of maps came out after Vespucci, representing North America as an extension of Asia, and South America, the America, as an immense island. Even Magellan's voyage did not at once end this geographical heresy, initiated by Columbus and certainly not quenched by Vespucci.

Announcing a new series:
LABOR IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

NOW READY:

The NEEDLE TRADES

By JOEL SEIDMAN

THIS series of volumes will provide a needed history, industry by industry, of organized labor's growing part in American life: its record complete, its leadership and probable future developments.

In this first volume Mr. Seidman tells the story of several of the most remarkable of the unions—those in the needle trades. It is a success story, for it progresses from the chaotic conditions of the sweatshop to the present policy of enlightened cooperation with manufacturers, far-reaching programs of health and education. The history of the I.L.G.W.U., the Amalgamated, and other unions in the fur, millinery and cap fields is told in detail, overlooking no factor of the internal strife that marked their course, or the adjustments that have brought progress and stabilization.

The price of each volume is $2.50. A list of the others, in preparation, will be sent upon request.

FARRAR AND RINEHART, Publishers
[illegible] Madison Avenue, New York

The naming of America, as Mr. Zweig shows, arose out of a combination of pedantry and ignorance for which Amerigo was only indirectly responsible. A young instructor at an obscure gymnasium in the Vosges, writing an introduction to a new geography, and ignorant of Columbus's work, suggested that as Europe and Asia were named after women, this "fourth part of the world" discovered by Amerigo should be called "America." Strangely enough, this suggestion by an unimportant pedant was taken up everywhere in Northern Europe, even for more than it was worth. The young instructor meant America to be the name of Brazil and there placed it on his own map, but Sir Thomas More has his North American Utopia (1516) discovered by Vespucci. Only Spain and Portugal failed to snap at the America naming—for they knew Amerigo. Spain called the New World Las Indias throughout the colonial period; the first Spanish map to use the name "America" is of 1758; and the Portuguese, whose empire of Brazil was Amerigo's original Novus Mundus, ignored both him and it. The name "America" has been particularly appropriated by that part of the New World never seen by Amerigo and unknown to his donnish promoter! A comedy of errors, indeed.

A writer with the language equipment and literary gifts of Stefan Zweig might have done a better job on Amerigo, even within this modest compass. It seems not unreasonable that he should have mastered the critical and controversial literature on Vespucci, much of which has appeared recently, before giving the public what purports to be the real facts. I allude especially to the work of Northup, Alberti, Magnaghi, Almagià, and Vignaud. He has inverted the misprint of Parias as Lariab, which has a vital bearing on the alleged voyage of 1497. His march-of-time chapter, "A. D. 1000. A dark and heavy slumber lies over the Western world," etc., one could well spare in favor of a translation of the Vespucci letter recently discovered by Alberti, or George Tyler Northup's excellent translation of "Mundus Novus." Mr. Zweig does reproduce the original tract in facsimile; but not many of his public can read abbreviated Renaissance Latin in black letter, and there are better facsimiles for scholars. Finally, there are some data in the Vespuccian tracts which are of significance in the history of celestial magnetism; but of these Mr. Zweig says nothing. Like so many writers on the discovery of America, he loses interest in the navigators as soon as they step aboard ship.

As for Vespucci, his fame is based on pleasantly written narratives of voyages, at least one of which was fictitious and none of which he commanded. He still remains, after all the explanations and apologetics, the Dr. Cook of the great age of discovery. SAMUEL ELIOT MORISON

Shakespeare and His Audience

SHAKESPEARE'S AUDIENCE. By Alfred Harbage. Columbia University Press. $2.25.

THE question "Who went to the Elizabethan theater?" is one of more than merely antiquarian interest. All sorts of conclusions concerning Shakespeare's aims and methods, even concerning the conditions under which genius is most likely to flourish, have been based upon the usual assumption that the bulk of the spectators at the first performance of "Hamlet" were disreputable in one way or another. Professor Harbage, whose competence has been demonstrated by several previous works of scholarship, reopens the whole question, weighs evidence more carefully than it has ever been weighed before, and comes to some fresh conclusions. Because he carries his learning lightly, his little book is also entertaining reading.

There are, of course, no attendance records for any one of the Elizabethan theaters, but Henslowe's famous diary does preserve a record of his receipts, and we do know what admission charges were to the various places in the theater. Juggling all the figures, Mr. Harbage succeeds in making it seem probable that Elizabethan theaters held a good many more people than is sometimes assumed, that about 13 per cent of the London population attended the theater weekly (as compared with the 65 per cent of the American population said to pay a weekly visit to the movies), and that the penny paid for admission to the pit represented about the same proportion of a workman's earnings as is represented today by the thirty cents which will buy admission to a movie. Upper-class people certainly went to the theater also, as we know from some direct evidence, as well as from the indirect evidence furnished by the fact that more expensive places were provided. Why, then, the assumption that the Elizabethan audience was not a cross-section of the entire population probably quite as representative as a movie audience today, but, instead, composed largely of disreputable elements?

Mr. Harbage's answer to this question is to me even more interesting, and perhaps even more convincing, than his statistical deductions concerning the size of the audience. Surely we would need very positive evidence to prove the inherently improbable assumption that the finest poetry in the English language was relished chiefly by the lowest elements in the population, and Professor Harbage shows that such evidence simply does not really exist. There is, to be sure, plenty of contemporary testimony furnished by Puritans and stern distrusters of popular amusement, but the same kind of testimony also regularly describes the plays themselves as "scurrilous," "impious," "blasphemous," and the like; and unless we are ready to accept as unprejudiced such descriptions of Shakespeare's plays, there seems no good reason for accepting judgments from the same kind of

RANDOM HOUSE BOOKS

England sends us a real thriller!

Hangover Square

BY PATRICK HAMILTON
Author of the Broadway smash hit ANGEL STREET

➡ An adventure in love and hate in a rather sinister corner of London just before the war. HARPER'S: "Evilly fascinating from start to finish . . . a wonderful job of atmosphere and suspense." 308 pages, $2.50

The shape of things to come–

Economic Consequences of the Second World War

BY LEWIS L. LORWIN

➡ "An invaluable source book on the causes of the war and the nature of the peace . . . a thoughtful and important book."
—Louis M. Hacker, Herald Tribune Books

➡ "The best all-around book to help us appraise the complex and abundant data and to sharpen our definitions and objectives."—New Republic.

510 pages, $3.00

IRWIN SHAW'S
NEW BOOK OF SHORT STORIES

Welcome TO THE City

➡ "He has no superior today in vividly etching the stuff of life on the printed page with near flawless artistry."—Philadelphia Inquirer.

➡ "1942 is not likely to bring many short story collections as good as this one."—N. Y. Sun. $2.00 sources on Shakespeare's audience. And yet even Sir Edmund Chambers seems to take it for granted that the atmosphere of the playhouse was as bad as its enemies maintained.

RANDOM HOUSE, 20 E. 57 ST., N.Y.

In a concluding chapter Professor Harbage asks our indulgence for some pure speculation concerning the effect of a representative audience, neither exclusively highbrow nor exclusively lowbrow, on the creative artist. He thinks Shakespeare had such an audience, that it brought out the best in him, and that if the even more nearly perfect audience enjoyed by the movies does not produce masterpieces, that is probably because too many executives, collaborators, agents, and what not come between that audience and the artist who is striving to use the medium of the film. I doubt, however, that it is quite so simple as this, or that it is much safer to say "the great public wants the best" than it is to say "public taste is always bad." I suspect that any audience, specialized or general, usually wants the best of the kind of thing it wants, but that its taste is limited in various ways at various times. There seems to have been an epoch in Italy when everybody was interested in painting, just as, broadly speaking, everybody today is interested in science and technology. Your average American wants the best radio he can get, but that does not mean that he wants the best painting or that one of the Italians said to have carried Cimabue's Virgin in triumph through the streets would have wanted the best dramatic poetry. Elizabethans were sensitive to words, especially to high astounding terms, and they were capable of appreciating the best that could be given them. But it is not certain that even the most representative American audience, in closest possible touch with its men of letters, would necessarily demand of them the best they could give.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

TO ASSURE VICTORY

—and Then The Peace

In The World's Destiny and the United States the problem of organizing common action against the Axis Powers which now confronts the United Nations was considered by a conference of experts in international relations even before the United States were at war.

How can this immense enterprise be best organized right now in order not only to assure victory but later on to stand the test of peace?

What about the systems of League, Federation or Union of Nations? How can these concepts be so combined as to meet not only the desire for unity but also the urgent need for security for all peoples?

How can free and democratic governments be so improved that they may efficiently deal both nationally and internationally with the need for greater social justice?

Lively discussions on these problems by experts from thirteen countries were edited by Henri Bonnet and are presented in a 320 page book:

THE WORLD'S DESTINY
and the UNITED STATES

Popularly priced: paper bound, 50¢; cloth bound, $1.

WORLD CITIZENS ASSOCIATION
86 East Randolph Street
Chicago, Illinois

Mme Undset's Report

RETURN TO THE FUTURE. By Sigrid Undset. Translated from the Norwegian by Henriette C. K. Naeseth. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

NEVER tell a lie. And don't tell the truth—unless you have to," is an old Norse saying for which I am indebted to Mme Undset; I do not find it among the many Norwegian proverbs and adages that give a homey touch to this story of her experiences during the war in Norway, her flight to Sweden, and her journey through Russia and Japan. The book does, however, live up to the prescription. She clearly had to tell the story. And, as a great writer, she is incapable of telling a lie.

Sigrid Undset saw it happen, and it is good to have in forthright language the living testimony of a human being who is a woman and a mother before she is a writer or thinker about what that evil thing, Nazi aggression, means on the spot. In this country such awareness is all too far away as yet. Mme Undset lost a son in the fighting in Norway, She does not make a secret of it, but people seeking for emotional thrills in her presentation of that episode will be disappointed. It is no coincidence that the comrades of her son described him as "quiet in manner, undemonstrative."

Mme Undset writes as a Norwegian. She places the Norwegian campaign in its proper perspective. She never lets you forget that Norway is her homeland. But this Norwegian approach is linked with a world view that takes account of the sufferings and efforts of other nations. She recalls the fight in northern Norway of a Norwegian army and fleet together with Englishmen, Poles, and French chasseurs alpins—"these last and the people up there were as congenial as Scotch and soda" is her phrase.

There may be readers who will find that Mme Undset has not quite lived up to her prescription in the chapters entitled Fourteen Days in Russia and Japan en Passant. The picture is dark in the one case and light in the other. Even if she were telling the truth one might argue that she did not have to tell it at a moment when we are fighting alongside the Russians and against the Japanese. But her observations are clearly and honestly qualified in both cases. The very titles of those two chapters are serious qualifications. And she does pose a problem which the democracies must face during the war, as well as when peace is won. The totalitarian nations have so far fought better and more successfully than the democracies, while sacrificing everything in the way of human values and improved standards of living.

She uncompromisingly affirms her own faith in the democratic way: "For in spite of everything, with the world as it has become today, it is certain that the victory of democracy along the whole line is the only guaranty of a better future, for all nations and all peoples, through endless centuries." And I know no better presentation of matured thinking on post-war reconstruction than her final chapter: Return to the Future.

BJARNE BRAATOY

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Dwight of Yale

TIMOTHY DWIGHT: A BIOGRAPHY. By Charles E. Cuningham. The Macmillan Company. $3.75.

NEVER before has it been more evident how closely our critical and biographical estimates are related to the prevailing sense of security or of danger. The booming twenties gave us a biography that was usually hard, often scornful, and sometimes contemptuous in its treatment of persons who had formerly been objects of veneration. During recent years and months, however, we have begun to realize that there was something quite indispensable in those virtues that once seemed parochial and outworn. We are now learning once more to respect those orthodoxies and fidelities which are the products not of ease but of danger. Now and then we look back a little wistfully at the heroes of our national past, wishing that the attitude of hero-worship had not been quite so violently assailed in the presence of those who are now called upon to be themselves heroic.

What this amounts to is that our pose of ultra-sophistication, a familiar trait of adolescence, is no longer fashionable. We are now making rapid progress toward the simplicity of really mature minds. And in this change a good many readjustments in our estimates of ideas, ideals, events, and persons will be involved.

It was in 1925 that the late Vernon Louis Parrington, a fair representative of the sophisticated attitude toward the national mind, called Timothy Dwight "the most dogmatic of Yankee Puritans." This remark, both untrue and highly dogmatic in itself, was made possible by the fact that Parrington did not know much about Timothy Dwight. Mr. Cuningham, who knows a great deal about him, indulges in no such hyperboles. He is content to let the facts speak. One suspects that Parrington held it against Dwight that he was a Yankee, a Calvinist, a Federalist, and, perhaps worst of all, a grandson of Jonathan Edwards. To Mr. Cuningham these incontrovertible facts are easily forgivable. Parrington could say that Timothy Dwight "swept away" the small beginnings of scientific study that had been made at Yale by Ezra Stiles, his predecessor in the presidential chair. Mr. Cuningham tells the absorbing story of how Dwight instituted the study of chemistry at Yale by his unassisted main force, choosing for the first instructor in that subject a young graduate by the name of Benjamin Silliman who had not, at the time, heard so much as one lecture or read even one book on the subject.

One can see that Parrington disliked Timothy Dwight for his extreme conservatism, and it is interesting to observe that Mr. Cuningham admires the same man for his many audacious innovations. The fact is, of course, that Dwight was intensely conservative in matters of church and state—which matters, it should be added, he thought practically inseparable—but that he was inventive, imaginative, almost creative, in the field of education. With regard to what seemed to him the central questions his mind was definitely made up; one might say it had been since the lifetime of his grandfather. On that very account he felt perhaps the more free to diverge in other regards from the prejudices and practices of his time.

Timothy Dwight, the man who set Yale College on its way to becoming one of the world's foremost universities, is by no means an easy topic for a biographer. His activities

AMUSEMENTS

"Buoyant, Giddy & Funny"
—Atkinson, Times
JUNIOR MISS
LYCEUM Theatre, 45th St. E. of B'way. CH 4-4256
Evenings, 8:40; Matinees, MON., WED. & SAT., 2:40

"A PERFECT COMEDY"
—Atkinson, Times
LIFE WITH FATHER
with HOWARD LINDSAY
DOROTHY STICKNEY
EMPIRE, B'way & 40 St.—269 seats $1.10
Evgs. 8:40. Mats. Sat. & Wash'ton's B'day

CHERYL CRAWFORD presents
George Gershwin's
PORGY AND BESS
"Go see 'Porgy and Bess' if you go to nothing else"
—Kronenberger, PM.
PRICES:
Evgs. . . . $2.75 to 55¢
Mats. . . . $2.20 to 55¢
MAJESTIC THEATRE, W. 44 St. Eves. Incl. Sunday. Mats. Wed., Sat. & Feb. 23

RECITAL
WEBSTER
AITKEN
PIANO RECITAL
"In a properly organized musical life such a musician would be heard constantly and everywhere."
—B. H. Haggin, THE NATION
TOWN HALL, Sat. Aft., FEB. 28 at 3
BACH, DUETS CHOPIN, 24 PRELUDES DEBUSSY, 12 ETUDES
Tickets: $2.20, $1.65, $1.10, 83c, on sale at Town Hall Box Office or from Management Guild for Musicians, 113 West 57th Street, New York City. CO 5-1577—Steinway

Don't Miss An Issue!
To keep THE NATION coming regularly
just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION ▪ 55 FIFTH AVE. ▪ NEW YORK

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I inclose $..........

☐ One Year $5
☐ Two Years $8
☐ Three Years $11

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER
to new subscribers only
☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name..........
Street..........
City..........
State..........
2-21-42
Extra postage per year: Foreign and Canadian, $1.00

and accomplishments covered a wide range. His industry was phenomenal. His influence in the religious, political, and educational life of his time is not easily overestimated. And yet there was no touch of genius in the man, or even of greatness. He fell very far below the intellectual and spiritual elevation of his grandfather. Neither was he the "prodigy of learning" that Van Wyck Brooks has called him. He was, of course, widely informed, according to the standards of his time and place, but he was not erudite. Living nearly all his life with boys and among admiring parishioners, always talking down, never leaving America or even New England, he acquired a very extensive knowledge of the sort that clergymen and schoolmasters are expected to have. And yet one would hesitate to call him a highly cultivated man.

Mr. Cuningham is nowhere sharply critical of Dwight. He does not point out that the man's thought is deficient in depth and in passion. On the whole, he admires the great president of Yale, and he does all that can be done to make his reader like him. His book is pleasant reading, written with good humor and not a little brilliancy of wit. Based in large part upon primary sources of information, it shows unusual skill in the techniques of research and also in the concealment of them.

One closes the book with the feeling that here is an important task thoroughly and finally done.

ODELL SHEPARD

Germany's "Lost Generation"

TIME WAS: DEATH OF A JUNKER. By Heinrich Hauser. Translated by Barrows Mussey. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

THE most eloquent form of history is biography, but it is most eloquent, as well as most revealing of its times, when the author is hardly conscious that he is writing more than a personal history. Such unawareness cannot be expected of the autobiographers of the present day, when the roar of titanic events is dinning in the ears of every writer, as well as in those of less sensitive people. As a result, many a good artist becomes an indifferent journalist, and Heinrich Hauser is only partially an exception.

However, Hauser avoids the pitfall of didacticism by telling two distinct stories, his own and Germany's. When he is concerned with his personal story, his narrative unrolls almost like a documentary film, a series of staccato shots which build up an extraordinarily powerful effect. As the child of a Junker family he is surrounded by that mirage of security which rendered his little caste even more unready for the cataclysm of 1914 than its analogues in other countries. (In fact, the mirage survived almost until 1918.) As a boy of seventeen he enters the Reich's last army along with the aged and the infirm and the other human scrap which was salvaged for Germany's final war effort. As a disillusioned young member of the "lost generation" he seeks escape and adventure as a seaman. As an advertising expert for the Hamburg-America Line he watches starving unemployed workers turning Communist and witnesses the revolting brutality of waterfront brawls between Nazis and Communists. Through the first six years of Hitler's regime he knocks about Germany, chiefly concerned with the ever fiercer necessity of getting a living. In a final scene he revisits the old Junker homestead, which the family is preparing to abandon. "We are being melted down," Hauser's old uncle tells him, as the shabby butler pours cheap wine into costly crystal glasses. One can almost hear the ax hacking at the cherry orchard which it seems must be growing just outside the windows of the Schloss.

The other story which Hauser tells is of course familiar to us; how a despairing Germany turned its eyes on Hitler as its last hope, and how a good many Germans were disillusioned in the following years, among them some of the original Nazi enthusiasts. But Hauser is a professional journalist and a competent one, and he knows his terrain better than many foreign correspondents who have told the story before him. He adds some striking anecdotes to the record, notably those which concern the clandestine building up of Hitler's war machine.

Most memorable are the chapters describing the Frankfurter Zeitung, that great voice of liberalism and the humanities which spoke to Germany, and to the whole enlightened world, every day for three generations, and was not immediately silenced even when Hitler came to power. Everyone who has ever worked on a newspaper—and everyone who has not—will enjoy this glimpse into the genial bedlam which by some miracle got out three editions a day.

In spite of its hybrid character the book is a spellbinder. It is also a model of the art of translation.

BETSY HUTCHISON

James Joyce, Heretic

JAMES JOYCE: A CRITICAL INTRODUCTION. By Harry Levin. New Directions. $1.50.

THE shade of James Joyce is probably smiling rather sadly in its sleeve at this quite excellent study because, although it anatomizes the technical Joyce with penetration, it fights slightly shy of the spiritual Poltergeists that inhabit the technical Joyce. I mean that here the critic has either deliberately minimized or elected to overlook the fact that above everything else James Joyce suffered from the same sense of guilt that devastates the Dostoevskian and makes "The Ancient Mariner" a poem comparable in content with "Crime and Punishment." This sense of guilt arises, I think, from the knowledge that blasphemy is possible only to those who venerate the objects of their blasphemy. Thus the clue, the whole clue, and nothing but the clue to James Joyce is not Dublin but Rome. Apart, however, from the fact that this autopsy omits to take the heart out of the corpse of Joyce, it is at once scrupulous, intelligent, and expertly surgical. Mr. Levin deserves all the applause that I am sure his study will receive. Well, almost all. That he has, as I happen to feel, missed the mill where the gist of Joyce is ground down to a kind of anathematical eucharist, is not, finally, as important as the possibility that a gifted critic has at last appeared on the landscape.

It is because I recognize Mr. Levin's incontestable critical acumen that I am surprised he has not suspected that the hysterical and desperately heretical gestures of Joyce prove principally that he fought on the end of an orthodox religious tether. These gestures of blasphemy certainly do not prove that he had liberated himself from the orthodox. For Mr. Levin the act of Joycean blasphemy represents nothing more than a "rebellion" against the Roman Catholic church; but under this particular employment of the noun all the seven cycles of apostatic hell happen to be concealed. "Joyce," Mr. Levin remarks, "is orthodox enough to go on believing in hell." This sentence, properly speaking, should have presented us with the crossed keys to the solution of James Joyce. Both "Ulysses" and "Finnegans Wake" were written in spiritual circumstances that only a Dante Alighieri or a Julian the Apostate could perfectly visualize: for every word that James Joyce wrote took its dynamic from the thing he sought to escape. This, in two words, was God Almighty. Thus the best thumbnail introduction to Joyce is not Stuart Gilbert's concordance or Harry Levin's volume but Francis Thompson's all too facilely discredited "The Hound of Heaven." While Mr. Levin has demonstrably observed this dynamic of recoil in Joyce, I do not think that he has ascribed to it the dominance that in fact it possesses here. On the day he died Joyce was not an atheist or an agnostic or a Parsee or a Holy Roller; he was a Roman Catholic who hated Roman Catholicism.

It is, finally, as exegesis that this introduction to Joyce is most meritorious. For in the matter of specific elucidations the critic can dispense with his faculties of abstract investigation, that is, if he happens to have them, and get down to the much more amusing and much less pretentious business of textual detection. This, in the works of James Joyce, becomes quite as entertaining as a murder mystery and infinitely more hazardous. Mr. Levin may not be particularly ingenious in observing that "Nobirdy avair soar anywing to eagle it" is an ornithological "Nobody ever saw anything to equal it"; but when he states that "the real romance [of Finnegans Wake] is between Joyce and the language," then he really pulls a plum; as in the remark, at once so obvious and so necessary, though I know of no one else who has made it, that Joyce's "restless play of allusion depends, to the vast extent of his knowledge, on the acceptance of a linguistic status quo." I wonder that this observation did not invite the critic to suspect that here again the Joycean dynamic of recoil asserted itself. For this "restless play of allusion," continually in a state of flirtation with the language proper, amounts, in the end, to a retreat in the face of established authority.

When a person sets about the invention of a new language, he is either schizoid or James Joyce. The real difference between the two is that Joyce invented variations on the English tongue for the sanest of reasons: he was in love with it, and love does the oddest things. It took Mr. T. S. Eliot, with his judicious eye fixed on the reasons why writers write so rather than on the way in which they write, to see that James Joyce, instead of being, as hoi polloi and the Bohemian suspect, the most heterodox, was in fact the most orthodox of writers. I imagine that Mr. Eliot is of this opinion because he recognizes in Joyce the writer who takes his drive from his hates, and Joyce's hates consisted of authority in the shapes of the British constitution, the Oxford Dictionary, and the Roman Catholic church. GEORGE BARKER

How to Woo a Jury

SUCCESS IN COURT. By Francis L. Wellman. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

IN FORTY years of experience as a trial lawyer Francis L. Wellman has been identified with numerous sensational cases, representing either prosecution or defense. From time to time he has written inspirational and instructive books which explain in detail to the young members of the profession the posture which must be struck, the apparel which must be worn, and the witticisms which must be related to win juries and influence judges. "Success in Court," the latest in this series, contains a selection of episodes from his own career and the careers of such giants of former days as Choate, Evarts, and Butler. Each story, of course, points some moral to the young practitioner. "This episode," Wellman explains at one point, "unconsciously led me to adopt a sort of legerdemain of my own, in later cross-examination, when I attempted to lead the witness into some sort of trap out of which I hoped to pull a rabbit—and to my surprise often did." In addition to the 299 pages of Mr. Wellman's anecdotage, there is a section of equal size to which nine ornaments of the bar have contributed brief memoirs of similar tenor.

The book is valuable chiefly for the light it sheds upon the methods employed for the ascertainment of truth in judicial tribunals. It reveals how great an emphasis is placed upon the skill of the advocate in handling witnesses, in dramatizing his facts, and in selecting and "wooing" a jury. It may seem strange to the uninitiated, but the elders of the bar find no inconsistency whatever between their complete confidence in the adequacy of the judicial process for the trial of issues of fact and their open admiration for those members of their profession who are most adept at the manipulation of courtroom procedure for the obfuscation of issues and the confusion of juries. JEROME H. SPINGARN announcing the publication of

"the poet in blue minor"

138 pages of distinctive modern verse

by SELWYN S. SCHWARTZ introduction by DAVID DAICHES cover design by RUDOLPH WEISENBORN cloth, $2.50

from your bookseller, or

The Press of James A. Decker
Prairie City Illinois

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Readers' Service Division

The Nation ▪ 55 Fifth Avenue ▪ New York

Aesthetic Theology

THE MIND OF THE MAKER. By Dorothy L. Sayers. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

DISCOURSE about God can take only two forms—analogy or the special language of the mystic. As her contribution to the general reawakening of interest in religion, Dorothy Sayers has traced the analogy between God and man as creators. She is not advocating any change of heart or declaring any faith of her own—implicit though her faith is in this concern with a particular analogy. She is merely expounding what Trinitarian Christianity says about God, and she does it by describing in simple and concrete fashion the behavior of man as artist. Being a writer, she naturally takes as her example the art of writing; so this book about God contains mostly matters of literary history and criticism, references to the conventions of the theater, quotations from the poets, and autobiographical insights into the mind that created the admirable shelfful of Wimseycality, from "Whose Body?" to "Busman's Honeymoon."

Miss Sayers's competence for her task is beyond question. Before being a writer of great detective novels, a medievalist, a playwright, a theologian, or any other sort of institutional person, she is a woman of immense culture and fine intelligence. "Begin Here," published last season, was a fitting forerunner to this more ambitious essay in what I should like to call aesthetic theology. But the importance and worth of "The Mind of the Maker" do not seem to me so conspicuously above criticism as her previous tract for the times. Even in execution the present work is not so successful. Miss Sayers begins with a justifiably angry preface about the modern reader's inability to understand what he reads, and in the past she has given such a reader no opportunity for reversing the blame. Hers is the prose of a master and a lucid one: remember, for instance, the judge's summing up at the beginning of "Strong Poison." But in the present book she is often ambiguous and over-full of words. Her aim is admittedly to reach the common reader, but again and again she uses needless technicalities, Latin derivatives and awkward circumlocutions that destroy rhythm, making difficult matters still more difficult.

These strictures are to be read in the light of the standard she herself has set. From some other pen, the same book might deserve to be called a triumph of exposition. Similarly, I am thinking of the many wonderful passages of criticism in her novels when I say that, despite its core of truth, her present account of the creative process in man has a strange absolutism about it. She speaks as if no other possibilities than those of a certain temperament and tradition had ever been successfully exploited in European art. With a view to her analogy, she takes the very slippery and distracting notion of perfection as an artistic standard, and she is thus led into the common error of choosing qualities apart from defects and persons apart from intentions. She forgets also the effect of time on artistic error: the nearer the greater. By now Homer, Dante, and Shakespeare—the most imperfect of craftsmen when compared with, say, Austin Dobson—possess through mere age a real patina and polish which amount to a false and irrelevant perfection. And of course the author's neglect of non-European art with the conditions of its creation tends to cast doubt on the universality of the "natural law" induced from her observations. Miss Sayers, in short, is not so empirical or so historical as she was wont to be.

Whether she is right in her abstraction or I am wrong in carping at it, the fact remains that her thesis is extremely well conceived and her exposition of it in the terms of the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity at once dramatic and persuasive. No more hocus-pocus here than in her tales of detection. The analogy of the two creations, as the author clearly states, proves neither the existence of God nor the ethics of the Sermon on the Mount. But it does show the psychological truth of Christian dogma. In making this point Miss Sayers is a worthy disciple of Shaw's, though very likely the seeming filiation is a mere convergence of perceptive minds. What this attempt at retranslation has to do with the modern world in its travail is contained in the final chapter (XI and Postscript), a bonne bouche I shall leave untouched for the reader. He might do well, incidentally, to begin with this last chapter and end with the first. He will then be scolded after he has committed the mistakes of slovenly reading—or perhaps after he has been enabled by the splendid conclusion to avoid committing the most obvious among them.

JACQUES BARZUN

PUBLISHED THIS WEEK

The American Idea. By Eugene T. Adams and Others. Harper. $2.50.
Flight in Winter. By John Clinton Adams. Princeton. $3.
The Declaration of Independence. A Study in the History of Political Ideas. By Carl Becker. New Edition. Knopf. $3.
Cesare Borgia: The Machiavellian Prince. By Carlo Beuf. Oxford. $3.50.
The Men Who Make the Future. By Bruce Bliven. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.
The Japanese Enemy: His Power and His Vulnerability. By Hugh Byas. Knopf. $1.25.
All-Out on the Road to Smolensk. By Erskine Caldwell. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.
Television: Today and Tomorrow. By Lee De Forest. Dial. $3.75.
Flight to Arras. By Antoine de Saint-Exupéry. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.75.
Dawn of Victory. By Louis Fischer. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.
Cordell Hull. By Harold B. Hinton. Doubleday, Doran. $3.
The Unknown Country: Canada and Her People. By Bruce Hutchison. Coward-McCann. $3.50.
New Directions in Prose and Poetry, 1941. By Dwight E. Lee. Houghton Mifflin. $3.75.
Enjoyment of Science. By Jonathan Norton Leonard. Doubleday, Doran. $2.50.
Bolivar: The Life of an Idealist. By Emil Ludwig. Alliance. $3.50.
Japan's Industrial Strength. By Kate L. Mitchell. Knopf. $1.50.
Black Borneo. By Charles C. Miller. Modern Age. $2.75.
From Madrigal to Modern Music. By Douglas Moore. Norton. $3.75.
The Panama Canal in Peace and War. By Norman J. Padelford. Macmillan. $3.
Pemberton: Defender of Vicksburg. By John C. Pemberton. North Carolina. $3.50.
Crisis in the Philippines. By Catherine Porter. Knopf. $1.50.
Gardens for Victory. By Jean-Marie Putnam and Lloyd C. Cosper. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.
The Needle Trades. By Joel Seidman. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.
Anton Bruckner: Rustic Genius. By Werner Wolff. With an Introduction by Walter Damrosch. Dutton. $3.75.

FILMS

"PRIVATE faces in public places," says Mr. Auden, "are wiser and nicer than public faces in private places." In the case of "Woman of the Year," a film directed by George Stevens (Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer), the public face is that of Miss Katharine Hepburn, who plays the part of a distinguished political columnist with a range of international connections and a proficiency in foreign languages equaled only by her total ignorance of the domestic arts; and the film portrays the uphill but ultimately successful efforts of Spencer Tracy, as the sports writer whom she marries, to reconcile her public eminence with the privacy and intimacy of home life. As a contribution to the hackneyed theme of "Can career women make successful wives?" the film is neither interesting nor moving, but it contains five or six farcical set pieces which make it well worth seeing: Miss Hepburn at her first baseball game; Mr. Tracy at a polyglot party; Miss Hepburn at sea in the kitchen; the embarrassments of a wedding night with the bedroom invaded by foreign diplomats and prize fighters. These and other such scenes are funny enough to carry the film over its occasional lapses into drama. The dialogue, too, is almost uniformly good. Miss Hepburn, though she looks more attractive than in any other film in which I have seen her, is not altogether well cast; she never succeeds in giving the impression that her political activity is vitally important to her or even that she is very good at it. Mr. Tracy's part is not one to tax his powers, but he performs it more than competently. The minor parts are well played, especially by Roscoe Karns as a wisecracking newspaperman and by Dan Tobin as the heroine's priggish secretary.

"Joan of Paris" (RKO-Radio) is important only because it introduces Mlle Michele Morgan to the American screen. She appears as a Parisian barmaid who falls in love with the Free French leader of a group of R. A. F. airmen and enables him and his friends to escape from Paris at the sacrifice of her own life. In reality, I am afraid, the Gestapo would not be so easily outwitted; but in this film the spy game is played by both sides with a disgraceful lack of subtlety and precaution. This would not matter so much if an atmosphere of suspense and danger were effectively created, but though the film begins well in this respect, it goes to pieces later on. The long chase of the hero by a bowler-hatted Gestapo agent through the streets of Paris, which could and should have been sinister, turns out to be inappropriately comic. But the chief disappointment to me was Mlle Morgan herself. She has made very good progress with her English, but she has lost or been robbed of the intensity that made her so remarkable in her previous films. Paul Henreld makes an adequate hero, and Thomas Mitchell, who for once is allowed to stay sober, is sympathetic in the part of a priest who helps the fliers to escape.

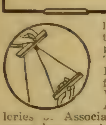
There is an air of improvisation about all of Sacha Guitry's films which gives the audience the sense that they are participating in a charade. In "Nine Bachelors" he has chosen to present himself as a dealer in a special kind of marriage à la mode, his profession being to furnish alien women with husbands who will give them French citizenship without in any way inconveniencing them. The most amusing scenes in the film occur when his group of down-at-heel elderly bachelors escape from their "home" and go to call on their wives. Neither Mr. Guitry himself nor Elvire Popesco, who plays the nearest thing there is to a heroine, is seen here to best advantage,

If you own Pictures you certainly need

BRAQUETTES

New Adjustable Picture Frame

only $1.00



Change pictures as often as you wish . . . quick BRAQUETTES let you have an ever-changing gallery in your home. They're smarter—and they cost less. A dollar buys a lifetime of framing. Fit any picture from 2" to 36" deep. Take 10 seconds to put on. Endorsed by Lewis Mumford, Margaret Bourke-White, Museum of Modern Art; used throughout galleries of Associated American Artists; in smart homes, salons, etc.

SEND NO MONEY. Satisfaction Guaranteed

Each BRAQUETTE good for a lifetime—hundreds of framings. Only $1 each, or 6 for $5 in handsome, durable ivory or black plastic. (In beautiful crystal lucite, 3 for $5.) Send coupon, without money. Try them—see the difference. If not delighted, return them at no cost.

BRAQUETTE, Inc., Dept N 2, 225 5th Ave., N. Y.

Send me .... BRAQUETTES at $1 (6 for $5). Check color desired: Ivory ☐; Black ☐; Lucite (price is 3 for $5) ☐. I will pay postman correct amount on delivery, plus few cents postage. If not delighted, I may return within 5 days for full refund.

Name....................................

Address.................................

City............................ State.........

☐ Check here if enclosing remittance NOW, and WE pay postage. Same 5-day refund guarantee.

IMAGINE! For only $5 you can hang an ORIGINAL by a Famous American Artist in your own home!

SIGNED ETCHINGS and LITHOGRAPHS by Grant Wood, Thomas Benton and 65 other great artists $5 for . . . . only each

Send for FREE 64-page Catalogue

NOW, in your very own home, you can enjoy the same calibre original works of art—etchings and lithographs created by famous American artists, and bearing their personally-signed signatures—that you have long admired at the Metropolitan Museum and other noted collections! And the price is incredibly low—only $5 each for originals normally priced from $18 to $36 each.

This remarkable opportunity to bring rare distinction to your home (or office) is possible only because America's greatest artists . . . Thomas Benton, John Steuart Curry, Luigi Lucioni and many others . . . are participating in this unique nation-wide art program. Thus every person can now enjoy the thrilling experience of actually owning living original art.

Send for FREE Illustrated Catalogue

At this low price, these limited-edition Signed Originals, many of which are prize-winners, naturally won't last long. So, to avoid disappointment, we urge you to send now for your free copy of the 64-page catalogue from which you may order direct. Over 140 subjects are illustrated, size of each is given as well as names and biographies of all artists, etc. Full refund if not completely satisfied. Enclose 10c in stamps for postage and handling. Address:

ASSOCIATED AMERICAN ARTISTS
Studio 82 711 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Associated American Artists
Studio 82,
711 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Please send me, FREE, the 64-page catalogue illustrating all Signed Original Etchings and Lithographs, with vestpocket biographies of all artists, prizes they have won, etc. I enclose 10c in stamps or coin for handling and postage.

Name....................................

Address.................................

City........................ State............

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

and it is the bachelors who make the film the entertaining piece that it is. While they are meant to be oddities, they are portrayed by Max Dearly, Saturnin Fabre, Aimos, and others as individuals and not as types; and it is not the least of their merits that none of them bears the slightest resemblance to any of the Seven Dwarfs.

P. H. RYE

RECORDS

MANY persons' idea of a critic is that he is someone who gets his only satisfaction in life from finding fault with everything and disliking everything. Speaking only for myself I can say that I approach music with love, and every concert, every recording with hope; and that I listen to a series of records like Columbia's of this month with nothing less than despair.

I began with the Lotte Lehmann recording of Schumann's great "Dichterliebe" song-cycle (Set 486, $4.20)—with eagerness and expectation born of my love of the work, my recollection of Lehmann's singing of it in 1937. And I heard the superb music superbly sung. But I also heard the piano part—so important in these songs that Bruno Walter was secured to play it—reduced to a distant, tinkly, tinny miniature by poor microphone-placement or whatever else produced the poor balance of voice and piano. Also I heard occasional shrillnesses and stridencies in the recorded sound of Lehmann's voice; and while some of them undoubtedly were produced by Lehmann herself, others may be like the ones in her Columbia Brahms Recital, which, as the records were worn by repeated playing, turned out to be distortions by faulty recording that got to be frightful; and as a matter of fact on a finer wide-range machine than my own the distortion on the "Dichterliebe" records was evident already. Also I heard additional evidence of poor recording or processing in occasional rumbling, hissing, crackling, grit. And let nobody tell me that I heard these faults and report them with pleasure.

Then a group of orchestral works: Brahms's Tragic Overture, played by Stock with the Chicago Symphony (Set X-214, $2.63); Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice," played by Mitropoulos with the Minneapolis Symphony (Set X-212, $2.63); Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, played by Stokowski with the American Youth Orchestra (Set 485, $3.68); Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, played by Barbirolli with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (11670-D, $1.05.) Even if I were impressed by the empty pretensions of Brahms's overture I would not want Stock's hurried, noisy performance when I could have Toscanini's magnificent performance with the B. B. C. Symphony; Mitropoulos's performance of Dukas's piece, though largely straightforward, has its inevitable Mitropoulos touches which would cause me to prefer the older Columbia set of Gaubert's performance or the old Victor record of Toscanini's; the inevitable Stokowski touches would cause me to prefer the Columbia set of Beecham's performance of the Schubert symphony; and I would prefer the Victor record of Bigot's lighter-footed performance of the Berlioz overture. But additional reason for avoiding these new Columbia versions is their recorded orchestral sound, ranging from poor to distorted—so poor and so distorted that I had to make sure nothing had gone wrong with my machine, and was reassured by the sounds of the Toscanini recording (English) of the Brahms overture, the Monteux recording (American) of Franck's Symphony. Sides 1 and 4 of my copy of the Schubert set wavered in pitch; sides 1 and 2 of my copy of the Dukas set were full of rattly distortion and grit.

After all this I wish I could report wonders about Shostakovitch's Quintet for piano and strings (Set 483, $4.78); but to my ears it is more of this all-too-fluent composer's tripe, well played by Vivian Rivkin and the Stuyvesant Quartet, and recorded with good fidelity to timbre. Or about Schumann's Andante and Variations for two pianos (Set X-213, $2.63), which is, however, a minor piece, well written for the instruments, well played by Bartlett and Robertson, and recorded with good fidelity but with occasional disproportionate sonorities that leap out at one.

These occasional explosive sonorities occur also in the recorded sound of Risë Stevens's singing of Wolf's charming "In dem Schatten meiner Locken" (17297-D, $.79); the sound is, in addition, rather harsh; the beautiful voice itself is afflicted occasionally by strong tremolo; the phrasing of this song, of Wolf's "Mausfallensprüchlein," of Schumann's "Widmung" is good but not excitingly so (I recommend Lehmann's Victor record of "In dem Schatten"). On another single disc (17294-D, $.79) Roland Hayes does well with "Xango," a Villa-Lobos arrangement of an African religious chant, and Nickerson's arrangement of a Creole folksong, "Micheu Banjo." And on still another single (17293-D, $.79) the young Metropolitan baritone Robert Weede sings an arrangement of the Negro spiritual "City Called Heaven" very beautifully, but spoils "Ol' Man River" with now mannered, now melodramatic phrasing.

B. H. HAGGIN

Speak . . . read
JAPANESE
CHINESE, SPANISH, RUSSIAN
Quickly, Easily, Correctly

The Linguaphone Method enables you to speak any of 29 languages—by LISTENING to voices of native teachers in your own home. Amazingly simple, thorough, sound; no smattering. SEND FOR FREE BOOK.

LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
3 R.C.A. Building, N. Y. C. • Circle 7-0830

BOOK BARGAINS

Military Strength of the Powers: Max Werner	$ .30
Air Raid: John Langdon-Davies	.39
America & the World War: Samuel T. Moore	.50
Meet General Grant: W. E. Woodward	.50
Ski Tracks, 190 Action Photographs	.50
The Devil's Dictionary: Ambrose Bierce	.50
It Can Be Done: James H. Maurer	.50
The Layman's Legal Guide: F. W. Marshall	.79
German Secret Service At Work: B. Newman	.79
Tobacco Road: Erskine Caldwell Decennial 3.00 edition, 40 illus.	1.00
My Native Land: Anna Louise Strong	1.00
Enduring Passion: Marie C. Stopes	1.00
Lawless Judges: Goldberg and Levenson	1.00
Burma Road: Nicol Smith (with photographs)	1.00
Moment in Peking: Lin Yutang (3.00 ed.)	1.39
The Short Stories of James T. Farrell	1.39
The World's Great Speeches, 249 masterpieces from Demosthenes to Churchill	1.98
Grove's Dictionary of Music & Musicians new, complete, $18 reg., six volumes	13.95
Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences: Editors Seligman & Johnson, new, $45 reg., 8 vol.	32.50

More titles in previous issues; U. S. A. mailing free.

DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR
212 Broadway New York, N. Y.

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.
regrets that through an error discovered too late for correction, the price of

REMAKING AMERICA
by Jay Franklin

was given in the advertisement on page 223 as $2.75. The price of the book is $3.00.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

CLASSIFIED
ADVERTISING RATES:

•

62c a line (six words)
Minimum 3 lines
$6.16 an inch

•

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.
ALgonquin 4-3311

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 154 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 28, 1942 NUMBER 9

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 241

EDITORIALS

Churchill's New Cabinet 243
Man-Power and the Draft 244
Court and Profiteer 245
Luce Thinking—II by Freda Kirchwey 245

ARTICLES

Pet Fascists by I. F. Stone 247
The U-Boat Strategy by Donald W. Mitchell 248
Uncertainty in Mexico by Harry Block 250
Jews After the War—II by Reinhold Niebuhr 253
Recognition by Richard Armour 255
No Obligations by Ida Treat 256
In the Wind 258

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Chirico, the Etruscans, and Others by Morton Dauwen Zabel 259
Poor White by Robert Penn Warren 261
Hector Bywater, Prophet by Donald W. Mitchell 262
Drama: Leave of Absence by Joseph Wood Krutch 264
Art: "Bubble House" Afflatus by Douglas Haskell 264
Music by B. H. Haggin 266

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 267

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor RICHARD H. ROVERE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

"TIMELY" IS THE WORD FOR PRESIDENT Roosevelt's report to the nation. Given the circumstances in which we entered the war, it was inevitable that we should taste defeat before victory. It was equally inevitable that this period of trial and disappointment would restore the bloom to the faded cheeks of those who never wanted us to stand up to the threat of the Axis powers. A process has been set in motion whereby isolationists and diehard enemies of the Administration can regain the limelight, reassume the pose of "patriot," and do more damage than ever. They need only join the cry for a defensive war. The President not only put the finger on this metamorphosis from ostrich to turtle but indicated its logical progression into a movement for a negotiated peace. We shall doubtless have to put up with a growing body of quitters until a turn in the military tide sets in. In the meantime it is good to have the President call national attention to their presence and to the fatuousness of the turtle tactics which they advocate. It is good, too, to hear the President speak contemptuously not of "the so-called Free French" but of "the Vichy French," and to have him remind the State Department of Vichy's role in making the Philippines untenable by yielding Indo-China to the Japanese. Finally it is good and vitally necessary for the President to take the people into his confidence concerning the worldwide military strategies pursued by the United Nations. The sure feeling that a carefully weighed plan is being followed, that the military effort is not a hit-or-miss affair, will go far to steel the country to temporary setbacks, to induce it to cheerful sacrifice, and to stiffen its resistance to the campaign of lies and rumors he so effectively damned.

*

SENATORS WALSH AND JOHNSON—FORMER exponents of the isolationist nobody-can-attack-us theory —are now practically inviting Axis raids by irresponsible talk about our "defenseless" coasts. Senator Johnson says that "we haven't any protection at all on the West Coast," and his colleague from Massachusetts, who unfortunately is chairman of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, chimes in to say that the situation in the East is just as bad and it might become necessary "to recall our depleted fleet" from its present battle stations in order to defend these areas. We have an enormous coastline on both oceans, and it is impossible to guarantee that we shall not suffer from aerial or naval attacks of the kind made by a submarine on California. Such raids, however, are costly, and they will certainly be disadvantageous to our enemies, since they tend to dispel the apathetic attitude of some groups in this country toward the war. Nor will there be any strategic gain unless our High Command can be panicked into concentrating the fleet in home waters. Senators who broadcast the idea that this, indeed, might be the result of a raid or two are certainly putting a tempting proposal before the Axis war chiefs. Hit-and-run raids may be tough to take, but they cannot defeat us so long as we keep our heads.

*

THE AIR AND NAVAL VICTORY OFF BALI HAS done little to relieve the desperate plight of the United Nations in the Pacific. By seizing airfields on Timor and Bali, as well as Sumatra, the Japanese have gained invaluable bases from which to attack Java. Although the Java defenses are believed to be much stronger than those of the other Dutch islands, it appears that the defenders have little chance of maintaining their present air superiority. Australia's decision to send aid to Java rather than wait for an attack on the Dominion itself holds out hope that the enemy can be made to pay dearly for the last of the main Dutch islands, but it is obvious that the island can be held only if the United States has sent an expeditionary force amounting to several divisions. On the Burma front the news is even more discouraging. Aided by troops released from the Singapore front, the Japanese have broken through the British defenses east of Rangoon, and the fall of this vital city seems imminent. Although arrangements have been made to ship goods destined for China by way of India, many tens of millions of dollars' worth of supplies are believed to be piled on the wharves at Rangoon.

*

BY INVITING CHIANG KAI-SHEK TO VISIT India and talk with the Indian National leaders as well as with the Viceroy the British government acknowledged that the white man could no longer carry his self-imposed burden. The writing on the walls of Singapore has convinced Prime Minister Churchill that India must be given full partnership in the Empire and among the United Nations, that a new Eastern democracy must be brought in to redress the balance of the Western world. In his parting message the Generalissimo expressed the hope that "Britain, without waiting for any demand on the part of the Indian people, as speedily as possible will give them real political power so that they will be in a position to develop further their spiritual and material strength." The Chinese leader could hardly have made such a statement without the foreknowledge of the British government and without some assurance that his hope would be realized. Hence there is good reason to give credence to the reports from London that Sir Stafford Cripps received guaranties on the subject of freedom for India before entering the War Cabinet and that a British minister will shortly be dispatched to Delhi to negotiate with National leaders. It must be recognized, however, that something more than British good-will is needed to solve the Indian problem. It is not encouraging that Mohammed Ali Jinnah, president of the Moslem League, should have commented sourly on Chiang Kai-shek's message, and at the same time pressed his demand for partition. Nothing could be more dangerous at this time than a prolonged dispute between the Hindu and Moslem communities—a dispute which we can be sure the Axis, already actively propagandizing the people of Allah in all parts of the world, will do its utmost to enlarge and embitter.

*

RED ARMY DAY HAS PASSED WITHOUT THE hoped-for announcement of a specific victory, although there have been reports of new offensive drives in several sectors. The struggle in Russia, and particularly on the central front, now seems to combine positional warfare with a war of maneuver. The Germans are clinging desperately to a number of towns which they have fortified so strongly that their reduction by direct assault would be a very costly task. Between these points Soviet mobile forces have broken through at a number of points and are ranging far to the rear of the most advanced German lines, harassing communications and rounding up isolated detachments. Presumably their hope it to deprive the exposed enemy garrisons of supplies and thus either to force their surrender or so soften them that they will be unable to withstand a full-scale attack. Hitler has ordered these German garrisons to hold on at all costs, for he needs the towns they occupy as bases for his spring offensive and calculates that communications can soon be restored once the roads are fit for mechanized transport. This expectation may be upset if the Soviets retain their present initiative and are able, as the weather improves, to swing into a general offensive. In his order of the day to the Red Army on its twenty-fourth anniversary, Stalin adopted a tone of sober confidence. He declared that the Nazis would eventually be thrown out of Russia but warned against any delusion that the enemy was already beaten. He also vigorously disclaimed any intention of destroying the German state and rebuked "the foreign press" for spreading such libels. Actually it is the Soviet press which has been indulging in overflamboyant talk of revenge. Stalin's disclaimer suggests that this has proved a handicap on the propaganda front.

THE HOUSE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE played politics disgracefully when it shelved the bill which would have provided special unemployment benefits totaling $300,000,000 to workers being retrained to meet the needs of the war-production program. No reason was given by the committee for its action, but the one objection to the bill brought out in the hearings was the fear lest it pave the way for a federal unemployment-insurance system. While experts are almost unanimously agreed that there should be a federalization of the system, the employees of the present state boards, many of whom hold their jobs through political favoritism, have formed a powerful lobby against alteration of the existing arrangement. The plan was far from satisfactory, but for reasons diametrically opposite to those cited by its critics. It had been drawn up hastily by Mr. Hillman and his associates, who gave far too little thought to the long-range problem of reorganizing our social-security system. The Social Security Board, which alone has the experience for dealing with the problem, seems to have had comparatively little to say about the technical aspects of the program. But since Congress is not in a mood to listen to experts and prefers to take advice from the state political machines, the result would doubtless have been the same if a carefully worked-out plan had been presented. Meanwhile hundreds of thousands of men must suffer because a small group of Congressmen put politics above their country's welfare.

*

THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE SHONE ONCE MORE when Léon Blum faced the court at the opening of the long-delayed Riom war-guilt trial. The other defendants showed the effects of disillusionment and long months of imprisonment. M. Jacomet, former controller general of the army, seemed a broken man. Both M. La Chambre, a former Air Minister, and General Gamelin bore signs of their recent illnesses. Gamelin refused to make any defense, declaring that he could not be held responsible for a regime that had disappeared. Daladier was vigorous but truculent. Blum appeared unchanged. He eloquently denied the death of the Third Republic and declared that the Republic and democracy were in fact the chief defendants at Riom. His attorney challenged the legality of the court and the government which had created it. The attorney read the instructions given to the press for reporting the trial to show that judgment had in fact been pronounced before the trial started. Daladier made an effort to place responsibility for the trial where it belonged, on Germany, but one of the judges checked his remarks by threatening to clear the court. The outcome of the trial is, of course, a foregone conclusion. The five men will be found guilty of betraying France. But the men chiefly responsible for the dishonor of France are not on trial; they are the rulers of Vichy who arranged the trial and prejudiced its outcome.

Churchill's New Cabinet

MEETING the House of Commons just after the fall of Singapore had shaken the British Empire to its foundations, Prime Minister Churchill was successful in getting a general debate postponed until the current "mood of anger" had cooled, although he refused to make any concessions to his critics. But democratic processes remain effective in Britain, and Mr. Churchill is not deaf to the voice of the people. He could not fail to recognize that the rising demand for real changes in the government was no phony agitation but the kind of genuine political ground-swell which wrecked the appeasement policy after the Nazi march to Prague and swept Chamberlain out of office in May, 1940. It is not surprising, therefore, that he should have gone part way to meet the public insistence on a change in men and methods.

The ministerial shake-up has undoubtedly warded off a first-class political crisis, although the changes are not as drastic as many people would wish. Very little new blood has been infused into the system, but at least some bad old blood has been drained out. Public support has strengthened Churchill to dismiss from the War Office Captain David Margesson, a central figure in the Tory machine and former whipper-up of majorities for Chamberlain. Another notable departure is that of Colonel Moore-Brabazon, who incautiously revealed the old appeasement Adam last summer when he expressed the hope that Russia and Germany would destroy each other.

More important than the reshuffle of departmental heads is the change in personnel of the War Cabinet and its reduction to a less unwieldy size. Sir Kingsley Wood, one of the holdovers from the appeasement era, and Arthur Greenwood, a Labor leader who has proved disappointingly ineffective since he "spoke for England" at the beginning of the war, can easily be spared. The other member to retire is Lord Beaverbrook, who only a week or two ago was appointed Minister of Supply. It proved impossible, however, to reconcile the powers he felt he needed for this job with those of other ministers, notably those of Ernest Bevin, Minister of Production. Consequently Lord Beaverbrook, whose health is affected by English winters, is to come to Washington to work on the problem of pooling supplies among the United Nations.

The new blood in the Cabinet is represented by Sir Stafford Cripps, left-wing independent and recently returned ambassador to Moscow, and Oliver Lyttleton—both young men as statesmen go. Cripps has sometimes proved a clumsy political tactician in the past, but he has a fine mind and probably a firmer grasp of the fundamental issues of the war than any other front-rank British leader. Lyttleton, who has been representing the British government in the Middle East, is one of the white hopes of the Conservative Party but something of a dark horse so far as the general public is concerned. He is said to be both able and energetic, but his pre-war activities as head of a metal monopoly with international ramifications raise the suspicion that he is being given his place in order to voice the views of those who still believe that the war is being fought to maintain intact the existing social system.

That is a view rejected by a growing multitude of Britons of all classes, who in the last two and a half years have become convinced that the paramountcy of property and the habits of thought it engenders are major obstacles to winning the war and absolute barriers to winning the peace.

Manpower and the Draft

THE fall of Singapore has brought home to many Americans for the first time the magnitude of the task that lies ahead. All hope that this will be a short or even a moderately long war has now been dissipated. Possibly because the crushing defeat suffered by the United Nations happened to coincide with registration for the third draft, speculation has centered largely on the size of the army that will be required to achieve victory. Newspaper accounts have mentioned the possibility that our armed forces may eventually reach seven, eight, or even ten million men. These stories have caused much needless anxiety among families who are completely dependent upon men registered for the draft. What is even more serious, they have nurtured a misconception regarding America's role in the war. The idea that the effectiveness of our war effort can be measured by the size of our army is deeply rooted in our thinking. And it is a misconception which, unfortunately, is not limited to the lay public. Many high army officers are convinced that we need an army of at least 10,000,000.

Such an army is not, of course, an impossibility, but it would mean a complete shift in our fundamental strategy. It would involve the repudiation of any idea of making the United States an arsenal for democracy and a complete concentration on our own defense needs. It is a reflection of isolationist psychology, since it would abandon our allies to their own resources in the mistaken view that we could thus save our own skins.

Some decision regarding basic policy is forced upon us by arithmetic. We shall face within a matter of months a man-power crisis far more serious than that encountered in the last war. The figures are readily available for anyone who has the courage to look at them. At the present moment we have about 2,500,000 men in the armed services. About 5,000,000 are employed in war industries and 44,000,000 elsewhere in industry and agriculture. It is estimated that there are about 4,000,000 unemployed, many of them skilled workers in industries being converted for war purposes. This does not seem a very alarming state of affairs, particularly since there are several million women and older persons who can be brought into production. But we must remember that the all-out production program that was launched after Pearl Harbor is still largely in the blueprint stage. Real production will not start until summer, when inductions into the army will also have been stepped up materially.

The pinch will be felt acutely by the end of this year. The army and navy plan by that time to have at least 4,000,000 men under arms. Employment in the war industries will probably reach 14,000,000 (some estimates run as high as 17,000,000). Employment in agriculture and non-defense industries will probably drop to around 40,000,000. The total, making no allowance for transitional or sectional unemployment, is approximately 58,000,000—or about 2,000,000 more than our aggregate labor force as usually estimated. Judging by the experience of World War I, these 2,000,000 workers can be provided by bringing women, retired persons, and youth into productive life. But the maximum labor supply available, on the basis of World War I ratios, is 60,000,000 or 61,000,000. This should be fully utilized early in 1943 if present production schedules are maintained. From this it is evident that we are bound to encounter real difficulties if we seek to increase the armed forces much above the levels now planned for the end of 1942. Figures on the number of factory workers needed to maintain a soldier at the front are notoriously unreliable, but according to the most conservative of these estimates, an increase of 1,000,000 men in the armed services would necessitate the employment of at least 3,000,000 additional men in the defense industries. It is possible that by a longer working day and a further curtailment of civilian industries, involving a considerable decrease in living standards, provision could be made for an additional million or so under these conditions, but an army of 8,000,000 or 10,000,000 can only be achieved by a drastic cut in aid to our allies.

Careful planning is needed not only to make the best use of our man-power but also to make the necessary transitions as smooth as possible. Never in our history have we undertaken anything so gigantic as the present diversion of the nation's man-power to the defense effort. In adopting legislation to register every man between eighteen and sixty-five we recognized that this vast change-over can only be done under governmental direction. So far there has been no real planning. But it is expected that the President will shortly set up an agency which will be responsible for directing the civilian draft and deciding broad policies for the use of our man-power. On the wisdom of its decisions may rest the outcome of the entire war effort.

Court and Profiteer

THE ancient spell of property rights seems to exercise its sway even over a liberal Supreme Court. Justice Black's decision in the Bethlehem War Profits case holds, in effect, that the law will not interfere if a business man takes advantage of his country's distress to drive a hard bargain. This was expressed most simply, and naively, in Justice Murphy's concurring opinion. "It is understandable," he said, "that one may be indignant at Bethlehem's claim, but such indignation does not justify the distortion of established legal principles. . . ."

The point of Justice Frankfurter's able dissent is that no principle is older or better established in equity and contracts than that "courts will not enforce transactions in which the relative positions of the parties are such that one has unconscionably taken advantage of the necessities of the other." This was certainly the case when the government negotiated what a lower court termed the "daylight robbery" shipbuilding contracts of 1917 and 1918 with Bethlehem.

The government's negotiators were forced under protest to accept an "efficiency" clause giving Bethlehem half of all savings effected on the original estimated cost. The clause permitted Bethlehem to place the estimates as high as it pleased in order to increase the margin of "savings" on which its bonus would be paid. The ships cost $120,000,000 to build, and the government has already paid Bethlehem $25,000,000 in "cost plus" fees, bonuses, and money for plant expansion. In addition Bethlehem Steel made a considerable profit selling steel to its own Bethlehem Shipbuilding. The government asked the courts to reduce these profits to a reasonable level. Bethlehem asked for $7,500,000 more in "bonuses" and under this decision will be paid an additional $3,800,000.

Justice Black argued for the majority that if the government didn't like the terms forced upon it, it should have commandeered the shipyards. The fact that this remedy was not used does not seem to us to foreclose appeal to equity. We have no doubt that Justice Black would approve commandeering, but we wonder whether Justices Reed, Byrnes, and Douglas, who agreed with him on that point, would today dare to propose the commandeering of General Motors or U. S. Steel.

The question is an appropriate one because Justice Byrnes has become a Presidential adviser on defense and Justice Douglas would like to be the head of the arms-production program. The reactionary social outlook of Justice Byrnes is well known, but it is disappointing to find Justice Douglas taking so weak a position on so basic a war problem. His only point of dissent was that Bethlehem should have been required to prove that the bonuses were due it for efficiency, not miscalculation.

Luce Thinking—II

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

I DON'T like to be blunt, particularly in talking about a contemporary, but the article by Henry Luce in Life for February 16, 1942, is without question the most pompous poppycock that has appeared in print since February 17, 1941, when The American Century, written by the same author, appeared in the same magazine. A whole year of this world's mortal pain, ending in several weeks of crashing defeat for American arms, has served only to tighten the seams and chromium-plate the surface of Mr. Luce's armor of self-righteousness. And I must say I am surprised. While I have never thought the editor of Life, etc., a man of broad social understanding, he is surely no provincial. During the past year he has heard with his own ears the crash of bombs in Chungking. He has seen death in distant lands. But he has learned only one new thing about the war.

He still believes, as he believed a year ago, that the peace to follow it must be "America's peace," and that it must produce a world which will guarantee "liberty under law." "Obviously," he says, "no one else is going to give us that kind of world." "It is useless," he says, for other countries "to worry about a peace which they are incapable of creating." So it is up to us. This is what he also said in the embarrassing pages of The American Century. The thing he has learned since 1941 is the importance of China in the war and the peace-to-be. China alone can hold Japan, and quite obviously Japan had better be held. So Mr. Luce adds that nation to the union of America and Britain which formed the basis of his last year's hegemony. What effect this new partner will have on the brave dream of an English-speaking order, the Führer of Time and Life fails to explain. It is to be hoped, for his sake, that the people of China will learn English. But whatever language they speak, the Chinese are offered a junior partnership in the enterprise Mr. Luce is promoting. In the Lucite New Order they will play a role similar to that offered the Danes and Swedes and Hollanders—if they behave themselves—in the Nazi New Order. They will be the little brothers of the boys who run the show. And just as Hitler has transformed the Japanese into honorary Aryans, so it may be possible for Luce to make Anglo-Saxons out of the Chinese.

Now this implied parallel between the ideas of the American super-editor and the Nazi super-tyrant would be inexcusable, even as jest, if Mr. Luce had not provided so much of the raw material himself. But the fact is, his whole cult of American superiority is no whit less revolting and no less unjustified than the Nordic myth that provides the moral sanction for Hitler's brutal aggressions. Mr. Luce modestly admits the existence of flaws in American society. The pure expression of the capitalist order has not yet been attained. But the ideal is unassailable, and it can only be achieved by American courage, American ingenuity, American principles, American I-forget-what-all. And the rest of the world will take it and like it, first, because it is American and therefore the best and, second, because America is strong enough to dictate terms—to friends as well as foes.

I maintain that such talk is both nonsensical and against the interests of the nations arrayed against Hitler. The unconcealed contempt for Europe which pervades Mr. Luce's article is not only ignorant and crude; it is exactly the attitude best calculated to create resentment among anti-Axis elements here and in the conquered countries across the Atlantic. To men and women in Nazi concentration camps, to guerrillas fighting in the mountains of Serbia, to Russian soldiers driving the German armies westward, mile by mile, to refugees from Hitler's terror, to civilians in every land risking their lives in acts of sabotage or counter-propaganda, the notion that Americans alone are equipped to formulate and dominate the coming peace would seem a tragic joke. To Americans who are not possessed by Mr. Luce's strange delusions, the idea is stupid and repugnant.

Britain stands well above continental Europe in Mr. Luce's hierarchy of nations but clearly, permanently, below that of the United States. Very smoothly Mr. Luce makes this matter clear. Gently he relegates Britain to the lesser role in the great partnership. Kindly he suggests a transfer of the burdens of leadership—and specifically of power—from Britain's weary back to our strong one. Delicately he proposes in effect that we take over the whole empire and "protect" it in the years to come.

As for other countries, they aren't considered at all—either as partners or protectorates. Mr. Luce mentions Russia's presence among the fighting nations, but it completely drops out of Mr. Luce's calculations when he takes up the matter of organizing the forces available to defeat Hitler and make an "American peace." This omission is not hard to understand. Mr. Luce's world order would be a neater affair altogether if only Russia could be forgotten—if only Russia were not winning all the battles being won by anti-Nazi forces anywhere.

And he manages to forget Latin America, too, a curious lapse so soon after the happy reunion at Rio. The other half of the hemisphere is not mentioned at all, either in relation to the war or to the peace. It is to be hoped that Life is not much read below the border.

But perhaps even now I haven't made Mr. Luce's basic position clear to those who have failed to read his little essay on internationalism. The thing is, only the United States knows what this war is about. And even the United States is a little puzzled. Or was until Mr. Luce set it straight.

This war is "a war against the cleavage of mankind into right and left." May I quote a few lines?

> It is war against the hidden civil war which, raging throughout the world, weakened the structure of nations until much of their national identity had been lost before Hitler overwhelmed them. . . . It is war against the politics of unprincipled power, the setting of group against group, of labor against business, business against government, farmers against wage-earners, which turns the rivalries of politics into class war.
>
> Because America alone among the nations of the earth was founded on ideas and ideals which transcend class and caste and racial and occupational differences, America alone can provide the pattern for the future. Because America stands for a system wherein many groups, however diverse, are united under a system of laws and faiths that enables them to live peacefully together, American experience is the key to the future.

So now you see. America wins the war—"America's war"—and institutes a reign of liberty under law which transcends the whole ugly clash of interests which makes for disorder and gives tyrants their chance.

It would be funny, this innocent and arrogant dismissal of the most profound problems that have emerged from our complex industrial society, if it were not typical of a certain broad streak of American opinion. It is fatally easy for us as a people to pretend that because equality was one of the ideals for which our own Revolution was fought we are somehow immunized against the ordinary ills of social conflict. It is easy to ignore the fact that we are in the thick of that conflict every day of our lives, that it is implicit in the political struggles waged in Washington as it is in the industrial struggles waged in Detroit or West Virginia. And, more serious still, Mr. Luce's fantasy obscures, by denying, the real meaning of the war itself.

That civil war against which he asks us to fight is the war in which we are, on the contrary, forced to take sides, and the side we are forced to take is the side aligned against Hitler. And unhappily for Mr. Luce and his theories, this side is a rather mixed team which includes, along with rather nice imperialists and capitalists, those very elements of the left toward whom he directs such specific contempt. For Hitler's war was first of all a war against the organized political and economic forces of the working class—against trade unions and Socialists and Communists. Hitler's war began as a class war and it is still that, along with several other kinds. It is still a civil war, too. And it is that war which must be won—not by America but by the men and groups in all countries who know what the war is about and on which side they are fighting. One can understand Mr. Luce's dislike of this war in which he is enlisted, but he can't change it around just to suit his preferences. Hitler set the terms long ago—sometime back in the twenties.

Pet Fascists

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 20

OIL to Spain. Shipment of oil to Spain, shut off entirely about two months ago when confidential figures on them were published in these pages, may be resumed within the near future. Export-control authorities claim, however, that they now have observers not only at all ports of entry but at all storage points in Spain, that they can prevent any transshipment to the Axis, and that only low-grade oil will be sent.

Hush, Hush. Had the figures on Spanish oil shipments remained undisclosed, shipments would have continued without the new safeguards. Publication of the news made it possible for the Milo Perkins crowd in the Board of Economic Warfare to win the fight for stricter surveillance against the flabbier-minded State Department. Dean Acheson, the Assistant Secretary in charge of export-control matters, and Max W. Thornburg, the department's adviser on oil, seem to have been allies of the Board of Economic Welfare in that battle.

Remedy. The remedy, in the opinion of the State Department, is not to shut off the oil but to shut off the information. There is good reason to believe that the department played a major part in the birth of the Biddle "hush-hush" bill now before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Under the terms of this bill a reporter revealing information declared confidential by any government department would be liable to a $5,000 fine or two years in jail or both. J. Edgar Hoover's friend, Assistant Attorney General Alexander Holtzoff, is to steer it through Congress, but newspapermen here are strongly aroused about it, and the bill can be defeated.

Too Delicate. Acheson, though better than his colleagues on export-control matters, is as bad as the rest of them when it comes to this question of secrecy. He, too, seems to feel that all matters handled by the State Department are much too delicate for public knowledge and discussion, and it was on his urging last year that the Coffee-Gillette resolution for an inquiry into the leak of American war materials to the Axis was killed in committee.

Test Case. The spectacle of our leading diplomats caught with their striped trousers down is indeed a delicate one. An example was furnished this week when Sumner Welles declared Vichy's explanations on North Africa "unsatisfactory." The British have again presented evidence that supplies are going through French African territory to the Axis forces in Libya. Only a few weeks ago A. A. Berle and other officials of the State Department were telling the press that they could find no substance in British complaints and that American observers in North Africa had a complete check on the situation.

Pétain Personally. Like less august mortals, State Department officials are prone to believe what they want to believe, and it is too early to assume that an "unsatisfactory" reply from Gaston Henry-Haye marks the beginning of the end of appeasing Vichy. The State Department feels that it has an ace in the hole because, as was explained to the press, Admiral Leahy can see Pétain personally. Our officials seem to regard this as a great privilege. But reliable reports indicate—not that it matters—that Leahy can see Pétain only in the presence of Darlan or one of the Admiral's stooges.

Progress. When a man does one the honor to receive one personally, it is hard to call him a liar, even in diplomatic language. What if Pétain assures Leahy that no supplies are going to Libya from North Africa? There is good reason to believe that the White House is less gullible about Vichy than the State Department. Even in the department progress is being made. Welles actually granted an audience to Adrien Tixier, leader of the so-called Free French, hitherto cold-shouldered in the department. And it is now admitted by the State Department that Pétain may be a fascist, though it is felt that he is not pro-Nazi. These fine distinctions seem to comfort some people.

Each Its Pet. The British government feels that our government is much too friendly to Pétain; ours that Britain is much too friendly to Franco. Each has its pet fascist. Halifax visited the department during the week to protest against (1) "appeasement" of Vichy, and (2) disclosure of the fact that the British were sending mining machinery to the Rio Tinto copper mines in Spain. Since there is an acute shortage of mining machinery here, and the Rio Tinto mines have long been a source of Axis supply, lease-lend officials were angered by the shipments.

Where Does F. D. R. Stand? Under the Eden White Paper, lease-lend materials or their equivalent cannot be reexported from Britain without American approval. The British embassy here claimed that urgent political considerations, perhaps Franco's empty threat to enter the war, and an agreement between the President and Prime Minister Churchill justified them in making these shipments without further consultation. Consultation was to be avoided because American export-control and lease-lend officials had previously vetoed proposed shipments of rubber and mining machinery to Spain.

The Roosevelt-Churchill Agreement. The agreement, according to the British embassy, was to support the economic life of Spain. Lend-lease is still waiting for an answer from Hull's assistant, Lynn R. Edminster, on (1) whether there is such an agreement, and (2) whether it is broad enough to justify waiving the White Paper and exporting scarce mining machinery to Spain. The State Department's usual technique in handling embarrassing questions of this kind is to delay an answer as long as possible or, providentially, to mislay the letter of inquiry. The department is much more interested in trying to find out how the information leaked.

Gaul, D. C. On the question of appeasement official Washington is divided into three parts. There are people friendly to fascism, particularly of the Catholic variety, who would give Spain and Vichy anything they want, and there are those who are opposed to "appeasement" of any kind, an extremist position but not without support from the events of the past ten years. In between are those who think it necessary to dole out limited quantities of supplies to Vichy and Franco to keep them "from joining the Axis." The President belongs to this intermediate group. The difference between the American and British governments is that the former would give less to Franco and more to Vichy, and vice versa. The difference between the dominant policy in our government and dominant opinion in the State Department is that the latter would like to give more to both.

Machiavellis or Suckers? It may be that this is a very clever policy, or it may be that Hitler prefers to leave the fueling and feeding of unoccupied France and unoccupied Spain to us until he is ready to take them over. Export-control officials may be justified in thinking that they can resume exports of low-grade oil to Franco without danger of transshipment. But Hitler is equally justified in appreciating the tuna sent the Axis by Spanish fishing smacks operating on our low-grade oil. There is another factor sometimes overlooked here. The spectacle of free America dickering fearfully with two-by-four fascist dictators is not the most effective inspiration for a democratic crusade.

The U-Boat Strategy

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE war at sea, spread over the greatest arena of any conflict known to history, has rearrested public interest; submarine sinkings are rising sharply after being held at low levels for six months. Submarine raids all through the war have come in waves, and a renewal of damage was to be expected after the phenomenally low level of losses in November and December. But the location of Germany's latest campaign, not in the seas near the British Isles, where targets are most plentiful, but along our own Atlantic coast and as close to the Panama Canal as Aruba, was a surprise. To make attacks on tankers and freighters in American waters the rather small German U-boats must have undergone a heavy battering in mid-Atlantic and have sacrificed at least half of their effective cruising radius.

One probable explanation of the change of field, that risks were too great in the eastern Atlantic, speaks well for the success of our convoys to England. But entirely aside from this reason, several other possible factors may account for Germany's decision to carry on its main campaign at sea farther west and also for the recent successes of that strategy.

In the first place, the United Nations have probably transferred some ships to the Pacific, leaving the western Atlantic, at least, with lighter protection. Still other vessels, especially British airplane carriers, are at present laid up for repairs. In this connection the recent burning of the Normandie is especially unfortunate since she would have made an unusually fast and efficient plane carrier. In the western Atlantic, also, from the beginning of the war, fewer precautions have been taken against submarines. We have depended mainly upon seaplane and blimp patrols along the coast, together with small naval vessels and Coast Guard ships equipped with hydrophones. Safeguards for harbors have been installed, and merchant vessels are being given defensive armaments, but none of these measures have been carried so far as they will now have to be, and no convoys have been used. German raiders are thus taking advantage of the fact that we are far less prepared today than we shall be later. While it is necessary for them to range widely in search of targets, they may, if lucky, score a number of successes in a two weeks' campaign.

The real objective of the attacks, however, may be to "test" the United States, in the hope that a panic-stricken populace will demand the retention of American ships at home. Germany may even dream of causing us to abandon our war plans for an invasion of continental Europe by a new A. E. F. If it can compel us, by this new effort, to expend a great amount of time and material that should be employed elsewhere in guarding ships near our coast, it will have won a definite victory.

The voyage of the three German capital ships from Brest is part of this strategy. United in one fleet, German sea power presents a far greater threat to the British and forces upon them a heavy concentration of strength at a time when the effective accomplishment of tasks in many parts of the world demands dispersion. Psychologically, the move has been effective in creating doubt in Allied ranks; it has aroused distrust of the adequacy of the protection which the British could assure to a future A. E. F. This protection must be their charge if we are to fight successfully in the Pacific.

Because of Navy Department censorship it is difficult to determine with what degree of success we are protecting our merchant ships. Even the navy itself may be in doubt since there is no sure way of deciding whether oil and air bubbles rising to the surface after a submarine has been attacked with bomb or depth charge indicate a corpse or merely a canny commander "playing possum." At any rate the Germans are finding more victims than they have found for some months. Only when they abandon these long voyages can we be sure that they feel the price has become too high. It is of course possible to meet the danger by adopting the convoy system, but a large diversion of tonnage from other sectors for this purpose would be justly regarded as a great gain for Hitler.

High as is the rate of recent losses, the situation can hardly be compared with that existing a year ago, when the British were in danger of starvation. Not only were total losses much greater at that time but the replacement angle was less hopeful, the tonnage of new ships completed being only a third of the amount destroyed. During January, 1942, in the United States alone completions held an advantage of about two to one over sinkings.

Today's threat in the Atlantic is no longer the starvation of the British Isles. It is rather the prevention of effective American intervention on the continent by restricting the merchant tonnage needed to transport adequate man-power, munitions, and planes. The 18,000,000 tons of new ships scheduled for completion in 1942 and 1943 are intended to serve the needs of an American Expeditionary Force of five million men in Europe. Every ship scheduled is needed, and in view of Japanese victories in the Far East, the total may have to be increased.

In the Pacific our navy is struggling with a problem of transport more difficult to solve than any ever faced before by a nation at war. Of the planes needed to defeat Japan only the largest bombers have sufficient radius to reach the scene of hostilities on their own power. And even in their case the equipment needed to keep them in running order, the bombs for them to drop, and the gasoline required for along-the-way refueling all have to be transported by sea. Japan's capture of most of the mid-Pacific bases used for earlier American air transport has compelled us to follow a much longer route. Using the safest routes available, supplies from the United States to the Far East have to be transported nearly halfway around the globe. It probably takes two months to transport fighting planes from San Francisco or Los Angeles to Burma or Port Darwin, unload them, and make them ready for use.

Perhaps because their main attention has been centered elsewhere the Japanese have so far made singularly ineffective use of their large fleet of cruiser submarines. Since their early and somewhat clumsy forays along our Pacific Coast Japanese submarines have claimed few victims.

The work of our navy in the Pacific in dealing with raiders, guarding convoys, and establishing new bases has been hard, unspectacular, and unappreciated. Because the factors of time and geography are so much in Japan's favor such efforts may even be fruitless in preventing it from continuing its string of conquests. Aerial equality is an absolute prerequisite to the naval and air offensive needed to bring about victory for the United Nations in the Far East. However, in view of the administrative mistakes of underestimating Japan and dividing the United States fleet and the unpardonable episode at Pearl Harbor, the navy has probably done as effective a job in the Pacific as could reasonably be expected.

In the war of attrition in the Pacific our score against both naval and merchant vessels has been high. But we should not make the mistake common to our radio and newspaper commentators of overemphasizing Japanese losses. Even in the engagements in the Macassar Straits the Japanese, despite tremendous losses, attained their objectives. None of the damage we have inflicted on man-power, air power, or shipping has been decisive. The shipping losses will be hardest to replace, but even in this field the Japanese will experience no extreme difficulty. They entered the war with 5,600,000 tons of merchant vessels and claim the seizure of 200 enemy and neutral vessels in their ports. Since embargoes have cut off Japanese trade, all these ships are available for war uses. At most we have not destroyed more than 10 per cent of them, and more than ample replacements for such losses are available. The sinking of the Haruna, a plane carrier, half a dozen cruisers, and a minimum of twenty-five destroyers and submarines, with heavy damage to other ships, was more serious, but the Japanese are still winning.

The United Nations are making a respectable showing on the high seas, but even complete success in the maintenance of sea communications is a negative achievement which enables us at best to continue the fight on other fronts.

Uncertainty in Mexico

BY HARRY BLOCK

Mexico City, February 13

FOREIGN MINISTER PADILLA's eloquence at Rio de Janeiro appears to have been a powerful factor in engineering the successful conclusion of the recent conference, and he has been accorded much deserved praise in the United States for his labors. In fact, Mexico's anti-fascist attitude, which antedates by several years the virtual scrapping of neutrality in June, 1940—when President Cárdenas sent a telegram to President Lebrun deploring the invasion of France by Nazi Germany—has led many progressives to believe that Mexico was safely on the side of the angels. During those years it raised what was often an almost solitary voice of protest against the attacks on China, Abyssinia, Spain, Austria, and Czecho-Slovakia. It has played a leading part among the architects of inter-American unity. And after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor it fulfilled without hesitation the obligations assumed at the several pan-American conferences.

The country as a whole, however, does not present quite the unbroken democratic front that its government's official stand seems to indicate. The present administration has continued the Cárdenas line in foreign affairs, but this policy was as unpopular among the groups which attacked Cárdenas as was his domestic program. The divisions of opinion that produced such bitter political struggles under Cárdenas have not been bridged in spite of the present government's appeals for national unity. But though the antagonisms persist, there has been a rather startling reversal of roles which it will require some explanation to make clear.

President Avila Camacho belongs to the moderate wing of the Mexican Revolution, a group whose interpretation of the revolution's purposes and final aims is considerably at variance with what was orthodox doctrine during the Popular Front days of Cárdenas. While the election campaign was in progress, however, it was expected that in a free play of social and political forces a new balance would be struck which, though it might be considerably to the right of the retiring administration's position, would still represent a continuation of its general policy. But the new government took office in a mounting war emergency, and the President appealed to all factions to sink narrow "sectarian" interests in a common patriotic endeavor to defend the larger interests of the whole nation. The labor movement responded loyally, but there is very little evidence that other groups and parties displayed a similar political quixotism. As a result, labor voluntarily yielded its initiative to its bitterest enemies, a circumstance from which most of the puzzling contradictions of the current situation have developed.

It is in the nature of middle-of-the-road governments that they adhere to the middle of the road only to the extent that roughly equivalent pressures from both sides operate to keep them there. The leadership of the C. T. M. (Confederation of Mexican Workers) adopted, however, a different theory, on which its course of action has since been based. Briefly stated, this was that the new regime faithfully represented the Mexican Revolution, that is, the hopes and aspirations of the Mexican masses for a better economic and political future. The reactionaries, the C. T. M. asserted, were trying to drive a wedge between the revolutionary government and the people, in order to destroy the alliance that had been the principal buttress of the Cárdenas regime and an important factor in the election of his successor. Unless unconditionally supported by the liberal and labor groups, the government, it argued, would be driven into the arms of reaction, and the power of Mexican fascism would be thereby increased. Finally, it maintained, any criticism of or opposition to the government's measures would open the way to the charge of "subversive" fifth-column activities.

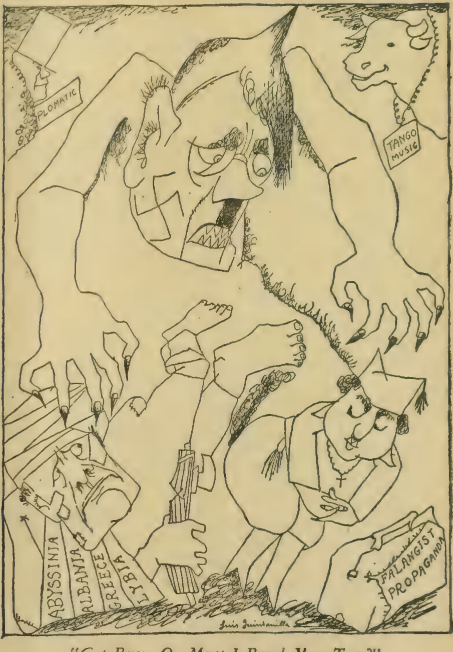
But while the C. T. M., in pursuance of this policy, has pretended that there is no essential difference between the new government and that of Cárdenas, it appears to have been fostering the very development it set out to prevent, and its foes have been jubilantly making hay. Two recent examples will serve to indicate the general trend.

When the Federal District government last month imposed a transfer tax on the sale of bonds and other securities, the bankers, who have small patience with the shibboleth of "national unity" and the virtue of universal sacrifice in these trying times, raised such a howl of protest that the measure was hastily withdrawn. At almost the same time the law regulating public education came before Congress for amendment and revision. Now this law represents a major political battle in the recent Mexican past. The famous "socialist" education, which has never, in fact, existed outside the statute books, had become during eight years of attack by the country's most obscurantist groups one of those political banners which the progressives could least afford to surrender. Actually they were defending the indefensible—what, after all, can be more absurd than the proposal to institute socialist education in a land that no one pretends is socialist?—and President Calles, when he presented this particular lemon to the radicals of the Revolutionary Party in 1933, must have derived considerable sardonic amusement from anticipation of the difficulties in which it was going to land them. But it had since become a standard around which people could be rallied for a number of quite different struggles, and to relinquish it would constitute a disaster precisely because it had been so tenaciously defended. However, when the new Congress proceeded last December to emasculate the law, the C. T. M. acclaimed the new legislation for having maintained "the principle of socialist education," in spite of the fact that, to mention only one of its quaint provisions, it discourages coeducation even in elementary schools on grounds of morality!

When one recalls the optimistic militancy of the C. T. M. three years ago, this seems indeed a sad eclipse. Only time will tell whether the present policy will in the long run prove beneficial; for the moment it is difficult to escape the feeling that the labor leadership must bear its share of responsibility for the country's present unstable temper. For the combination of labor paralysis and economic difficulties is producing general discontent. It is no secret that the workers' apparently spectacular gains under Cárdenas were largely illusory and that they have little to show for their paper victories—literally paper, as they constituted in effect promissory notes on the future. Wages, at a generous estimate, have increased possibly 40 per cent during the six years but have never come within hailing distance of a price level which in its most important item, food, has soared 100 per cent. It is unfortunately true that Cárdenas, who showed such conspicuous daring in other directions, became afflicted with palsy whenever he was brought face to face with the problem of price control.

Since the outbreak of the war prices have continued to rise while wages have remained, at best, stationary. Real suffering and resentment have begun to spread through large worker and middle-class groups, no longer sustained by the stimulation of united action and the hope in the future they had known under Cárdenas. The political result has been the curious reversal of roles mentioned above. When Cárdenas preached democratic solidarity and anti-fascist action to a largely unheeding world, he was denounced as an international busybody and a Bolshevik by all the reactionaries in Mexico, whereas the traditionally anti-gringo masses shed a large part of their ingrained hostility to the United States. But now that the reactionaries believe that things are coming their way at last, that the government is on their side, they are drawing a discreet veil over their recent paeans to Hitler and swearing undying loyalty to a democracy for which, in fact, they have no more use than they ever had. The workers, meanwhile, bewildered by the retreat they have been forced into, are drifting into a dangerous mood of cynical opposition and becoming ever more susceptible to the blandishments of fascist demagogy. It is true that as yet this feeling is prevalent only among the more reactionary worker groups and the labor "aristocracy" on the fringe of the middle class—those who made up most of the urban following of Almazán during the 1940 campaign. But it is among them also that the Spanish Falange, composed of Hitler's deputies in Latin America with their phony Indian-baiting Hispanicism, and its allies, the Sinarquistas, are making inroads.

There is nothing that a certain class of Mexicans respects so much as machismo (maleness) and military ruthlessness; a large part of the respect with which the Germans are regarded here is due to their demonstrated machismo—they are muy hombres, very tough guys. Few actions of the American government have done more to strengthen American prestige here in recent months than its placing Axel Wenner-Gren, the somewhat mysterious Swedish financier, on the black list. Wenner-Gren had been on intimate terms with high government officials and prominent politicians, who were apparently preparing to make him handsome concessions for the money he was reputedly going to invest here. The blow, when it fell, was a heavy one to these insiders, including several Americans who were not above flirting with the enemy.



"Get Busy. Or Must I Break You Too?"

But while the United States government's action was resented, it was also respected, because it showed that the gringos too could get tough when necessary.

It would be easy, however, to exaggerate the importance of such aberrations; I mention them only to show that Mexico is far from being of one mind about the war. Does this mean that the country could be converted into a base of operations against the United States? I think not. There are plenty of actual and potential fifth columnists, but there is one effective bar to their successful action. With an insufficient agriculture and a rudimentary industrial structure, the country is largely dependent on its foreign trade, and the United States has now become almost the sole country with which trade can be carried on. Nearly 100 per cent of exports and imports now go to or come from the United States, and under that compulsion the most recalcitrant diehard nationalists can see that, with or without Good Neighbor policies, with or without pan-American conferences and hemisphere solidarity, their country's future is now irrevocably bound up with that of its neighbor.

Thus the government's policy of full cooperation with Washington, while it may not command universal approval, has been accepted by everyone except the openly fascist minority. At the same time there has been a strong conviction that Mexico should get very substantial national concessions in return. This was the opportunity to obtain compensation for El Chamizal, to reach an agreement in the oil dispute, to settle on advantageous terms such long-standing issues as the Claims Convention, the government and railroad debts, and some other dubious financial obligations inherited from former regimes. In short, if Mexico were to aid the United States and Great Britain in the war against Nazi imperialism, the least it could expect in return was a loosening of the bonds which had obstructed its own advance toward a democratic future.

Unhappily, these things did not come to pass. Relations with Great Britain were resumed—in a voluntary expression of democratic solidarity—with no mention of the oil dispute that had provoked the rupture. Why, people asked, did not Mexico insist on a settlement as a prerequisite to renewed diplomatic relations? On the other hand, the American State Department missed a real opportunity for cementing Mexican friendship by allowing the talks to drag on for a year and by conducting them in a pinch-penny bargaining spirit. The final agreement is excellent as far as it goes, but for all the anguished protests of Standard Oil and the New York Herald Tribune, it does not go very far. Actually, because of the stubbornness of the American oil interests, a final oil settlement was again postponed. The agreement exacted $40,000,000, from 10 to 15 per cent of the face value, in payment of old American claims—many of which I am told, had in fact been disallowed by the International Claims Convention—whereas Mexico had been able to settle similar claims with other countries at about 2 per cent. It provided a fund to stabilize the shaky Mexican peso, but a better way might have been for the United States to buy more Mexican goods, which it is still not importing in anything like requisite quantities. A loan was granted, but since the money is to be used principally in building highways and improving harbors and the railroad system, almost purely military and defense projects, it will not necessarily have any lasting beneficial effects on the national economy. Finally, direct silver purchases from the Mexican government were renewed, purchases that had been suspended in 1938 after the oil expropriation. The profit on the turnover will of course be useful to the Mexican Treasury and many mine workers will keep their jobs, but the principal beneficiaries of this transaction are the Americans who own 70 per cent of Mexico's silver mines.

What was most encouraging about the settlement, in fact, was its being concluded at all, after so many premature announcements of its imminent signing. It was encouraging to find the United States recognizing Mexican sovereignty in the oil dispute after Mr. Hull's unhappy attempt to impose international arbitration of a purely domestic issue; and to find that an amicable solution was possible for some, if not all, of the issues that were obstructing improved Mexican-American relations. But much as Mexicans welcomed the clearing of financial horizons and the disappearance of existing tension, they could not help wishing they had secured more favorable terms.

Foreign Minister Padilla went to Rio with a program to which most Mexicans would subscribe, either out of personal conviction or the feeling that expediency offered no better course. But they rose up in wrath when he rather clumsily stated that Mexico's proposal of a unanimous rupture of relations with the Axis should be adopted "because that was what the United States wanted." Doubtless he meant to say that in this way the American republics would be best able to realize their desire to aid the United States in the existing emergency. But the wording, coupled with what was widely regarded here as Mexico's failure to derive greater profit from the financial settlement with the United States, seemed to indicate a subservience to Washington that was extremely galling. This is not to say that Mexicans are trying to be mercenary at American expense; but the national policy of any country is seldom conspicuously identified with pure altruism, and many Mexicans felt that the war was providing an opportunity of which the nation was not taking full advantage. At any rate, I have yet to talk to a Mexican of any class or occupation who was not deeply mortified by the Padilla statement.

The discouraging course of the war in the Pacific has naturally given rise to preoccupation about defense. Here the government has shown a full disposition to march shoulder to shoulder with the United States. It has granted the facilities of harbors and landing fields; it has concluded a defense agreement with Washington; it is strengthening, so far as limited resources will permit, its coastal defenses; it is acquiring some modern equipment for its army and few naval vessels; and it has appointed General Cárdenas to supreme command of the Pacific Zone.

These measures, important as they are, have not been reinforced with anything like an adequate mobilization of popular sentiment for the war. Apart from a few frigid official pronouncements, the government has done little to create a broad democratic front or to rouse the people to the urgency of an uncompromising anti-fascist stand. On the contrary, many genuine anti-fascists have been removed from government service or shunted into minor posts in response to the conservative clamor for a purge of the Cárdenas "Communists," and certain men whose fascist sympathies are well known and scarcely disguised have been elevated to positions of authority. The appointment of General Cárdenas was indeed a gesture to the left, but his scope of action has been seriously circumscribed by political enemies in the capital, who dread any activity tending to increase his prominence in public and political life.

What is wrong, then, with Mexico's reactions to the war? Simply that the country does not yet realize that this is its war quite as much as it is anyone else's and that its own independence is bound up with the defeat of the Axis. An anti-fascist war can be won only by people who are sincerely anti-fascist, and anti-fascism is not nourished by discouraging liberalism at home. A total war against fascism requires a rooting out of all fascist tendencies in the rear lines and the widest possible extension of democratic methods and policies. The present regime in Mexico has shown an unhappy disposition to give greater attention to the opinions of the anti-democratic minority than to maintaining the people's advance toward participation in national affairs which was Cárdenas's real achievement. And unless the energies and convictions of the common people are fully enlisted, Mexico will be exerting only a fraction of its potential power for a democratic victory.

Jews After the War

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

II

I OFFER "a" solution rather than "the" solution to the problem of anti-Semitism precisely because a prerequisite for any solution of a basic social problem is the understanding that there is no perfectly satisfactory formula. A perennial problem of human relations can be dealt with on many levels of social and moral achievements, but not in such a way that new perplexities will not emerge upon each new level. The tendency of modern culture to find pat answers and panaceas for vexing problems—one aspect of its inveterate utopianism—has confused rather than clarified most issues with which it has occupied itself.

I have previously suggested that the problem of the relation of the Jews to our Western democratic world calls for at least two different approaches. We must on the one hand preserve and if possible extend the democratic standards of tolerance and of cultural and racial pluralism which allow the Jews Lebensraum as a nation among the nations. We must on the other hand support more generously than in the past the legitimate aspiration of Jews for a "homeland" in which they will not be simply tolerated but which they will possess. The type of liberalism which fights for and with the Jews on the first battle line but leaves them to fight alone on the second is informed by an unrealistic universalism. If its presuppositions are fully analyzed it will be discovered that they rest upon the hope that history is moving forward to a universal culture which will eliminate all particularities and every collective uniqueness, whether rooted in nature or in history. History has perennially refuted this hope.

The late Justice Louis D. Brandeis illustrated in his person and his ideas exactly what we mean by this double strategy. Brandeis was first a great American, whose contributions to our national life prove that justice to the Jew is also a service to democracy in that it allows democracy to profit from the peculiar gifts of the Jew—in the case of Brandeis and many another leader, the Hebraic-prophetic passion for social justice. But Brandeis was also a Zionist; his belief in the movement was regarded by some of his friends, both Gentile and Jewish, as an aberration that one had to condone in an otherwise sane and worthy man. Brandeis's Zionism sprang from his understanding of an aspect of human existence to which most of his fellow-liberals were blind. He understood "that whole peoples have an individuality no less marked than that of single persons, that the individuality of a people is irrepressible, and that the misnamed internationalism which seeks the elimination of nationalities or peoples is unattainable. The new nationalism proclaims that each race or people has a right and duty to develop, and that only through such differentiated development will high civilization be attained."* Brandeis understood in 1916 what some of his fellow-Jews did not learn until 1933 and what many a Gentile liberal will never learn. "We Jews," he said, "are a distinct nationality, of which every Jew is necessarily a member. Let us insist that the struggle for liberty shall not cease until equal opportunity is accorded to nationalities as to individuals."

It must be emphasized that any program which recognizes the rights of Jews as a nationality and which sees in Zionism a legitimate demand for the recognition of these rights must at the same time support the struggle for the rights of Jews as citizens in the nations in which they are now established or may be established. This strategy is demanded, if for no other reason, because there is no possibility that Palestine will ever absorb all the Jews of the world. Even if it were physically able to absorb them, we know very well that migrations never develop as logically as this. I cannot judge whether Zionist estimates of the millions which a fully developed Palestine could absorb are correct. They seem to me to err on the side of optimism. But in any case it would be fantastic to assume that all Jews could or would find their way to Palestine, even in the course of many centuries.

It is more important, however, to consider what democracy owes to its own ideals of justice and to its own quality as a civilization than what it owes to the Jews. Neither democracy nor any other civilization pretending to maturity can afford to capitulate to the tendency in collective life which would bring about unity by establishing a simple homogeneity. We must not underestimate this tendency as a perennial factor in man's social life. Nor must we fail to understand the logic behind it. Otherwise we shall become involved in the futile task of seeking to prove that minority groups are not really as bad as their critics accuse them of being, instead of understanding that minority groups are thought "bad" only because they diverge from the dominant type and affront that type by their divergence. But to yield to this tendency would be to allow civilization to be swallowed up in primitivism, for the effort to return to the simple unity of tribal life is a primitive urge of which Nazism is the most consistent, absurd, and dangerous contemporary expression. In the case of the Jews, with their peculiar relation to the modern world and the peculiar contributions which they have made to every aspect of modern culture and civilization, any relaxation of democratic standards would also mean robbing our civilization of the special gifts which they have developed as a nation among the nations.

The necessity for a second strategy in dealing with the Jewish problem stems from certain aspects of the collective life of men which the modern situation has brought into tragic relief. The Jews require a homeland, if for no other reason, because even the most generous immigration laws of the Western democracies will not permit all the dispossessed Jews of Europe to find a haven in which they may look forward to a tolerable future. When I say the most "generous" immigration laws, I mean, of course, "generous" only within terms of political exigencies. It must be observed that the liberals of the Western world maintain a conspiracy of silence on this point. They do not dare to work for immigration laws generous enough to cope with the magnitude of the problem which the Jewish race faces. They are afraid of political repercussions, tacitly acknowledging that their theories do not square with the actual facts. Race prejudice, the intolerance of a dominant group toward a minority group, is a more powerful and more easily aroused force than they dare admit.

A much weightier justification of Zionism is that every race finally has a right to a homeland where it will not be "different," where it will neither be patronized by "good" people nor subjected to calumny by bad people. Of course many Jews have achieved a position in democratic nations in which the disabilities from which they suffer as a minority group are comparatively insignificant in comparison with the prestige which they have won. A democratic world would not disturb them. Their situation would actually be eased to an even further degree if the racial survival impulse were primarily engaged in Palestine. Religious and cultural divergences alone do not present a serious problem, particularly under traditions of cultural pluralism. But there are millions of Jews, not only in the democratic world but in the remnants of the feudal world, such as Poland and the Balkans, who ought to have a chance to escape from the almost intolerable handicaps to which they are subjected. One reason why Jews suffer more than any other minority is that they bear the brunt of two divergences from type, religious and racial, and it is idle for Jews or Gentiles to speculate about which is the primary source of prejudice. Either would suffice, but the prejudice is compounded when both divergences are involved.

Zionist aspirations, it seems to me, deserve a more generous support than they have been accorded by liberal and democratic groups in Western countries. Non-Zionist Jews have erred in being apologetic or even hostile to these aspirations on the ground that their open expression might imperil rights painfully won in the democratic world. Non-Jewish liberals have erred equally in regarding Zionism as nothing but the vestigial remnant of an ancient religious dream, the unfortunate aberration of a hard-pressed people.

Whether the Jews will be allowed to develop a genuine homeland under their own sovereignty, within the framework of the British Empire, depends solely upon the amount of support which they secure in the two great democracies, for those democracies will have it in their power, if Hitler is defeated, to make the necessary political arrangements. The influence of the American government will be indirect but none the less effective—which is why American public opinion on this issue cannot be a matter of indifference. It is obviously no easy matter for British statecraft to give the proper assurances and to make basic arrangements for the future while it is forced to deal with a vast and complex Arab world still in danger of falling under the sway of the Nazis. Yet it must be observed that the Arabs achieved freedom and great possessions in the last war, and that this war, in the event of victory for the United Nations, will increase the extent and cohesion of their realm. The Anglo-Saxon hegemony that is bound to exist in the event of an Axis defeat will be in a position to see to it that Palestine is set aside for the Jews, that the present restrictions on immigration are abrogated, and that the Arabs are otherwise compensated.

---

* From an essay first published in 1916 and reprinted by the Jewish Frontier in its October, 1941, issue.

Zionist leaders are unrealistic in insisting that their demands entail no "injustice" to the Arab population since Jewish immigration has brought new economic strength to Palestine. It is absurd to expect any people to regard the restriction of their sovereignty over a traditional possession as "just," no matter how many other benefits accrue from that abridgment. What is demanded in this instance is a policy which offers a just solution of an intricate problem faced by a whole civilization. The solution must, and can, be made acceptable to the Arabs if it is incorporated into a total settlement of the issues of the Mediterranean and Near Eastern world; and it need not be unjust to the Arabs in the long run if the same "imperial" policy which establishes the Jewish homeland also consolidates and unifies the Arab world. One may hope that this will not be done by making the Jewish homeland a part of an essentially Arab federation.

It must be noted in conclusion that there are both Jews and Gentiles who do not believe that Palestine is a desirable locus for a Jewish homeland though they do believe that a homeland must be created. They contend that there is as yet no evidence of Palestine's ability to maintain an independent economic existence without subsidies; that the cooperative agricultural ventures of the Jews, impressive in quality but not in size, offer no hope of a solid agricultural basis for the national economy; that the enmity of the Arab world would require the constant interposition of imperial arms; that the resources of Palestine could not support the millions whom the Zionists hope to settle there; and that the tendency to use Arab agricultural labor may once more create a Jewish urban caste. It is difficult to know to what degree such criticisms are justified. The fact that 25 per cent of the Jewish settlers in Palestine are engaged in agriculture tends to refute the argument that the Palestinian economy has no adequate agricultural base. The criticism that Palestine cannot, under the most favorable circumstances, absorb all the Jews who must find a new home and security after the war is more serious. However, even if fully borne out, it would not affect the thesis that the Jews require a homeland. It would simply raise the question whether a different, or an additional, region should be chosen. It is barely possible that a location ought to be found in Europe.

The whole matter is so important that it should be explored by an international commission, consisting of both Jews and Gentiles, both Zionists and non-Zionists. The Jews were the first, as they have been the chief, victims of Nazi fury. Their rehabilitation, like the rehabilitation of every Nazi victim, requires something more than the restoration of the status quo ante. We must consider this task one of the most important among the many problems of post-war reconstruction. We cannot, in justice either to ourselves or to the Jews, dismiss it from our conscience.

[The first part of this article was published last week.]

Recognition

BY RICHARD ARMOUR

Stalin gets nine more words in the 1942 edition of the British "Who's Who" than he did in the 1941 edition.—NEWS ITEM.

They didn't call him comrade
And they had no medal struck
When he might have left the Kremlin flat,
Instead of having stuck.

They didn't send him shillings
And they didn't dub him knight
For turning back the Nazi hordes
And putting them to flight.

They didn't ask him over,
Nor name their children Joe,
Because he kept on taking towns
In forty-odd below.

But you can trust the British,
From commoner to king,
To recognize accomplishment
And do the handsome thing.

And that is why the editors
Of Britain's proud "Who's Who"
Bestowed on Stalin nine more words
In nineteen forty-two.

No Obligations

BY IDA TREAT

IT'S not the principle, it's the person—" Mrs. Wason said for the second time. There she stuck. She had no idea what to say next. The Club expected her to find a solution. She was perfectly aware of that. She was their president. She stood by the oak table, twisting and untwisting the chain of her lorgnon.

Young Mrs. Cotton, who sat facing her, lifted her chin from its nest of silver fox. "The person generally is to blame, don't you think?" she asked helpfully.

Mrs. Wason flushed, and Mrs. Philip Nycey, who was acting as secretary, stopped scribbling a row of M's across the top of a blank sheet of note paper. "This is a very unpleasant predicament for us all," she emphasized.

"In other words," young Mrs. Cotton's tone was as silky as her furs, "the refugee-as-an-idea and the refugee-in-the-flesh have proved to be two quite distinct and contradictory—"

"Ladies, members of Current Events!" Mrs. Wason found her voice again and plunged headlong into her speech, spacing her breathing like a singer. "I am sure none of us regret our generous effort (breath) in behalf of the unhappy victims of aggression (breath) even though today we are confronted—"

"—with the person," young Mrs. Cotton cut in pertly. Some of the younger members tittered. Mrs. Wason brought up short, sails flapping. The look she gave the girl with the silver foxes was heavy with reproach. The chain of her lorgnon wriggled in knots among the frills of her jabot.

"I didn't mean to sound unkind," she faltered, and then and there decided to give up her speech. "Whatever shall we do with her?" she asked helplessly. Then she stepped behind the table and sat down.

Mrs. Nycey gave a disapproving cough, and someone in the back row remarked: "If we had taken a child as I suggested—"

Mrs. Wason tried to look as if she had not heard. She avoided the eye of the secretary, who was trying to get her attention. Whereupon Mrs. Nycey shrugged her shoulders none too graciously and answered for her.

"As I remember, we were all agreed—a child would have been too permanent. The Club was in no position to assume the responsibility. ("How well she does it," thought Mrs. Wason. "Why didn't they make her president?") We chose an adult refugee because helping an adult had the advantage of being temporary."

"Or so we thought," young Mrs. Cotton corrected. "We weren't anticipating Miss Lipovska."

Mrs. Nycey rapped the table with her pencil. "I am sure no one forgets what Miss Lipovska has been through."

Mrs. Wason looked troubled. She wondered whether she herself had not forgotten. She recalled the day Miss Lipovska told the Club of her escape from burning Warsaw and her spectacular flight across Europe. The members had listened spellbound. They all wanted the privilege of entertaining Miss Lipovska. They were none too pleased when their president carried her off, a little dazed and tearfully grateful at such a competitive display of friendliness.

That was three months ago. Since then, other members besides the president had entertained their refugee. Today she was back again at Mrs. Wason's. As the last hostess pointed out, Mrs. Wason had the biggest house. Since Miss Lipovska's return Mrs. Wason had been obliged to change housemaids. Now the new one was threatening to leave. That was what had precipitated the meeting.

Mrs. Wason was aware she had let Mrs. Nycey take the meeting away from her. Not that she minded personally. But perhaps it was not fair to the Club. The Club had not wanted Mrs. Nycey for president, though she would have made an efficient one. A little too aggressively efficient, Mrs. Wason decided. She stopped twisting her lorgnon chain and rose to answer a member who wanted to know why a job had not yet been found for Miss Lipovska. Mrs. Wason referred the question to the Refugee Committee.

The chairman reported her committee had been active. It was not their fault if Miss Lipovska spoke French so queerly that no one wanted her as a teacher. The chairman had tried her out on her own children—and in a week they were pronouncing all their l's like w's! Miss Lipovska admitted she did not know any grammar. She had learned to speak French as a child. What was more, she hadn't the faintest notion of how to handle children. The committee doubted if Miss Lipovska was really fitted to teach anything.

"She can talk," said a voice.

"Oh, can she!" This from young Mrs. Cotton. "Neither Milton nor I got any sleep when she stayed with us. She'd sit up until all hours—"

"All Slavs are like that. They never go to bed," put in Mrs. Nycey.

"—talking and smoking. Cigarette ashes over everything."

"I know," nodded the chairman. "Stubs on the rugs and setting wastebaskets on fire—"

"I don't like to criticize a guest, but—" began Mrs. Wason, who was thinking of her housemaid.

Young Mrs. Cotton caught her up. "What I would like to know is—is or is not Miss Lipovska a guest?"

"One would think she was," sighed the chairman. "At my house she never lifted a hand. She'd leave her bed unmade all day rather than do it herself."

Mrs. Nycey made herself heard again. "Miss Lipovska is used to servants."

"I know—four maids and a chauffeur and a villa in Zacopani. I'm so tired of her villa in Zacopani."

"She hasn't a villa any longer," Mrs. Wason reminded.

"She has a mink coat," Mrs. Nycey said suddenly. The Club looked startled, as if Mrs. Nycey had set Miss Lipovska in their midst like a Godiva in furs.

Mrs. Wason frowned. "It's the one thing of value she has left."

Mrs. Nycey predicted the coat would soon lose its value.

"She sits around in it all day like a house cat. It's a shame the way she treats it. I couldn't afford a mink coat."

Someone asked why Miss Lipovska did not sell her coat.

Mrs. Nycey raised her eyebrows. "She doesn't feel she has to."

Mrs. Wason called them to order. She thought they were getting away from the subject. Had no one an idea? Couldn't they think of some sort of work for Miss Lipovska?

The chairman of the Refugee Committee recapitulated: "She can't teach. She never would do in an office. I'm sure no one would keep her a day as a saleswoman. She doesn't know how to sew. She never cooked anything in her life."

"Couldn't she be a companion?" someone suggested.

The chairman shook her head. "She's the kind that hires companions. And you could scarcely ask her to work as a charwoman."

"Not in a mink coat!" Mrs. Nycey added she was sure the coat had prejudiced people. They took Miss Lipovska for one of the well-to-do refugees—like the man who wanted Philip to pay such a lot of money for doing something secret to rubber, and all the time he was living at the Waldorf. A lot of them lived at the Waldorf.

"Haven't you any suggestions?" Mrs. Wason's voice had a panicky ring. She scanned the faces before her hopefully.

Nobody ventured a remark except young Mrs. Cotton, who suggested frivolously that they might try to marry off Miss Lipovska. Mrs. Wason knew they were all thinking: You got us into this. It's for you to find a way out. She tried to steel herself with the thought of the cigarette ashes, the unmade bed, the tub Miss Lipovska always neglected to clean after her bath—and the housemaid who said that morning she wasn't hired to be the foreign lady's personal maid. In spite of herself, she kept seeing Miss Lipovska, with her frightened eyes and brown-stained fingers, homeless and helpless, huddled like a sick bird in her wrappings of expensive fur. It made Mrs. Wason feel like crying—for Miss Lipovska and herself. She awoke to the fact that Mrs. Nycey had taken over the meeting again.

"I think the time has come to speak straight out," began the secretary. "We can't go on forever being sentimental. It gives refugees the impression that we owe them something. We're not responsible for what the Germans did. We're under no obligations. Miss Lipovska can't expect the Club to support her for the rest of her life. None of us here would expect strangers to support us."

"We leave that to our husbands," murmured young Mrs. Cotton.

Mrs. Nycey ignored the remark. "We have nothing to reproach ourselves with. We welcomed Miss Lipovska into our homes and gave her three months' vacation. She must realize the vacation is ended."

"So what?" thought Mrs. Wason. She felt guiltier and guiltier as she listened.

It seemed Mrs. Nycey had a plan for Miss Lipovska. She had not mentioned it before, since no one had asked for her advice. If she proposed it now, it was out of loyalty to their president. Everyone knew that the president had too big a heart.

Mrs. Wason caught herself wondering whether she had a heart. Would she have called the meeting if she had?

"The first thing, Miss Lipovska must sell her coat," Mrs. Nycey said firmly. "She can't expect a big price for it, but the money she will get should be sufficient to pay for a good wool one and keep her through the winter if she's careful."

Here Mrs. Wason interrupted. "You're not suggesting she pay board to me?"

"Of course not." Mrs. Nycey explained she had first thought of taking Miss Lipovska into her own home, to relieve Mrs. Wason. She had no guest room. She would have had to put Miss Lipovska on a couch in the hall. "And that would not give her the sense of independence she needs, now would it?"

Mrs. Wason nodded no, emphatically. She could not imagine herself feeling independent on a couch in the hall at Mrs. Nycey's.

Mrs. Nycey looked gratified. "And so I had to think up a better plan. There's that little Polish baker on Elm Street, the one who makes the nice meat patties. I spoke to him tentatively and he's quite agreed. He will let Miss Lipovska a little room over his shop. Cheaply too. I told him it was for a refugee."

"Do you think Miss Lipovska will like—"

"She can't help but like it. The room is quite acceptable, and, besides, she'll be among her own people. We all know what that means."

Mrs. Wason was not quite sure that she did. Listening to Mrs. Nycey made her somehow feel it was more than a matter of language. Young Mrs. Cotton broke in with the very question she wanted to ask.

"And when Miss Lipovska's money is spent?"

Mrs. Nycey said she thought that was looking too far ahead. The main thing was to help Miss Lipovska to her feet and make her feel her independence. "When she is definitely on her own, she'll enjoy looking about to find a place for herself. I'm convinced, too, the baker will do something eventually. It ought to be a matter of national pride for him. He may let her help out in the shop."

Mrs. Wason felt her cheeks tingle. She stole a look at the Club. They were listening as they had listened that other time, when Miss Lipovska first came and spoke. Young Mrs. Cotton's gaze met hers, a pair of bold young eyes above a faintly ironical smile. Mrs. Wason looked away.

When Mrs. Nycey's plan was put to vote it carried without a dissenting voice. The Club moved a vote of thanks to the secretary and appointed her a committee of one to put the plan into effect.

"If it doesn't work, why not try arsenic?" young Mrs. Cotton suggested. Mrs. Nycey was frankly shocked. She saw no humor in cynicism, she said afterward to Mrs. Wason.

As president, Mrs. Wason took no part in the votes. She felt she must speak to Mrs. Nycey, but it took her some time making up her mind what to say. Nearly everyone had left when she moved over to the secretary's chair. Even then she hesitated, tugging at the chain of her lorgnon. But not for long.

"Have you anyone in mind . . . for Miss Lipovska's coat, Mildred?" she asked.

Mrs. Nycey, who was writing down the notes of the meeting, answered vaguely that she really hadn't thought. Though now that Mrs. Wason spoke of it; "Perhaps I might get Philip to buy it," she said, laying down her pencil. "Three hundred dollars at the outside—that would be a fair price, don't you think, and a lot of money for Miss Lipovska."

Something beat quickly under Mrs. Wason's satin frills. When she spoke her voice shook a little, but there was purpose behind it. "I'll be glad to contribute half myself—but the coat must go back to Miss Lipovska afterward."

She hoped she sounded fierce enough to make Mrs. Nycey understand.

In the Wind

A PLAN TO OVERCOME the geographical obstacles to bombing Japan and at the same time to take advantage of Russia's neutrality in the Pacific war is being widely discussed in Washington government circles. American bombers and flying fortresses would take off from Alaska or the Aleutian Islands and bombard Tokyo. Instead of trying to return to their bases, they would go on to Vladivostok, where the Russians would be forced, under their present agreement with Japan, to intern the planes. The presence of American bombers and fighting planes in Vladivostok might discourage Japan from making an early attack on the Soviet Union and would, in any event, enable the Russians to release a good part of their Eastern defense for use against the Nazis. And finally, Soviet military men could study the design of the flying fortresses, none of which have reached Russia as yet.

THE LEAGUE for the Rights of Man, the international civil-liberties organization which formerly had its headquarters in Paris, will soon be reorganized here.

A LARGE DISTRIBUTOR of magazines and newspapers in Chicago, the Post Office News Company, discontinued the sale of several magazines a few days ago after America's entry into war. When the editors of Partisan Review inquired why their publication was no longer being distributed, they learned that Post Office News had dropped all left-wing magazines for the duration of the war.

RECENT REPORTS that John L. Lewis and David Dubinsky intend to cooperate gained further credibility with the recent appointment of Emil Schlesinger as attorney for District 50 of the United Mine Workers. Lewis has been concentrating most of his energies on District 50 in recent months, and Schlesinger, a friend of Dubinsky's, has for several years been counsel to the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union.

THE CANADIAN NATIONALIST PARTY, an avowedly fascist group, is still functioning. Recently it distributed thousands of copies of its program throughout the dominion. While not openly pro-Hitler so far as the war is concerned, the statement boasts that the party wants for Canada an internal regime modeled on that of Nazi Germany.

THE NEW YORK WORLD-TELEGRAM, which has been running an editorial almost every day demanding that all social-welfare work be eliminated from civilian defense, has at the same time been running a series called This Too Is Defense by Jay Nelson Tuck. The point of the series is that child-training and physical-fitness programs and adult education are essential to civilian defense.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

Chirico, the Etruscans, and Others

THE STORY OF MODERN ART. By Sheldon Cheney. The Viking Press. $5.

THE EARLY CHIRICO. By James Thrall Soby. Dodd, Mead and Company. $3.

AMERICANS 1942: 18 ARTISTS FROM 9 STATES. Edited by Dorothy C. Miller. The Museum of Modern Art. $2.

THEY TAUGHT THEMSELVES: AMERICAN PRIMITIVE PAINTERS OF THE 20th CENTURY. By Sidney Janis. Foreword by Alfred H. Barr, Jr. The Dial Press. $3.50.

ETRUSCAN SCULPTURE. Phaidon Edition. The Oxford University Press. $3.50.

CONSIDERING the enormous prestige, recognition, and popularity modern art has won and boasted during the past two decades—its success in dramatizing the struggles, conflicts, and ambitions of artists for the general public, its controversies and battles, its skill in bringing the whole range of contemporary scientific interest, ideological enthusiasms, and historical curiosity within the range of plastic expression, its establishment of works by Cézanne, Van Gogh, and Gauguin as household classics, and the success of even the wildest aberrations of surrealism in drawing record crowds to galleries and influencing popular taste—it is startling to hear that Mr. Cheney was moved to write his latest compendium only "two or three years ago" by a museum director who told him he still thought "modern art is all a racket" and by the fact that about the same time "a patron of the arts in Chicago [the socially prominent dowager and poetess, Mrs. Frank G. Logan, whose verses are warmly admired by the local press] had organized a movement and was spending her money freely to combat the advance of modernism, under a banner inscribed 'Sanity in Art.' " He thereupon undertook to write a book to convert "the form-blind," those who continue to "see and read pictures" rather than "see and experience" them. The "Story of Modern Art" that has resulted, a large book of over 600 pages, is frankly a "story" on the scale and level of the well-standardized stories of philosophy, science, and literature that have become endemic to our age. His hope is to win a public which has hitherto been given too many "mystifying and alienating" treatises—"including my own."

At this late date such a book from the hands of a competent defender of causes like Mr. Cheney is to be welcomed, but only after admitting that propaganda's work is never done and that Mr. Cheney's numerous predecessors in evangelism were either pioneers who wrote too soon or sophisticated specialists who wrote too preciously and even sooner. It isn't too easy to do this. There may always be room for another good general history of painting since the time of David and Ingres; but Mr. Cheney has been preceded by a number of able chroniclers as well as by various specialists who have not only made his work possible but who have provided the kind of serious analysis and criticism which the public needs today much more than it needs the loosely defensive propaganda and overwrought storyizings that have more to do with museum publicity and dealers' profits than with the serious judgment and appreciation of artists and pictures. One may say of Mr. Cheney's book that at best it satisfies its purpose by being attractively readable, historically colorful, lively in arrangement and dramatic contrasts, never blatantly vulgarizing in the manner of Burton Rascoe, prejudiced like Meier-Graefe, or slipshodly combative like C. J. Bulliet; but that conversely it shows how the synthesis, digesting, and persistence necessary to so vast a project are bound to lead to an overworking of epithets, a flagging of discriminations, a continuous wavering of the line that separates specific analysis and critical tact from propagandist enthusiasm, a straining of pedagogical zeal, and a scattering of critical force and taste through an eagerness to do justice to the claims of almost every type and school of painting that has appeared in the last 150 years. And one must add that Mr. Cheney's survey, however serviceable in a worthy cause, is hardly the best job of its kind. It does not show the workable apparatus of terms and the vigorous historical grasp of R. H. Wilenski's books, the analytical virtues of men like Salmon, Read, and Einstein, or the penetrating insight and originality that intensify both style and content in the books of Roger Fry. It is one of the best products of the propagandist wing of current aesthetic publicity and may without qualms be placed in the hands of the prejudiced and uninitiated—provided they are given to understand that its spirited chapters remain, even as late as 1942, more in the nature of first words on their subjects than last, and that the time has now arrived when last words are within the reach of the best historians and critics in this field.

Mr. Soby's book on the early work of Chirico comes opportunely to hand as an example of what the serious critic can do when he tempers propaganda—Mr. Soby presents himself as an ardent pleader for his hero—with serious formal and historical criticism. The problem he defines in Chirico is exemplary. Chirico's paintings of the past two decades are the work of a talent in tragic disintegration, showing not only the deterioration of one of the most powerful creative visions of our century but a fatal distraction by the personal and professional conflicts through which he has lived. His imagery has lapsed into sterile formulation, his "classicism" into banality, his symbols into an almost complete enervation of what was once an absolutely authoritative plastic and poetic genius. Mr. Soby deals slightly with this problem of deterioration, but his chief business is to define the origins and growth of Chirico's great gifts during his formative and mature years, between 1906 when the artist was only eighteen and 1917 when he came to the end of his precocious fruition and began to revise, adapt, and disfigure his own canvases in a fashion that seems to have destroyed both his imaginative confidence and his actual technical skill. In Chirico at his greatest there appeared a brilliant fusion of the romantic, symbolic, and metaphysical capacities of the modern sensibility. He superbly summarized the elements of classic perspective, imagery, and form; he epitomized the psychic crisis of our times so intensely as to make his work the fountainhead of new possibilities in design and iconography (he might be called a Rimbaud among painters, and like Rimbaud he shows up at a glance most of his descendants, the surrealists, for the dabblers and decadents they are); he perfected certain condensations of imagery and allegory—supremely in the "Chirico city" with its unforgettable squares, arcades, wharves, statues, towers, engines, and unearthly skies—that succeeded in extracting both from his original experience of nature and from such sources as Raphael, the Renaissance landscapists, Courbet, and Böcklin the central essence of a major tradition, loosely called the "romantic," whose strength he passed on to fellow-artists as various as Picasso, Braque, Ernst, Duchamp, Berman, and the egregious Dali. His finest canvases are unquestionably among the greatest things in twentieth-century art. And Mr. Soby's well-written, reasonably argued, carefully discriminating study is one of the best monographs in its field in recent years—exactly what was needed to bring the genius of Chirico into line with the significant developments of his age and to fix him as one of its most decisive and influential inventors.

The eighteen Americans currently exhibited at the Museum of Modern Art show as well as any recent collection the always astonishing technical competence and stylistic varieties of present-day American art. But the competence either scatters into a baffling eclecticism or exists so self-sufficiently as to preclude intensity and depth of personal vision, and the styles in most cases need only to be measured by work like Chirico's to reveal themselves as ungrounded in any recognizable power of sensibility or concept. None of these painters goes in for the stultifying documentary realism that has become a bane in American studios. Some of them—Breinin, Austin, Lebrun, Howard—show skill in the devising of original forms and images; some—Hirsch, Martin, Chapin, Siporin—in naturalistic derivation; one, Emma Lu Davis, the sculptor, has a deft hand in symbolic fancies and shows great cleverness in bringing her mediums into a characterizing play with her themes; one symbolist of fantastic tendencies, Graves, is not embarrassed by comparison with Arp and Klee. But the mark of derivation and understudy is so continuously present among these craftsmen, the submersion of insight by medium and craft is so deliberately patented an appeal among their exhibits, that when their talent for diverting and entertaining the spectator is spent, they show few of the solider satisfactions we have a right to expect of a display of national proportions. What they show too often, in fact, is the compressing of a great fund of natural talent and craftsmanship into the Procrustean molds of fashionable styles, fads, and mannerisms; the servility of their attitudes goes to extremes in the work of Merrild, Medellin, the thickly racial designs of Bloom and Levine, the glib fantasies—she calls it "classicism" but allows the new coinage "postsurrealism"—of Helen Lundeberg. Anyone might own with pleasure the pictures of Graves, Breinin, and Lebrun, but it would be hard to grant house room to the pretentious spooks of Darrel Austin or the exhausting action studies of Fletcher Martin. And it is quite likely that close living with most of these pictures would bring one to realize the sterility and fragmentary intelligence that are still present in most of the modern styles they ape or suggest.

Nor is it likely that a very great refreshment of vision and craftsmanship will come from what Mr. Janis presents as our modern American "self-taught" artists—"non-professionals," "popular painters," "folk-artists," "instinctives," "naives," and "naive-primitives" are discussed by him as alternative names for the race whose patron saint is the douanier Rousseau, who now receives his first large-scale American exhibition at the Chicago Institute. The reversion to primitive models in modern painting and literature has had its usefulness, but it is a usefulness easily overestimated, notoriously so by Frank Crowninshield when he devotes a panegyric to John Kane as "a magnificent paradox," "an immigrant day laborer who had no time to paint, no money to paint, no earthly provocation or encouragement to paint," yet now stands revealed as "the most significant painter America has produced during the past quarter-century." To mistake the work of this order of painter with that of a genuine creative talent is to show the lamest and most prejudiced of all contemporary hostilities—the hostility toward reasonable intelligence and culture which leads André Breton to say that the "four poles of attraction" in modern art are "primitive sculpture, children's art, paintings done in psychic states, and the artistic work of the insane." We may go as far as we like in admitting the suggestive, cleansing, and restorative value of these sources without going to the length of making either a cult or a major historical issue of illiteracy and regressive innocence, both of which lead us right back to where the dogma of the primitive or pre-conscious has always led in the past, whether in poetry or the plastic arts. If authentic models of the primitive are wanted they still exist in genuinely fruitful forms, and they are likely to be much less confusing when found in the actual past than in the mentally arrested or emotionally retarded present.

The latest volume in the superb Phaidon series offers a convenient means of studying one of the great inheritances from antiquity whose bearings on the modern sensibility is a case in point. These fine photographs show the full range of Etruscan invention in stone, bronze, pottery, and wood; they include the dynamically rudimentary stylization and symbolism of the earlier centuries and the heightened realism and psychological penetration of the later figures and portraits, and they readily reveal what Professor Goldscheider emphasizes as the informing element of all Etruscan creation —the "transcendental" character of its religion and vision: "they had . . . to depict essentials, not aspects solely; not once-for-all and fleeting impressions, nor yet the sum of all impressions, for they had to show the underlying reality which the phenomena express." The "expressionist" nature of their art thus becomes emphasized in its relevance to the modern creative ambition, and it is impossible to miss the subtle balance between abstract values and suggestive or symbolic revelation, between idea and physiognomic intensity, that brings this tradition into line with the most serious archaistic sympathies of the modern craftsman. Goldscheider provides an elaborate critical apparatus in his preface, notes, and bibliography. Specialists will find him guilty of a considerable simplification of his problems in his prefatory essay (one may be warned of some of the limitations of the Phaidon series in this respect by a severe criticism of the recent volume on Michelangelo's sculptures by Professor Wittkower in the Burlington Magazine for April, 1941); but for the general reader and practicing artist no more beautiful introduction to Etruscan art exists at the moment, no more convenient opportunity for becoming aware of what a radical difference exists between genuine archaism of matter and spirit and the wasteful archaistic derivation which has occasionally refreshed but more often stultified by pedantry and puerile mannerism the obsessions of novelty and originality among modern artists. Years ago, in writing about the Florentines Berenson made a distinction between true and false archaism in painting, calling in the example of Degas by way of modern illustration of the true. It is still a valid and necessary distinction, if only because its usefulness recurs in the continuously imperative problem of distinguishing between style and cliché, mastery and talent, art and entertainment, true vision and an eye for public susceptibility, in the art around us today.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

Poor White

FIRE IN SUMMER. By Robert Ramsey. The Viking Press. $2.50.

"FIRE IN SUMMER," by Robert Ramsey, is a very interesting and exciting novel which is embarrassed by a peculiarly tactless and offensive blurb. "Because Mr. Ramsey is a Southerner, writing of Southern people and employing that speech . . . heard only in the back-country districts, his book will be called 'regional.' It will be compared to Caldwell and Faulkner. . . . In a sense it is regional, and in a measure it is akin to the work of other Southern writers. But Ramsey's tragic hero transcends the narrow bounds of regionalism. . . ." This is precisely the sort of nonsense which infected a good many of the reviews of Eudora Welty's excellent "A Curtain of Green" or Katherine Anne Porter's "Pale Horse, Pale Rider." If a book happens to be good, it "transcends" regionalism. This is like saying that if a man can run a hundred yards in ten seconds he "transcends" the fact that he has two legs.

Regionalism is a descriptive term; it may be taken to describe a certain type of material used by a writer or to describe a certain complex of attitudes exhibited by a writer. But the word can be made to make critical sense only if one understands it in its more fundamental social reference. Even then it is useful only to define something about the nature of a literary work and not its degree of excellence. This is no place to discuss regionalism, and it should be unnecessary at this date to point out that the adjective "regional" as applied to a novel carries no implication in regard to the excellence of the work. But the nameless blurb writer has here implied that Faulkner, for instance, is merely regional—therefore limited, inferior, etc.—while Ramsey "transcends" regionalism.

Now one factor which contributes heavily to Faulkner's superiority over Ramsey—it is an unfair comparison, for this is a first novel and Faulkner is a veteran, but the comparison is forced on us by the blurb writer and by certain aspects of

AMUSEMENTS

"Buoyant, Giddy & Funny"
—Atkinson, Times
JUNIOR MISS
LYCEUM Theatre, 45th St. E. of B'way. CH 4-4256
Evenings, 8:40; Matinees, WED. and SAT., 2:40

CHERYL CRAWFORD presents
George Gershwin's
PORGY AND BESS
"Go see 'Porgy and Bess' if you go to nothing else"
—Kronenberger, PM.
PRICES:
Evgs. . . . $2.75 to 55¢
Mats. . . . $2.20 to 55¢
MAJESTIC THEATRE, W. 44 St. Eves. incl. Sunday. Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30

THE FREE WORLD ASSOCIATION
Presents
The Voice of Freedom
A recital by
MARIANNE LORRAINE
"The Sarah Bernhardt of Song"
Saturday, February 28, at 8:45
TOWN HALL
113 West 43RD Street
Tickets: Orchestra, $2.75, $2.20, $1.65
Balcony, $1.10, $.83, $.55 Loges (seating six) $16.50
Now on sale at Town Hall Box Office

Don't Miss An Issue!
To keep THE NATION coming regularly
just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVE. • NEW YORK

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I inclose $.............................

☐ One Year $5
☐ Two Years $8
☐ Three Years $11

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER
to new subscribers only

☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name...
Street...
City...
State...
2-28-42
Extra postage per year: Foreign and Canadian, $1.00

Ramsey's own method—is that Faulkner is not less, but more, "regional." That is, he understands his regionalism in terms of the history of his region and in terms of the values which are competing not only in Southern but in American society, while most of the so-called regional writers are content merely to report a special way of life and a special sociological situation. But Faulkner's concern with the history of his region and with the conflict of values in Southern society provides the forms in which the psychological and ethical issues are dramatized. However, the theme of "Fire in Summer"—"the hatred of the poor white for the Negro," as the blurb tells us—is treated almost entirely at the sociological level.

We have the story of a poor white farmer who comes down into the rich bottom lands of Arkansas to find himself squeezed by a system based on Negro labor, and who takes out his frustration in irrational violence. This may be a valid piece of sociological commentary as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough to provide a real center for the novel. For instance, the hero, we are given to understand, had always been the same fury-possessed man, even before he left the hill country, where he was not in competition with Negroes. Spence Lovell's attitude toward Negroes is the effect of a complex set of causes; and the novelist should, if he is to explore a depth beyond the sociological threshold, give us an understanding of these causes. But he delineates, instead, the pattern of effect. And this pattern is mechanical rather than organic; that is, each instance tends to recapitulate the meaning of previous instances, without enriching the meaning. The character is "flat"; it repeats its formula in action, but without shading, reservation, complexity, irony, or internal tension. Ultimately, Spence Lovell has no story.

For WAR Books

THAT EXPLAIN:

WHAT HAS HAPPENED
WHAT IS HAPPENING
WHAT WILL HAPPEN

—consult your bookseller, who knows every book published on the subject and can help you select the ones you want.

AMERICAN BOOKSELLERS ASSOCIATION
Members Everywhere

It might have been effective for the author to show the fury of Spence Lovell thus simplified when it manifests itself in the white-Negro situation, where Lovell appears in a social role, if he had played off this simplification against a complexity in the manifestations of fury when Lovell appears in a private role, in relation to his family, for example. But Lovell's fury is as mechanically patterned in his private as in his public role. He is simply robot, monster, machine, and the few comments offered by the wife do not give us an adequate lead back into the character. In other words, the novelist has avoided his responsibility on this point—probably because he has accepted sociology as explanation.

Such remarks as these would be meaningless about the work of a bad novelist, because a novel must, in a sense, set up the standard by which its very deficiencies can be defined and measured. But Mr. Ramsey has, I believe, the talent of a very good novelist indeed. He has an excellent sense of narrative and pace, his powers of observation are sharp, he can build and control excitement in a scene, his dialogue is good, and the style of his first-person narrator is well handled, despite a tendency to strain dramatic appropriateness by attempting incidental literary effects. The basic defect of his novel derives from the fact that he has not set himself the proper problem. He did not try, apparently, to define the center of his book. There is no clearly realized issue at the heart of Spence Lovell's character, and therefore none at the heart of the book. There is only the catchword of a journalistic sociology. Perhaps Mr. Ramsey needs to look harder at his region; for if he looks hard enough at his region he may see that the Spence Lovells are rather complicated people, after all.

ROBERT PENN WARREN

Hector Bywater, Prophet

THE GREAT PACIFIC WAR. By Hector C. Bywater. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

NO OTHER war in recent history has been as thoroughly discussed in advance as the war in the Pacific between the United States and Japan. It has been a favorite study in our Naval War College for at least thirty-five years, and has been commented on by publications ranging from the yellow journals to the New York Times and by military and naval critics as far apart in views and type as "Big Bill" Shearer and Hanson Baldwin. The best book on the subject, however, is undoubtedly "The Great Pacific War" by the English naval expert, the late Hector Bywater, and Houghton Mifflin is to be praised for reprinting it.

Since Mahan no naval expert has enjoyed greater international prestige than Bywater, who served as naval correspondent for newspapers on both sides of the Atlantic. Books dealing with military and naval strategy are generally lacking in popular appeal, but both the book under review and the same author's "Seapower in the Pacific" have an unusually wide circle of American readers, whose admiration is fully justified by the books' extremely engrossing content and technical excellence.

Today it is especially interesting to reexamine "The Great Pacific War" and note how closely the outlines of the struggle correspond with the facts of the present world war. Bywater expected the Pacific war to be preceded by a successful surprise attack which would arouse in Americans a grim determination to see the war through to a successful conclusion. In his forecast the early war continues to go badly for the United States. Japanese submarines and plane carriers go into action off our Pacific Coast and cause considerable psychological and some material damage. The Philippines and Guam fall into Japanese hands after putting up a brief opposition, and much American trade is cut off. Meanwhile, United States submarines and planes create havoc among Japanese transports. Both sides make feints along the Alaska-Aleutian-Kurile chain of islands but do not undertake a real offensive because of climatic obstacles and lack of important objectives.

The turning point is reached when the United States abandons the defensive strategy with which it entered the war in 1931—as in 1941—and resolves on a vigorous offensive in the western Pacific. An expedition to seize the Bonins is at first a failure, but repeated attacks eventually place the Japanese fleet in a strategic position in which it is obliged to fight. In pitched battle the United States navy proves to be definitely superior. With the crippling of Japanese sea power the early American losses are regained. Japan is blockaded and in danger of being bombed. It recognizes its hopeless situation and sues for peace.

In general, events have so far conformed to this pattern. The surprise attack was made on Hawaii, the center of United States strength, rather than on the Panama Canal, and caught our armed forces woefully unprepared. Wake, which Bywater overlooked as unimportant, also fell to the Japanese onslaught. By clever strategy the United States avoided the likely easy destruction of its Asiatic fleet, and this fleet has since caused Japan serious losses. West Coast feints by Japan have been much less effective than Bywater supposed would be the case, and our civilian reaction has been decidedly calmer, with a more alert defense than he expected. A book written in 1925 could not entirely foresee and does in fact underemphasize the role of air power. Moreover, in this Pacific war the British Empire, the Netherlands Indies, and China, as well as the United States, are involved, with the Soviet Union a somewhat truculent neutral, and it is, therefore, a very different affair from a war between Japan and the United States alone. Despite these changed conditions, the book on the whole offers a brilliant discussion of the strategy of today's war.

It is only when Bywater gets away from military matters and deals with politics or economics that he ceases to be a trustworthy guide. He almost totally overlooks the important effect of economic strength or weakness on the war effort of his contestants and believes that Japanese morale is apt to be affected by rationing and scarcity. This is contrary to all other estimates of Japan, not only those made today but also those current when the book was written. These are, however, only minute flaws in a work which for general timeliness, despite the seventeen years which have passed since it was written, can hardly be surpassed.

DONALD W. MITCHELL

FOR THE CLASSROOM

The Nation's Special Rate Per Month is only

25c

PER STUDENT

ON BULK ORDERS OF TEN OR MORE COPIES TO A SINGLE ADDRESS

In schools from coast to coast The Nation is required supplementary reading for classes in economics, government, English, political science, and foreign affairs. Particularly in the study of contemporary problems teachers and students turn to it regularly for its long-range thinking, comprehensive documentation, and regard for historical perspective.

Send for our free booklet which gives complete information about The Nation's editors, its departments and special features, as well as the history of this magazine through its seventy-seven years of courageous, liberal journalism.

Instructor's Copy Free

THE NATION • 55 Fifth Ave. • New York, N. Y.

For my class of .... students in (subject) .... send The Nation for the next .... months at the special classroom rate of 25 cents a month $............. inclosed.

NAME ....

SCHOOL ....

ADDRESS ....

....

2-28-42

PUBLISHED THIS WEEK

Book of Bays. By William Beebe. Harcourt, Brace. $3.50.

The Arch Lectures. By Claude Bragdon. Creative Age Press. $2.

Belgium: The Official Account of What Happened 1939-1940. Didier Publishers for the Belgian Ministry of Foreign Affairs. $2.50.

The War at Sea. By Gilbert Cant. John Day. $3.

Army Talk: A Familiar Dictionary of Soldier Speech. By Elbridge Colby. Princeton. $2.

The Good Inheritance: The Democratic Chance. By Norman Cousins. Coward-McCann. $3.

All My Born Days: Experiences of a Naval Intelligence Officer in Europe. By John A. Gade. Scribner's. $3.50.

Franklin Street. By Philip Goodman. Knopf. $2.75.

Defense Will Not Win the War. By Lieutenant-Colonel W. F. Kernan. Little, Brown. $1.50.

The Sea of Memories: The Story of Mediterranean Strife Past and Present. By Charles Moran. Scribner's. $3.50.

Admiral of the Ocean Sea: A Life of Christopher Columbus. By Samuel Eliot Morison. Little, Brown. $3.50.

Capured: My Experiences as an Ambulance Driver and as a Prisoner of the Nazis. By Bessy Myers. Appleton-Century. $2.50.

Dead Men Do Tell Tales. By Byron de Prorok. Creative Age Press. $3.50.

This Freedom: Thirteen New Radio Plays. By Carl Randau and Leane Zugsmith. Random House. $3.

The New Day. By Jules Romains. Knopf. $3.

Bookman's Holiday: The Private Satisfactions of an Incurable Collector. By Vincent Starrett. Random House. $3.

The Voice of Russia. Edited by Lucien Zacharoff. Alliance. $3.

DRAMA

Leave of Absence

MY TASK for the week—and no easy one at that—is to explain how it happens that I like a certain new English war play at Henry Miller's Theater and why, with appropriate warnings and apologies, I recommend it to others. Its title, "The Heart of a City," certainly suggests early Owen Davis, and the play itself undoubtedly has some relations to the ten-twent'-thirt'. But perhaps it could be more precisely described as a judicious combination of the Messrs. Dunning and Abbott's once famous "Broadway" and "The Wookey" of more recent memory. It is, in other words, a rather gaudy tale of back-stage life, with beautiful girls running about in various stages of deshabille and conducting their private affairs en route between the dressing-room and the stage. But instead, as in "Broadway," of introducing bootleggers and gangsters to furnish the excitement it introduces the blitz, and the show must go on despite blackouts, falling bombs, and boy friends who are in the R. A. F. I do not think that it is very well written; perhaps it is not, except in the most elementary sense, written at all. I am certain that the complications are pretty obvious and that both the sentiments and the heroics, though tolerably restrained, are equally unoriginal. But since the whole is rather gay and inoffensive, its topicality somehow renders it not only amusing and interesting but quite astonishingly heartening as well. Indeed, I am inclined to think that its cheerful triviality carries more reassurance than a more serious play would be likely to inspire. Evidently it is possible for a people to behave quite heroically without having to accomplish what we fear, for ourselves, would be the impossible task of becoming Heroes, with all the spiritual rebirth, etc., which the latter seems to imply.

I find all this more embarrassing to say than I would if I were not aware of the fact that I have always insisted in a rather lofty and superior manner that works of art should be judged by nothing except artistic standards. When, for example, some pretty bad plays of the Marxist-proletarian variety were at least tolerantly reviewed I not only explained that the most important subjects and the best intentions in the world were artistically unimportant unless something was made of them but also, as I remember, inveighed against those who failed to distinguish between what the play in question actually managed to communicate and what they themselves brought to it in the way of knowledge, conviction, and emotional conditioning to certain subjects. But I am afraid that something like this last is chiefly responsible for the effectiveness of "The Heart of a City." The situations do not have to be powerfully conceived; we know too well what they refer to, and events have given them emotional values which the author has not needed to establish since they are, for us, already established. Indeed, he does not even have to be especially convincing. We already know that such things not only can be but are.

I doubt that anything like this could be true of a more solemn or more pretentious play. In fact, some of our own war dramas seem to have proved that it is not. Trying to write seriously, the author merely reminds us that his elevation and his eloquence are not adequate. In the same way a popular song, say "Tipperary," may be not only less embarrassing than an Ode to Our Gallant Forces but also actually moving, more moving certainly than the Ode; unless, of course, the latter is really first-rate—which none of the serious war plays have been.

"The Heart of a City" would certainly be vulgar and cheap if it were not the product of an actual war, and it will certainly be trivial if ever that war is victoriously disposed of. Artistically, in other words, it is a nullity, and perhaps in liking it I am abdicating or at least taking a leave of absence as critic. But if I have lost my critical integrity I shall at least try to stay honest. And I should not be that if I told you either that "The Heart of a City" is a good play or that I did not both enjoy it and feel the better for it after the last curtain was down.

P. S. The girls are most unusually goodlooking, and one of them, Miss Musgrove, an English newcomer, is an ingenue of considerable charm.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ART

"Bubble House" Afflatus

IN A tough world the story of the defense "bubble house" may provide a small spot of entertainment. There has been great fanfare for the house shaped like a little dome, while other experiments have been left to oblivion. Why?

A few of these houses have been erected at Falls Church, Virginia; the architect is the Californian Wallace Neff, and the sponsor none other than Jesse Jones, having quite a fling solving the housing problem (never mind what he did about a few others, such as aluminum or rubber).

The method of construction that gives rise to the nickname "bubble house" is to inflate a half-balloon and spray it with air-spray cement, which hardens to form the inner shell of the house; a layer of insulation and an outer shell finish the job. The shape that has been most frequently illustrated is composed of twin domes linked by a conventional room containing the kitchen; but some of the later models are single elongated shapes like a fat sausage or the top half of a blimp.

People who have visited the houses describe them as really quite enchanting; seen from the outside they have a fairy-tale quality—like giant mushrooms in the woods—and inside they are said to be surprisingly inviting. What is there that makes it seem so snug, reassuring, and refreshing to live and sleep in such a fantastic fashion, with a domical vault up above one's domestic head?

There are functional explanations, of course, for the domical shape. An especially ambitious one, in the New Yorker, connects it with the "traditional, simple, nomadic house—the tepee, the igloo"; and declares, moreover, that no "decisive" advance in mass production is possible without working from those. Well, the idea that there is no other good way forward might suffer under pinprick even more than would Mr. Neff's balloon; but it is true that there is a connection. Indeed, everybody who sees the bubble house seems to recall something primitive or remote in his own memory—Walt Disney movie settings, or the group of domed huts that Professor Wagner was going to build against earthquakes in Turkey, or the Mongolian yurt which so pleases Buckminster Fuller[*] because its streamlining makes the wind anchor it all the more firmly, or again the round-topped tepees of some Eastern woodland Indian tribe, or African villages—especially African villages, since no form of primitivism is more fashionable. Once you begin looking, the domed shape sprouts all over the primitive world; rounded mud-plastered huts were the early prototypes of all the domed splendor of Persia, and the little prehistoric Greek beehive house was the humble precursor of the great Pantheon and even of that grand end-slice of melon which caps our most ambitious National Gallery of Art.

So here we find ourselves, with our sudden overwhelming need for security, reaching right back to those primitive shapes, hitting on just that kind of "functionalism" which delivers the most emotional reassurance. The reason it does would seem to be definitely Freudian; the primitive tribes were sticking close to Mother. Mr. Dali has put the case bluntly if indelicately by suggesting "small, dark, womblike houses" as retreats from the whole of the modern world; and the doubling of the hemispheric form detracts in no way from the force of the symbolism.

Such allusions need not scare us! The war need not make us deliquesce into anti-mechanical Dali-ance. After all, the

---

[*] Mr. Fuller's metal defense igloo is at the Museum of Modern Art in New York.

American energy will win!

FOOD ENERGY COMPARISONS

Approximate Energy Units in Various Staple Foods

ONE BOTTLE OF PEPSI-COLA 5¢	185 Calories*
ONE LAMB CHOP (medium size)	178 Calories*
ONE WHITE POTATO (average size)	92 Calories*
ONE WHOLE EGG	70 Calories*
ONE FRESH TOMATO	[illegible] Calories*

*STANDARD UNITS OF FOOD ENERGY

AMERICA has a big job to do—a big job that requires every ounce of energy of men and women everywhere.

To help keep up this energy, to help boost morale, millions call for Pepsi-Cola. It provides quick food energy and offers a welcome lift during a hard day.

Speed up, America. Let's go!

PEPSI-COLA

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

5¢ 12 OZ. BOTTLE

THE DRINK WITH QUICK FOOD ENERGY

native, healthy, popular builders of America also take to the dome shape regularly with all the avidity of an African tribesman. We have our derby-shaped restaurants and brooder-house tourist cabins; and at the World's Fair some designers who had read a book and who also knew their public used domes for the structures of an air-conditioning company, a pickle company, a steel company, and the distillers' building, not to mention the mound-like shape of the building for General Motors—and remember the perisphere?

So the manifest affection being displayed for the "bubble house" suggests the desire to return to fantastic shapes for relief from the shock of rationalism disrupted; the deep base of such fantasy; hence, the wisdom of giving more study to the irrational and super-rational drives in the building field, of understanding the neighbors with some of the attention given hitherto to European flaneurs. It suggests the possibility that domed or rounded vaults may multiply as an element even in domestic building, serving for quiet withdrawal from the openness of our glass planning. At one end of the scale stand the African village, the drive-in igloo, and the bubble house; and at the other St. Mark's in Venice or the Hagia Sophia; and the basic impulse is the same.

DOUGLAS HASKELL

MUSIC

THE post-Christmas chamber music concerts of the New Friends of Music have made distinguished and memorable contributions to the season's music. One of them offered Schubert's song cycle "Die schöne Müllerin" sung by Lotte Lehmann; a series of five gave us Schubert's piano sonatas and some of his other piano music played by Artur Schnabel. And meanwhile another series of five concerts at the Y. M. H. A. has presented Beethoven's string quartets played by the Budapest Quartet.

There is nothing new that I can say about the artistic resources of voice and feeling which Lehmann brought to Schubert's cycle, or about the playing of the Budapest Quartet at its best—the luminous beauty of the four strands of sound, their sensitive inflection, their marvelously integrated progression. The qualities that were familiar had fresh and newly astounding impact; and some of Schnabel's performances also made me more sharply aware of the characteristics and effect of phrasing that is unique, inimitable, wonderful in the way—by timing and force—it places sounds in significant, powerful relations in the contours of the successions of sounds, the way it builds up and releases tensions in the movement toward and away from salient points in those contours.

My experience with this Schnabel series has left me with a doubt whether all-Schubert concerts are a good way of presenting Schubert's music—whether they don't offer more of the music than a person can absorb at one time. I had the same doubts about the New Friends all-Haydn concerts, the Y. M. H. A.'s all-Mozart quartet concerts, two or three years ago. And at the Y. M. H. A.'s Beethoven quartet concerts people have complained that after an Op. 18 and an Op. 59 they are incapable of the attention and concentration demanded by one of the last five; but I suspect that if one of the last five were placed second these people would find it just as difficult to concentrate on an Op. 59. I think it would be best to offer only an hour of Beethoven or Schubert at each concert; but then the works would have to be distributed over a greater number of concerts; and both the individual concert and the series would be more expensive. It would be better still to make it an hour of Beethoven and Schubert or Haydn; and no more than an hour even of the two composers, for I find that even the mixed program of normal length offers more than I can keep my mind on, and more, apparently, than other people can.

Few of us can afford what it would cost to have Schnabel or the Budapest Quartet play for an hour in the quiet of our homes; so we pay 1/1500 of this cost to hear them at Town Hall or the Y. M. H. A. And as a result we hear them play longer, and hear them under less favorable conditions—the restlessness of some of the other 1,499 persons as they tire, the mere bad manners of some of the others from the start. For the concert has been made possible only by heavy promotion, which has included appeals to snobbery and pretentiousness that have brought some people in who should have been kept out. On my left at Town Hall are two women who at tomorrow's bridge table will talk of having heard Schnabel play Schubert at the New Friends, but who now, while he is playing, are talking about yesterday's bridge, fussing with their pocketbooks, idly leafing through their crackling programs, abstractedly fingering the rattling chains on their necks. In front of me at the Y. M. H. A. Budapest Quartet concert are three youngsters making exhibitionistic nuisances of themselves over a score; behind me are a young man and a young woman who have come to the concert to impress each other and are whispering uninterruptedly in the process.

But last autumn an hour of Beethoven played by the Budapest Quartet was brought into my quiet living room on Sunday mornings by the Columbia Broadcasting System; and Schnabel's performance of Schubert's great posthumous A major Sonata, which I heard at the New Friends concert through a continuous fidgeting and rustling of programs like the sound of leaves in a forest, I can hear undisturbed from the Victor records whenever I wish. That is what the radio and phonograph can do for us, and what they do, but only to an inadequate extent as yet. The broadcasting companies justify the American system of commercial broadcasting by the fact that it pays for the good music they send out all over the country. But a Chicago reader told me that those Budapest Quartet broadcasts were not heard in Chicago; readers elsewhere have told me of not getting C. B. S.'s New York Philharmonic broadcasts; and the reason is the American system of commercial broadcasting—the fact that the local stations don't carry these programs when they can sell the time. And C. B. S. itself lops off the concluding half-hour of the New York Philharmonic concert to sell to an advertiser. My Chicago reader told me of hearing N. B. C.'s Radio City Music Hall broadcast of a Mahler symphony cut off in the middle of a movement after a half-hour. And Schubert's piano sonatas performed by Schnabel may be an event of artistic magnitude; but commercial contracts have cut down the hour that N. B. C. formerly gave the New Friends concerts to about twenty minutes, so that I myself heard a broadcast break into the middle of one movement of Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata and break off in the middle of the next, and the same thing, outraged readers informed me, happened to Schnabel's performances of Schubert. So with records: at Columbia's rate of progress we are a long way from having the Budapest Quartet's performances of all of Beethoven's string quartets available to us on records; and Victor has yet to give us even a second Schubert sonata played by Schnabel—for example, the great posthumous B flat Sonata that was issued in England last year.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Protest from Mexico

Dear Sirs: We are unable to understand the real reasons for the slanderous attack upon André Simone in your issue of February 7. We wish to call your attention to Richard Rovere's complete misrepresentation of facts in his article dealing with the attacks being made in Mexico against Victor Serge, Marceau Pivert, and Julian Gorkin. A representative committee of the Mexican Congress has made serious formal accusations against Serge and his partners, charging that it has proofs of their connection with the Nazi fifth column in this country. None of the members of the committee belong to the Communist Party, some even being well-known anti-Communists.

André Simone has made constant and valuable contributions to the fight against Hitler's agents in Mexico and has exposed their methods of work. On the other hand, Mr. Serge and his partners have never done this type of work, dedicating their efforts exclusively to slander of the Soviet Union and its government. Significantly, the first issue of a magazine edited by Gorkin contains no single article against Hitler or Japanese aggression and fails to call for help for the democracies in their fight against fascism. Serge and his partners adhere openly to the official Trotskyite line, which fights the Soviet Union today for "allying itself with imperialistic powers such as England and the United States."

Recently an anti-fascist congress organized by the Acción Democrática Internacional and patronized by the Free French, the British propaganda office, and native professional and intellectual groups refused admittance to Serge and his partners on the basis of their anti-Allied activities in this country. Also the directors of the Liga Cultura Alemana, among whom are several anti-Communists, have bitterly condemned Regler's behavior in Mexico. Rovere's article has created ill-feeling among representative Mexicans for its vicious attack upon the Mexican people in general, whom he considers always in readiness to commit crimes in gangster style.

We are addressing you in the hope that the true information submitted herewith will help you to understand the Mexican situation with regard to foreigners posing as leftist who are really undermining the anti-fascist struggle. We protest also against the unsupported attacks upon Simone by Mr. Rovere, using terms which do not differ from those employed by Nazi official agents in Mexico as a reprisal for Simone's well-known valuable activities against Hitlerites here.

VICENTE LOMBARDO TOLEDANO, president Latin American Workers Federation; CESAR GARIZURIENTA, deputy; REINALDO LECONA SOTO, deputy; LUIS AGUILERA, deputy; CARLOS ZAPATA VELA, deputy; LUIS ORDORICA CERDA, deputy; ALFONSO FELIX DIAZ ESCOBAR, deputy; ALEJANDRO CARRILLO, deputy; LUDWIG RENN, ANNA SEGHERS, EGON ERWIN KISCH, COLONEL JUAN B. GOMEZ, PABLO NERUDA.

Mexico City, February 16

[The editors of The Nation do not want to enter into an argument with the distinguished Mexicans and European exiles who sign the telegram printed above. Our consistent support of the anti-fascist struggle, both before and since the start of the war, relieves us of the necessity of restating our general position. As for our attitude toward Mexico and the Mexican revolution, that has been established through long years of warm support and by our consistent opposition to all the imperialistic attitudes and practices of which our own government has in the past been guilty.

So it should not be necessary to insist that we have no wish either to criticize the Mexican people or to defend pro-Nazi activities. We cannot answer for the character of all the persons who have been under attack in Mexico, but it is difficult for us to believe, on the basis of his public record, that Victor Serge is connected with the Nazi fifth column. However, we shall waste no sympathy on Nazi agents. If the legislative committee mentioned in the protest has proof that "Serge and his partners" are actually guilty of such connections, we believe and hope that they will be dealt with severely by the proper authorities. And if such proof can be submitted for examination, here or in Mexico, The Nation will without hesitation make any further statement the facts demand.

Toward Gustav Regler, whose character and record are well known to us, we feel certain that injustice is being done. Regler served with utmost courage and distinction as an officer and commissar in the Loyalist army throughout the Spanish civil war. His devotion to the Allied cause since 1939 has been consistent and outspoken. To find him accused of such offenses against our common cause as consorting with Phalangists and Nazis, is to us shocking. We believe that accusations such as these are in themselves a betrayal of the ideal of democratic solidarity and a source of aid and comfort to those reactionaries—and even some misguided leftists—who in this country as in Mexico seize upon every excuse to attack the Soviet Union and so weaken the anti-fascist front.

Meanwhile, we reaffirm our belief in freedom of political expression. The Nation defended the rights of the Communists when they opposed the war and the entire Allied position; we similarly defend the rights of persons whose only offense is to criticize the tactics of the Communists.—THE EDITORS OF THE NATION.]

A Socialist Looks at Ireland

Dear Sirs: Your recent supplement on Ireland failed to measure up to the Nation standard. Like most Irish people, your writers are living in the past and are ignoring the fact that though southern Ireland has been a "free" state since 1921, it is no better off than before. This has been a rude shock to the Irish people, who had been led to believe that their troubles would disappear with the British. Their hopes have of course proved false, for while the English brought feudalism to Ireland they did not take capitalism away with them when they left.

Unable to fill the people with food, De Valera continues to fill them with hate against the British, against the Protestants, against the Ulstermen, against anybody but his masters, the Irish capitalists. Mr. Maloney plays this game when he speaks of the peace established in Ulster with "Protestant clubs." Presumably the Irish Catholics like being clubbed, for numbers of them emigrate every year from Eire to Northern Ireland. At the same time Mr. Maloney is silent as to why the Six Counties are not a part of Eire. Articles 11 and 12 of the Anglo-Irish treaty gave Northern Ireland the right of self-determination which it exercised. Consequently the partition question is closed until it is reopened by the people of Ulster.

If De Valera were really an Irish statesman, he would have inserted a clause in his constitution providing for the separation of church and state and the equality of all religions. This was absolutely necessary in a country so divided religiously. His followers, however, have singled out the Protestant churches for acts of terrorism. Many Protestant church halls, and even an orphanage on the banks of the Shannon, have been burned by armed ruffians whose activities the Eire government either cannot or will not stop. As Maloney fails to mention these facts, we must conclude either that he approves of them or that the newspapers he receives from Ireland contain no mention of them. When we look at the books and plays that are banned in Eire we see at once that it is a clerical-fascist state like Pilsudski's Poland and Dollfuss's Austria. In passing it may be well to note that the number of Protestants in the south have declined 32 per cent in fifteen years. This brings me to a further conclusion that the picture of Lincoln and the copy of the American Declaration of Independence that hang on the walls of De Valera's office are mere window-dressing.

Turning to the economic situation, we find that recent population figures show a decrease of 3,572 while Ulster's population has increased by 78,558, although Belfast was considered a depressed area before the present war. This indicates that Eire is worse than a depressed area. The situation could be improved by the industrialization of Eire, and this is the aim of Fianna Fail, but along conventional capitalist lines, which means years of misery for the Irish workers and farmers. The only way out for Ireland is socialism, but this is anathema to the church and De Valera's backers. We even hear today that the Irish Labor Party has been considering changes in its platform to please the church after its reverses in the 1938 election.

I also find myself in disagreement with Keith Hutchison, whose usual care in sifting economic events has produced many fine articles for The Nation. Mr. Hutchison says that the trade war between Eire and Britain had no effect on the political situation in Ireland, citing the election of 1933 as proof. Inasmuch as the trade war did not start until 1932, its effects did not spread over the country before that election. The test came in the following election, when the Fianna Fail failed to get a majority and Labor held the balance of power. De Valera immediately sought an agreement with Britain and, having the senile Chamberlain to deal with, came out on top. In an election held shortly afterward De Valera regained his former majority. This indicates that more than the big ranchers were affected by the loss of the British market.

Two events that occurred in the last Ulster election show that De Valera and his Ulster Tory "enemies" are really allies. Just prior to the elections a progressive movement was started against the late Lord Craigavon in his own party, and the number of disaffected members became so large that they might have gained a majority in the approaching election. Mr. de Valera at once rushed to the support of the reactionaries by emitting a violent blast against partition. Craigavon called an election immediately and by making partition the main issue swept the Six Counties and emerged with a greater majority than before.

In the same election the leader of the Northern Ireland Labor Party contested a seat in the dock area of Belfast. The voters were divided into Tories, Laborites, and Nationalists. The Nationalists had no chance of winning the seat and usually did not contest it, but this time they ran a candidate, split the vote, and elected an Orangeman. Why did they do this? Because the Labor Party had supported the Spanish Republican government against the murderer Franco.

In Canada we have the same national and religious differences as Ireland has, and the C. C. F., Canada's farmer-labor party, is faced with the same problem in its relation to the Roman church as the Irish Labor Party. All Canadian political parties must recognize the special privileges of the Roman church in Canada or it takes the field against them. Toward the end of the last century the Canadian Liberal Party faced the same situation. It overcame the difficulty by ceasing to be liberal. To avoid more years of strife and misery the Labor Party in Ireland and the C. C. F. in Canada must separate church and state completely at the same time as they end the capitalist system; otherwise they will leave a fifth column ready to stab them in the back as in Spain.

KENNETH STEWART

Verdun, Quebec, February 13

O. G. V.'s Birthday Dinner

Dear Sirs: Readers of The Nation will be interested to know that a dinner is being given in honor of Oswald Garrison Villard on his seventieth birthday, March 13, 1942, at the Hotel Roosevelt in New York.

Some of those who are on the committee sponsoring the dinner disagree with Mr. Villard's views on the present world crisis, but this is America, where we are still free to disagree.

It couldn't happen anywhere except in America—or in England. We remember and honor the gallant fights Oswald Villard waged in the old Evening Post and The Nation, fights for civil-service reform, for decency in government, for Irish and Hungarian and Russian and Chinese freedom. And we honor him today for his continuing fight for Negro rights, for all human rights, and for American freedom. We honor him for his courage in dissent, and we are glad that America produces such a man and gives him the right to be heard.

Speakers at the dinner will include John Haynes Holmes, Lewis Gannett, Walter White, Norman Thomas, Joseph Schlossberg, and Mr. Villard. Reservations for the dinner may be secured through the committee, at 112 East Nineteenth Street.

MARY W. HILLYER, for the Committee

New York, February 19

CONTRIBUTORS

HARRY BLOCK is The Nation's Mexican correspondent.

IDA TREAT is an American writer who has recently returned to this country after twenty years in Europe. She has published a book on defeated France entitled "The Anchored Heart."

RICHARD ARMOUR is a member of the English Department of Wells College. A book of his light verse will be published shortly.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL, professor of English at Loyola University, appears frequently in The Nation as a critic of art and literature.

ROBERT PENN WARREN, an editor of the Southern Review, will soon publish "Bearded Oaks and Other Poems on the Same Theme."

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 154 · NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 7, 1942 · NUMBER 10

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 269

EDITORIALS
- Japan Can Be Stopped 271
- Hearst Carries On 272
- Interventions—Old and New by Freda Kirchwey 273

ARTICLES
- Labor and the Long View by I. F. Stone 275
- West Coast Perspective by Louis Fischer 276
- Dark Days Ahead by Donald W. Mitchell 278
- The Chicago Sun by Milton Mayer 279
- World Trade After the War by Keith Hutchison 283
- In the Wind 285

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
- End of Season. A poem by Robert Penn Warren 286
- Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 286
- Fischer on England by Ralph Bates 287
- Japan's "Mein Kampf" by Maxwell S. Stewart 288
- Robinson Jeffers by Clement Greenberg 289
- Argument for Democracy by Irwin Edman 290
- Old J. P. by Louis Filler 291
- Marianne Lorraine by Rosamond Gilder 293
- Art Notes by C. G. 293
- Music by B. H. Haggin 294

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 295

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER · Washington Editor I. F. STONE · Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON · MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor RICHARD H. ROVERE · Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN · Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX · Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

THE BATTLE OF STARAYA RUSSA, WHERE THE Red Army claims to have trapped a Nazi army of 90,000 men, may prove of decisive importance. This city is the northern anchor of the German winter line and one of the strongholds which Hitler has ordered held at all costs. If the Russians succeed in capturing it, the German positions in front of Leningrad will be endangered and the invaders may be forced to retreat on a wide front. The value attached to this city by the German High Command is suggested by the use of hundreds of planes in an attempt to provision it by air. The Russians claim that this endeavor has been frustrated with heavy enemy losses. The battle, however, is not yet won, and it must be remembered that the German garrison at Mozhaisk, which had also dug in, strongly resisted for weeks after it had been surrounded. And while winter still grips this section of the Russian front, it will not be many weeks before the snows begin to vanish. In the south the spring thaws have already set in, and both sides are struggling with the mud. The Moscow radio, however, reports that a new drive against Kharkov, which is the chief southern anchor of the German army, has been launched. Several previous offensives in this direction have proved abortive, but there are still grounds for hope that Marshal Timoshenko may be able to turn this position before Hitler is ready to use it as a springboard for a new campaign to win the Caucasus. In this connection reports originating in Berlin of tremendous new Russian concentrations are worth noting. They may be preparing the way for announcements of fresh retreats.

*

THE SENATE FARM BLOC STRUCK A POWERFUL blow against our living standards when it passed a bill prohibiting the sale of government-owned farm products at less than parity prices. Not content to allow the bill to pass through normal legislative channels and thus risk a Presidential veto, Senate farm-bloc leaders threaten to attach it as rider to the $32,000,000,000 war-appropriation bill. When the President denounced this plan as "reprehensible," Senate farm leaders declared that they would withdraw from the fight pending developments. These developments have now materialized: the issue has been transferred to the House, where the Appropriations Committee has attached a similar provision to the Department of Agriculture's regular supply bill. To date the agricultural exemptions which the farm bloc wrote into the Price Control Act have been largely inoperative because of the government's power to dispose of its huge crop holdings at less than parity prices. If this power is removed by Congressional action, it will be impossible for the Price Control Administration or any other government agency to prevent a sharp rise in the prices of foodstuffs and agricultural raw materials—a rise which must inevitably be reflected in higher wage and production costs for industry. Furthermore, as the President pointed out in his letter to Vice-President Wallace, the proposed legislation would bring about an unwanted increase in the production of wheat and corn at the expense of needed livestock products and oil-producing crops.

* * *

CREDIT KENNETH G. CRAWFORD AND PM with a service to the country. Through their watchfulness and persistence a $25,000,000 naval construction project of the utmost secrecy is no longer intrusted to the engineering supervision of George Deatherage, one of America's more violent fascists. If it seems strange that this little anomaly had to be cleared up by a newspaper reporter rather than by the Naval Intelligence, how much stranger is it that considerable pressure had to be applied before Mr. Deatherage was finally ousted? One Navy Department official explained that there could be no haste in the matter since "a man's job is at stake," and for several days it seemed improbable that the navy's delicate sense of justice would permit branding a man a fascist simply because he had proclaimed himself a fascist. Thanks to Representative Vinson of Georgia, the matter came to the attention of Secretary Knox, and Mr. Deatherage is again an unemployed Knight of the White Camellia. His experience, however, has not discouraged an even more distinguished fascist from aspiring to be an officer in the ranks of democracy. Lawrence Dennis, author of "The Coming American Fascism," has offered his services and has been told by the War Department that he is eligible, by virtue of his World War record, to apply for a captain's commission in the military police. Thus unless Mr. Dennis's past is as forcefully recalled to Secretary Stimson as Deatherage's was to Secretary Knox, American soldiers who lean toward subversion may have to answer to the man who only a month ago predicted hopefully that "we shall react from international communism to a brand of National Socialism of our own making."

* * *

THE HONORABLE HAMILTON FISH APPEARS at last to have become an embarrassment to the Republican Party, an achievement of no small proportions. It has never been a secret that the man who represents President Roosevelt's home district in Congress is an arch-appeaser, but it took the trial of George Sylvester Viereck, a professional Nazi agent, to reveal the extent to which Mr. Fish had become enmeshed in pro-German intrigue. For weeks, it may be recalled, Mr. Fish dodged subpoenas issued by a District of Columbia grand jury investigating local subversive activities. When his wretched clerk, George Hill, testified falsely before that same jury, Fish defended him warmly in the press but allowed him to go to jail for perjury without testifying in his behalf. When Hill threatened to reverse himself after his conviction, Mr. Fish raced from judge to judge seeking an order to forbid any further grilling of the prisoner. His failure led to the revelation that for months he had maintained a working arrangement with Viereck to send copies of anti-British, pro-appeasement speeches through the mails at the taxpayers' expense through use of his franking privilege and mailing lists. Some of these speeches were actually written by Viereck and made on the floor of Congress by the late Senator Lundeen. All of which is not more palatable for being technically within the law. The forced retirement of Mr. Fish would assuredly be a great boon, but not if it draws the lightning away from other equally dubious legislators. The Viereck trial indicates that Mr. Fish was by no means the only one to use the Congress of the United States as a sounding board for Dr. Goebbels's opinions. The removal of Representatives Day of Illinois and Sweeney of Ohio would similarly sweeten the air over Capitol Hill.

* * *

A PERSONAL MESSAGE FROM MR. ROOSEVELT to Marshal Pétain has produced assurances from Vichy that France will continue to be neutral, that it will not allow the use of French vessels "for purposes of war," and that it will not "adopt a policy of assistance to the Axis powers beyond the terms of the armistice." It is interesting to note that the President's message, which referred specifically to supplies shipped from France to the Axis forces in Libya, was sent on February 10. The reply was handed to Ambassador Leahy in Vichy only on February 24, four days after the Olympian patience of the State Department had been so far exhausted that it went to the lengths of using the adjective "unsatisfactory" to describe information received from the French government. After the receipt of Vichy's tardy communication Sumner Welles refused to say whether the situation was still unsatisfactory but did say that "further clarifications" were being sought on the French attitude. We presume this means an attempt to get a direct explanation of the shipment of trucks, oil, and other supplies from France to Libya. If this aid to the Axis is within "the terms of the armistice," there is nothing about Vichy's new promise to the United States which need disturb Hitler. We think the State Department would do well to insist on receiving an unexpurgated copy of the armistice agreement together with a full and exact statement of the commitments to which Vichy considers itself bound by that instrument.

* * *

MEANWHILE THE LOGIC OF WAR HAS FORCED the State Department to give left-handed recognition, at least, to the Free French by agreeing that the United States will cooperate in the defense of the Pacific islands which, as it recognizes, "are under the effective control of the French National Committee established in London." Just what French possessions are included in this agreement are not specified because, it is stated unofficially, the United States government has not been able to determine whether effective control is exercised in many islands claimed by the Free French. Only New Caledonia, the largest, richest, and strategically most important of the French colonies in the South Seas, is definitely named. Actually there is no doubt that the Free French also effectively control the Marquesas and the Society Islands, the most easterly of the Pacific archipelagoes, which in the event of raids against the west coast of South America would assume great strategic importance. Cautious as the State Department's announcement is, it constitutes a real slap at Vichy, which not long ago named Admiral Decoux, governor of Indo-China, as High Commissioner of all French Pacific possessions—an obvious attempt to set up a diplomatic obstacle to cooperation between the United States and the Free French in this area. Incidentally, the doctrine now adopted by the State Department as governing relations with French territories points clearly to a solution of the St. Pierre problem, since it is undeniable that the Free French are in "effective control" there.

* * *

THE NAZI-CONTROLLED PARIS PRESS AND radio have once again been attacking Ambassador Leahy, accusing him of carrying on espionage and propaganda and falsely reporting his forthcoming retirement. This campaign may be intended as a hint to the State Department to play no favorites but bestow on Vichy as accommodating an envoy as Franco has been happy to entertain for nearly three years. In an interview given to Louis J. O'Donnell of the Baltimore Sun, Alexander W. Weddell, American ambassador in Madrid, who recently returned to this country for consultation with the State Department, declared with evident approval that the Spaniards regarded the war as a large-scale projection of their civil conflict—a "war between the forces of communism and the civilizing forces of opposition." Asked in a later interview whether this statement represented his views, Weddell replied that he was quoting a Spanish newspaper. To the question whether Spain had moved closer to the Axis in the past six months, our chief official source of information on Spain answered, "I wouldn't know." Another query about the amount of trade between Germany and Spain drew the evasive reply, "I know there is a good deal of trade between Spain and the United States and there ought to be more." Mr. Weddell and his wife, who has presented the Falange with a clubhouse, are said to be extremely popular in Spanish government circles.

* * *

LORD HALIFAX HAS REPLIED EFFECTIVELY to the charges of American isolationists that England is not doing its share in the war effort. Speaking before the American Academy of Political and Social Science, the British Ambassador pointed out that England sent abroad last year four and a half times as many airplanes and ten times as many tanks as it received from the United States. He also disclosed that British fighter-pilot losses in the series of daylight forays made over Western Europe last summer for the purpose of aiding Russia were half as large as those suffered in the Battle of Britain in 1940. He warned us especially against allowing ourselves to fall victim to the "skilful and utterly unscrupulous" attempt of Nazi propagandists to drive a wedge between the United States and Britain, declaring, "If the lion's claws seem blunt to you, you will not sharpen them by giving his tail a twist." His comments were particularly appropriate in view of the new wave of Nazi-inspired anti-British propaganda which has recently been appearing in the McCormick and Hearst press and such organs as Social Justice. It must be recognized, of course, that not all criticism of Britain is Nazi-inspired; nor is it all to be deplored. Constructive and vigorous criticism is essential to the effectiveness of the war effort in all the democratic countries. In this process the United Nations need not spare one another. But clear distinction must be made between the healthy criticism of a free people and the parroting of enemy propaganda. A review of the short-wave reports emanating from Berlin, Rome, and Tokyo will almost invariably show the pattern utilized by the enemies in our midst.

Japan Can Be Stopped

WITH the invasion of Java the plight of the United Nations in the Pacific war has become desperate. Java is by far the most important of the Indies. Its population and resources are approximately double those of the other islands. In the hands of the Japanese it would provide easy access to the Allied supply lines to Australia, India, and the Near East. Equally grave consequences may result from the fall of Rangoon and the cutting of the Burma road. Continuation of the present defensive strategy of the United Nations, as Mr. Mitchell points out elsewhere in this issue, can lead to only one result—an early and decisive defeat. This fact must be faced in all its implications while there is still time to prevent final catastrophe.

The strategy of the United Nations in the Far East to date appears to be identical with that adopted by Britain in the early months of its war against Germany: it is an endeavor to wear the enemy down by a war of attrition until our resources become adequate for a decisive offensive thrust. This involves fighting a delaying action in the East Indies, Australia, India, or wherever the enemy may choose to attack. It has two fatal weaknesses: (1) it gives the enemy the immense advantage of the initiative and a short inner line; and (2) it accentuates our grave shipping weakness by forcing us to maintain a 12,000-mile line of communications with the battle front. The events of the past three months indicate rather conclusively that we cannot hope to win against a determined and resourceful enemy in the face of these handicaps. If we take into account China, India, and Russia, the United Nations have tremendous superiority in man-power, fighting equipment, and potential resources. But this superiority can only be made effective if we are able, through taking the offensive, to choose the battlefields and make the most efficient use of our admittedly inadequate shipping.

By following a bold strategy it is perfectly possible to stop Japan in 1942. But the psychological and political obstacles to the adoption of such a strategy are tremendous. In outlining this strategy we shall be betraying no military secrets. The Japanese leaders know very well how they can be defeated. But they have risked everything on the assumption that the United Nations, particularly the United States, will be unwilling to pay the price of victory.

The first condition of victory is obviously a willingness to gamble with losses in order to seize the offensive and strike Japan at its weakest point. The first step to this end might well be a vigorous attack on the Japanese lines of communication by submarines and surface raiders supported by carrier-borne planes. This should be done with something of the audacity shown by Nazi and Japanese submarines in our waters. It would obviously bring losses, probably heavy ones, but if it resulted only in the sinking of ten or twelve tankers Japan's military efficiency would be dealt a crippling blow. The chief obstacle to the adoption of such tactics seems to be the navy's desire to conserve its ships and men. This consideration does not prevent the enemy from taking even greater risks although neither Japan nor Germany has a capacity for replacing losses that is comparable to our own.

Since Japan cannot be effectively blockaded by naval action alone under present conditions, it will also be necessary to strike directly at Japanese bases and industrial centers by aerial attack. To achieve this, we must find bases closer than the Aleutian Islands. Certain areas in Free China would provide ideal bases—only a few hundred miles from the center of Japan—but the Chinese have been seeking in vain for nearly a year to obtain bombers and the necessary technical equipment for such landing fields. The closing of the Burma road will make this undertaking vastly more difficult, but it is still within the realm of possibility.

An even more satisfactory base for operations against Japan is to be found in the Soviet Maritime Provinces. But since Russia is not at war with Japan, this base is not available today. Nor will it be made available by our sitting back and hoping that Japan will attack Russia or that Russia will attack Japan. If Russia is to be brought into the Pacific war under circumstances favorable to the United Nations, we must do two things: (1) mobilize planes, ships, and men in Alaska to enable us to support a Russian attack; and (2) open up a second front in the West so as to assure the defeat of Hitler. Russia has not said openly that it would enter the Far Eastern war on these conditions, but Maxim Litvinov's speech before the Overseas Press Club suggests that Moscow would welcome this type of strategy. Russia is under no illusions as to the necessity for defeating Japan. Its Far Eastern army is reported to be virtually intact, but it dare not get involved in the East until Nazi pressure is relieved in the West.

Perhaps the greatest argument for such a plan of action is that it would permit us to utilize our strained shipping resources with maximum efficiency. American supply lines to Europe would be 3,000 miles in length, those to Vladivostock between 4,000 and 5,000 miles, as against the 12,000 miles to the South Pacific. Although it is the only plan that offers real hope for victory in 1942, it presupposes a type of political and military collaboration with the Soviet Union which does not yet exist. Progress is undoubtedly being made in that direction, but history will not wait. If the opportunities for dealing the Axis a knockout blow which exist today are lost, they may not reappear.

Hearst Carries On

WE CALLED attention in our issue of February 14 to the fact that very powerful newspapers in the United States—those owned by William Randolph Hearst, Joseph M. Patterson, and Robert R. McCormick—were making a concerted drive along lines disturbingly similar to those followed by the reactionary elements in France previous to the French surrender. Last week Hearst's New York Journal-American published an editorial on the trials at Riom which marks a new limit in this campaign. The whole free world is nauseated at the spectacle of the men of Vichy, who, having first supported policies that undermined the security of their country and then delivered it over, bound hand and foot by "collaboration," to the enemy, are now trying Léon Blum and his colleagues for treason. The whole world knows that even if Hitler is not the direct instigator of this trial it is an attempt to curry favor with him; and it knows, too, that what Blum and the others are really being tried for is the crime of having attempted to resist Germany at all. But this is what Mr. Hearst has to say:

> The trial of Daladier and Blum in France may be the beginning of a new era of justice and of peace on this earth. . . . It is surely time that the men responsible for the murder and misery of war should be tried and convicted and deservedly punished for the highest of all crimes against heaven and humanity.
>
> It is to be hoped that the guilty will be convicted in France and that their prosecution will afford an example—a precedent—which all the other outraged peoples of the world will follow.

Nor does Mr. Hearst leave one in any doubt as to the people who he thinks should profit by this example. His article continues:

> Blum . . . is blamed for coddling the Communists and the anarchists when they were undermining the strength of France by strikes and sabotage and every kind of obstruction to progress and production.
>
> He is arraigned for having wasted the wealth of France in political boondoggling, in compelling the payment of preposterous increases that disloyal strikers demanded through force and violence . . . for having filled the public offices of France with political bureaucrats loyal to nothing but themselves and the regime which kept them in place and power.
>
> The point that holds out a bright promise for a better future is that leaders who project their nations into the war are already being prosecuted, with fair hope of punishment, for their failure in war.

It need hardly be pointed out that Hearst's charges against Blum are precisely those made daily against the Washington Administration in the papers cited above, which for the best part of two years have also been accusing Roosevelt of "projecting" this nation into war. Now Hearst is devising and rejoicing in the punishment to be meted out by an "incensed and outraged people" to leaders who "involve the world in the disasters of war."

The extraordinary thing about it is that, except for a brief note in PM, no responsible commentator has thought this inflammatory editorial worth mentioning. If some eccentric professor should write a book developing the theme of Mr. Hearst's article it would reach comparatively few readers but would no doubt be denounced and discredited by reviewers all over the country. Yet for every hundred readers reached by such a book and by the reviews of it, Mr. Hearst reaches 10,000.

Interventions — Old and New

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE other day Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles stated with great clarity the principles underlying the present Latin American policy of the United States. The Rio conference, he said, marked the "beginning of a new era" in which "inter-American solidarity had become a reality." He contrasted the present situation with that of a decade ago when "on our southern border there lay a Republic of Mexico filled with resentment and antagonism against the United States" and when "in those republics more nearly adjacent to the Panama Canal there still burned a flaming hostility toward our government because of acts of unjustifiable and unjustified intervention and of military occupation," and when the republics of South America "were still deeply suspicious of our ultimate aims and outraged because of our unwillingness to concede their sovereign equality."

He insisted most emphatically that the perpetuation of the new understanding between ourselves and the rest of the hemisphere depended upon the avoidance by any one nation of interference in the internal affairs of another. And he condemned "certain individuals and groups" who have urged the United States to cooperate only with certain Latin American governments or with certain individuals and groups in other countries whose views favor a policy he described as "revolutionary democracy." The failure to name names or define groups leaves this charge somewhat vague, but it may not be too conceited to assume that it applies to The Nation, among others. In any case the glove is a loose fit. I don't mind wearing it—at least for the duration of this editorial.

"I wonder," said Mr. Welles, "if this group of alleged liberals to whom I refer has ever realized that what they are now proposing is the pursuit by their government of a policy which is identical with the policy of picking puppet governments that has been pursued during the past five years by Hitler."

In this speech Mr. Welles reveals himself as a repentant sinner. Surely no American ever played the game of diplomatic intervention more consciously and purposefully than he in the days immediately following the overthrow of the Machado dictatorship in Cuba. But in his regenerate state Mr. Welles puts up a powerful argument against interfering in other nations' affairs. It is an argument The Nation has used so often against the State Department and Mr. Welles that I find it refreshing, as well as challenging, to have it turned, even by implication, against The Nation. For it is true enough that today we seem to be in the position of advocating, in the interest of democratic survival, methods we opposed when they were used to bolster the reactionary policy of the pre-Good Neighbor era. The inconsistency is more apparent than real—as I believe Mr. Welles's repentance is also—but on the surface the case against us is a good one.

For years The Nation, along with a few other organs of progressive opinion and a very few Senators and Congressmen, opposed the arrogant and domineering attitude of our government toward the Latin American countries. We fought against oil imperialism in Mexico. We fought to get the marines out of Haiti and Santo Domingo. We attacked intervention in Nicaragua. We argued against an interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine that turned the Latin American countries into a private hunting preserve for the capitalists of the United States. We opposed intervention, but intervention was no more than the outward sign of the inward disgrace of imperialist penetration and control. Somehow the question never arose whether the money or the influence—or even the marines—of the United States should or should not be sent to help the people of a country resist economic exploitation or the oppression of a dictator.

Now, in a new and fearfully insistent form, that question does arise. The democratic forces in Latin America that were united in suspicion and hate of the United States have been partly disarmed by the friendly overtures of the Roosevelt Administration; and, whether or not they fully trust the intentions of this country, they understand that their real enemy is the fascist menace which moves closer day by day. In every country they have shown their desire to join the struggle against Hitler. Even the best efforts of the Nazis have failed to turn them against the war and the United States.

It is unnecessary to say that this overwhelming democratic sentiment is ineffective in several South American states. In the Argentine the government of Acting President Castillo still plays the Axis game in defiance of the pronouncements of Rio. In Brazil several events have already created doubts about the sincerity of the government's professions of love for the anti-Axis cause. Sumner Welles announced just after the conference closed that one of its immediate good results would be the ousting of all Axis agents, official and otherwise, from the countries severing relations with the Axis powers. But just the other day the Brazilian government issued a decree specifically providing that German diplomatic and consular agents should be allowed to continue to carry on their private lives in the cities where they have their residence. In Brazil, too, the German societies—which had been banned for just twenty-four hours after the Rio meeting—have been permitted to resume operations under the supervision of a representative of the government. So the Nazi agents stay and the Nazi organizations carry on—and one of Mr. Welles's accomplishments at Rio goes up in smoke.

The Nation has never advocated sending the marines to the Argentine to help the people throw Castillo out of office or to Brazil to institute democratic elections. We have advocated a policy of supporting and encouraging the democratic forces in all the Latin American countries. The people can take care of their own dictators if they have a chance. But when the United States gives financial and moral backing to a reactionary, pro-Axis dictatorship, we not only help keep in office men who work against our interests and for the interests of Hitler but we discourage and confuse the groups organized to back the democratic fight.

If Mr. Welles wants to know just what we "alleged liberals" would do in the case, for example, of Castillo, we can tell him. We would make financial support of the Argentine government dependent on the establishment of a straight-out anti-Axis policy. (Why should we finance an avowed partisan of our enemies?) We would openly encourage the pro-democratic organizations of the country by sending outstanding Americans to work with them and by inviting their leaders to visit this country. When deputies representing the democratic, anti-Axis position—men like Damonte Taborda or Americo Ghioldi—come to the United States, we would see to it not only that they were received with honor but that their advice was sought and their information put to use.

We would cooperate with Argentine democratic groups to carry on strong counter-propaganda against the Axis. In case of actual threat to the security of the country, we would not hesitate to give practical material aid to the anti-Axis forces. We would send as diplomatic and consular representatives thoroughgoing democrats who would be in contact with representative popular groups, as well as with officials, and would stand ready to encourage whatever activities were necessary for victory. We would realize that our natural—and only—allies are those people, in office or out, who are committed to the democratic cause; and we would not let the bogy of "interference" or the tyranny of protocol prevent intimate collaboration with them. This, briefly, is the sort of intervention we would substitute for Mr. Welles's theoretical non-intervention.

For his non-intervention is no more real than was non-intervention in Spain. Mr. Welles wonders whether we alleged liberals have ever realized that the policy we advocate "is identical with the policy of picking puppet governments that has been pursued by Hitler." (Surely he can't mean the governments of Pétain and Franco!) But I wonder whether Mr. Welles has ever realized that the policy he has pursued of supporting pro-Axis dictatorships in Latin America is itself a policy of picking puppet governments? The only difference between our strategy and Hitler's is that the puppets we pick are Hitler's—not ours.

Labor and the Long View

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 2

DESPITE our old bogyman friend, the fall of France, the Smith amendment to suspend the forty-hour law for the duration, if not longer, has been defeated, but the forces behind the amendment are playing for larger stakes and their strategy is mapped in longer perspectives.

German fascism fattened during the post-war decade on the myth that the Reich lost the last war because it was stabbed in the back by liberals, democrats, socialists, and Jews. American reactionaries are busy building up for future use the myth that democracy was stabbed in the back by the forty-hour week. The debate in the House disproved the notion that the forty-hour law is an obstacle to the war effort, but the circulation of the Congressional Record is not as wide as that of the anti-labor press, and it is a good deal harder to read than headlines. As Representative Voorhis of California pointed out, not more than 20 per cent of our workers are on a forty-hour week, and two-thirds of those are in continuous-process industries where production is best organized in three eight-hour shifts.

The Smith amendment actually was not a bill to lengthen the work week but a bill to end the payment of overtime. Insufficient stress has been laid on the part played by the need to pay overtime in the development of the swing shift and other devices for continuous operation. So long as overtime must be paid, it is cheaper to work out methods for two- or three-shift operation on a forty-hour basis than to operate on one or two ten- or eleven-hour shifts. In some cases employers would rather work their force longer hours than take on and train new employees for additional shifts. The 53.8-hour average work week in machine tools, for example, reveals the failure of that crucial industry to embark on continuous round-the-clock production.

One cannot exclude the possibility that some big companies are causing trouble as part of a deliberate campaign to discredit labor. Much was made in the press and the House debate over the walkout at the Bethlehem Steel Corporation plant in Los Angeles. But as Representative Fogarty of Rhode Island said, "When Bethlehem ordered two ten-hour shifts instead of three eight-hour schedules, it defied the Navy Department, the Maritime Commission, and the War Production Board."

This is an election year. Repeal of overtime would help the sweatshop South against the organized North. Northern Republicans stood with New Deal Democrats in the 226-to-62 vote by which the amendment was rejected. The Administration, aware of the dangers to morale in repeal of overtime when huge profits are being made by industry, really threw its weight into the fight. But neither the size of the vote nor the formidable array of argument on its side should blind labor to the dangers ahead of it. If logic and statistics were enough to demolish a lie, the German scholars who disproved and the clever German journalists who ridiculed the stab-in-the-back myth under the republic would never have ended their days in concentration camps. Labor cannot wage a defensive war on a Maginot Line of social gains without suffering ultimate defeat. This is not 1937 and it is not 1939. It is 1942, and 1942 will be a dark year for the forces of freedom. Labor leadership, as much as industry or government, needs to shake loose from customary thinking and to lift eyes to broader horizons. Too many labor leaders, especially those near the top of the labor movement, continue to think in terms of conventional labor issues and labor politics. The strategy of the right is to keep labor on the defensive, to make it appear to be worrying more about its "rights" than about the safety of the country, to distil a constant poison in the press. What gets through to the blurred mind of the public is not the arguments or the statistics but the echo of what seems a continuous yammer from labor. Labor leaders must pick their issues carefully, must prepare to play a more constructive role, if labor is not to be badly smeared by a hostile press before the war is over.

I think that it was a mistake for automobile labor, for example, to raise the issue of double pay for Sundays on a five-day swing shift. I think it might better surrender on a minor issue than risk public misunderstanding. Too much of the squabbling now going on would be deeply regretted by all of us if our country should suffer defeat. I think that in a nation, as in a family, there are times when the partner with the most sense must give in to the partner with the loudest voice, even though justice be on his own side. I think it time we stopped talking of "labor" in the narrow meaning of a faction contending for its share of the national income and began to think broadly of "labor" as a great force in the direction of the war effort and for the reconstruction of our society afterward.

In the ranks of labor and among the lesser labor leaders there is ferment, a desire for fresh leadership able to operate outside the sphere of routine trade unionism.

Bewildered draftees and harassed small business men could be won to labor's cause if labor's cause were made America's cause. There is too much insistence on formulas like "industry councils," too little willingness to get down to the long and hard task of training labor for a share in management. Too much time and energy are spent on old rivalries and petty feuds.

Labor can win the war and labor can win the peace. It must do both if it is to save its freedom. This must become the framework of its thinking. The war cannot be won without considerable reconstruction of our society in the direction of greater democracy in industry. Labor must win allies among other classes for that program. There is a long pull ahead of us, and foreign troops may be on our soil before the grip of monopoly and the dollar-a-year mentality on the means of our defense is loosened, but loosened it will be. In the choice between property and patriotism some will call for a negotiated peace if Germany and Japan succeed this year in dismembering the British and Dutch empires and cutting off the Soviet Union from its allies. Labor must be prepared for grave eventualities.

Labor's first task is production. Younger people in the labor movement here have been talking for months of the need for some kind of joint A. F. of L.-C. I. O. bureau, divided into industry sections, to study the problems of war production, to siphon up ideas from the work bench, to win public esteem by a constant stream of informed criticism and suggestions, and to educate labor leadership in industrial management for war. But production is not labor's only responsibility. Labor could play a leavening role in every aspect of the war effort where more democratic thinking is required—in dealing with the draftees, in our relations with our allies, in our appeals to the German and Japanese masses, in mobilizing colonial peoples, and in framing war aims. It is by gearing itself to these tasks, not by fighting rear-guard actions for overtime, that the labor movement can find safety and fulfil its obligations to the country and to the future.

West Coast Perspective

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Spokane, February 27

I HAVE reverted to old habits formed in Europe and have been visiting factories. During the month of February, traveling north from Los Angeles to San Francisco and Seattle with side trips to smaller towns nearby, I went through several of America's most important munitions plants. What I saw was encouraging. I saw finished products and partly finished products moving quickly toward completion; when transported to the scene of battle, they should appreciably influence the outcome.

Production rose 70 per cent in a single recent month at a huge plant that manufactures what is probably the most effective modern weapon of war. Since then the output has jumped still higher. Pearl Harbor accelerated the assembly lines. The workingmen know from the daily military communiqués that what they do today and every day soon makes a difference at the fighting front.

I asked a sales girl whether she bought books, and when she said yes, I asked her whether she had contributed any books to the libraries of the armed forces. She replied, "No, I never felt like doing it. But last week my brother went into the army and I'm going to send some books to his camp." As more and more relatives and friends join the army, navy, and air force, and as more American combat units enter the actual arena of conflict, civilians generally and workingmen in particular will get into the spirit of the war and intensify their war effort." There is no use scolding a nation for "complacency." The average mortal just does not know how not to be complacent. Every individual should be told exactly what to do.

Key managers in unrelated and widely separated munitions enterprises made one response when I asked what was their chief complaint. "Paper," they said. Factories, I was told, are required to answer innumerable questionnaires from government offices. Washington demands information, then the state asks similar data, then the region wants more facts, then another department in Washington wires for statistics that have already been sent to its neighbor around the corner, and so on endlessly. At one plant I was shown a large administrative building in the process of construction. "That," said the director, "will house a few hundred people who will wrestle with the red tape." I had no way of learning whether this often-repeated grumble is justified. If it is, one of President Roosevelt's urgent jobs is to coordinate the work of federal and local quizzers.

Raw materials are plentiful in the crucial munitions units. Steel scrap is wanting here and there because so much of it was sent to Japan. But this is not a serious bottleneck. Experts told me that production was quickly acquiring rhythm.

Knotty labor problems exist. The population of some small towns has been doubled as a result of war work, and the housing difficulties are great. I was present in two factories when the shift changed, and to see those thousands of men rush to their cars or buses and then stand still for long periods until traffic was unsnarled made me realize that next spring's battles may be affected by the fact that most American munitions workers must take two hours to get to and from work.

Soldiers and many well-to-do anti-labor civilians say, "If the fighting man risks his life for $21 a month, why should the workingman be receiving $40 and $50 a week?" The workingman says, "If the boss is making millions and being exposed as a profiteer by a Congressional committee, why shouldn't I get a decent wage?" "If I didn't take double pay for holidays," a welder said to me at a shipyard, "the money would go to the company's stockholders. It wouldn't go to MacArthur's boys." During a war equality in facing death cries for equality of civilian effort and sacrifice.

The government has still no policy with respect to the drafting of munitions workers. Men just graduating from the apprentice stage to experienced production are sent by draft boards to the training camps. Of course, if every defense job became a reserved occupation, some men would seek war work so as to evade military service. This would have to engage the intelligence and vigilance of the authorities who choose the selectees. But factory managers declare that the first requirement of efficiency is a stable labor force. The labor turnover is considerable; bad housing, scarcity of women, and voluntary enlistments swell the ebb and flow. Confusion is intensified by steeply increased production and by changes in models introduced on the basis of experience gained in overseas battles.

In general, the West Coast is more conscious of the war than the rest of the country. It hears more facts and rumors about Pearl Harbor. It witnesses the country going into action. It is also more jittery. Rich folk are leaving San Francisco, Seattle, and other places for the safety of inland Arizona and Nevada. Most people I have encountered this month in California, Oregon, and Washington believe that they will be severely bombed by Japanese airplanes. This stimulates a demand that America keep its weapons at home to protect its own shores. It also intensifies the man-hunt on Japanese-born and American-born Japanese, who, it is alleged, might try to capture cities, shipyards, and plants during raids. I talked to women who were honestly afraid that Japanese truck growers would poison their vegetables.

In Seattle I saw a girls' school going on an excursion, and smiling Japanese children were walking hand-in-hand and arm-in-arm with American children. Teachers and superintendents in liberal Pasadena and Seattle told me that the Japanese students were often brilliant and always loyal. Numerous housewives told me they trust their Japanese servants. The public is not showing hate or spite. But the reactionary press and the politicians are out for blood and wholesale internment. Jingoes are endeavoring, under the cover of war-time flag-waving patriotism, to do what they always wanted to do in peace time: get rid of the Japanese, harness labor, and frighten the liberals. In many places one discovers beautiful souls, progressive minds—people eager and anxious to set the world right. They are especially worried about who will make the peace and what kind of peace it will be. But these liberals, though numerous, are neither vocal nor organized. It hurts them to see clowns in Congress and in editorial offices behave as though they thought they could win the war by attacking Mrs. Roosevelt and sending Japanese children out to Colorado, which doesn't want them; but pain, even in a heart which is in the right place, is not a force in politics. Cheap demagogues are having a field day.

I suppose the majority of West Coast citizens lack the knowledge and perspective to keep themselves from falling into a slough of defeatism when the news from the battle area is black. They cannot be blamed for taking the fall of Singapore hard. They ought to have more guidance from the nation's capital. They ought to be told that the fall of France was a far greater calamity than the fall of Singapore; yet almost two years have passed since Hitler defeated France, and he is much farther from victory now than he was then. Hitler has conquered Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, France, Yugoslavia, and Greece, but he has not won the war. In like manner Japan's triumphs in the Pacific do not spell victory. American convoys laden with valuable weapons have reached Australia and New Zealand. More will follow. Four-motor Boeing flying fortresses have been reported bombing the Japanese. Many more will follow. America is getting into the war. Factories are busy. No one will win or lose this war in the next few months.

Hitler's failure to invade England demonstrated the inadequacy of his air force. Hitler's inability to cut the lifeline between England and America demonstrates the inadequacy of his sea power. Hitler's reverses in Russia prove that he is not always invincible on land. There is more to war than the actual occupation of territory. The Allies won the war in 1918 before a single Allied soldier had set foot on German soil and when the German army still stood on conquered foreign territory. Easy optimism is very dangerous. Defeatism born of shortsightedness is also harmful. Out here a lot of "experts" had predicted that we could "knock the Japanese out of the Pacific in three weeks." When citizens discover that we cannot, they swing from the extreme of frivolous conceit to the extreme of profound dejection. The truth is that we are not as weak as events since Pearl Harbor have indicated. We shall, to judge by what I have seen recently, soon be stronger.

Dark Days Ahead

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

IN THE past three months Japan has conducted a series of the fastest and most decisive campaigns on record. Its conquest of Singapore and its victories in the Netherlands Indies have completely changed the complexion of the war. The optimistic view that Japan was saving face by committing hara-kiri on a grand scale has completely faded as the forces of Nippon have marched from one success to another, not only undefeated but unchecked by any of the Allied powers. Japanese domination of all of southern Asia now appears a likely consequence of six months more of war.

The importance of the loss of Singapore depends largely upon the condition of the naval base and its facilities at the time it fell into Japanese hands. If Domei reports are to be believed, the "scorched earth" policy of the British here as elsewhere was a complete failure, and after minor repairs the base will be in a condition to do business for Japan. If it can be used effectively, it will enable Japanese warships to dominate most of the Indian Ocean. In any case the loss of the only naval base between Alexandria in Egypt and Pearl Harbor has deprived the United Nations of all chance of waging anything more decisive than a guerrilla war in the southwestern Pacific. Japan is now so firmly placed in the South Seas that direct attack can probably not dislodge it.

The surrender of 60,000 British soldiers released 100,000 Japanese and a considerable force of planes for use on other fronts. MacArthur in the Philippines, the Dutch in their last stronghold in Java, and the British armies in Burma are already feeling the increased pressure. With the main link in the Allied chain broken, all others are proportionately weakened.

Another direct gain for Japan is its acquisition of raw materials. Of the many war essentials missing at home, only mercury and copper are unobtainable in the areas now under Japanese control or subject to imminent attack. Oil resources gained may require six months for effective exploitation after the efficient job of destruction done by the Dutch, but in some instances the building of refineries will be unnecessary, for the oil is of such high quality as to permit its direct use by shipping. Iron is perhaps still a problem, since the iron resources of Luzon are hardly sufficient to replace the 94 per cent of Japan's iron supply normally imported from the British Empire and the United States. However, India, well within reach, can supply any remaining deficiency. Japan is now probably blockade-proof.

In fact, the economic screws are now turning in reverse order. The Allies expected to feel the lack of tin and rubber, but soon they will lack oil. With the loss of the wells in Burma and the Indies, fuel for planes and ships in the Far East will have to be transported, thus adding enormously to the burden on shipping.

Two intangible but serious results of Allied defeats are the growth of recriminations among the United Nations and the definite blow to Anglo-Saxon prestige. Our resentment against the British for military blunders and overconfidence and British resentment against the United States for Pearl Harbor and the failure of the navy to take a bold offensive in time are natural feelings being sedulously cultivated by Axis agents. All of us will do well to seek carefully for all mistakes, but once we have uncovered them and learned their lesson, there is no gain and much loss in continuing to spread blame. The loss of white "face" in the Far East might be kept within reasonable bounds if Great Britain, making a virtue of necessity, would offer ultimate independence to its many subject peoples in Asia and try to make this war everywhere a fight for the four freedoms.

Almost unnoticed among greater disasters has been the closing of the Burma road. Alternative longer routes are in preparation, and the old caravan route from Russia across Central Asia can still be used. But any road from India must surmount the obstacles to be met in crossing the 16,000-feet-high plateau of Tibet and runs the risk, besides, of being shortly disrupted by new Japanese attacks. Meanwhile the Soviet Union is far too busy fighting for its life to be able to spare many war materials even if the nearly uncharted deserts of Turkestan permitted their transportation. Hence we are likely to have to face an increasing military passivity on the part of the Chinese.

No one can doubt that India will be the next Japanese objective. The capture of this great subcontinent would not only supply Japanese economic lacks but represent the initial step of a gigantic pincers movement to be coordinated with a German drive to eliminate the British from the Near East. The persistent activity of Axis agents among the Pathan tribesmen on India's Northwest Frontier is one evidence of this approaching threat.

Australia may or may not be seriously attacked by the Japanese. Port Darwin, the much overrated base on the northern coast, is certain to be taken, if only to prevent later trouble from that direction. But between Port Darwin and the centers of population of southern and eastern Australia extend extremely long and poo some of communication and a singular dearth of military and economic objectives. To reach Brisbane or Sydney by either land or sea Japanese forces would have to venture far from their bases and would almost certainly come into conflict with growing forces of American troops and planes. If they regard these reinforcements far to the south as a sufficiently serious threat, the Japanese are quite likely to push an attack. If this is not the case, they are likely to expend their force in fields offering greater immediate rewards.

One of these fields is the Indian Ocean. With Singapore in its possession Japan enjoys extreme positional advantage in conducting naval operations in this third largest of the world's oceans. Because of the great distances it probably will not be able to sever completely the lines of communication between Australia and Great Britain and those by which war supplies are moving up the Persian Gulf to be transshipped to Russia and up the Red Sea to the British in the Near East. Yet with surface raiding vessels, such as cruisers, it should be able to take a considerable toll of shipping on all three routes and force the now widely dispersed Allied navies to cover still another vast sector of sea.

All this has been accomplished by a relatively poor nation disposing of mediocre air and land forces but using all weapons with unscrupulous skill. Aerial superiority is not an adequate explanation. Furthermore, on the Burma front, where Japanese armies have been making steady gains, their air force has been repeatedly and soundly trounced by American and British fliers. In addition to air superiority it was naval dominance which allowed the Japanese in Malaya to land well-trained troops repeatedly behind their opponents and compel retreat. All branches of the armed forces have been operated in perfect coordination according to a sound strategic plan sufficiently flexible to avail itself of enemy blunders.

Any realistic evaluation of the present strategical position of the United Nations must reveal that it is critical in the extreme. The darkest hours of American history probably lie ahead. We are losing the war today, and by the middle of this year it may have been definitely lost. Still, there is no room for defeatism. The situation of the United Nations today is no worse than was that of the British after Dunkirk or at the height of the submarine campaign a year ago. We have suffered a catastrophic defeat, but if we make immediate intelligent use of our vast resources and man-power, these early setbacks may finally be overcome.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

The Chicago "Sun"

BY MILTON MAYER

Chicago

THE moment Japanese planes took off for Pearl Harbor, the Chicago Sun's season for being ceased to exist. The Sun, at the tender age of three days, was the most violently belligerent paper in America with the single exception of PM, also owned by Marshall Field. Its Sunday cartoon on the morning of Pearl Harbor depicted Japan as a little mosquito buzzing boldly around the massive head of Uncle Sam, and the caption was "Time to Swat Him."

Intervention was the only thing Chicago's morning paper stood for. But what Chicago needed was a good newspaper, a good newspaper being no better than, say, the interventionist New York Times or the isolationist St. Louis Post-Dispatch. The Sun management—and we shall have to distinguish the management from the owner—thought that to be interventionist in the Chicago morning field was enough. It was too easy a formula. It overlooked the inevitable disappearance of the intervention issue, and it overlooked Chicago's need, Chicago's nature, and, in particular, the nature of Chicago's hatred of the Tribune.

alwEverybody in Chicago hates the Tribune. For ninety years the Tribune has been fastening its paretic grip on Chicago, not by virtue of this issue or that but by virtue of its simply being there, by virtue of its being a hard-hitting newspaper in a hard-hitting town, and by virtue of its being, mechanically and technically, one of the best newspapers in the world. The liberals hated it because it was reactionary; the tories because it supported the Kelly-Nash "New Deal" machine. But they all read it.

What was indicated for a mesmerized Chicago was a good newspaper dedicated to the proposition, not that it would whip the Tribune, but that it would save Chicago, and in saving Chicago whip the Tribune. What was indicated was the long view and the long pull. But the Sun was going to do the job in a hurry. (The editors brag that they hired their first man September 1 and published their first paper December 4.) They were going to whip the Tribune and capture Chicago on the issue of isolation and appeasement. The issue went up in the smoke of the battleship Arizona, and the next morning the Tribune came out with Old Glory in three colors on the front page and "My Country, Right or Wrong" on the masthead.

At the end of two months the Sun is not a bad paper, but it is not a good one. And it is very definitely not a successful one. Its circulation, in contrast to its pre-publication promise of a million, is "in excess of 300,000." But its gross press run is around 350,000, of which 150,000 must go to the suburbs and the country in equal parts. An estimate of 40 per cent suburban and country returns is generous to the Sun. (Of a hundred papers shipped to New Orleans, two or three are sold.) An estimate of 35,000 returns on the city gross of 200,000 is also generous to the Sun. The net, generously estimated, is under 300,000.

The advertising picture, if less significant, is more promising. The January paper carried only a fourth as much department-store lineage—the bell-wether classification—as the Tribune, but it did phenomenally well in classified advertising, and all but two of the big local stores were represented in the display columns. Whether or not the paper "pulls," the advertisers can't yet tell, January retail sales in Chicago having been the highest in history in spite of reduced advertising budgets. What the Sun has to face, along with every other paper, is a steadily shrinking volume of advertising as consumer goods disappear.

More important than circulation or advertising is the great intangible—good-will. No paper in the history of American journalism ever had as much pre-publication good-will as the Sun, if for no other reason than that no other city ever had a Chicago Tribune. "Twenty-five million dollars' worth of good-will," the best editor in Chicago says, "and they blew it in sixty days." What happened? And why?

The "what" is plain to see. Chicago was led to expect a great paper. Chicagoans disagreed as to what constituted a great paper, but they agreed on certain factors. It would be well written and well edited. It would be mechanically excellent. It would be complete. It would be independent. It would be original. And—this went without saying in Chicago—it would be a fighting paper. The bourgeoisie was sure it would fight the Kelly machine. The progressives were sure it would fight the Tribune.

The letdown—the buildup was in part the fault of a hopeful Chicago—was terrific. After ninety days of publication Chicagoans of every kind and condition agree that the Sun is dull, listless, characterless, unsatisfying, uninspired. The whole city admits that the paper has no personality, no vitality, no direction, no distinction. These expressions—and I found no dissent from them, even in the local room of the Sun itself—damn the new paper in a way that Hearst and McCormick at their worst were never damned. These expressions damn the Sun—the only major American newspaper venture in the last twenty years—as just another newspaper.

That's the "what" of the Sun. The "why," if not quite so plain, is still plain enough. And it is not to be found in the ordinary difficulties involved in starting a metropolitan newspaper. The ordinary difficulties were there. There was the confusion of sharing the mechanical equipment of a big paper like the News. There was the impossibility of finding ready-made "Supermen" or "Blondies" in a comic-crazy age. There was the Tribune's sudden splurge of front- and back-page color, and the fact that the News presses won't take color decks. There was the refusal of good newspapermen—whose number is not legion—to take a flier, even a flier with Field. There was Hearst, who wanted a million dollars for the only inactive AP franchise in town. And, finally, there was McCormick, the fake apostle of free enterprise, who kept the paper out of the City News Bureau and the picture services.

The handicaps were there, but if anyone ever had a chance of beating them it was Marshall Field. He had the good-will of a million people who, in the last analysis, would settle for anything that was even a little better than the Tribune. He had a great Chicago name and a growing reputation in his own right as a man whose intentions were as good as McCormick's were bad. Finally, he had a half-billion dollars, and, in his own naive words, he didn't care what happened to it. He was willing to pay salaries that the Guild intended to ask for—but not get—in heaven, ranging from a rewrite man's $130 to the publisher's reported $3,000—and I mean per week. Colonel Knox, the popular patriot, is said to be paying off his building mortgage on the composing-room take alone.

The failure of the Sun is the work not of Field but of the men who manage the paper, beginning with its publisher, Mr. Roosevelt's "my good friend" Silliman Evans. Evans is a Texas type, a bumptious glad-hander with a banker's eye and a broker's heart. Originally a reporter for Amon Carter, the Fort Worth Hearst, he rose rapidly to his natural level, that of promoter. He managed Jack Garner's publicity campaign in 1932 in exchange for the Fourth Assistant Postmaster Generalship (no kidding). Jesse Jones gave him a teetering insurance company and some RFC money to mate it with, and then some kind friend who thought that a New Deal paper would be nice in Tennessee financed him into the Nashville Tennesseean. The Tennesseean fought the Crump machine and the poll tax, supported Roosevelt and the TVA, but somehow never got itself mistaken by anybody for a genuinely liberal paper. Evans remained, and remains today, a crusading liberal of the Garner-Carter-Jones school. He was sold to Field by Field's adviser, Charles G. Cushing of Wall Street.

Evans hired Rex Smith as editor. Smith, the AP's man in Spain for years, was editor of Newsweek. Apart from having been "impartially" pro-Franco during the war, he did an excellent job of making Newsweek readable and reliable. When he moved to Chicago, he transferred his headquarters and hiring-hall from the Stork Club to its Chicago counterpart, the Pump Room, an odd place for a fighting liberal or, for that matter, a busy man.

Smith picked the managing editor, the city editor, the editorial writer, the sports editor, and the head of the copy desk. They were all Hearst men; not men who had to work for Hearst but men who liked to. In combination, and in the same respective positions, these were the men who ran the Chicago Herald and Examiner into the ground. For head of the Washington bureau, Smith picked Bascom Timmons, a lifelong Garner man and the journalistic representative of Garner-Carter-Jones crusading liberalism in Washington. For business editor, Smith picked Phil Hanna, whose daily column in the Chicago Journal of Commerce was—and still is, in the Sun—reactionary even for the reactionary Journal of Commerce.

These are the men who hired the staff of the Sun. These are the men who dominate its policies and direct its gathering and selection of news. With these men in executive positions, the miracle is that the paper is as good as it is. And its redeeming features may be traced, quite directly, in equal parts to Field's surviving intentions, to a lot of good working stiffs in the lower brackets, and to the irritating presence of a couple of excellent men in secondary desk positions. Smith's alibi that he had to have men who knew Chicago and Washington suggests that his criteria are, at best, childish.

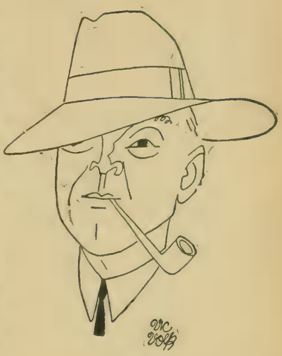
The Sun is plainly a reaction from PM. Smith and Evans, particularly Evans, are understood to regard Ralph Ingersoll as a nutty idealist and PM as a radical fantasy. The Sun was to be everything PM is not. It half succeeded: PM is a bum paper with an idea, and the Sun is a mediocre paper without one. Evans wanted no crusades, no attacks, no novelties, no tricks. He wanted an ordinary newspaper, and he got one.

Behind this reaction to PM lay the taint, as Evans saw it, of being a rich man's darling. Evans, and Smith with him, was determined to make money with the Sun and to begin making it with the first issue. Their determination took the form of the silliest formula in journalism: try to please everybody, but if you can't please everybody, please everybody who will swing on you if you don't. It was the wrong means even to achieve the wrong end of quick success.

Perhaps Field thought that intervention and liberalism were identical, or that the New Deal and liberalism were identical. Evans gave him his intervention and even a little New Dealism, the latter in the form of some heavy early slugging at the Smith anti-labor bill, since forgotten, and at the Honorable Martin Dies. Kind, if uninspired, words are spoken occasionally for the Farm Security Agency and for security in general. The war effort is supported fanatically, uncritically, and occasionally very stupidly, as when the paper suggested we ought to forget the Far East and smack Hitler. The good things the Sun says are said so limply that to date there hasn't been a single editorial worth quoting.

But the good things the Sun says might just as well be said in New York, New Orleans, or San Francisco. The test of a Chicago newspaper's liberalism is not where it stands on the war but where it stands on Sanitary Ed Kelly. The Sun stands four-square, rock-ribbed, and copper-sheathed on the fence.

Roosevelt wanted a Chicago morning paper to fight the Tribune on intervention. Kelly, who is everybody's man, is both McCormick's and Roosevelt's man, McCormick's at heart and Roosevelt's man at election time. Roosevelt told Kelly to help Field, and Kelly interceded with McCormick. McCormick agreed to let the Sun reach the newsstands, ostensibly for Ed Kelly and the fair name of Chicago, actually because a circulation war, complete with slugging of newsboys, would have made hundreds of thousands of Sun sympathizers. When the Sun circulation system broke down, after the first month, Kelly again went to McCormick, and McCormick agreed to let the Sun into the local delivery organizations, ostensibly for Ed Kelly, actually—according to report—because the Sun agreed to raise its Sunday price to a dime in the near future.



Marshall Field

So the Sun was tied to Kelly, and through Kelly to the whole complex of public plunder that spells Chicago. Besides, Roosevelt needed Kelly to carry Illinois in the fall, and Roosevelt's whim is the Sun's will. From its first day of publication the Sun combined the interesting procedure of building up Kelly and laying off him. Days passed into weeks without a single editorial on a local issue, while the "reactionary" News continued its magnificent series of campaigns against the machine in general and the rape of the school system in particular.

By the time the Sun began building up Kelly's campaign for the Senatorial nomination—strictly as news, of course—its readers were familiar to the point of intimacy with the name, the face, and the fame of Edward J. Kelly. When the machine decided on an unknown Congressman as its candidate, the Sun spoke vaguely and generally about unity.

Meanwhile, Professor Paul Douglas, a bred-in-the-bone liberal who was finishing a refreshing term in the City Council, announced his intention, with the support of all the respectable liberals in town, to run for the Senate. The Sun was the only paper that failed to send a photographer to cover his announcement. The "reactionary" News began building him up. The machine picked its party-hack candidate, and Douglas ripped into the machine at a "harmony" luncheon in Springfield. The Sun said nothing. Eventually it will have to support Douglas or abandon its claim to being even a decent newspaper, but it missed its chance to grab him when it could have had him for the asking and put him in the Senate and itself on the map.

There's a pension scandal that has been kicking around unpublished since the first of the year. Business Editor Hanna either knows about it or doesn't read the annual report of one of the biggest corporations in town. Everybody else knows about it, and Messrs. Evans and Smith may even have heard about it at the Pump Room. It's a hot story, going right to the heart of the banking-utility setup, but the Sun hasn't broken it, and the rest of the papers won't. What the Sun has done is run an editorial jubilating over the fact that "Chicago's slum babies are the healthiest in the world" and asking rhetorically, "How could money be better spent?" than by the Infant Welfare Society.

Taking journalism strictly as art, the Tribune is journalistically excellent. It is well written, well edited, and well printed. The Sun, artistically considered, is atrocious. Loaded with prima donnas—some of whom were no good in their prime—it is consistently overwritten. Some days the paper carries as much as thirty-nine columns more news than the fatter Tribune and still fails to be a complete newspaper. The reason is that stories that ought to be a column or two—like Turner Catledge's dispatches from South America—are cut to a few paragraphs.

The paper depends on the brilliance of its individual writers—few of whom are brilliant—instead of on sound reporting. "It's like a department store with every department leased out," says one of the editors of the News. Some of the prima donnas are Hearst sob sisters, like the lady who began her page 1 biography of Colin Kelly with, "When he was sixteen months old, Colin Kelly's mother dedicated him to God." Others, more numerous and even more terrible, are whimsy specialists.

Whimsy is a dangerous business. There is nothing essentially whimsical about a worker's being crushed almost to death by a five-ton pile of salt, and the headline "Worker Neatly Seasoned Under 5 Tons of Salt" doesn't make it so. Neither does the lead "The flavor of a glass of beer is immeasurably improved by a pinch of salt." A painfully funny front-page feature, "Windy the Weather Girl," editorial pieces on antimacassar oil and the man-hours lost when Dorothy Lamour inspected an airplane factory, and consistently flippant or oleaginous treatment of minor tragedies are too numerous and regular to be accidental.

Bad writing and editing are posterior to bad news judgment. A reporter is sent to Missouri to cover a lynching three days after the story is dead. Another is sent to Hawaii cold, writes two or three necessarily inadequate stories, and is brought back home. A Sun scoop is usually something nobody else wants, and when another paper gets a real beat, the Sun half the time tries to outplay it and half the time ignores it.

Distortion—not, of course, anywhere near as bad as the Tribune's—appears regularly in the omission of local and the handling of international news. H. R. Knickerbocker's arrival in New Zealand with "United States naval forces" is played up over the invasion of Singapore island. A Washington dispatch reporting an air battle in which the Japs lost three planes to the Americans' two asserts in the lead that "the results were disastrous to the enemy." The first story on a move for A. F. of L.–C. I. O. unity is given less than a third of a column, without any background or insight.

Something that can only be described as general stupidity may lie behind all this. When Time ran a not unfriendly story about the decline of the paper and its circulation and editorial troubles, the Sun ran its telegram of protest on page 1 of the Sunday edition. The Sun telegram, weak, evasive, and abusive, brought the Time story to the attention of three million Chicagoans, of whom only some ten or twenty thousand would have seen it otherwise.

Under the same category of general stupidity must be placed the ragged, erratic make-up—particularly of the front page—and the steady stream of mistakes and inaccuracies that find their way into the paper. Churchill came over on a new battleship—and didn't go back on one, as the Sun reported. The squash tournament finalists represented the Chicago Club—and not the University of Chicago, as the Sun reported. Montgomery Ward has always lettered the extra pages in its catalogue—and didn't "hit upon the idea" in order to get war prices in, as the Sun said. These things are trivial, but they pile up.

Worst of all—from the standpoint of journalism strictly as art—the Sun doesn't know the town and hasn't touched it. Chicago is a slugging town and a sentimental town. The Sun hasn't waded into anything yet, except water pollution—with a Supreme Court decision on water diversion as the villain and Mayor Kelly as the hero. A suicide of a boy whose girl has told him he's too prudish for modern times goes untouched; so does the story of a little boy whose tongue froze to a fire hydrant on the coldest day of the year. A fire in one of the worst tenements in Chicago, a structure condemned and uncondemned a dozen times, is reported twice—in each case with a long story—in the same edition, but without anything on the scandal of the tenement itself. Even the war hasn't been brought home to Chicago the way it has in the smart Hearst paper.

Finally, the paper, with all its whimsy, lacks originality and independent news judgment. Having put its streamer on Knudsen the night Nelson was appointed, it shifted back and forth all night, vis-a-vis the successive editions of the Tribune, and wound up in its last edition with the streamer on Knudsen's "promotion." It prints more canned publicity stories and pictures than any other paper in town. It carries good syndicated columns by Lippmann, Lindley, Grafton, H. Allen Smith, and Ernie Pyle, but its local features are conventional, and its women's and club pages, on which it lavishes loving care, are completely insipid. The Sun does nothing that somebody else hasn't done before—and many times before. The handicaps mentioned previously explain only a few of these defects. The management is primarily at fault.

Marshall Field doesn't know Chicago and doesn't know the newspaper business, and admits he doesn't. But the men he hired do, or ought to. Field's paper lacks, among other things, the character given a paper by a dominating personality, like that of McCormick, Ochs, White, or Hearst. If Field has that personality, and he has yet to display it, he can save his paper and learn how to run it. Until he learns how to run it, he can find men like Agar or Bovard, or even a great working editor in Chicago who would like to change jobs right now. The principles on which Field founded the Sun can never be realized under its present executives. Chicago still needs a good paper. If Field still wants one, he, and he alone, can get it.

World Trade After the War

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

ONLY in the context of a greatly expanded world trade, the new Anglo-American economic agreement recognizes, can this country hope to receive any physical return for the billions of dollars' worth of material which it is shipping to Britain and other countries under the terms of the Lease-Lend Act. Consequently, the signatories declare, the squaring of accounts at the close of the war must be accompanied by measures to enlarge "production, employment, and the exchange and consumption of goods which are the material foundations of the liberty and welfare of all peoples"; and to this end they undertake to eliminate "discriminatory treatment in international commerce" and to reduce tariff and other barriers.

Ambitious as this program is, no one can say that it is out of scale with the magnitude of the problem of restoring international trade to full and robust health. This means much more than a return to 1939 or even to 1929, for the progressive paralysis of international trade dates back at least to the last war. But now the final crisis has been reached, and unless drastic measures are taken to enable goods to flow freely from one country to another and thus make possible the reintroduction of a stable international exchange system, we are likely to be forced back to primitive methods of barter.

It has not yet been widely enough recognized that among the major casualties of the war is the British market, which for over a century has occupied a pivotal position in world trade. Despite its abandonment of free trade during the depression, Britain was still at the beginning of the war the least autarchic of the major powers. Even the stoutest British champions of protection were forced to recognize that a crowded population and limited domestic resources made self-sufficiency a ridiculous ideal. Consequently most tariff rates were moderate, and the country drew freely on all parts of the world for food, raw materials, and even manufactured goods. The British trade balance was habitually passive, with imports exceeding exports by upward of a billion dollars a year. But normally this gap was closed by Britain's numerous "invisible" sources of international income, of which the most important were returns on foreign investments, shipping receipts, and banking and insurance earnings. Up to 1929 these items were sufficient not merely to pay for the excess of imports but to leave a balance for reinvestment abroad. During the depression years, however, foreign income from all sources fell somewhat short of the amounts payable abroad, and in order to keep its international accounts balanced, Britain was compelled to realize foreign investments.

In the two and a half years of war this trickle of disinvestment has become a flood, and even though Lease-Lend has relieved Britain of an enormous volume of current payments, its needs for foreign exchange still far exceed its receipts, forcing it to continue the dissipation of its accumulated wealth. It is worth while to examine more closely the ways and means of this liquidation. Just before the war started, according to the Federal Reserve Bulletin for December, 1941, Britain's gold and dollar resources aggregated $4,483,000,000. Today there is only $547,000,000 available in this country with which the British government can meet the many disbursements not included under Lend-Lease. Practically all British owners of American stocks have had to turn them into the British Treasury in return for payment in sterling. Several hundred million dollars' worth of these securities have been sold on the New York Stock Exchange for British government account, and other huge blocks have been pledged to the RFC as security for a loan.

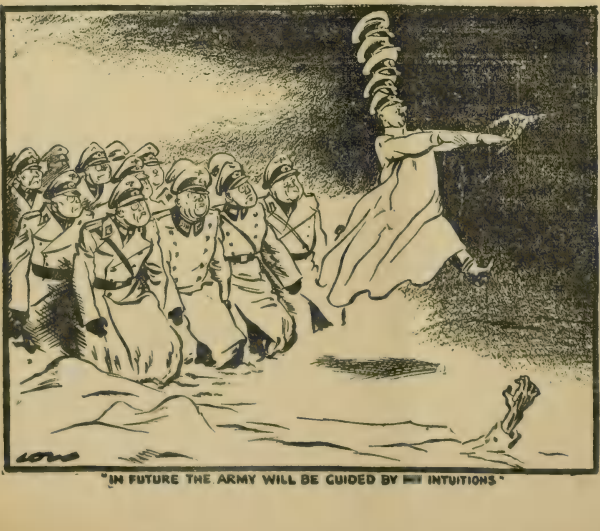
London has always been the normal financial center for the dominions and India, and their bonds formed an important segment of Britain's overseas assets. Now these countries are accumulating sterling balances as the result of sales to Britain far in excess of purchases and so are able to repatriate these debts. India, for instance, has redeemed all its direct obligations held in London and thus achieved complete financial independence, a fact which is not without political significance. The South African government has repatriated or repaid sterling debt amounting to some $160,000,000 since the outbreak of the war and in addition, according to the Economist, has been able to make available in London a far larger sum for the purchase by South Africans of British-held shares in South African gold mines.

Another fruitful source of British investment income has dried up in Malaya. Possibly after the war the tin mines will again yield profits if capital can be supplied for their rehabilitation, but there may be a rather limited future for rubber plantations if this country succeeds in building up a large-scale synthetic-rubber industry. Thus in all parts of the world we see that British foreign investments have either been liquidated to pay for the war or are being destroyed. And this has economic significance beyond its effects in diminishing the incomes of the British capitalist class. For it means a permanent decline in Britain's receipts of foreign exchange and thus a reduced ability after the war to buy American cotton and machinery, Canadian wheat, Argentine beef, and innumerable other commodities for which it long provided the largest and freest market in the world.

Before the war Britain's total foreign assets, including gold and investments in the empire, were estimated to be worth about 5 billion pounds, yielding in 1938 an income of about 200 million pounds. One-fifth of the capital sum was liquidated during the first eighteen months of the war, and unless peace comes much sooner than now seems possible, a total reduction of 50 per cent is a reasonable expectation. A still greater reduction in income is probable, since it is, on the whole, the most productive investments which are being disposed of. It is also necessary to take into account the fact that Britain's shipping income will decline, since its much depleted fleet will have to compete with an enlarged and almost new American mercantile marine. We can therefore expect that after the war Britain's capacity to buy imported commodities in excess of its exports will be reduced by a half. That will mean a reduced standard of living for the British, but it will also mean a reduction of income for the countries accustomed to sell in Britain and an aggravation of the harassing problem of surpluses.

It is clear that if Britain is to make a return in kind of Lease-Lend materials and also to continue as an importer on its pre-war scale, it will have to enlarge its exports. Indeed, far more than Germany before the war, it will be in a position where it must "export or die." Unless, therefore, the aspirations of the Atlantic Charter and the good intentions of the new economic agreement are translated into concrete terms of lower tariffs and demolished trade barriers, Britain is likely to be forced to turn to methods of barter. Commenting on this post-war problem, the Department of Commerce stated recently: "No other solution is seen than that the North American continent disposes itself to the import of goods on a scale far larger than ever before, while England makes every possible effort to take advantage of the opportunity offered."

Those of us who have observed in the past the responsiveness of Congress to pressure groups when discussing tariff matters cannot feel very optimistic about the adoption of this solution unless an overwhelming public opinion in favor of freer trade is organized. This means a big job of education, but if the facts can be presented clearly and authoritatively, they should prove eloquent.



"IN FUTURE THE ARMY WILL BE GUIDED BY [illegible] INTUITIONS"

Congress may shy at reducing tariffs, but it is also likely to insist that the terms of the Lease-Lend Act in regard to repayment are carried out. But how is this to be done if the barriers against goods remain as high as they are today? Perhaps it will be suggested, as indeed Senator George proposed during the debates on the Lease-Lend bill, that Britain should ship to the United States our normal requirements of tin, rubber, jute, and other non-competitive raw materials free of charge for so many years. But is this the solution? Surely the only result would be that Britain's capacity to import from foreign countries, including the United States, would be correspondingly diminished. This might be approved by some of our overprotected industries concerned only with the domestic market, but how will it sit with the farmers and the increasing number of manufacturers willing and able to find new foreign markets?

After the war, pressure to sell in foreign markets will increase in America. The farm-surplus problem is being alleviated by war demands, but it is not going to be solved. And the tremendous increase in industrial capacity now taking place will hardly be fully employed unless new outlets become available. As a result, private enterprise in this country may find itself impaled on the horns of a very awkward dilemma: either it will have to submit to far greater government interference than it has yet experienced, adapting itself to economic planning in the interests of full employment, or it will have to revert to genuine competition and sacrifice that prime begetter of monopolies—the protective tariff.

Now that we have nearly all the gold in the world, the showdown cannot be postponed by accepting bullion instead of goods that we can consume and enjoy. Our present shortages show up the Fort Knox folly, for which chief responsibility rests on the tariff system, in a glaring light. How much better off we should be today if we had stored up only half as much gold and ten billion dollars' worth of rubber, tin, sugar, wool, worsted, copper, aluminum, and steel!

We have been learning painfully in the past few weeks that even so rich a country as the United States cannot hope to attain self-sufficiency. We shall learn as the months go by that the only true criterion of economic prosperity is the amount of goods available for consumption. But shall we be able to draw the moral after the war? Shall we realize that if we bar or restrict those goods which other countries can produce more efficiently we are acting to diminish the total supply available for consumption as well as limiting the output of those goods for the production of which we have peculiar aptitude?

This is the proposition embodied in the Atlantic Charter and more specifically in the new economic agreement. The world has passed through twenty years of extreme economic nationalism, and its fruits have proved to be poverty and war. If, when peace returns, we do not seize the opportunity to build an international economy on the basis of maximum exchange and consumption of goods, we must expect our children to gather the same bitter harvest.

In the Wind

DESPITE THE STRICT RATIONING of new automobiles, Franco's ambassador to London, the Duke of Alba, has been granted permission by the State Department to buy and ship to England a new car, complete with tires. A few months after the Spanish civil war, when there was no rationing, Juan Negrín, former Republican Premier, ordered an American car with bullet-proof plating. Permission to buy the car was refused him by the State Department on the ground that the arms embargo excluded such a purchase.

AN EFFORT TO COUNTERACT the theory of "crime waves" is being made by a group of liberal criminologists who have organized a new press agency, Crime News and Feature Service. Regular feature stories on current crimes will be syndicated, but the cases will be integrated with their social and economic backrounds and not pictured as part of, or exceptions to, recurring cycles of criminality.

IN AN ARTICLE ON MORALE, the Quartermaster Review, an army publication, offers this analysis of military failure: "The French Revolution was ushered in by a general laxity in military discipline and courtesy. The armies of Russia utterly collapsed in the World War following the issuance of the order against saluting."

A MINOR CAMPAIGN to create a war-time job for Joseph P. Kennedy, ex-ambassador to Great Britain, is being waged by former critics of the President's foreign policy. Boake Carter, Arthur Krock, the Boston Traveler, and the New York Enquirer have all urged that Kennedy be given a high government post.

JACQUES DORIOT, the French Communist leader who became a fascist, recently returned to Paris from the Russian front. He told reporters he had gone there to "avenge the retreat of Napoleon."

ROBERT JORDAN, pro-Nazi soapboxer, was picked up by the FBI on February 17 for alleged failure to register as a foreign agent. He is known to have made several clear statements of his fascist sympathies, of which the following are examples: "I am here to bring you the word of Hitler. I am his ambassador. . . . I was smart enough to take out my papers and keep within the law." Since it could not be proved that he was receiving funds from Germany, Jordan was freed on February 23.

[The $5 prize for the best item received in February goes to Pauli Murray of Washington, D. C., for her story on discrimination against Negroes in government work, published February 7.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

End of Season

BY ROBERT PENN WARREN

Leave now the beach, and even that perfect friendship
—Hair frosting, careful teeth—that came, oh! late,
Late, late, almost too late: that thought like a landslip;
Or only the swimmer's shape for which you would wait,
Bemused and pure among the bright umbrellas, while
Blue mountains breathed and the dark boys cried their bird-throated syllable.

Leave beach, spiaggia, playa, plage, or spa,
Where beginnings are always easy; or leave, even,
The Springs where your grandpa went in Arkansas
To purge the rheumatic guilt of beef and bourbon,
And slept like a child, nor called out with the accustomed nightmare,
But lolled his old hams, stained hands, in that Lethe, as others, others, before.

For waters wash our guilt and dance in the sun:
And the prophet, hairy and grim in the leonine landscape,
Came down to Jordan; toward moon-set de Leon
Woke, while squat Time clucked like the darkling ape;
And Dante's duca, smiling in the blessèd clime,
With rushes, sea-wet, wiped from that sad brow the infernal grime.

You'll come, you must! and with the tongue gone wintry
You'll greet in town the essential face, which now wears
The mask of travel, smudge of history;
And wordless, each one clasps, and stammering, stares:
You will have to learn a new language to say what is to say,
But it will never be useful in schoolroom, customs, or cafe.

For purity was wordless, and perfection
But the bridegroom's sleep or the athlete's marble dream,
And the annual sacrament of sea and sun,
Which browns the face and heals the heart, will seem
Silence, expectant to the answer, which is Time:
For all our conversation is index to our common crime.

On the last day swim far out, should the doctor permit
—Crawl, trudgeon, breast—or deep and wide-eyed, dive
Down the glaucous glimmer where no voice can visit;
But the mail lurks in the box at the house where you live:
The summer's wishes, winter's wisdom—you must think
On the true nature of Hope, whose eye is round and does not wink

Notes by the Way

JOHN STEINBECK'S latest book, "The Moon Is Down" (Viking Press, $2), is a fable of the occupied country cast in the dramatic form he employed in "Of Mice and Men." The action takes place in "any conquered country in any time," and the theme is the slow undermining of the morale of the conquerors. The invaders take over the island without a struggle, thanks to the expert preparatory work of a local fifth columnist—the popular storekeeper. They try to conciliate the people in the person of Mayor Orden; they see no reason why an orderly people should not remain orderly, especially since they are unarmed and helpless, and go on operating the mines which made their island important in the first place. But the islanders, who have been free for four hundred years, refuse to accept their role. They are helpless, yet they manage to disrupt the work at the mines; even worse is their ostracism of the invaders, to whom they deny in innumerable and quiet ways the status of human beings. Shootings have no effect, and in the end it is the invaders who are on the defensive.

The theme is important, timely, universal. It is closely bound up with prevailing emotions. It would seem, therefore, to be the stuff out of which a modern fable might emerge. Yet I found the book curiously unmoving despite my own preoccupation with the subject. The trouble lies, I think, with the method Mr. Steinbeck has affected—studied understatement, simple, unaccented language, matter-of-fact tone. Such writing depends for its power on the concentration and maturity of feeling with which it is charged. In this case the charge is not sufficient. The form, therefore, seems contrived, the simplicity becomes pretentious, the understatement and matter-of-fact tone sentimental. The sprawling yet effective eloquence of "The Grapes of Wrath" seems to me much better suited to Mr. Steinbeck's particular gifts.

THE WRITING of Antoine de Saint Exupéry resembles that of André Malraux in one respect: it is marked by the special kind of frenzy which results when passion is joined to technique. Such writing reminds me of the performance of a ballet dancer whose wonderful freedom of movement rises from and is released by a technical control of the body in motion strict in the extreme but so complete that it has been "forgotten" by the performer and is invisible to the observer; and it yields the same keen pleasure.

The passion of Malraux springs from an intellect and an imagination more profound and complex; but Saint Exupéry's "Flight to Arras" (Reynal and Hitchcock, $2.75) is a fine performance. It gives a thrilling account of an actual flight to Arras; it brings us to the very center of the French defeat; and it gives one man's answer to the question why the members of Group 2-33 accepted, with a "Very good, sir," the command to take up their planes though France was already in collapse and the sorties of Saint Exupéry and his comrades were both useless and suicidal.

The answer reveals a man perceptive, humane, of exquisite honesty. To my mind, however, the most striking passages of the book are those in which Saint Exupéry shows us the countryside of France from his great height and particularly those which bring under our very eyes the terrible reality of France disintegrating into a sluggish stream of refugees, of villages toppling one by one into the river of defeat.

> . . . I had seen the village in which we were billeted go to pieces. I do not expect ever to be free of that clinging, viscous memory. . . . All the stables, all the sheds, all the barns and garages had vomited into the narrow streets a most extraordinary collection of contrivances. There were new motor cars, and there were ancient farm carts that for half a century had stood untouched under layers of dust. . . . Every box on wheels had been dug up and was now laden with the treasures of the home. . . .
>
> Together, these treasures had made up that greater treasure—a home. By itself each was valueless; . . . Each filling its place, they had been made indispensable by habit and beautiful by memory, had been lent price by the sort of fatherland which, together, they constituted. . . . Fling sacred relics into a heap, and they can turn your stomach.

"FALLING THROUGH SPACE" by Richard Hillary (Reynal and Hitchcock, $2.50) is the personal history of another aviator, a young Australian who was a student at Oxford when the war broke out. He immediately joined the R. A. F.; a year later he was shot down over the Channel during the great German air offensive. He was rescued, but he was so badly injured that he spent almost as many months in hospitals as he had spent in the air. The last third of his book is an account of his long painful recovery and of his efforts to discover the meaning of his experience.

In time of war the individual shrinks to the proportions of a pinpoint at the minimizing end of a telescope. In self-defense we think in terms of masses of men; and separate human tragedies are hidden rather than revealed by the round numbers of casualty figures. But every human being, since he is "involved in Mankinde," is under an obligation to retain his awareness of men as individuals if only because man in the mass loses his significance.

Mr. Hillary is only now twenty-two. His is a first book both as to writing and thinking. It has not the charm or the brilliance or the resolution of "Flight to Arras." But for that very reason it serves to make real for us the individual ordeal in a world at war.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Fischer on England

DAWN OF VICTORY. By Louis Fischer. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.

ONE value of Louis Fischer's new book is that it will help the American reader to understand the constant reshufflings of the British Cabinet, particularly the recent one. Those changes, in what they avoid rather than in what they confront, emphasize the real problem of Britain—war production. Mr. Churchill, an unmatched leader of the people, is not a very good conductor of the war. He does a good job as strategist-politician, but he is weak on production, as Louis Fischer says. The June 23 speech, on solidarity with the U. S. S. R., was one of the greatest strokes of political generalship of this or any other age. Yet Britain is using much less than 100 per cent of its real productive potential. Why is this so? Because, Fischer answers, the conservative classes dread the reorganization of British economy. The social perspectives which would be opened up by all-out production are what has prevented the appointment of a supreme Minister of Production.

The author is insistent on these points. In its unbreakable will to resist the Axis Britain is a unity; in the how of that resistance it is not. We have heard much about a "revolution" in Britain. Fischer is skeptical. There is a great desire for a more decent life, but that desire is growing up outside the political parties. Labor, certainly, has not so far made itself the natural leader of that populism. The British government is fundamentally a conservative one, even more so after the recent Cabinet changes. A great deal of what Fischer has to say here about the rivalries between Bevin and Beaverbrook and between the two factions of the Tory party is most illuminating. I wish, however, that he had paid more attention to the career of Churchill, for much of the obscurity of the situation is peculiarly due to the Prime Minister's position. Mr. Churchill is leader of the Conservative Party, yet in a sense, though he is a Conservative and on many points an extremely reactionary one, he is really a man without a party. He is distrusted by a great many Tories; his cautiously managed approach to Labor would have guaranteed that, of course, though a majority of his party realize that they could not survive without Churchill and Labor. After the Chamberlain tragedy the trade-union party alone could have got the best out of labor. But Churchill had already changed his political party twice, from Conservative to Liberal in the early 1900's and back again in 1924. He is not firmly imbedded among the Tories, and it is impracticable for him, if not impossible, to join the Labor Party. (Some labor leaders expect him to make that move should Labor ever grow strong enough to provide adequate support.)

The independence, or rather the personalism, this implies, quite as much as his courage and his rejection of appeasement, makes him the only possible leader of a coalition government. It also inevitably forces him to compromise to an excessive degree. At all costs he must placate the Conservative Party, which alone could overthrow him. Hence the defeatist Hoare, the suspected Simon, and the detested Margesson, his enemy within the Conservative Party. As the author puts it, Churchill has not captured the Tory party, "that party has captured him." The author does not give any serviceable advice as to what line Labor should follow, though he is disturbed by Labor's forcelessness. Nor does he touch upon a problem which is engaging many intelligent people of all parties, of how to create a real Board of Grand Strategy. That again is related to Mr. Churchill's monopolistic character. Nevertheless, in general these chapters are extremely useful, alike in their information and in their suggestive power. One notes only two minor errors, and one unnecessarily cruel statement. Fischer says that a certain Cabinet minister is reputed to be a descendant of Queen Elizabeth. He might have left Englishmen at least one symbol of virginity.

About Russia the author has much to say that is profoundly interesting. Axis propaganda in this country seeks to intensify the existing distrust of Britain and the Soviet Union. To the problem of Russia Fischer provides answers which differ considerably from those recently given by this reviewer in The Nation.

Does a Russian victory mean the domination of Europe by the Soviet Union and the spread of communism? After tracing the rebirth of Russian nationalism, Fischer offers two basic reasons why this is improbable. The European masses believe that a transformation of society is necessary. The question before them, however, is what they shall put in the place of capitalist democracy. Louis Fischer believes that it is unthinkable that they will choose communism, for greater democracy is the essence of the public desire. Given the probable circumstances of post-war Europe, I think he is right. Lenin long ago put the matter succinctly when he said that the working classes do not revolt until they are convinced that any change will be for the better, or rather not for the worse. (That, one supposes, was also why Hitler polled 44 per cent of the German electorate, though Lenin had not foreseen that sort of choice.) The problem of communism, then, is less likely to become urgent if the democratic powers reconstruct their world. This is good reasoning as long as one bears in mind that so far there is very little reason to expect that the democratic rulers of today will become vigorously reconstructive unless they are given what might be called overwhelming support. Fischer's second point is, at bottom, that it is more than likely that as the war goes on Russia will be so weakened and engrossed by home affairs that it will be little inclined toward military or political expansion. At the same time British and American armies will be in Europe, and America will have the control of food surpluses. Hence Europe will look to America rather than to the Soviets.

One confesses that the second argument, based as it is on probability, is disagreeable. It seems to suggest that the solution of the whole Russian question depends on German strength rather than on democratic vision. The estimate of relative strengths may turn out to be correct. The enormousness of the task confronting Russia will probably incline it to cooperation. That being so, we have only one sane course, to offer security, post-war aid, and the right of collaboration irrespective of any estimate of its strength. The contrary course is to perpetuate Russian fears, fears which are likely to do as much harm in the future as they have in the past. I wish Fischer had said this explicitly. He has not done so, though when he says every power must be included in our scheme for post-war reconstruction, he doubtless means the Soviets also. What is indisputably of great value, however, is his warning that the policy of the balance of power is once more likely to be pursued. Certain British Tories are already thinking of an Anglo-Russian bloc to replace the Anglo-French coalition. There is also the idea of an Anglo-American bloc, regarded by some conservatives as the complement of the Anglo-Russian setup; the one to be balanced against the other, with Britain at the center of the world seesaw. Against this the author vigorously warns us. Over and above the importance of the author's analyses of immediate realities, it is the discussion of these trends which makes "Dawn of Victory" so suggestive a book.

RALPH BATES

Japan's "Mein Kampf"

JAPAN'S DREAM OF EMPIRE: THE TANAKA MEMORIAL. Edited with an Introduction by Carl Crow. Harper and Brothers. $1.25.

ALTHOUGH it antedates the published version of "Mein Kampf" by several years, Japan's blueprint of world conquest, the Tanaka Memorial, is comparatively unknown in this country. Scholars interested in the Far East have been debating its authenticity ever since it was first brought forth by the Chinese delegation to the Kyoto conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations late in 1929. But perhaps because the scholars have been skeptical regarding its authenticity, it has received little attention outside of academic circles. Except for a few brief references in 1931 and 1932 the daily press has ignored its existence. With the attack on Pearl Harbor and the obviously carefully planned offensive against British, Dutch, and American possessions in East Asia and the South Seas, this controversial document has suddenly been rediscovered and is now published in this country for the first time.

The reviewer was among those who first read the Tanaka Memorial some twelve years ago and was among those who were dubious about its authenticity. The document purports to be a memorial presented to the Emperor of Japan on July 25, 1927, by Premier Tanaka, who was a forerunner of the present military clique. Its audacious plan for the domination of the whole of East Asia through the defeat of the United States seemed, at that date, completely incredible. Moreover, since the document itself contains certain obvious textual inaccuracies there was reason to consider it only another international forgery.

The authenticity of the document is still unproved. But as Carl Crow points out in the introduction to this edition of the memorial, "there has not been an official action of Japan in China for the past ten years which has not followed the lines laid out in the memorial. If the memorial was never written and never presented to the Emperor, then it is a very curious and unaccountable circumstance that it should form the basis for Japanese policy."

Although it does not carry us as far as the attack on Pearl Harbor and the South Seas, the document sets forth in detail the Japanese plan for overrunning Manchuria and for the subjugation and exploitation of China, and it carries explicit recognition of the necessity for fighting both the United States and the Soviet Union.

Some of the sections on the conquest of Manchuria are positively uncanny. Tanaka outlines in detail the use of Korean immigrants in providing the excuse for attacking Manchuria. He describes how Manchuria is to be exploited by the depreciation of Fengtien banknotes, and provides a blueprint for the building of railroads and other military preparations in Manchuria for the eventual war against China and the Soviet Union. All of these steps have been carried out exactly as outlined.

> For the sake of self-preservation and of giving warning to China [Tanaka adds] we must fight America some time. The American Asiatic squadron stationed at the Philippines is but a stone's throw from Tsushima and Senchima. . . . The Yamato race is then embarked on the journey of world > conquest. According to the last will of Meiji, our first step was to conquer Formosa, and the second step to annex Korea. Having completed both of these, the third step is . . . the conquest of Manchuria, Mongolia, and China. When this is done, the rest of Asia, including the South Sea Islands, will be at our feet.

For a document written in 1927 this is pretty fair prophecy! But there are some significant variations in the pattern. Tanaka, if indeed he wrote these words, did not envision Japan fighting simultaneously against China, Great Britain, the Netherlands, and the United States. And he was clearly too optimistic regarding the economic advantages to be gained by the conquest of Manchuria and Mongolia. While Japan today is much farther along the road to world conquest than he dreamed, it has achieved this by taking risks which Tanaka sought to avoid. As prophecy, therefore, the memorial has serious shortcomings. But as a key to the mind of the Japanese militarist it should be required reading.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Robinson Jeffers

BE ANGRY AT THE SUN AND OTHER POEMS. By Robinson Jeffers. Random House. $2.50.

JEFFERS'S poetry turns out to be better upon reacquaintance than the reviewer remembers it to have been. And the reviewer is not one to overrate this sort of poetry. But it stays more or less the same, without amplification or development. All that is new in this latest volume—the unrelieved obsession with contemporary events and even the influence of Yeats (one of Jeffers's few admissions that he reads his contemporaries)—is imposed upon an unchanged essence. The new narrative poem, Mara, is as bad as ever, if not worse—probably worse. How Jeffers won his reputation on the basis of his narratives I cannot see: they contain some of the worse respectable poetry in English, and couch a humanity too narrow ever to be taken very seriously in poetry or out of it. Elsewhere, in the verse play included in this book and in the short poems, this narrowness does less harm, lacking the space in which to make itself felt.

The verse play, which deals with Hitler at a peripatetic moment of his career, is surprisingly successful in spite of its stilted passages, because its argument is felt strongly and seriously enough to inform the verse with strength and seriousness. Jeffers treats Hitler as a personality valuable in its own right, and thus not simply to be hated and feared but to be understood and delineated for the purposes of poetry, since, after all, it is to figure in a poem. The paths to wisdom, or to a wise attitude, are many, and not all of them are wise. Jeffers's philosophy of history, a compost of Spengler and sophomoric cynicism, enables him to understand events better for the sake of poetry, and perhaps for the sake of truth itself, than does the better-informed, better-intentioned, but more self-indulgent partisanship of liberal anti-fascism. The latter for the right reasons clings to illusions of which Jeffers has rid himself for the wrong reasons. Wrong reasons and all, this is why the short poems here make up some of the best contemporary literature about the war itself.

"Strong . . . pungent."
—LOS ANGELES TIMES.

A MODERN PICARESQUE NOVEL
BY Ward Moore
BREATHE THE AIR AGAIN

A lusty novel told in vigorous prose that hammers at the heart — the story of a young man who sets out to see the country in order to learn what he wants to do.

Read this Amazing Review by Max Eastman:

"WARD MOORE has written a magnificent novel, a 'proletarian novel' which contains a real passion for the proletariat. It absorbed me from the first page to the last. I call the style better than John Steinbeck's.

"No book I ever read presents erotic experience with more vivid truth. In this field Hemingway is an amateur by comparison with Ward Moore.

"It has what it takes to make a great novel. I predict a brilliant career for Ward Moore."

At all bookstores $2.75

HARPER & BROTHERS—NEW YORK

RELIGIOUS INFORMATION PLEASE

The experts—Rabbi Moses, Father Patrick and Reverend Modernist—are often stumped when asked by Brother Humanist about God, spirituality, immortality, prayer, the Bible and Christ.

Send 60c for twelve issues of this serial; or obtain it free if you can answer these questions correctly:

1. Which books of the modern Holy Bible did Luther and Calvin reject?
2. Where does God say: "Beat your plowshares into swords, and your pruninghooks into spears"?
3. Where is the Biblical evidence that Jesus was not born of a virgin or laid in a manger?

THE ARBITRATOR
114 East 31st St., New York City

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

But what is Jeffers's merit as a poet? Certainly he has too little and too crude a feeling for language and for the plastic requirements of poetry, too little sensitivity to the weight, texture, flavor, rhythms, and history of words, taking and using them too much as he finds them, failing to exploit their extra-logical qualities. He can state physical detail vividly; yet he has little power to suggest or evoke much beyond that which is actually stated. But that is just it. Jeffers's poetry is successful—when it is successful—as statement; one might almost say as charged prose. It is worst whenever the poet reminds himself that he is writing formal poetry and tries to call the reader's attention to the fact. This verse does not enter poetry by its formal merits but because it is driven by a certain force and conviction. It is about something. And this something, the experience of a sincere and intensely serious person, is strong enough to transfigure the crudeness and clumsiness of its own means of expression. Given, to begin with, enough intensity and some competence—which Jeffers does have—thoroughgoing sincerity will usually produce some amount of good poetry in a lifetime. With most people fashionable pretensions and the wrong influences get in the way.

For Jeffers there is little question of this last; he is an odd item, a raw poet, out of the main stream, taking nothing from and giving nothing to his contemporaries. Which is his handicap as well as his advantage. He understands too little, knows too little, cherishes too many half-truths, and like all provincials tries to make too few ideas go too far. Thus, not having enough art, he has to rely mostly on his temperament. I can only wonder whether that will be enough to make more than a small fraction of his work permanent poetry.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

AMUSEMENTS

"Buoyant, Giddy & Funny"
—Atkinson, Times
JUNIOR MISS
LYCEUM Theatre, 45th St. E. of B'way. CH 4-4256
Evenings, 8:40; Matinees, WED. and SAT., 2:40

CHERYL CRAWFORD presents
George Gershwin's
PORGY AND BESS
"Go see 'Porgy and Bess' if you go to nothing else"
—Kronenberger, PM.
PRICES:
Evgs. . . . $2.75 to 55¢
Mats. . . . $2.20 to 55¢
MAJESTIC THEATRE, W. [illegible] St. Eves. Incl. Sunday. Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30

SUBSCRIPTION FORM
THE NATION 55 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y.

For the inclosed $.................... please enter my subscription for the period indicated below:

☐ THIRTEEN WEEKS ($1) ☐ TWO YEARS ($8)
☐ ONE YEAR ($5) ☐ THREE YEARS ($11)

Name..
Address..
City..
Extra Postage for Year: Canadian, 50c; Foreign, $1.00 8-7-42

Argument for Democracy

THE DESTINY OF WESTERN MAN. By W. T. Stace. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

MR. STACE is like one of those saintly philosophers of the medieval period who could not rest until he had fortified his unquestioned and unquestioning faith in God by proving that God existed, that he was eternal, and that he was good. Mr. Stace, Briton born and philosopher by profession, has written his book to prove that democracy is not only desired by our side but good on all counts. It is perfectly clear that our author has never doubted that he prefers the democratic to the totalitarian way of life, and does not think English-speaking readers need to be converted. But he feels that it is necessary to show that democracy is not only relatively but absolutely good and, what is more, absolutely "true." He seeks to demonstrate that "we can believe, on good and rational grounds, that our ideals are rooted in reason and goodness, that they are worth defending because they are right and true, because they are actually the noblest and greatest ideals which human beings have yet found in the world. And we may further fortify our faith that in the end our cause must triumph, not because it is ours, but because it is just."

A rhetorical flight such as this may be forgiven in the last paragraph of a book of three hundred pages, nearly all argument, including diagrams, and, though non-technical, highly abstract. This volume, it may be noted, won the prize of $2,500 in a contest sponsored by its publishers for members of college and university staffs. One of the judges, Carl Van Doren, calls the book "as searching and rousing a book as any in our age." It is certainly an attempt, moderately successful, to search out first principles. But "rousing" is a piece of fanfare. Though written in the decent English of an urbane Englishman, it is extremely dialectical and rather pedestrian, even to the listing in classroom fashion of Points One, Two, and Three, and sections of summaries and commentaries. One waits for the bell to ring.

Mr. Stace's argument is not unfamiliar, even in his insistence that democratic morals are grounded in the eternal order of reason; eighteenth-century democrats like Jefferson would have recognized that, too. Democracy, Mr. Stace points out, holds that impulse intelligently governed in each individual generates happiness. All systems, political, legal, social, are to be measured by the extent to which they promote that harmony of variety which is rational and self-justifying in a life satisfactory to the individual. Individuals are all in the same boat, and not only share the same fate but find their happiness in no small part in sharing the same experience. The harmonizing of impulses is the work of Reason, the Greek contribution to democracy; the sharing of life, the sense of brotherhood, and a mutual sense of the infinite value of each individual is the Christian heritage of Sympathy. The totalitarian state, in contrast, exalts will and power over reasonable control. It exalts the abstract Leviathan of the organic state and ignores or contemns the individual life.

Mr. Stace's argument for democracy lies largely in his attempt at a demonstration that what we call democracy, in aspiration if not in fact, expresses the eternally human character of human life. Democratic morality consists in an emphasis on "the infinite value of the individual"; it has exhibited the various facets of this idea—liberty, equality, and fraternity. Mr. Stace holds, then, that democracy, which he equates with "civilization," is an attempt to express and organize a life on the principles of "reason and sympathy." Totalitarianism seeks "to found instead a new civilization based on the primacy of will." It is, Mr. Stace thinks, founded on Schopenhauer rather than Plato, on Nietzsche rather than Christ.

It hardly needs to be said at this late date that Mr. Stace is speaking almost the banal truth when he reminds us that democracy in its essential symptoms goes a long way back, and far deeper than the merely recent and political forms we associate with the word. It goes back to Plato, though the aspects of Plato Mr. Stace is discussing are perhaps much more present in Aristotle. Plato was at best a very reluctant democrat, and combined an emphasis on reason with as organic a notion of the state as any German or Japanese could mumble. When Mr. Stace asks us to accept Schopenhauer as the "basis" of the totalitarian "order," he is asking us to swallow a good deal in the way of simplification. The cult of irrationality had many sources other than Schopenhauer or Nietzsche, and Schopenhauer liked to talk about sympathy almost more than any democratic thinker Mr. Stace could dig up.

Mr. Stace's essential point is a simple enough one. A society that measures its values in the terms of harmonious and satisfactory individual lives is a permanent and recurrent human ideal. In that sense democracy may be eternal and it may be true. But it seems a singular enterprise to try to defend the morality of a free and flexible society by dignifying it with the same kind of absoluteness that tyrannies cherish. Mr. Stace makes a quite good case, though an unnecessarily complicated one, for showing that a democratic society is more generous, reasonable, and happy than a totalitarian one. He is one of a long line of philosophers who apparently cannot rest until they prove that the relatively better is the eternally true. That way dogmatism lies. The relativism against which Mr. Stace inveighs so often in his book is the very essence of the democratic faith, the experimental adventure of free men in an open universe.

"The Destiny of Western Man" is a catch-penny title, obviously not the author's. The book is about the natural basis of democracy and its human fruits. Mr. Stace is much more modest than his title suggests and does not pretend to be a Spengler in reverse. He is simply a lover of democracy who wants logic as well as tanks to be all on our side.

IRWIN EDMAN

Old J. P.

JOSEPH PULITZER AND HIS WORLD. By James Wyman Barrett. The Vanguard Press. $3.50.

MR. BARRETT has, I suppose, done everything possible to make his big book on old J. P. and the World interesting. He offers fast, clever impressions of very important people—a bushel of them. He writes up ancient situations as though they were spot news. He totally forgets that at

EMIL LUDWIG'S
greatest biography since NAPOLEON

"That searching appraiser of the lives of Napoleon, Bismarck and Lincoln . . . succeeds in presenting this moving historical character from perhaps the only angle that had been heretofore allowed to remain in the dark." —N. Y. TIMES

". . . a vast storehouse of entertainment and instruction." —SATURDAY REVIEW OF LITERATURE

"Few books are better suited than this one to help Americans to understand Latin Americans."—TIME

AS TIMELY AS PAN-AMERICAN UNITY

BOLIVAR

[illegible] • Published by ALLIANCE BOOK CORP. • NEW YORK

Allan Nevins says:
"A book no student of our history can neglect"

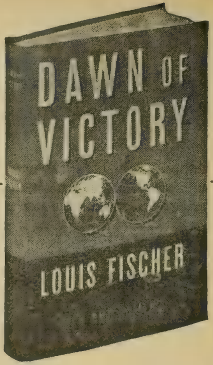
AMERICAN TAXATION
Its History as a Social Force In Democracy
by Sidney Ratner

The war has brought home to every American the importance of taxes as a means of financing defense. Yet few of us realize the tremendous role that taxes play in the American way of life . . . how they affect our past, present and future.

American Taxation is an entirely new treatment of the subject, the story of the American people's endeavor — from the days of Hamilton and Jefferson to those of Hoover and Roosevelt — to forge taxes which would be instruments of political justice and social welfare.

It studies in detail the pressure politics behind taxation, and pictures the distribution of wealth and income in relation to tax legislation for various periods. Every phase of our tax history is thus [illegible] as an integral part of the American epic. $4.50

W. W. Norton & Co. "BOOKS THAT LIVE" 70 Fifth Ave., N. Y.



"How Will World Unity Grow Out of the Blood and Ruin of This War?"

ASKS

LOUIS FISCHER

Author of "Men and Politics."

And in this probing new book he answers that question step by step "how."

As European correspondent for The Nation, Louis Fischer went to England last year because he believed that in the pattern of England he could find out (1) what war is doing to the anti-Axis world, and (2) what the anti-Axis world will do after the war is won. Now, in a sober and realistic book, Fischer tells what he found. There is a chapter on what has happened to Britain, and on what it will do when victory comes. There is a frank interpretation of Churchill and the British government. Then follows a fascinating analysis of Stalin, of the Russo-German war, and of Russia's probable peace role. A chapter on America's new position and another on the grand strategy of victory bring the book to its daring conclusion—a proposal for winning the peace, with definite suggestions.

The price of Louis Fischer's new book is $2.75. Through a special arrangement with the publishers we are able to offer it in combination with a year's subscription to The Nation for only $6.50,

A Saving of $1.25

If you are already a subscriber, your Nation subscription will be extended from its present expiration date.

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVE. • NEW YORK

Please send me a copy of Louis Fischer's new book, DAWN OF VICTORY, and enter my one-year subscription to The Nation. I inclose $6.50.

Name..

Address..

City..

Add $1 for Foreign and Canadian postage on Nation subscription.

3-7-42

times when momentous events were happening to J. P. they were also happening to his contemporaries. This is, in fact, a story of Pulitzer and his times rather than a biography. No one is likely to enjoy the book less for that reason—no one, at least, who has read Don C. Seitz's solemn tome on the same subject. Mr. Barrett was the last city editor of the World, and he remembers his newspaper with affection. He makes a valiant effort to recapture its spirit for a new generation, and I think he succeeds.

For the fact remains that after you have got past the yellow of the first yellow journal—and Mr. Barrett has his fun with absurd old headlines and fantastic feature articles—you have a newspaper which was in constant touch with the general public and operated consistently in its interest. How did it get that way? We may well ask. J. P. probably did not single-handed keep us out of an inexcusable war with England in 1896, during the famous Venezuelan affair—as Mr. Barrett suggests. But he did take a firm stand against such an adventure, and he did help organize public opinion against it. Aside from that, there were literally scores of first-rate campaigns, local as well as national, which a tribune of the people sincerely concerned for principle as well as circulation could and did conduct. They make absorbing reading today.

As for old J. P. himself, he merits all the affection, and a good deal more critical attention, that Mr. Barrett has given him. This immigrant was one of the foremost Americans of his time. Dana of the Sun, who had long since laid aside the old generous ideals of Brook Farm, liked to report his newspaper rival's public addresses in dialect, because Pulitzer still spoke with an accent—a shabby trick. But Pulitzer understood the American way better than Dana did. J. P. made a career of free speech and honest polemic. He surrounded himself with live, earnest journalists, many of whose names were writ large during the glamorous days of Progressivism. And it was by no means an accident that he got these men. Here, for example, are some of the questions Pulitzer asked regarding a possible editor for the World: "What has [he] read in American history—Rhodes, McMaster, Trevelyan, Parkman? What works on the Constitution and constitutional law? Has he read Buckle's 'History of Civilization'? Where did he stand during Bryan's Free Silver campaign?"

A pretty stiff course of reading for a yellow journalist. But bring it up to date, change the political issue, and you have a formidable pen man. It was this sort of approach that made the World one of the outstanding papers of its time; and very much worth reading about today. Mr. Barrett carries the story past Pulitzer's death in 1911 on to the end of the World in 1931. Here, of course, he writes from personal knowledge. The World remained a good paper to the last, but after Pulitzer it was never again great.

LOUIS FILLER

In Early Issues of The Nation

"Athene Palace" by Countess Waldeck
Reviewed by Rustem Vambery

"Admiral of the Ocean Sea" by S. E. Morison
Reviewed by William McFee

Marianne Lorraine

A WHITE, triangular face suspended in darkness, a tortured mouth, red hair curling and flaming, this was Marianne Lorraine on the stage of the Town Hall last Saturday evening. Her gestures, few but expressive, had breadth and power—arms that swung in wide circles from the shoulder, hands that lifted and exalted the phrase. Miss Lorraine's performance is unique. The word diseuse best describes her particular combination of recitation and song, a style nourished in the café concert and boite-de-nuit of a vanished but not forgotten Paris; to it she has given an individual slant by her interest in modern poetry and her preoccupation with the unusual in subject matter.

The Town Hall recital launched Marianne Lorraine on a new career. As Marianne Oswald she was before the war the favorite of a band of avant-garde poets, writers, musicians, artists. For her they wrote poems and songs. Her strange, raucous voice, her burning, tortured violence, her look of having been "loosed out of hell To speak of horrors," fitted the Continental mood of pre-war or inter-war disillusionment and disintegration. She gave voice and being to a very special, a very French mood, alternating her typically grivois pieces with laments for the under-dog, songs that pictured the misery of the poor—the anguish of the stoker at his task, the nightmares of the French taxi driver.

Her first appearances in this country were in night clubs, where she still, necessarily, sang in French. Now, with a new name derived from her birthplace, she is launching forth on a new English-speaking career. It is evident that she has worked hard and under wise guidance on the heart-breaking job of learning a new language. Her English, though of course still heavily charged with un-English accent and emphasis, is agreeable and, what is more important, understandable—especially as the evening wears on and the listener's ears become attuned to its rhythms.

Her program, in which she was accompanied on the piano by Lou Cooper, who composed several of the musical backgrounds for her pieces, and by John Serry, accordionist, consisted of poems, songs, and recitation in English and French, the English poems being by Archibald MacLeish, Carl Sandburg, Gerald Marks, García Lorca (translated by Stephen Spender), and others. Jacques Prévert and Georges Henri Clouzat were among the French poets represented; the musical credits were almost as distinguished and as far flung. For those who are afflicted with nostalgia for the Paris that is no more, Miss Lorraine's harsh, haunting voice and blue-lit mask as she sang "Les Bons Menages," "Les Soutiers," the "Song of the Hussars," and the inimitable "Quand je danse avec lui," caused the arid platform of the Town Hall to disappear and a dead scene and epoch to live again.

No one today can do a certain type of acrid, smoke-laden, sordid ditty better than Marianne Lorraine. Her songs need a smoldering earthy violence which she can express superbly. Her puckish humor as illustrated in the recital of the New Yorker saga of the little boy who wouldn't do anything was also diverting. In the more serious episodes making up the larger part of the program Miss Lorraine encountered the difficulty that besets all poetry readers. The grand word, the noble phrase tend to become grandiose, bombastic, and often not a little absurd when intoned from a stage. Poets have acclaimed Miss Lorraine's interpretation of their words; MacLeish, Cocteau, Rostand, Saroyan, and particularly Sandburg have sung her praises. Many have written for her; Mr. Sandburg supplied one of the less happy moments of the evening, a piece entitled "Mr. Lincoln and His Gloves." But the average listener, drilled in the school of understatement and unused to the process of poetry, recoils from the flaunted phrase.

The reading of poetry is perhaps the most difficult of "concert" arts, a lost art in this country and in this day and generation. The chief difficulty that Miss Lorraine faces in restoring the art of the diseuse to a serious level, somewhere in that exalted region where the memory of Yvette Guilbert trails its iridescent robes, lies in her lack of tonal and temperamental variety and in the narrowness of her appeal. She cannot express the broad humanity, the sunny laughter, the childlike gaiety and faith that Yvette could convey quite as readily as she could the wisdom, the sorrows, and the sins of a world she knew and loved. Miss Lorraine is serious to the point of harshness, sometimes to the point of humor, for she treads dangerously near and sometimes oversteps the delicate line that separates the sublime from the ridiculous. For this reason she is at her best in her less pretentious numbers.

ROSAMOND GILDER

Art Notes

ANDRE MASSON. Oils, gouaches, drawings. Buchholz and Willard Galleries. Until March 14.

Masson's failure is in the contemporary grand manner. There is little of the dull or second-rate about his work, and to fail as he does is more worthy than to succeed as any dozen safe and minor artists can. Masson is a surrealist, but he has absorbed enough cubism, in spite of himself, never to lose sight of the direction in which the pictorial art of our times must go in order to be great. His endeavor to expand painting concentrates on the means, not on the subject; color and line are to be detached and disassociated from their old habits of meaning, and made to express or suggest what is inconceivable to anything but the eye's imagination. One can glimpse through the badness of his painting how greatly Masson conceives; and so it is only by some physiological, tactile deficiency in himself that I can explain the collapse of his actual work: the raging sickness of color, the obtuseness with which he rattles together pigment, design, space—the art nouveau, the hard, machined insensitivity of line in his drawings, and their maladroit literary flourishes. A débâcle, in which there are at the most three acceptable pictures; but as I have said, little that is second-rate, nothing that is stereotype. Masson could cover up his faults rather plausibly and without too obvious dishonesty, and I praise him for his unwillingness to be anything but himself.

Speak . . . read
JAPANESE
CHINESE, SPANISH, RUSSIAN
Quickly, Easily, Correctly
The Linguaphone Method enables you to speak any of 29 languages—by LISTENING to voices of native teachers in your own home. Amazingly simple, thorough, sound; no smattering. SEND FOR FREE BOOK.
LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
3 R.C.A. Building, N. Y. C. • Circle 7-0830

VILLAGE
VANGUARD
★Burl IVES ★Belle ROSSETTE
Glamorous Calypso Girl
★ANNA (RIFF) ROBINSON
★EDDIE HEYWOOD & Band
7th AVE.
Nr. 11 St.
CH 2-9355

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING APPEARS IN THIS ISSUE
ON THE INSIDE FRONT COVER

WALTER QUIRT. Oils, drawings. The Pinacotheca Until March 14.

Surrealism again, in which representational forms fracture off under spatial analysis into abstract design. The world on the point of dissolution. Quirt has ambition, energy, and much surface facility, but like most surrealists he takes his surface and his medium too much for granted. His work lacks painted quality; its color, keyed within a narrow range, is sapless, schematized, and impotent to affirm the space it covers and the forms it fills. In the given picture the vertical rhythms, articulated in great detail, repeat themselves too helplessly and too protractedly from one corner of the canvas to the other. Quirt's intentions, like Masson's, are in the grand style, but his failure is not.

C. G.

MUSIC

AMONG the things attractive enough to get me to stand the annoyances of the concert hall was the Dessoff Choirs' Lassus program. I could hear only the first half; and some of the music—the motet "Timor et tremor," and two of the "Lamentations of Jeremiah"—turned out to be magnificent in sound and powerful in effect; but some of it—the three motets for two voices—struck me as pretty dull. Mr. Boepple would probably contend that if I knew the two-part motets as well as he I would find them as interesting as he does; but I think the value he finds in them is the excessive value that people who saturate themselves in a composer sometimes find in even the least consequential of his products—the dullest two-part invention of a Bach, or two-part motet of a Lassus.

Irresistibly attractive also were the final two concerts of the New Friends of Music chamber music series, with Mozart's String Quartets K. 499 and 465 in the marvelous forms in living sound which they were given by the Budapest Quartet. And also the concert of the New York City Symphony with Haydn's Symphony No. 99 and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" conducted by Beecham, but with both works, as it turned out, the less effective for the orchestra's lack of precision, which dulled the sharp contours of Berlioz's musical thought, and did comparable damage to Haydn's.

The performance of "Carmen" that Beecham conducted at the Metropolitan I heard over the air; and so all my attention was given to what interested me most—the music. For a time the experience of hearing the shabby and battered phrases given sharpness and brightness and liveness was exciting; but after an hour of the unrelenting fast pace I began—as did the music, the singers—to beg for relief, for a chance to relax, to breathe.

On this occasion I got an earful of what is broadcast from the Metropolitan during intermissions. The broadcasts I heard in Salzburg in 1937 seemed to be based on the belief that there were people outside the Festspielhaus who were as interested in the music as the people inside, that they were listening to the broadcasts for that reason, and that they wanted and should be given over the air the information about the performance that the Festspielhaus audience got from the printed program—namely the cast of performers, which was all that was broadcast. The British Broadcasting Corporation used to provide additional information about opera broadcasts in its publications; and I believe it also published cheap librettos that made it possible for the radio audience to follow every word and action. When you have given the cast and the libretto you have given everything an interested listener needs to understand and enjoy the performance; and if you believe he is interested, that is all you will give him. But that is something which the people who run American broadcasting do not believe: music doesn't genuinely interest most of them, and so they can't believe it interests anyone else. What impresses them, what they think will impress the public, and what therefore they broadcast is not music but the prestige-value of the word "music," the name "Toscanini," "New York Philharmonic-Symphony," "Metropolitan Opera." And so at least one plan for publishing and distributing librettos that I heard about (consider how easy it would be to distribute them through Texaco's outlets all over the country) was turned down; and aside from the few minutes in which the story of the next act is told by the adenoidally unctuous Milton Cross, the intermissions are filled with all the rubbish that is considered necessary to hold the radio listener's interest. The day I listened this included Mr. Cross's minute-by-minute description of the awesome scene in the Metropolitan, someone else's lengthy salute to Seattle as a music-center, Lucrezia Bori interviewing Rosa Ponselle, and a quiz, in the course of which Mr. Richard Simon of Simon and Schuster, answering the question what opera one should hear at one's first visit to the Metropolitan, thought it should be an opera that had schmaltz (which Mr. Robert Lawrence later changed to "melody" under cover of a "seriously"), and specifically suggested "Pagliacci."

At Toscanini's broadcasts with the N. B. C. Symphony for the Treasury Department's defense bond campaign Deems Taylor, of all people, has been the commentator, and as such has made highly complimentary references to Toscanini. I say "of all people" because a few years ago, when Columbia Broadcasting System was trying as hard as the New York Philharmonic to make Barbirolli look big, Mr. Taylor, who had once built up Damrosch by crediting him with scorn for Muck's over-subtlety, contributed another black-is-white-white-is-black build-up of Barbirolli that knifed Toscanini: "The extraordinary thing about Mr. Barbirolli's tenure of office so far is that people have begun to realize that the Philharmonic is a great orchestra. They don't talk so much about the conductor; and I think that's the greatest tribute you can pay the conductor of any orchestra. . . . They don't talk about him getting down on his knees and begging the orchestra to sing. You know he's just a conductor. He has a group of musicians that in their line are as great musicians as Kreisler is in his line, and he asks of them to make music—and, by God, they make it!" Saying this one year, saying complimentary things about Toscanini another year—it's all in the day's work for Mr. Taylor. But I would expect some other people to recognize that one man who should not be the commentator for Toscanini's broadcasts is Deems Taylor. (N. B. C., incidentally, still doesn't seem to be able to keep those Toscanini performances from getting mixed up with a jazz band on an adjacent wavelength.)

Victor's February records have been delayed; but there is a last January release to comment on: the set (854, $3.50) of three pieces from Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy. The writing is unusually expansive for Hindemith, with a stunning climax in the second piece; but the essential Hindemith feeling remains to make this work as unattractive to me as the others. Performance and recording are excellent, with a noisily defective surface on the third side of my copy.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Hitler's Volunteers: Few from Scandinavia

Dear Sirs: Hans Christian Andersen's story of the pinfeather moulted by a hen which barnyard gossip turned into five hens self-slain for love is well matched by Joachim Joesten's story of Hitler's Volunteers in your issue of February 14.

The Nazi "agreement" with the Danish government that a Danish Free Corps could be formed took most of the -government by surprise. It was made by Mr. Scavenius, who specializes in such arrangements. The number of volunteers was not published, the Danish Nazi paper declaring that this was against "military secrecy." Meanwhile the Danes openly said the volunteers were so few that the local members of the Danish Nazi Party had to join them so as to make their ranks visible when they were departing—the said members getting quietly off the train a few stations farther on. Finally, as Mr. Joesten says, the Danish Nazi paper claimed that 3,000 had volunteered.

An American lady who returned from Denmark not so long ago tells that while she was in a Copenhagen trolley car she herself heard a well-known Dane questioned as to how many volunteers he thought the Free Corps Denmark would obtain. "I don't know," he said loudly and clearly, "but I hope it will be about 3,000; then we'd get rid of our whole Nazi Party at one swoop."

It is certain that no such luck attended the appeal to enlist, or we should have seen pictures of the result. The majority of the 3,000 or so Danish Nazis belong to the German minority in Schleswig, but even so they much prefer what is left of Danish butter to Russian guns.

One wonders what possesses Mr. Joesten to bother quoting the Nazi paper's figures, as if he believed them. Can it be that he is again emulating Andersen, who wrote a long fairy tale called "Soup on a Sausage-Skewer" just to prove that he needed a minimum of material?

The Scandinavian countries have about as much Nazi meat on them as there's sausage adhering to a skewer; Mr. Joesten should really stop trying to brew any sensational soup out of that.

SIGNE TOKSVIG

Newtown, Conn., February 23

Dear Sirs: Joachim Joesten's article on Hitler's Shanghaied Volunteers was regrettably inaccurate both in detail and in perspective as far as my country, Norway, is concerned. Indeed, it is a travesty of the facts to talk about "Norway's tragic cleavage . . . reflected in the formation of the Nordland Regiment," in connection with the outbreak of the Nazi-Soviet war. I lived through that period in Norwegian history on the spot, before I was ordered abroad to take up the position assigned to me by the Norwegian authorities.

On the day of the German attack on the Soviet Union, June 22, 1941, I was present at a press conference in Oslo convened by the Reichskommissariat and addressed by Hauptmann Ehmer, who demanded 100 per cent active cooperation and complete solidarity from the Norwegian press in the German-ordained "crusade against bolshevism." The newspapers had to print the call for recruits to the so-called Norwegian Legion. Thousands of applications poured in. But the same names appeared again and again, and we ascertained that they were the names of well-known Nazis all over the country, sent in by patriotic Norwegians. Mass-meetings were called by the Nazis, but I saw myself how the one they arranged for July 4 in the University Square of Oslo was deserted, whereas a competing meeting convened by means of a whispering campaign among the loyal Norwegians and held around the Abraham Lincoln statue in an Oslo public park was successful.

The figure of 350 given by Mr. Joesten is in itself evidence of the lack of success in recruiting the Norwegian Legion. The officers who were ordered to join refused. Those whose names he gives either do not exist or are anything but "outstanding." The general to whom he refers was made "general" of the Labor Service of Norway by the Nazis. He had no such army title in Norway. Some of the officers on the list established by the Nazis only learned of their enrolment when the list was published.

. Yet Mr. Joesten says that a "by no means negligible fraction has accepted service with the enemy." Not even the Nazis have dared assert any such thing. Quite to the contrary, the situation has again clearly shown that the Norwegian people remain united in a desperate struggle against overwhelming odds.

HANS KRISTIAN SKOU

New York, February 24

Dear Sirs: His article on "Hitler's Shanghaied Volunteers" is another episode in the systematic campaign Mr. Joesten is conducting to devaluate democracy in Europe and particularly to paint the Scandinavian peoples with a thick Nazi brown. Having returned from Sweden only a few months ago, I can testify that if any correction is needed of American public opinion it is rather in the opposite direction. The important general fact is that the Nazis have scored very little success in the Scandinavian democracies. Specifically, the report by Mr. Joesten on Swedish participation in Germany's war is contrary to facts: there never was any "Swedish section of . . . a German military unit," much less any "Swedish regiment."

The story of Swedish volunteers in the war against Russia may rather be told as a proof of the defeat of Nazi propaganda. Whereas in the short Russo-Finnish War of 1939 about 8,200 Swedish volunteers were serving in the Finnish army when peace was signed, not more than 1,000 have gone to Finland in the present war, when Finland has Germany as an ally. Of these only 275 remain. Whereas the volunteers in the previous war were equipped at Swedish expense, those serving in the present war went individually and were equipped in Finland, contrary to Mr. Joesten's assertion.

There was also an attempt to enrol Swedish volunteers in the German army, but it failed completely. It did become a "public scandal," but not for the Swedes. The very evening it was exposed to the public I had dinner with the journalist who made the scoop, and not even he could say that a single man had left the country to join the Germans. As to the government's policy, it was made clear that no applications had been or would be granted to Swedish men of military age to serve in a foreign army other than the Finnish.

The popular reaction to the German appeal is also unambiguous: the applications filed totaled twenty-three. Mr.

Joesten, however, moves among big figures and high ranks. He makes the captain helping in the attempted recruiting "a high-ranking officer of the Swedish General Staff." He does not and never did belong there. He is a landowner with a reserve commission.

The sequence of the story should not go untold. Some of the Swedish volunteers in the Finnish army, after reaching Finland, were offered higher pay as an inducement to shift to the German army. However, as the Stockholm correspondent of the New York Times cabled on August 31, only ten men decided to make the change. Of these, two quickly returned home when told that they would be sent to fight in the Ukraine instead of in Finland. What became of the other eight is not clear. But to talk of a "Swedish section of the famous 'Viking Division,'" fighting in the Ukraine is evidently off the mark.

Mr. Joesten has probably not realized it, but sowing mistrust between conquered and unconquered, belligerent and non-belligerent democracies is right now one of the major objectives of Axis propaganda. One democracy has a perfect right to criticize another in a factual way. But exaggerated, misleading, or incorrect statements can serve no good purpose. We are in need of more unity—not less. ALVA MYRDAL

Princeton, February 25

Mr. Joesten Suspects

Dear Sirs: Whenever I write an article even vaguely referring to some Scandinavian country, letters like those above invariably descend on the unhappy editor. I am beginning to suspect an organizing and directing hand behind the scenes. The Scandinavians seem to hold the view that nobody but they themselves or writers specifically approved by them should write about their countries and politics.

I cannot make head or tail of Miss Toksvig's elaborate fairy-tale letter. Whether there are 3,000 or 300 or only 30 Danish volunteers in the field is quite irrelevant. I cited the one available figure, gave the source, and duly characterized it. The important point is that there is a Danish Free Corps, that it has been officially approved by the Copenhagen government, and that it is commanded by ranking officers of the Danish army, whom I have named.

Mr. Skou's letter is a typical product of the over-sensitiveness which many Norwegians have developed as a result of the world-wide publicity given to the fifth-column work in Norway. I should call it the Quisling complex. Because a few writers did overemphasize the number of the Norwegian traitors and the role they played on April 9, 1940, these people would have us believe that Quisling is a solitary phenomenon, quite by himself. Let Mr. Skou look up the (loyal Norwegian) Nordisk Tidende of July 24 and August 7, 1941, and he will find the names and ranks of all the "non-existent" Quisling officers whom I mentioned in my article.

What Mrs. Myrdal has to say about the amount of Swedish aid to Finland is exactly what the Stockholm government and its propaganda agencies in this country care to acknowledge for the time being. I claim the right of any independent journalist to question official facts and figures given out for political reasons. As regards Captain Schmiterlöw, Mrs. Myrdal might learn from the government organ Socialdemokraten of September 18, 1941, that at that time—long after his scandalous activities as a Nazi agent had been exposed—the man was still "deputy chief of an important section of Stockholm's air defenses." Would she call that a "reserve commission"?

The way to beat Hitler is not by glossing over his successes.

JOACHIM JOESTEN

New York, February 26

Master-Blood

Dear Sirs: The Red Cross at first refused donations to the blood bank from Negroes, but after pressure from organizations and individuals representing one-tenth of our population, it consented to admit Negro donations on a strictly segregated basis. Admitting that there is no distinction in the actual composition of the serum, the Red Cross, nevertheless, panders to the popular prejudices that result from our careless use of the phrases "Negro blood" and "white blood." We gladly accept serum from the blood of horses to prevent and cure diphtheria, but are afraid we might "catch" miscegenation if a bleeding white soldier should be saved by a transfusion that contained some plasma donated by his black fellow-soldier's sister back home. And so the great American Red Cross prostitutes its character in order to appease the most ignorant and bigoted of our citizens. And we follow Hitler in his shoddy, false, and perilous pronouncements of a master-race.

What will our 450,000,000 Chinese allies think, and the Filipinos, who die on our battlefield?

RUTH ATLAS BINSTOCK

Chicago, February 23

Thank Pétain for Manila

Dear Sirs: May I congratulate you for what you have done to open the eyes of your readers to the extraordinary treatment of "Free France" by Washington?

Free Frenchmen have been on active service in many parts of the world. They have the most to lose should Hitler and his Quislings win the war. Why, then, treat the men who are upholding the honor of France like insignificant adventurers? The Vichy ambassador seems to be omnipotent at the State Department. Why? By opening Indo-China to Japan Vichy paved the way for its aggression. In the long run we have Pétain to thank for Pearl Harbor and Manila.

Why was Colonel Morand, Vichy's notorious Gestapo chief, allowed to pass through the United States on his way to Martinique to carry on a "purge" of Free Frenchmen? In Martinique and Guadeloupe, as a result of Washington's policy, the regimes are 100 per cent totalitarian, backed by the naval force of Darlan's naval thugs. Nearly half a million people are not only commercially ruined but terrorized by the Gestapo. Is that what we are fighting for? I can back these statements from personal experience, having left Guadeloupe in 1940. A. W. DOWDING

Hollywood, Cal., February 16

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS FISCHER is traveling up and down the country on a lecture tour while his latest volume, "Dawn of Victory," is being widely discussed in the press.

MILTON S. MAYER has contributed articles to Harper's, the Atlantic Monthly, and other periodicals.

ROBERT PENN WARREN will soon publish "Bearded Oaks and Other Poems on the Same Theme."

CLEMENT GREENBERG is an editor of the Partisan Review.

IRWIN EDMAN, professor of philosophy at Columbia University, has recently published in collaboration with Herbert W. Schneider an anthology of democratic literature entitled "Fountainheads of Freedom."

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 154 · NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 14, 1942 · NUMBER 11

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 297

EDITORIALS
- Haggling over India 300
- Violence and the Law 301
- The New Tax Proposals 302

ARTICLES
- Dies Helps the Axis by I. F. Stone 303
- How Strong Is the Home Front? by Donald W. Mitchell 305
- To My Accusers by Pierre Cot 306
- John L. Lewis's Commandos by Will Chasan and Victor Riesel 309
- Standing Firm for Genesis by Virginius Dabney 310
- George W. Kirchwey (1855-1942) by Rustem Vambery 312
- In the Wind 313

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
- Stefan Zweig by Margaret Marshall 314
- The Discoverer by William McFee 314
- Russia at War by Markoosha Fischer 315
- Loneliness in the Modern World by Karl Menninger 317
- The Art of Government by Reinhold Niebuhr 317
- The Italy of Tomorrow by Paolo Milano 318
- In Brief 320
- Films by P. H. Rye 320
- Art Note by C. G. 321
- Music by B. H. Haggin 322

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 323

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER · Washington Editor I. F. STONE · Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON · MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor RICHARD H. ROVERE · Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN · Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX · Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 8, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

BY SEIZING JAVA AND TWO AIR BASES ON New Guinea, the Japanese have cleared the way for an all-out attack on Australia. A few weeks ago the obstacles to a drive on Australia seemed insuperable, but not many persons would hold to that opinion today after the débâcle suffered by the United Nations at Java. The defenses of Java, particularly in the Bandoeng area, were regarded in many circles as impregnable, capable of holding up the Japanese advance for some months. Actually they collapsed in a few days, for reasons that are a little difficult to discover. Most correspondents have stressed the absence of aerial support for the defenders. But no one has explained satisfactorily why the needed fighter planes were not sent, or, indeed, what happened to the 1,500 planes which were supposed to be based in the island. It is apparent that the Japanese superiority was more qualitative than quantitative, but the record of American planes on the Burma front indicates that this need not have been true if the United States had made a determined effort to save the island. Again, it may be asked what happened to the "thousands" of American soldiers who were reported to have landed at Java a few days before the invasion. The presumption is that it was only a token force—that once more our aid was "too little and too late." Although United Nations resistance has been somewhat stronger on the Burma front, it now appears that Rangoon is definitely lost and that an invasion of India may be attempted simultaneously with that of Australia. If the results of the Hongkong, Singapore, East Indies, and Burma campaigns were the only examples we had of Japan's military effectiveness, the prospect of stopping it would seem slight indeed. But Douglas MacArthur in the Philippines and the Chinese have both shown that with determination and the strategy of total warfare the Japanese can not only be stopped but thrown back by inferior numbers.

*

THE DEMAND FOR A COUNTER-OFFENSIVE IN the Pacific has mounted to such proportions in both the United States and Great Britain that it is doubtful whether the two governments can long resist it. At the beginning the struggle in the Pacific was thought of as a "war of attrition" in which the superior resources of the United Nations would eventually win. But if Japan can consolidate its gains of the last three months, it should be able to hold out indefinitely. A complete change in strategy is therefore required. The United Nations must strike, and strike hard, before Japan has time to consolidate its position. There have been rumors that such preparations are under way. Lieutenant-Governor-General Van Mook has spoken of powerful assistance coming from some quarter, and Walter Farr, in his now celebrated dispatch to the London Daily Mail, wrote indiscreetly and perhaps inaccurately of "great convoys of ships carrying American troops, pilots, planes, tanks, and guns" to the South Pacific. It would be folly, however, to expect offensive action in this region. Because of the immense distances, any troop movements to the South Pacific must be primarily for defensive purposes. Offensive action, under present circumstances, must be aerial or naval, or be launched by our allies on the continent of Asia. And the attack must be in the north against Japanese possessions or lines of communication. We should like to think that some such move was already in preparation, but the record of failures in United Nations strategy gives no ground for confidence.

*

FOR MONTHS NOW THE R. A. F. HAS BEEN bombing ports and industrial centers in occupied France for the simple reason that French industry has been forced into the service of the German military machine. There have been protests about other raids, but Pétain's most violent denunciation has been reserved for the raids on the industrial suburbs of Paris, and they have provoked a flow of crocodile tears in Berlin—over the bombing of civilians! The reasons are obvious. Vichy, which has a stake—miserable though it would turn out to be—in German victory, wishes support from the people of France for its policy of increasing collaboration, and one way of getting it is to arouse anti-British feeling. Germany wants the same thing, and needless to say it would also like to have its war factories in France immune from R. A. F. bombs. It is not at all surprising that both Vichy and Berlin are making the most of an "attack on Paris," the city which is a symbol both to Frenchmen and to the rest of the world. We may be sure that sympathy for France and regret for the casualties of the R. A. F. raid are far greater in London than in Berlin; and there is evidence that French workers not only expect such raids, but realize that they are necessary. In a letter to the New York Times a correspondent who returned only recently from occupied France says that everyone in Paris has been expecting raids. "The French will grieve, but they will understand, as they understood all the bombings which have taken place along the French coast and in the factories of northern France. . . . The destruction of these plants that were making munitions for Germany is the beginning of the liberation of France." We find this much more convincing than the complaints of Goebbels and Pétain. But we shall not be surprised if Vichy uses the Paris raids as the excuse for complete collaboration with Hitler.

*

THE PRESIDENT HAS DONE WELL TO CARRY the battle against inflation over the heads of the Congressional farm bloc direct to the farm families of America. The radio program in which he took part on March 9, together with Vice-President Wallace and Secretary of Agriculture Wickard, was designed to remind the farmers of the benefits they have received from the New Deal farm program, inaugurated just nine years ago, and to point out that the progress which has been made might be jeopardized by an attempt to take advantage of the war situation. Mr. Wallace recalled how the ever-normal-granary program had sustained prices when surpluses threatened to flood the market. "Now," he said, "the ever-normal granary is making possible the expansion of livestock production which is so urgent." This program would be difficult to achieve, however, if legislation prevented the government from stabilizing feed prices by the gradual release of its enormous stocks of corn and wheat. It is all-important, Mr. Wallace warned his audience, that "we maintain the farm program in good repute. We must not at any time give those interests which have always been against agriculture the opportunity to say that the farmers are a selfish pressure group."

*

ALTHOUGH THE EXTENT TO WHICH THE FARM bloc really represents the working farmers of America is doubtful, it seems prepared, despite these warnings, to push its program, with perhaps some modifications. The chief lobby working for the sterilization of the government-held surpluses appears to be the Farm Bureau Federation, which is essentially an organization of big farmers. It is interesting to note that this body is also active in trying to kill the Farm Security Agency, which has done so much to rehabilitate small holders and tenant farmers. It is also interesting to note that the farm bloc, while unwilling to help the taxpayer recover part of the very large sums which have been spent in keeping surpluses off the market, is ready to cripple important activities of the Department of Agriculture. Thus in the past few days the appropriation for the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, which is carrying on extraordinarily useful research work, has been slashed. This was done with the blessing of Representative Cannon of Missouri, who two days later, in a lightning change from his role of guardian of the public purse, declared, "The farmer should cling to parity as a woman clings to her virtue."

THE ACCOUNT OF THE RUBBER SITUATION which Leon Henderson gave the Truman committee of the Senate last week was a gloomy one but not more so than the facts appear to warrant. With the fall of Java only minor sources of natural rubber are available to the United Nations, and one of these, Ceylon, may soon be in serious danger. Even with civilian consumption cut to the bone, present stockpiles will be exhausted by May next year, and the continuance of the arms-production program with its demand for huge quantities of rubber will then depend almost entirely on the progress of the synthetic-rubber industry. As to that Mr. Henderson said, "Frankly, I believe it will almost require a miracle to secure the amount of synthetic rubber, 300,000 tons in 1943 and 600,000 tons in 1944, shown in the tables [of essential military requirements]." We are not entirely without confidence that the miracle will happen, but Mr. Henderson's skepticism seems to us more realistic than the hoopla statements of some other authorities. However, we should like to recommend less talk and more action to the head of the OPA. It is doubtful wisdom to threaten private motorists with the commandeering of their tires. That discourages economy in the use of tires and stimulates the second-hand-market racket. It would be better to take quick action to ration gasoline, regulate the second-hand car and tire markets, and provide really stiff penalties for "shoeleggers."

*

LET NO NORTH AMERICAN OBSERVERS interpret the Castillo victory in the recent Congressional elections in Argentina as evidence that the pro-Axis policies of the present Acting President represent the majority opinion of the country. The vote followed by three months the dishonest elections in Buenos Aires which created a scandal throughout the country. As a result of these government-operated frauds, the Radical Party boycotted last week's election outside of the Federal District of Buenos Aires, where public opinion is strong enough to guarantee relatively honest results. In that district the Socialists and Radicals won hands down; and in the country as a whole the Conservative Party won by a margin so narrow as to give the Socialists the balance of power in the new chamber. Under normal circumstances this result would provide an effective legislative block to the "prudent-neutrality" policy of Castillo. But the extension of executive power under the state of siege robs the election of any immediate practical effect.

*

IN A WORLD GROWN CALLOUS TO CRUELTY the sinking of the 400-ton ship Struma in the Black Sea outside Istanbul has attracted little attention, though 750 Jewish refugees on board lost their lives. Responsibility for the death of these hounded and miserable folk from Rumania rests not only on the Nazis and the Rumanian Iron Guard, who drove them out, but also on the Turkish and British governments. The former refused them the right to land even temporarily; the latter would not give permission to them to enter Palestine though influential Jewish organizations interceded for them and their number could have been deducted from the rigorous annual quotas imposed on immigration there. The Colonial Office is still a stronghold of bureaucracy, and the death it decreed for the poor folk on the Struma contrasts painfully with the permission it recently gave half the exiled Mufti's followers to reenter Palestine. The Mufti, Hitler's Quisling for the Holy Land, is now in Berlin. The first British soldier to fall at Tobruk was a Czech Jewish refugee, but many Jewish refugees are still interned in Palestine, presumably as dangerous aliens, while the Mufti's followers are at large, and no effort has been made to arm the Jewish community for self-defense against the Nazi tide.

*

TOM MOONEY, WHO DIED LAST WEEK, HAD only three years of freedom after his release from prison, where he had spent twenty-two years expiating a crime he did not commit. During the fight for his vindication, which was finally won when Governor Olson set him free in January, 1939, Mooney became a world figure. As a martyr to the cause of labor he commanded the sympathy and respect of tens of thousands of people. But martyrdom is a poor substitute for freedom. Mooney emerged with his innocence established and his faith miraculously unimpaired. But his health had been broken, and no court or governor could restore to him the twenty-two years he had spent behind prison bars. The sordid story of Mooney's persecution—of his conviction on perjured testimony and the repeated refusals of the courts to grant him justice—is lightened only by the fact that he was finally released. His martyrdom was one of the fruits of the last war; and we can best serve his memory by a determined fight to prevent similar miscarriages of justice in connection with the present conflict. So far we have been spared the widespread prejudice and hysteria out of which the persecution of Mooney grew; but the Minneapolis convictions and the savage sentences in the criminal-syndicalism cases in Oklahoma are warning signs.

*

"NATIVE NAZIS: HERE'S YOUR CHANCE! IF you are genuinely sympathetic with the aims of your country's enemy, if you have actively fought the American system of government and propagandized for Hitler, Mussolini, or Franco, there is a place for you in the American war effort. Don't be chagrined at having picked the wrong horse. Let us show you how you can be for Hitler and still draw pay from Uncle Sam. Send for our fascinating free booklet that tells how George E. Deatherage, who sought advice from German consuls on how to make America Nazi, was put in charge of a $25,000,000 secret naval construction job. Read how Lawrence Dennis, author of 'The Coming American Fascism,' has qualified for a captaincy in the military police of the United States army; how Joe McWilliams's lieutenant, James Stewart, Christian Mobilizer, street-corner Jew-baiter, and ardent supporter of the Bund, is now guarding the piers of New York against Nazi saboteurs and spies. Learn how the firm of Captain Torkild Rieber, former confidant of Herman Göring and friendly business associate of Ribbentrop's commercial envoy to the United States, won $10,000,000 worth of naval contracts. Others have done it. Why not you? Send today for a copy of 'How to Take Advantage of Your War and Navy Departments.' Box 62, Berlin. Remember Pearl Harbor." Advt. (imaginary—we hope).

*

MARK SULLIVAN HAS DISCOVERED A NEW New Deal plot and is exposing it with all the fervor of the happy days before war and "unity" cramped his style. The New York Herald Tribune editorially has taken up the same line and the line is this: The New Deal is going to hold on come hell or Hitler. Just when we are all asked to sacrifice our personal and partisan interests for the common cause, the politicians of the left are using the war emergency to slip over their subversive doctrines. How are we to achieve unity in the struggle against our foreign foes while the Administration carries on political civil war? Mr. Sullivan points up the argument by citing a couple of speeches made at a recent dinner in Washington under the auspices of the New Republic. Attorney General Biddle, for example, is quoted as warning the diners that the opposition is going to fight to wipe out New Deal reforms and that their supporters had better be prepared to fight back. Treason, that. Michael Straight is supposed to have said, "The New Deal is more dynamic than fascism, and more revolutionary than communism." This, to Mr. Sullivan, clinches the argument and proves the menace. But all it really proves, if it is correctly quoted, is the exuberance of a hopeful young man. The New Deal is in fact, as Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Straight both know when they drop politics and oratory, a rather confused collection of halfway measures designed to provide moderate restraints on business, moderate protection to labor, and a moderate chance of rocking along through a bad period without revolution or fascism. And today the reforms of the New Deal offer us our one hope of the unity for which Mr. Sullivan clamors. Unity can only be got if the people believe that they are not being asked to give their lives for bread lines and the other by-products of economic breakdown. But of course this is only our heresy—not the gospel according to Mark.

Haggling over India

THEIR advance in southern Burma is rapidly bringing the Japanese within striking distance of India; their capture of Singapore and the Dutch islands leaves them in a position to dominate the Bay of Bengal, if not the whole Indian Ocean. Consequently the inadequately defended subcontinent of India is dangerously exposed to military assault from the east. Nor is that its only peril. There are signs and portents that Hitler may launch his great spring campaign not against Russia but against Turkey and the British Near Eastern armies, that he may attempt an Alexandrian drive with the twin objectives of replenishing oil supplies in Iraq and Iran and joining hands in India with his Japanese allies. It is a colossal conception, but it is not the Axis leaders in this war who have failed in strategic imagination.

The extent to which the present dangers of India are the concern of all the nations resisting Axis aggression has been underlined by Chiang Kai-shek's recent visit to Delhi and by President Roosevelt's decision to send a technical and economic mission to assist in strengthening Indian defenses. Yet it would almost seem as if these dangers were insufficiently obvious to the British government and the Indian Nationalist leaders, for both appear to be approaching the crucial problem of cooperation for India's defense in a haggling spirit.

It is agreed that if India is to be properly defended, its masses must be given a stake in victory. They must know they are being called upon to fight for their own freedom, and weapons must be put into their hands; otherwise they are likely to adopt the passive attitude of the natives of Malaya. Reports from London indicate that even Prime Minister Churchill—always a diehard on the Indian question——has realized that genuine concessions must be made. But the promised Cabinet statement has been delayed, and there are rumors that the reason for the delay is pressure from conservative elements who think that the government's proposals "go too far." It is much more likely that they do not go far enough. As the weekly Tribune, which is close to Sir Stafford Cripps, has pointed out: "No half-measures have any value now. The Indian revolution is on. . . . This is not opportunity knocking at our door—it is history battering it down." The Tribune proposes that a provisional All-Indian Legislative Assembly be convened and that Jawaharlal Nehru, leader of the All-India Congress, be asked to become Prime Minister.

This is roughly Nehru's own program, and if Congress were fully representative of the varied peoples of India it might be rapidly put into effect. Unhappily any plan to give Congress, with its Hindu majority, control of the Indian central government is challenged by the Moslem League, which claims to represent between seventy and eighty million Moslems chiefly concentrated in northwestern India. In a recent interview Nehru brushed aside the fears of this organization. "The question of minorities," he said, "does not really arise in the present crisis, and in any event all reasonable and possible protection will be given to them." "Eventually," he went on, "there will either be agreement or the matter may be referred to an international tribunal—or, ultimately, the problem will be solved by conflict. The risk has to be taken, there's no other way."

To our mind this approach seems unrealistic and dangerous. Congress supporters have often insisted that the Moslem League is representative of a landowning class rather than of the Moslem masses. Be this as it may, its head, Mr. Jinnah, has a considerable following, and given an opportunity might find it feasible to exploit the social and religious differences which divide Moslem from Hindu. Should Congress secure control at Delhi and refuse to discuss Jinnah's plan for a separate Moslem state carved out of northwestern India, the Moslems, warned that eventually the question might have to be solved by "conflict," would be tempted to look around for immediate allies. And let us remember that the Nazis have been working overtime, and not without some success, to persuade the Moslem peoples in lands bordering India that the Axis cause is the cause of Allah. The real danger to Indian independence today comes from the Axis. Indian Nationalists, if they are wise, will concentrate on that danger instead of insisting on immediate and total self-government, which might well mean the horror of civil war added to the terror of invasion. They need not fear that victory for the United Nations would make them once more subject to British rule. British imperialism died at Singapore when it failed to protect people who had accepted its rule in return for protection. The revolution is on, and it cannot be reversed by any British effort; but it can be smothered in the counter-revolution of the German and Japanese new orders.

Violence and the Law

WHEN Congress passed the so-called Copeland bill against racketeering in 1934, the vote was based in part on a memorandum from the Department of Justice which said, not without unconscious cynicism, "The provisions of the proposed statute are limited so as not to include the usual activities of capitalistic combinations, bona fide labor unions, and ordinary business practices which are not accompanied by manifestations of racketeering." The Attorney General explained that the bill had been revised to exempt labor unions and that it was aimed at "price-fixing and economic extortion directed by professional gangsters."

The Supreme Court, with only Chief Justice Stone dissenting, has obeyed the intention of Congress in deciding that the activities of Local 807 of the Teamsters did not come under the statute. It is a bona fide labor union. It can muster respectable arguments for its campaign to replace tired "over-the-road" drivers on long-haul trucks with union men inside the New York City limits. There is violence in the record of the case, but the use of violence, as the majority says through Justice Byrnes, "is plainly subject to the ordinary criminal law."

To have brought violence by labor unions under the anti-racketeering statute would have been to open the door to a new series of legal devices for circumventing Congressional intention and curbing unionism. The present court, under the lead of Justice Frankfurter, has insisted on giving full weight to the exemption granted labor unions by the Clayton Anti-Trust Act and could hardly show less regard for the similar exemption granted in the anti-racketeering statute.

This decision makes it all the harder to understand Justice Frankfurter's decision for a unanimous court in the Wisconsin Injunction case. The same court which declines to make violence the excuse for extending the anti-racketeering statute to labor unions permits violence to be used as an excuse for undermining labor's right to picket. In a Wisconsin case some years ago the late Justice Brandeis held for the majority that picketing was a form of speech and as such protected by the Constitution. Is this still the rule?

Justice Frankfurter is careful to say for the court that free speech may not be enjoined, but the injunction order upheld by his decision forbade picketing. Its terms are sweeping, and to judge from the wording they cover picketing of any kind, peaceful or otherwise. Here again, as in the Chicago milk injunction last year, Justice Frankfurter seems to think that the use of violence in a strike justifies state courts in forbidding peaceful picketing after it has occurred. As our outstanding authority on the labor injunction, he should know better than anyone else the ease with which violence can be arranged and the wrongs to which rulings of this kind have exposed labor in the past and will expose it again in the future.

The conservative press was as pleased with this decision as it was displeased with the one on the anti-racketeering statute, and one wonders to what extent the desire to play a little august judicial "politics" moved the court to hand down the two decisions on the same day.

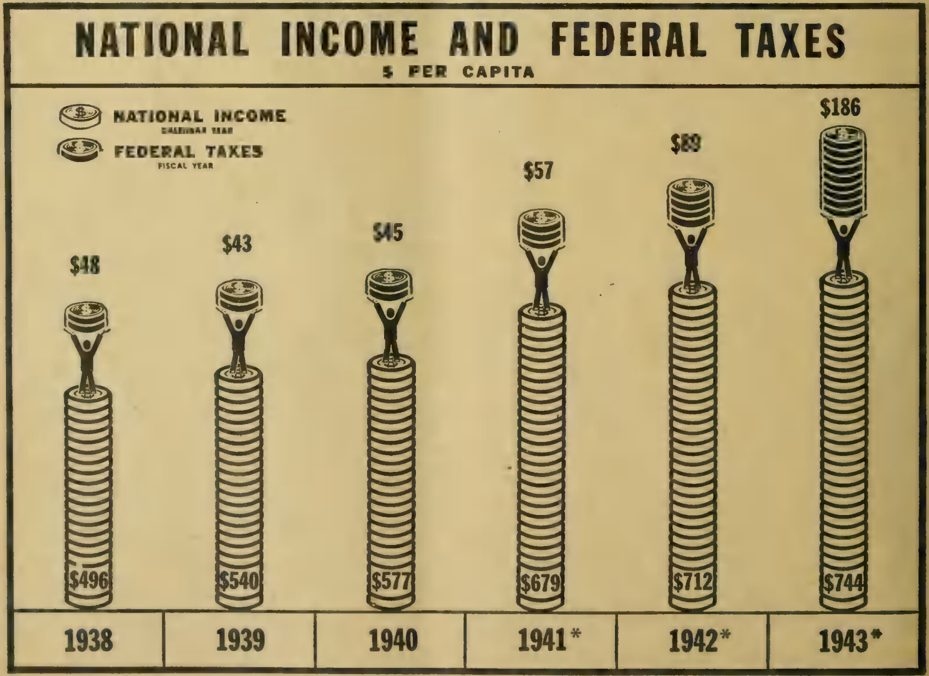
Familiar lines of cleavage were visible in a third decision by the court, this time on the power to issue subpoenas under the wage-hour law. Justices Black and Douglas, the left wing of the present court, dissented, and won Byrnes and Jackson to their side. We think the minority made the better argument and that administration of the wage-hour law will be rendered very difficult by the majority's decision that the Administrator must issue all subpoenas personally. The Chief Justice spoke for the majority.

The New Tax Proposals

ALTHOUGH it is perhaps unfortunate that the Treasury's war-tax proposals should have been announced at the moment when the average taxpayer was struggling with his 1941 returns, the new tax program is basically sound. Including a planned increase of $2,000,000,000 in social-security taxes, to be announced later, the program calls for the raising of $9,000,000,000 through increased taxation. While this leaves us far short of the original plan to raise two-thirds of the cost of the defense program through taxes, it does provide for a total tax income of $27,000,000,000, which is more than 45 per cent of the budgeted expenditures for the year. This is far closer to a pay-as-you-go policy than was achieved by any country in the last war, and compares favorably with Britain's record in the present conflict.

While the amount may not be all that is theoretically desirable, the type of increases proposed will stand up under scrutiny. Roughly one-third of the new funds are to be derived from increases in rates on individual incomes. This involves a doubling of the rates in the so-called middle-income brackets and a considerable increase in the levies on the well-to-do. At first glance the moderate-income groups may seem harshly treated, but actually these groups have been far too lightly taxed for years, and the proposed changes are in the direction of a more equitable distribution of the tax burden. Before weeping about the effect of the new taxes on the "little fellow," it may be well to remember that even under the new schedules the man with an income of $2,350 pays no tax if he has a wife and two dependents. A man with three children who owns his own house would pay virtually no income-tax on a $3,000 income. It should be axiomatic that families with incomes above this level can afford to bear the brunt of the war taxation.

Another third of the new tax funds is to be derived from taxes on corporations. No change is proposed in the normal corporation tax rate, but the surtax is to be revised and improved. It is suggested that the excess-profits tax rate be increased from the present 35 to 60 per cent to from 50 to 75 per cent. While this, together with the technical changes in the corporation surtax, should result in a more effective tapping of war profits, we shall still be a long way from eliminating all abnormal profits derived from the war effort. As the optional method of calculating excess profits was retained in the Treasury proposals, it will be possible for some firms to make huge profits and still pay little or nothing in the way of an excess-profits levy.



GRAPHIC by PICK-S '* Taxes per capita for 1941 and 1942 are estimated on the basis of the tax rates effective during those years; those for 1943 [illegible] the basis of the Treasury program presented to Congress last week.

The remainder of the new funds is to be obtained under the Treasury program from a small increase in estate and gift taxes, increased excise taxes, and the removal of the "special privileges" of certain groups. While the new excise taxes might be criticized as bearing on all groups of the population, the poor as well as the rich, they are relatively moderate—being designed to raise only $1,340,000,000. Moreover, they apply chiefly to such articles as liquors, photographic apparatus, gasoline and lubricating oil, and to transportation, and these, for the most part, are not everyday necessities. Among those receiving "special privileges" Secretary Morgenthau mentioned the owners of tax-exempt securities, married couples who file separate returns, and the life-insurance companies. He estimated that $680,000,000 could be obtained by eliminating these privileges.

Viewed as a whole, the proposals are excellent. If adopted as they stand, they should provide a reasonably effective counterweight against inflation. More important, they tend to safeguard low-income groups from sacrifices that would be injurious to the nation's health, efficiency, and morale. While they will not prevent a few individuals from becoming rich through profiteering, they take a long step in that direction. Unfortunately this does not mean that the proposals will enjoy clear sailing in Congress. On the contrary, the only ones which seem to be welcome in Congress are the suggested increases in excise taxes. It is likely that these will be adopted first, so as to permit Congress to squabble over the more controversial aspects of taxation policy.

As in previous years the Congressional advocates of a sales tax have been extraordinarily vocal, and their voices have been magnified by organized business, including a considerable portion of the press. An attempt has even been made to suggest that there is a vast popular demand for this tax, which, as Secretary Morgenthau points out, would fall on those who "have all they can do to feed and clothe themselves and their families." On previous occasions the Administration has been able to prevent Congress from adopting this cumbersome, regressive form of taxation, but the battle is likely to be a particularly fierce one this year. Business groups profess to be greatly concerned lest the increased corporation and excess-profits levies will impair the cash position of many companies and thus limit expansion for war production. They urge Congress to lighten the burden on corporations and to raise as much money as possible by either a sales tax or a withholding tax on wages. This is, of course, a purely class proposal designed to shift the burden of financing the war to the lower-income groups. But camouflaged as an aid to the war effort, it may carry more weight in Congress than it deserves. It is to be hoped that in this election year Congressmen will remember the interests of the overwhelming majority of their constituents and not yield to the business lobby.

Dies Helps the Axis

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 8

IT IS a pity that Hitler's Reich does not have a Dies. A special committee of the Reichstag to harass Nazi officials and spread suspicion of Germany's allies could be forgiven the occasional exposure of some notorious democrat. On a purely reciprocal basis the Reich might well go in for a Dies committee of its own in exchange for the growing readiness of our Congress to adopt innovations from Berlin. Saying "Ja" to Mr. Dies has become a habit with the House. Tom Eliot and Vito Marcantonio, the only two Congressmen with the courage to oppose the latest request for an extension of his committee, were cut short with a motion to adjourn. Dies was forced to make some kind of promise that he would "lay off the reds," but no one expects him to keep it. He will soon be helping us to win the war—by summoning Leon Henderson from the task of price control to say whether he was ever a technocrat.

The danger Dies represents is not unappreciated in the House, and a passage in the crafty attack he made on Eliot reflects this. It also illustrates the Texan's ability as a demagogue. He does not allow himself to be forced into a defensive position. He knows it is easier to affect people's thinking by association of ideas than by logical argument. These are among the lessons of "Mein Kampf," and Dies showed that he could apply them when Eliot demanded that he explain what he meant when he said, "A fear of displeasing foreign powers and a maudlin attitude toward fifth columnists was largely responsible for the unparalleled tragedy at Pearl Harbor."

Dies's claim to clairvoyance in the Pacific will not bear examination, and he therefore brushed past the question to take the offensive in an extraordinary reply. A stranger to the events of the past few months would conclude from it that Pearl Harbor was bombed by the Soviet Union, that Congress shared the blame by refusing to permit registration of Communists, and that the C. I. O. was somehow responsible for the inability of the Dies committee to prevent the catastrophe.

Dies began his reply by saying that he thought the answer to Eliot's question obvious. He said he was still of the same opinion about Pearl Harbor. "However," he continued, "under all the circumstances, the House of Representatives saw otherwise, and they refused to adopt my amendments." The amendments to which he referred would have required the registration of Communists, but Dies indicated that he bore no hard feelings. "I now believe," he declared graciously, "that the House and Mr. Hatton W. Sumners were wiser than I was to this extent: that I believe that while it is absolutely essential for this committee to investigate and expose communism, I agree with the great majority of this House that there is no occasion, regardless of the facts, to risk antagonizing any other foreign country that happens to be allied with us." The italics are mine. Dies went on to talk of the C. I. O.'s refusal to cooperate with his committee. Goebbels could not have done a more skilful job in poisonous association.

Much in domestic and foreign policy becomes clearer if one studies this passage closely. Dies is no freak in the political skies. He is the embodiment of the forces on which Hitler has relied from the beginning. He is spokesman for those who feel as did the Czech agrarian leader who said, "If the Germans come, they will take half my purse. If the Russians come, they will take it all." His reference to the Soviet Union as a foreign country "that happens to be allied with us" was no slip in tact. The Russians have lost several million men fighting Hitler. We are just on the verge of making the ultimate sacrifice of stopping all production of civilian radio sets next April 22. The relative sacrifices of the allies make Dies's casual reference sting, as it was intended to do. But there are too many men in the War and Navy departments who feel just that way about the Russian alliance.

As important as the foreign are the domestic overtones of the Dies statement. If, "regardless of the facts," one cannot risk antagonizing an ally by investigating communism, the corollary is clear. Not until the Soviet Union is out of the war by defeat or by a separate peace can the war on "Communists" at home be carried on with full vigor.

I have a copy of an open letter recently sent to members of Congress by Walter E. Spahr, professor of economics at New York University and secretary of the Economists' National Committee on Monetary Policy. "It may be doubted," the letter begins, "whether anyone can reliably predict how the United States will emerge from the present war." There is one school of thought, Spahr suggests coyly, "whose members expect that we will emerge as a collectivist state. They point to the large number of collectivists in our federal government and to the power these leftists wield. They believe that the regimentation of this war is being capitalized in every way possible by the revolutionists . . . as a short cut to their desired collectivism." Spahr warns that "a careful watch must be maintained not only over our revolutionists but also over those who clumsily tinker with our economic mechanism." But as long as the Russian alliance holds, the Dies statement implies, there will be difficulty enough in going after Communists, to say nothing of the subversive fellows who merely disbelieve in the gold standard.

The Dies committee survives demonstrations of its errors and of its danger to unity because a majority of the members of Congress haven't really made up their mind whether they prefer to win the war abroad or the war at home. The basic problems of our war effort revolve about the tasks of mobilizing our machines and educating the masses to the meaning and necessity of the war. The men best suited to the former task are those who have no compunctions about subordinating property rights to patriotism. The men best suited to the latter are those who sympathize with the aspirations of the underprivileged. Both are almost certain to be on the black list of Dies. That is another of the services he performs for the Axis.

Exile

BY RICHARD ARMOUR

[Hitler, at the eastern front, is reported to have taken a vow never again to set a foot on Reich German territory until the last Russian army unit has been annihilated.—NEWS ITEM.]

Never to visit Berlin any more,
Or ride in state through the Brandenburg Tor,
Never again in his life to see
The vast marble halls of the Chancellery.

Never to soar in Wagnerian moods,
Or gaze upon galleries plastered with nudes,
Never to visit old pals at the Keller
In Munich, where Adolf's a regular feller.

Never to relish first-hand the good sport
Of Himmler's bi-weekly cadaver report,
Never to frolic with maidens in Baden,
Or muse on the mountains of Berchtesgaden.

Never to go from this land of barbarians
To heavenly Germany, home of the Aryans. . . .
Although I confess I'm a doubting Thomas,
I hope that this once he will hold to his promise.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

How Strong Is Our Home Front?

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

ALTHOUGH the rapid succession of disasters in the Far East has inevitably drawn attention away from the home front, it is probably on the success with which production, organization, coordination, and planning are carried on in the United States that future victories in the field will depend.

The essentials for turning this nation into the most efficient possible base and arsenal are in broad outlines quite clear. We need first of all a well-coordinated plan of operations joined to a knowledge of the war material required for its execution. The master-plan must then be broken up into military and industrial parts to be efficiently taken care of by able men operating within the framework of an organization which will promote rather than retard their efforts. Finally, the details of the plan must receive maximum cooperation from all citizens.

Despite impressive achievements in the past two years, our reforms in planning, organization, and production and our progress toward national unity have failed to keep pace with the steady deterioration in world conditions. It is high time we checked up on the weaknesses of our home front.

We are today operating on a master-plan drawn up by the Joint Board of the Army and Navy after July, 1941. As more and more of its items have been translated into legislation, our citizens have learned of the 125,000 planes, 18,000,000 tons of shipping, and 10,000,000 men under arms projected for the end of 1943. If we reach the production planned we shall have achieved the greatest industrial miracle in our history. Yet even this accomplishment may well be insufficient, since the strategic situation on which it was based has already changed. The original plan was directed against Germany. After the U-boats had been defeated and overwhelming aerial superiority reached, the plan called for a large-scale invasion of Europe. Bombing offensives against the Japanese mainland, economic boycott, aid to China and Siberia, and defense of the Netherlands Indies and Singapore were expected to hold Japan in check. Such measures have now proved tragically inadequate. It has been made appallingly evident that waging a defensive war against Japan leads only to one defeat after another. On the other hand, the collapse of Russia by the middle of 1942, which was assumed in our calculation of the enormous forces needed to defeat Germany, does not seem likely, and the question arises to what extent the mistaken evaluation of our ally, Russia, counterbalances the gross underestimation of Japan.

Important as a good plan may be, the machinery for transforming the blueprint of victory into reality is equally essential. The Administration has been alert to the need for cooperation among the United Nations but has been unable to effect a perfect working harmony. Unified command has been adopted for several theaters of operation, and Anglo-American production is being increasingly coordinated. A weak point on the diplomatic front is the persistence of appeasers in the Department of State, whose actions fail to mesh either with British actions or with the demands of a successful war. A greater obstacle to complete coordination of effort has been the attitude of the Soviet Union, which has so far failed to impart the complete facts upon which its allies must base plans for its aid. The present economic setup under Donald Nelson fixes responsibility and is a definite improvement over the muddled, badly constructed NDAC, OPM, and SPAB which preceded it. But only the future can show how capable some of Nelson's subordinates really are. The lack of plans for the conversion of basic industries to war production is not a good sign.

In the services some progress has been made, although many incompetents are still to be eliminated. The jolt which Pearl Harbor gave to the higher-ups has probably done some good, but it could not implant initiative and originality where such qualities did not grow before. The retirement of the physically unfit among the lower officers in the army has improved the tone of the service, but the purge has not yet been sufficiently thorough or reached high enough. In the navy the fact that the two commanding officers carrying the greatest war responsibility in the Pacific area had to be immediately replaced is not too comforting. But at least demonstrated ineptitude brought quick corrective action. One first-rate military leader has been uncovered in General MacArthur. Since Japan's gains in the Indies have made his holding out in the Philippines of minor importance, the suggestion for his evacuation and promotion to army leadership has more than purely political significance.

Perhaps our greatest weakness on the home front is to be found in the attitude of the general public. The pensions for Congressmen, the newest veterans' bonus grab, the farm bloc's insistence on special treatment, the unwillingness of organized labor to abandon any of its gains at a time when German workers in some industries are putting in sixteen hours' work a day, all are indications that civilians either fail to realize the significance of the struggle or are so blindly selfish as to put personal gains above the threatened loss of all that makes democratic existence worth living.

This attitude stems in part from the publicity policy of the government. News announcements, in theory controlled by the Office of Facts and Figures, are given out by many agencies and departments, and in actual practice Mr. MacLeish has no way of preventing a false emphasis, as in Secretary Knox's speech likening the well-conducted but indecisive raid of cruisers and carriers in the Central Pacific to the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. We have probably not been getting as much manufactured news as we did on occasion in 1918, but neither have we been getting as much of the truth as military safety will allow. And many facts have been sugar-coated, by either the government or the headline writers.

This badly mistaken public-relations policy has been the government's greatest blunder since December 7. Defeatism is not likely to be a common attitude of mind in the United States, but complacency and what Homer Lea once termed "the valor of ignorance" are fairly common. Every time the war has brought a disaster the American reaction has been prompt and positive. But we have not been scared frequently enough or badly enough to keep us working at maximum tempo. Only a sustained sense of emergency, a realization that the war is steadily being lost, seems likely to give Americans the drive needed to achieve success. And only the brutal facts, without any softening, will give us this realization.

To My Accusers

BY PIERRE COT

THE American people know how to interpret the Riom trial. Americans have understood, from the time of the first hearings, that it was not to be a real trial which would enable impartial judges to apply the law but an act of political vengeance which would enable a fascist government born of defeat to blame that defeat on democracy.

In bringing the accused to trial the Vichy government had two motives. In the first place, it wished to prevent the French people from asking why the army had been so badly trained in modern methods, and so badly commanded in May and June, 1940. After the armistice the whole country, and especially the soldiers, showed intense anger at the military chiefs. Some generals were accused of incompetence, others of treason. It was necessary to direct this anger away from the government and to look for scapegoats outside the military order. In the second place, the fascist Vichy government wanted to destroy democracy. Beyond Léon Blum, Daladier, and myself, it was the Front Populaire that it wanted to reach. Pétain and Darlan are afraid of the Front Populaire, and they have reason to be. One of the best observers of French politics, Pertinax, wrote recently: "If France were free, she would vote again for the Front Populaire."

The Riom affair is going to last for several months. I shall have more than one opportunity to reply to the charges made against democracy and to show that the most elementary rules of justice have been violated by the Vichy government. I desire here merely to recall to the American public the character and the achievements of the statesmen who have been accused along with me, to pay homage to my friends Léon Blum and Edouard Daladier, and to note that the incrimination of Guy la Chambre was both maladroit and unexpected.

The difference in moral and intellectual quality between the leaders of the Front Populaire and their accusers was apparent in the very first days of the proceedings. Beside Pétain and Darlan, the defendants Blum and Daladier have the aspect of intellectual giants. Their retorts have shown on which side lie not only abstract right and reason but individual intelligence and probity. For nearly two years French democracy has been silent, and one might have thought that the genius of France had disappeared forever. But when the imprisoned democrats spoke at Riom, there vibrated once more the human note which will always be missing from the military pronouncements of Marshal Pétain. For all the treason of the fascist generals, the spirit of the French Revolution is still alive.

Léon Blum is the greatest of those accused. His first words raised the debate to a level which the representatives of the Vichy government could scarcely reach. Thanks to him, the roles have been reversed, and the accused have become the accusers. The ministers of the Front Populaire do not have to give an accounting to the military men who were in charge of national defense—such as Pétain and Darlan. But when the French people regain the power to express their will and to choose their government, they will demand an accounting of those who betrayed them. The demonstration of the illegality of the trial made by Léon Blum, his protest against Marshal Pétain's scandalous interference with the course of justice, impressed even the judges, and it was necessary to adjourn the court to give the Procureur Général the chance to frame a pitiful reply.

Only those who did not know Léon Blum were surprised. The leader of the French Social Democracy is one of the noblest spirits and one of the finest minds of his day. Unfortunately, the calumnies of the reactionary press, cleverly disseminated even in the United States, have created an abominable myth about Léon Blum which I may compare—si parva licet, etc.—with the one which this same propaganda has built up around my name. Yet the political ideas of Léon Blum have always been openly expressed; and whether one condemns or approves them, one cannot deny their nobility. In foreign politics, from 1919 to 1933, he made every effort to bring republican France and democratic Germany closer together, and from 1932 to 1940 he did everything possible to oppose the action of fascist aggressors by promoting the union of free peoples. In domestic politics he tried to substitute for the domination of man by the machine and by money the supremacy of man—that is to say, of labor—over the machine and over money—that is to say, over capital. It was the privilege of the French conservatives to prefer Hitler and Mussolini to the Republic of Weimar, fascism to democracy, and capitalism to socialism, and it was the privilege of Léon Blum to combat those preferences in the name of the workers, whose leader he was. If fascism should triumph in the world, the "crime" of Léon Blum, before history, will be that he wished to give all Frenchmen "bread, peace, and liberty," while the "glory" of Marshal Pétain will be that he profited by Hitler's victory to suppress liberty, equality, and fraternity.

Léon Blum is blamed for having carried out the policies of the Front Populaire: for having put into effect a new labor statute—providing for a forty-hour week, two weeks of vacation with pay each year for workers, and the practice of collective bargaining—and for nationalizing the war industries. But these measures were submitted to the French nation during the general elections of May, 1936. Right or wrong, this program was approved by the great majority of the French people. Léon Blum's duty was to put it into effect. Léon Blum is accused only of having carried out, by means of governmental decisions, the will of the nation.

I must emphasize, for that part of the American public which does not know it and for the French conservatives who pretend to forget it, that all the acts for which Léon Blum today is blamed were controlled and approved by the elected representatives of the French people. They were ordered by laws voted by Parliament. The law nationalizing war industries was passed by the vote of about 80 per cent of the deputies and senators. The execution of these laws was supervised not only by competent parliamentary commissions but by the entire Parliament. The application of the new labor code and of the war-industries law was the subject of public debate in the Chamber and the Senate, and the debates were concluded by votes which proved that the government acted in full accord with the majority of the senators and deputies, the sole qualified interpreters of the popular will. The two Cabinets headed by Léon Blum were, it is true, overthrown by the Senate, one in July, 1937, the other in February, 1938, but the lack of harmony between Léon Blum and the Senate had to do with the financial and monetary policy of the government and not with the measures now being criticized by the Vichy regime. What Marshal Pétain is asking for at the Riom court is the condemnation of Léon Blum for having respected the sovereign will of the French people.

Léon Blum is a man more than seventy years of age. Chief of a political party which used to have the largest number of adherents in France, accused only of having done his duty, he appeared before the tribunal by order of his foes after having spent eighteen months in prison. But his first words at Riom sufficed to show the world that the spirit of French democracy is still living—proud, vigorous, and worthy of the French genius.

Edouard Daladier, head of the Radical Socialist Party, was Minister of National Defense from June, 1936, to March, 1940. Certainly it is permissible to dislike this brusque and stubborn man, the son of a baker in Provence, who by hard work alone became a professor of history, then a minister of the republic. We may not approve of his politics. But we need only consider the facts without prejudice, as set forth in the Journal Officiel, to realize that Daladier, more than any other French statesman, consecrated himself to building up the military strength of France, and to perceive that he also worked in the open under the control of Parliament.

As a result of his origin, his development, his type of mentality, and his way of living, Daladier has been the incarnation of the qualities and the defects of the French lower bourgeoisie. I often criticized his military policy while he was at the head of the government, but I deny the right of anyone, certainly of the friends of fascism in the ranks of the French émigrés, to challenge his patriotism or the loyalty of his intentions. He had a passion for his country and for the French army, and this should suffice to silence those who now strike him down, after having received from him titles, favors, or honors; Marshal Pétain and Admiral Darlan are in that position. For it was Daladier who not only made De Gaulle a general but made Darlan head of the navy; and it was Daladier—alas!—who made Pétain the French ambassador in Spain. Daladier was thrown into prison by the very men whom he had appointed to head the French forces or maintained at their head.

If Daladier is to be tried, it is proper also to try Pétain, for Daladier's responsibility for the military organization of France is but a reflection of the responsibility of Marshal Pétain. It was not the inspiration of a good Minister of War which the French army needed; it was a military plan adapted to the conditions of modern warfare. And no other man is so responsible as Pétain for the French military plan. Pétain is the only man who, from 1919 to 1939, occupied without interruption the highest posts in the French army. He was the only man who was able to act with that continuity of control which is ordinarily associated with totalitarian regimes. If the French army was badly trained, Pétain, rather than Gamelin or Weygand, is culpable. The only fault which military historians will be able to find in Daladier will be that of having kept a marshal more than eighty years old at the summit of the hierarchy.

During the whole period that Daladier was Minister of National Defense, Pétain was vice-president of the Permanent Committee on National Defense and of the High Military Committee. Because of this double function he was the highest French military authority. From June, 1936, to January, 1938, I was present at all the meetings of the High Military Committee, and I never heard Marshal Pétain oppose a single one of the measures relating to national defense; on the contrary, he either suggested or approved all of them. If he believed that the policy of Daladier or of the Front Populaire endangered the security of France, it was his duty to resign; since he did not do so, one may well ask who was the more guilty: Daladier, who thought he was acting for the good of the country in placing confidence in Pétain, or Pétain, who associated himself with and even inspired a course the errors of which he denounces today.

American journalists attending the Riom proceedings have described the astonishment visible on the face of Guy la Chambre. La Chambre is justified in not understanding why he is included in the case against the leaders of the Front Populaire.

Guy la Chambre, as a matter of fact, was never an adherent of the Front Populaire. He is a young bourgeois liberal, the possessor of a large fortune, brought up in luxury, a man bound by friendship to Daladier, who made him Air Minister after the disruption of the Front Populaire in 1938. Previously La Chambre had opposed not only the Communists but the Socialists. As a member of the government he fought the Front Populaire; he opposed aid to the Spanish Republic, was against the Franco-Soviet military understanding, was a partisan of the foreign policy of "appeasement" which Georges Bonnet directed and which culminated in the agreement of Munich. And after leaving France in June, 1940, he made on his arrival in the United States public statements favorable to Marshal Pétain.

The real reason for the presence of Guy la Chambre at Riom is that it was necessary to inculpate him in order to strike at me. I left the Air Ministry in January, 1938, two and a half years before the defeat of France, and the average life of a military plane in time of peace is three years, in time of war a few months. It was difficult in these circumstances, even for a military dictatorship, to declare that I was solely responsible for the inadequacy of French aviation in June, 1940, since Guy la Chambre had been Minister of Air since January, 1938. Out of hatred of my politics Marshal Pétain threw into prison one of his own partisans; fascist manners are not pretty.

I forbid myself to utter a single word that might be used against the unjustly accused Guy la Chambre. I should like to be able to help him, and I hope that he will be able to unload upon me the entire responsibility of his long ministerial tenure. He may have committed errors, but he too acted in good faith, and no more than any of the other accused persons has he committed any act subject to punishment by law. He too was the victim of the incapacity of his military advisers. It was on the demand of the General Staff that parachute troops were suppressed in 1939. We had brought them into being in 1937, in imitation of the Soviet parachutists. Guy la Chambre was able to obtain, in 1938 and 1939, very large appropriations because the menace of German air power, which I had vainly reported to the Permanent Committee of National Defense from 1936 on, had finally impressed the members of the General Staff. If the growth of French air power in 1938 and 1939 was far less than the increased appropriations authorized, the cause was largely the rivalry existing between the military and the technicians of the Air Ministry.

Finally, to Guy la Chambre must be given the credit for having placed the first orders for airplane supplies in the United States. The indictment of this man by Pétain and Darlan is merely a low political maneuver. Because he was opposed to the Front Populaire, he will be given a very light sentence. It will still be unjust and unreasonable to have kept him in prison for two years.

With all his machiavellianism Hitler has not proved that the Communists burned the Reichstag. Even with false documents, the French General Staff could convince no one of the guilt of Dreyfus. Nor will the Vichy government be able to make even its partisans believe that the military defeat of France is to be explained solely by the mistakes of six statesmen.

The causes of the French defeat were many. France paid in a lump sum for the errors piled up during twenty years of bad politics. During those twenty years the Front Populaire was in power only for eighteen months. The defeat of France was due largely to the intellectual and moral decadence of the French bourgeoisie. The people of France are not responsible for this middle-class decadence. If they were able to make a free decision, they would seek the guilty ones among the generals, the industrialists, and the financiers who clamored in 1936 and 1937: "Hitler rather than Blum!"

John L. Lewis's Commandos

BY WILL CHASAN AND VICTOR RIESEL

JOHN L. LEWIS, the mine-union leader, is organizing farmers. When newspapers recently were informed that District 50 of the United Mine Workers of America had undertaken a nation-wide organization campaign among dairy farmers, they treated it as a huge joke. "John L. Lewis Organizing Cows," one newspaper headed its story. Hostile union leaders jeered and the public laughed.

But District 50 and its campaign are not a joke. Ousted from C. I. O. leadership by pro-New Deal unionists with tacit support from President Roosevelt, Lewis has begun a grim drive to regain his former eminence as the nation's leading labor spokesman and to turn labor against the White House. In this drive District 50 and its cows are intended to play a decisive part.

Some see in District 50 the beginnings of a new farmer-labor bloc which Lewis will swing to the Republican Party in the 1944 elections. Influential Republicans in the Hoover camp have expressed the conviction that the U. M. W. A. boss is the only man able to lead the labor vote, or a substantial part of it, back into the G. O. P. fold. For representatives of the party's most conservative wing to pin their hopes on the bête noire of American employers is less paradoxical than it may appear. Lewis supported Hoover in 1928, urged his nomination in 1940, and was allied with the Hoover Republicans in their fight against Roosevelt's foreign policy. Moreover, several Republican publicists felt, after Lewis's move for peace with the A. F. of L. had collapsed, that it had greatly improved his position and set the stage for the kind of venture he has now launched.

Potentially District 50 is a vast new labor empire. Established in 1936 as a U. M. W. A. subsidiary for workers in coke, chemical, and allied industries, of whom there are about 1,000,000, it now wishes to annex some 3,000,000 dairy farmers and 2,000,000 utility workers. In the hands of another union leader this extended domain would mean little or nothing, but Lewis's daring and pertinacity, fed by the U. M. W. A.'s $5,000,000 treasury and $900,000 monthly income, may swiftly transform it into the nation's mightiest labor group. "This new Lewis movement will be bigger and more important than the whole damn C. I. O.," John's brother, Denny, is said to have boasted.

It is doubtful that the miners' boss sees his new organization as a rival to the C. I. O. Despite rumors that he plans to bolt, most of which have emanated from left-wing sources, Lewis has told several persons of his intention to remain in the C. I. O. and to continue to pay his per capita taxes. His course ultimately will be determined by the degree of success attained by District 50, but at the moment it is difficult to see how any of his purposes would be furthered by the formation of a new labor federation. Moreover, a realignment of the controlling forces within the C. I. O. in the post-war period is almost inevitable, and Lewis will then have a splendid opportunity to reestablish his hegemony.

The "new Lewis movement" got started last December, when organization among dairymen began. At about the same time Kathryn Lewis, secretary-treasurer of District 50 and third member of the Lewis triumvirate, began a purge of her father's former left-wing allies. The opening stages of the campaign among the dairymen received no publicity; the days following Pearl Harbor were thought unpropitious for an announcement of Lewis's plans for empire. Only after the move for labor unity had diverted public attention from Lewis the isolationist to Lewis the peacemaker did fanfare begin. The failure of proposals calculated to give him the balance of power in a united labor movement chagrined the miners' boss, but the attempt created a fine backdrop for District 50's activities, which perhaps was one of its purposes.

It is estimated that District 50 now has 100,000 members, some 50,000 of them acquired since December, and the number is increasing rapidly. Using the C. I. O. as a model, it has established separate organizing committees in each of its industrial subdivisions and started local campaigns in at least a dozen states. A farm-association representative has described the U. M. W. A. drive among dairymen as "a deeply sinister thing," but there is apparently some truth in the assertion of a District 50 spokesman that "dairy farmers seem to like John Lewis's record of getting results and are coming in without much urging." Last month 22,000 members of the Dairy Farmers' Union—an organization of farm owners, not of farm workers, in the New York milkshed—joined in a body. An immense staff has been assembled to supply whatever urging Lewis's intended subjects require. Michael Widman, Jr., who directed the Ford drive and is now District 50's organization director, claims that 700 organizers are already in the field. The 700, if that is the number, no doubt include a liberal sprinkling of those large-muscled gentlemen without whom no Lewis retinue is complete. Except for a prediction in mid-February that 150,000 dairymen would be recruited "at no distant date," District 50 has not publicly discussed its hopes.

However, an effort obviously is being made to duplicate the early spectacular growth of the C. I. O.

R. J. Thomas, president of the C. I. O. automobile workers' union, is reported to have assured President Roosevelt that "John L. Lewis is ripe for repeal," but other C. I. O. leaders are less sanguine. Many are frankly apprehensive about the possibility of large-scale raids by "Lewis's commandos," as one New York leader has dubbed District 50. It is improbable that Lewis plans to invade jurisdictions of the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee or other large C. I. O. units, but he has already begun to attack smaller units. The establishment of a special utilities division within District 50, despite the existence of a C. I. O. utilities' organizing committee, indicates that he doesn't intend to be hampered by C. I. O. charters. Many of the smaller C. I. O. units are led by left-wingers, for whom Lewis has developed an intense hatred since their line changed last summer, and whose jurisdictions he will now systematically raid. In the words he used in his dramatic attack on the A. F. of L. Executive Council in 1935, he feels that the left-wingers have "seduced" him with "fair words" and now he is "enraged and ready to rend" his "seducers limb from limb."

The left-wingers, of course, are preparing to resist the rending operations and to do some rending in retaliation. Organizers recently dismissed from District 50's staff have been hired by the Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers' Union. Lewis, who probably anticipated such a development, tried to entice Reid Robinson, president of the Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers, into District 50, but was rebuffed. The New York City C. I. O. met the announcement that the Dairy Farmers' Union had joined the U. M. W. A. with a cold statement to the effect that it was "not interested in the type of organization" the farmers' union represented. A spokesman for the C. I. O. utilities' organizing committee told us that "Lewis was going to have a fight on his hands." Lewis himself has thus far remained in the background, partly because Mrs. Lewis, to whom he is deeply attached, has been seriously ill, but he is expected to step forward shortly to take personal charge of District 50's fortunes.

Few patriotic impulses will impede District 50's efforts to gather members. It has referred to its campaign as "part of the whole fight" against the Axis, but it is apparently untroubled by the nation's defense problems and plainly intends to exploit any unrest created by war-time pressures; in Widman's words, it intends to "organize, organize, organize!" Since most C. I. O. and A. F. of L. national officials now are completely identified with defense and mediation agencies, groups dissatisfied with decisions of these agencies will gravitate naturally toward Lewis. If the last war is any guide, there will be many such groups, especially after the tide has turned against the Axis and our production needs become less acute. Aided by this fact, Lewis undoubtedly expects to make great advances during the war period, and to emerge from it in a position to dominate labor's politics.

Meanwhile, his effort to establish himself as the leader of a powerful farmer-labor bloc ought to be watched. The combination of his autocratic impulses, tory views, and desire to acquire a middle-class following has ominous implications.

Standing Firm for Genesis

BY VIRGINIUS DABNEY

A DECADE and a half has passed since the anti-evolutionist uproar was at its height and Tennessee, Mississippi, and Arkansas passed laws officially banning the teaching of the evolutionary hypothesis in state-supported institutions of learning. These laws are largely dead letters today, and it is unthinkable that any other state would seek to buttress the historical truth of Genesis by legislative fiat. Yet many institutions in this country make a fetish of Fundamentalism by offering bowdlerized courses in biology, and still require their faculties to affirm annually an unshakable belief in the entire Bible or otherwise to provide convincing evidence that they are untainted by modern heterodoxies.

One such institution is William Jennings Bryan University, established at Dayton, Tennessee, in honor of the man who during the Scopes trial was "complete master of every situation"—or so the institutional literature says. The university leaflet goes on to declare that "it was not William Jennings Bryan who was on the stand throughout those trying days; it was the Word of God." Following the Commoner's death at Dayton a few days after the trial ended, the plan to establish a university as a memorial to him, took shape. The ambitious founders set out to raise $5,000,000 for the purpose. Since only a small fraction of this sum was obtained, the "university" opened in 1930 in an abandoned high school. After functioning there for five years, it moved into a concrete basement, the only structure which had been built with the scanty funds available. Later several rooms were added to the basement, and a dormitory was secured. Other improvements and additions were made subsequently, and the main building now has a couple of floors.

This seat of the higher learning, curiously enough, has attracted far more students from Pennsylvania than from any other state. Of the ninety matriculates enrolled for the session of 1939-40, no fewer than thirty-one came from Pennsylvania, as against thirteen from Tennessee and ten from Ohio. The use of tobacco by any student brings immediate expulsion, although the catalogue states that "the religious attitude of the university is one of Christian love and sufferance." It goes without saying that alcoholic beverages "of any strength or kind" are forbidden. Moreover, no undergraduate "who visits beer parlors, pool halls, and other such places of ill repute will be tolerated in the university." Every member of the teaching staff, which is composed of "consecrated Christian men and women," must subscribe annually to a "Statement of Belief" which commits him or her to the dictum that the Bible is "of final and supreme authority in faith and life, and, being inspired by God, is inerrant in the original writings," and to the further thesis that the "origin of man was by fiat of God in the act of creation as related in the Book of Genesis." Allegiance to these principles is solemnly renewed each year by the pedagogues at Bryan, lest heresy rear its head on the faculty.

Among the institutional needs emphasized in the university's fugitive literature is "an enlarged science department, the better to combat false teachings [masquerading] under the name of science." Those who may be desirous of contributing to this objective should consult the catalogue. It says: "The attitude of the Science Department of this university is that the theory of evolution is not supported by scientific evidence. Facts of nature which prove the theory of evolution to be without sound basis are abundant and are brought to the attention of the student. The facts of science are found to be in harmony with the Bible, our foundation and guide." A recent issue of the Newsette, published monthly by the university, listed the names of seven "recognized scientists who discredited evolution." Five of them had been dead anywhere from thirty-one to forty-two years, the sixth was an unidentifiable Englishman, and the seventh was in reality an evolutionist, although the quotation given from his writings, when hastily read, created the opposite impression. William Jennings Bryan University is under the presidential ministrations of Judson A. Rudd, M.A., University of Kansas.

Another Southern institution which rests its appeal primarily upon its belief in the "absolute authority of the Bible" and the "creation of man by the direct act of God" is Bob Jones College, established in 1927 at Cleveland, Tennessee, which boasts that it is "America's Most Unusual College." The boast seems justified, if for no other reason than the college's announcement in 1941 that "every graduate of Bob Jones College has a good position and is a leader in his profession or business"! Its founder, Dr. Bob Jones, is chairman of the Educational Committee of the World's Christian Fundamentals Association, and the acting president, Dr. Bob Jones, Jr., is an M.A. of the University of Pittsburgh and a Litt.D. of Asbury College. Former Governor Bibb Graves of Alabama is vice-president of the trustees, and other members are the Reverend Bob Shuler of Los Angeles and Mrs. Billy Sunday. As at Bryan University, every teacher at Bob Jones College signs a statement annually which expresses complete faith in every syllable in the Bible. "Whatever the Bible says is true" sums up the attitude. While the college protests that it is "not 'overly pious,' " the catalogue points out that "every class is opened with prayer, and our social gatherings blend easily and naturally into 'a little prayer before we go.' " Each student is required to take the Bible course every year. Like William Jennings Bryan University, with which it appears to compete, Bob Jones College grants the B.A. and the B.S. degree. "Training in the Department of Science strengthens a student's faith in the Word of God and its divine inspiration," says a prospectus.

Also founded in the 1920's, and emphasizing the inerrancy of the Scriptures, is Columbia Bible College, at Columbia, South Carolina. At the session of 1939-40 it had 228 matriculates from twenty-seven states and seven foreign countries. While South Carolina, with 53, furnished more than any other state, Pennsylvania—seemingly a Fundamentalist stronghold—was next with 27; North Carolina was third with 24, and New York fourth with 20. Robert C. McQuilkin, B.A., University of Pennsylvania, and D.D., Wheaton College, Illinois, is president. The institutional keynote seems to be struck in the following paragraph: "It is urged that Christian educators recognize that a course of study in which Christ is central, and in which God's revelation is the determining guide, is the only truly scientific way to educate young people. It is, at least, an ideal toward which he should work. Deuteronomy 6:4-9 is God's plan for educating our children." The college does not offer a separate course in biology, but does give one in "physiography and introduction to science," and the catalogue elucidates the course's methodology as follows: "Reference is made to important theories of modern science, and the proper attitude of Christians toward those which affect one's belief in divine revelation is explained."

A similar attitude toward the Biblical story of the creation is inculcated by Toccoa Falls Institute and Bible College, Toccoa Falls, Georgia. Dr. R. A. Forrest and his wife founded the institute in 1911, "strictly as a matter of faith in God," says a publication of the school. There are 400 students, distributed among the high school, the four-year Bible College course, the Commercial Department specializing in vocational training, and the Music Department. "Possession of firearms and playing cards, the use of profane or improper language, and the use of tobacco and alcoholic beverages in any and every form are positively forbidden." The institute is noteworthy by virtue of the fact that on its property is situated Toccoa Falls, "the highest perpendicular falls east of the Rocky Mountains," and also because Dr. Forrest, who is still president, finds "it much easier to believe the Bible story of the origin of man than to believe the evolutionary hypothesis." The institute is in full accord with the views of Bryan on evolution.

It should be emphasized that most Southerners have never even heard of this Georgia college or of the three other obscure Fundamentalist institutions described above. Their influence upon Southern thought is almost nil, and they are eclipsed in the public mind by the many progressively oriented and competently manned colleges and universities in the region.

If a handful of Southern institutions seem to stress Fundamentalist doctrine far too heavily, at the expense of scientific inquiry, various colleges in the Middle West and other parts of the country are doing the same thing. Wheaton College, at Wheaton, Illinois, has a platform which places the institution on record as believing in the Scriptures "as verbally inspired by God and inerrant in the original writing"; and it not only forbids all students to use either liquor or tobacco but also to dance, play cards, or attend any theatrical performances, including motion-picture shows, on pain of expulsion. Every applicant for admission must answer the following in writing: "Have you ever read through the Gospel of John consecutively? . . . What is your attitude toward Jesus Christ? (Think carefully before answering this question.)" Of the 1,149 students at Wheaton in 1940-41, 291 came from Illinois, 92 from Pennsylvania, 91 from New York, 63 from California, and scarcely any from the South.

Cleveland Bible College at Cleveland, Ohio, is another Fundamentalist institution. In its biology course "life and its origin will be considered in the light of divine revelation." All women matriculates are required to wear sleeves which reach at least to the elbow and skirts "well below the knees, not higher than fourteen inches from the floor." Other important Fundamentalist centers of the Middle West are the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago, founded by Dwight L. Moody, and the Northwestern Evangelical Seminary and Northwestern Bible School of Minneapolis, founded and still headed by Dr. W. B. Riley, who as executive secretary of the World's Christian Fundamentals Association, said in 1927 that every state would be "thoroughly organized" for state and federal anti-evolution laws within a year, and that ample funds were in hand. These celebrated centers of religious learning, as well as others which have not been cited here, offer not so much as a single course in natural science. Moody Institute, "the West Point of Christian Service," is entitled to high praise, however, by virtue of the fact that it has two Jewish faculty members who teach a course in Jewish Missions. One of the stated purposes of this course is to "create a feeling of sympathy between the Christians and their Jewish neighbors."

Thus, although three Southern states wear the stigmata of unrepealed anti-evolution laws, there is evidence that the evolutionary hypothesis is, on the whole, not in greater disrepute below the Potomac than in the corn, hog, and wheat belt.

George W. Kirchwey

(1855-1942)

BY RUSTEM VAMBERY

THIRTY-TWO years ago a large number of European criminologists attended, as representatives of their respective governments, the International Penitentiary Congress at Washington. Among our American colleagues in this assembly one of the best known was George Washington Kirchwey, at that time Dean of the Law School of Columbia University. His road to fame had not been paved with bulky legal textbooks and treatises, though he had started his literary career with scholarly volumes on the law of real property (1900) and the law of mortgages (1901). His real interest was in human beings rather than in legal abstractions, as was manifest in his paper on Crime and Punishment prepared for the Penitentiary Congress, in which he stressed the importance of individual treatment of the criminal.

This was the issue of the day, and it was fought all over the Western world in scientific duels between the protagonists of retribution and the advocates of prevention, between the representatives of the past and the prophets of the future of criminal law. On this issue Dean Kirchwey took a firm stand. He possessed a fortunate blend of the requisites of a criminologist—a gentle heart and a serene mind, as one of our Italian colleagues put it, qualities to which a number of masterful essays bear witness. "The Rate of Progress," "Social Work and the Law," "The Future of the Criminal Law," "The Old Justice and the New Order," the brilliant compendium of criminal law in the Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences, and many others express both his humanity and his scientific credo.

Dean Kirchwey utterly disbelieved in the theory of deterrence—not out of any sentimentality but because of his knowledge of human nature. "Unlike the poet the criminal is not born, but made"; "psychology shows that men differ not in kind, but in degree"; therefore "the individual criminal must be studied and understood." Through these affirmations he nourished in us the hope that "as the new wisdom increases . . . those hoary institutions will change from courts of criminal justice into courts of social and personal amelioration." It was not sensibility that made him a sworn enemy of capital punishment but the experience that "the millions who read of it in the press are less affected by the lesson the penalty aims to teach them than by the emotion of sympathy for the tragic victim." After reviewing an "elaborate array of motives for punishment," he concluded that "it has been a long journey from the era of hatred and contempt, but the end of the reign of terror is in sight."

These were not the dreams of an armchair liberal criminologist. Of even greater importance, perhaps, than his teachings on the theory of the indeterminate sentence, the probation system, and the organization of prison inmates or his suggestions for a State Commission on Prison Reform were his achievements in practical life. If the hardest task of the lawgiver is to apply the laws he has made, the professor who has to watch the test of his theories in practice is in an even more difficult position. It is a victory both for the theories and the man if they stand the test. Such success crowned Dean Kirchwey.

When Thomas Mott Osborne, warden of Sing Sing, chairman of the Commission on Prison Reform, and an intimate friend of Dean Kirchwey, reorganized the Golden Rule Brotherhood, an association of inmates, and stopped the graft in prison contracts, his superiors and political adversaries charged him with failure of discipline and neglect of duty. While the case was being investigated, Osborne took a leave of absence and Dean Kirchwey was appointed temporary warden of the penitentiary. According to the expert criticism of Professor Haynes, conditions in the prison improved during the more than six months of his administration, and he won the loyalty of the inmates and demonstrated that their association could succeed. He proved the truth of what a prisoner, Donald Lowrie, once wrote: "Some day people will realize that the man at the head of a state prison should be just as capable and efficient as a man at the head of a university."

Loyal to his liberal principles, George Kirchwey took an active part in work for peace as president of the American Peace Society and by promoting social peace as well. Some persons called him a radical because he was so often on the side of the under-dog, occupying himself with finding employment for World War veterans and with looking out for discharged prisoners.

We criminologists remember his own quotation of Sir Edward Coke, who early in the seventeenth century made a plea for a preventive instead of a punitive justice, and invoked the blessing of God upon him "that layeth the first stone of this building." Dean Kirchwey was one of the ablest architects of that structure.

In the Wind

IN A RECENT ADDRESS to the Georgia Farm Bureau Federation, Governor Talmadge promised farmers affected by the labor shortage that he would help them with convict labor when their need became acute. "I will say this," asserted the Governor, "and let the newspapers give me the devil for it, that if you are troubled with labor, just find yourself a convict and let me know."

GYPSY ROSE LEE, the strip-tease artist, agreed to make some extemporaneous remarks at a rally of the Victory Book Campaign on the steps of the New York Public Library. When she arrived at the meeting and saw the size of the crowd she became panicky and wanted to read from a prepared script. There was no opportunity to write anything; so she grabbed the first script she saw, which happened to be Clifton Fadiman's. "All my life," Miss Lee began, "has been spent in the world of books."

THE GERMAN SEAMEN'S MISSION of Hoboken, New Jersey, which used to be a Nazi recruiting ground, is still operating, although there have been no German ships in New York Harbor for months.

THE KU KLUX KLAN, which burned fiery crosses at the Detroit race riots last week, is reorganizing its combat units, known as the "Faithful Fifties."

EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES have reported that instability is developing in the labor market because women are quitting their jobs and seeking war work. Suspecting that women were not replacing men at anything like the rate reported in the press, the United States Employment Agency has been investigating. A preliminary survey shows that munitions plants plan to hire about three women to every twenty men during the next six months, a very slight shift from the peace-time ratio.

A BARRAGE OF PROTESTS from clergymen and reformers has forced the War Production Board to back down on its order to conserve textiles by shortening women's skirts.

JOSEPH E. DAVIES, former ambassador to the Soviet Union, whose "Mission to Moscow" has made him extremely popular in Communist circles, is due to draw the fire of the New Masses and the Daily Worker. Those publications have been carrying on a campaign against Evalyn Walsh McLean as the leader of "America's Cliveden set." When questioned about the charges at a meeting of the Chicago Press Club last week, Davies strongly defended Mrs. McLean. "It was a horrible charge," he said. "I would not put the name of my friend Mrs. McLean on that list."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

Stefan Zweig

TO THOSE who knew Stefan Zweig only as an author whose fame and success were world wide and who was therefore not subject to the more sordid vicissitudes of exile, the effect of his suicide was a sense of shock mingled with resentment. He had chosen to live in Brazil; from all accounts he was happy in his choice; and the sale of his books in the still free countries ruled out the material difficulties that haunt the lives of most refugees. To those who knew him intimately, however, his death has a different context. Berthold Viertel, the German poet, was one of his contemporaries and close friends, and what follows gives the sense and in part the text of a talk with Mr. Viertel.

Zweig, a Viennese and a Jew, was above all a European. His interest in literature, which began at a very early age, and his amazing capacity for receiving, assimilating, and translating ideas made him one of the mediators of European culture. He was the friend of every important writer; he was also the patron of the young and the unknown. At the close of the last war he was one of the first, along with Romains Rolland, to set out to repair the cultural ravages and divisions it had brought about. He was a prolific writer, and his own books—novellas, biographies, and in particular essays on literature and literary men—were translated into thirty languages. He himself made voluminous translations of the work of other writers.

To Zweig—the non-political, the humanist, the écrivain absolu—the collapse of Europe meant the end of a world he had helped to build, to preserve, to enrich, a world of which he had been, moreover, a favorite son. And though he had the right to feel at home anywhere in the free world, he could actually feel at home only in the Europe that had fallen to pieces.

In a letter to Mr. Viertel written at the end of January Zweig praised the Brazilian village where he lived and where he planned to write a book about Montaigne, who was his ideal man. But he also had this to say—in English:

> All that happens now will perhaps be helpful to the next or the overnext generation, but not more to ours; and those of us who went quietly away were perhaps the wisest; they had a round life while we will hang over like shadows of ourselves.

As Mr. Viertel points out in a note to me, Zweig had completed his autobiography—the one book necessary to round out his literary life. "I do believe that his was a kind of Roman death." "The past was stronger within him than the future." "He was a pan-European who could not survive the destruction of Europe."

We must still reserve our highest honors for those Europeans, like Berthold Viertel himself, who do not go "quietly away"; in whom the future is stronger than the past despite the bitter struggle for survival; who are, in Viertel's words, "deeply opposed to the solution of suicide." But we cannot but grant his generous contention that "the ways of human beings are manifold; and a preacher for tolerance, as Stefan Zweig was, ought to find some tolerance among us."

MARGARET MARSHALL

The Discoverer

ADMIRAL OF THE OCEAN SEA: A LIFE OF CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS. By Samuel Eliot Morison. An Atlantic Monthly Press Book. Little, Brown and Company. One Volume. $3.50. Definitive Edition, with Additional Notes and a Chapter on the Origin of Syphilis, in Two Volumes. $10.

NOT long ago that eminent humanist and scholar Governor Eugene Talmadge of Georgia made a speech defending himself from the attacks of college professors. He and Columbus, he said, were just two poor boys who happened to be right, while the professors were wrong. Columbus said the world was round, that America was over there; the professors laughed at him. The barefoot boy showed the professors up by discovering America.

This is the sort of homespun fustian which Samuel Eliot Morison in his "Admiral of the Ocean Sea" would like to destroy in our national culture. The Columbus legend has become so incrusted with fabulous irrelevances that the man himself has been obscured. He has become a figure of fun and satire. And as Professor Morison says, most biographers have been afraid to put to sea with the Discoverer. Their books might be described as the life of Columbus on shore. They tell us he was a Jew or a Spaniard or a Portuguee, or even a German or a Greek. They suggest that he was a madman and a fanatic, that he never discovered America, or if he did it was another man of the same name.

Professor Morison has superseded most books about Columbus with this new and magnificently presented biography. He disposes with skill and vigor of most of the Columbus myths. Governor Talmadge won't like it at all.

Columbus was not "just a poor boy." He was the son of a master-weaver in good circumstances resident in Genoa, one of the republics of medieval Italy. His father was a burgess in business for himself. Domenico Colombo was as well off, probably, as was Shakespeare's father in Stratford-on-Avon a century later. He married the daughter of another master-weaver. He had a coat of arms. He took his sons, Christopher and Bartolomeo, into the business. He kept his real estate in his wife's name.

Columbus was not an Italian. The word meant little at that time. He was a Genoese and spoke the Genoese dialect, which was, and is, as different from classical Tuscan as Gumbo French is from the French of Racine. He was a tall, strong, adventurous young man, uneducated in the academic sense of being a good Latin and Greek scholar but far from uneducated in other matters. He knew how to sail a boat and was fond of map-making. Genoa had a school of mapmakers and supplied the mariners of the Mediterranean with charts. All traffic, owing to the configuration of the Ligurian coast, was carried on by sea. It was as natural for Columbus to take to the sea as for a native of Plymouth, England, or Gloucester, New England. From short voyages he took to longer ones. He visited the Aegean, a good school for sailors. He joined a convoy going through the Straits of Gibraltar, and was in a sea fight in which he was wounded and his ship sunk. He got ashore, six miles away, with an oar for support, and went to sea again. That was when he was twenty-five. The next year he made a voyage to Iceland and called at an Irish port. He was a sailor. He was also a thinker. When we consider the available data at his disposal, we can only add that he was a thinker of genius.

LIBRARY
Cal.

There is no other word for it. The popular notion that between the legendary voyages of Leif Ericson and the start from Palos nobody had tried to get across the Western sea, is absurd. So is the notion that Columbus had to convince the ecclesiastical professors that the world was round. Everybody knew it was round. Professor Morison published last year an interesting little book about "The Portuguese Voyages to America in the Fifteenth Century." Portugal was the leading maritime nation. Its mariners were pushing out in all directions, inspired by their sovereigns and the hope of gold. They had settled the Azores and were familiar with the Canaries and the Cape Verde Islands. Quite possibly some of them believed Asia could be reached by going west, but doubted whether the westerly route would be any easier than that discovered by Bartolomeo Diaz in 1488, when he was blown clear to the south of the cape that was afterward called Good Hope. Sea captains were pushing out in all directions. Many were lost. Many sailed and sailed, and then turned back, or were blown back by the southwest trades, a few leagues before they might have sighted land.

Columbus had troubles enough to get his own scheme approved. He wanted to run farther south before striking across. His experience with the courts of Portugal, France, and England would have sickened anyone but a genius with a profound faith in his star. The stories told by Washington Irving, which match those told by Parson Weems, have become so firmly imbedded in the national consciousness that Professor Morison will be accused of debunking. In fact, he is the arch debunker of debunkers. He is a foe to all pretentiousness. When he does not know he says so, instead of concealing his ignorance with a hypothesis. Most marvelous of all, he has taken a leaf from the book of the historian Parkman and followed the tracks of Columbus in a ship about the same size as the Santa Maria and the Niña. This results in something new in maritime history. We see Columbus at work as a navigator and explorer. Columbus, by the way, was never very good at latitude. He was not too good at longitude, sometimes, either. At dead reckoning, on the other hand, he was astonishing. Professor Morison tells us that the famous dual reckoning Columbus kept, to fool his crew and keep them from being scared at going so far, was the correct one. His private log was much farther from the facts.

It was only to be expected that the author of "The Maritime History of Massachusetts," from which many of us have stolen shamelessly on occasion, should write his life of Columbus in a style that is a model of lucid English, full of lusty vernacular phrases, and shot with dry humor. We have become so accustomed to second-rate biography of the fictionalized kind, a kind that is neither good fiction nor accurate history, that Professor Morison's scholarly, unpedantic prose is, to use an expression dear to British seamen, a fair treat. He is so completely master of his theme and his medium that he creates the impression of an amateur yachtsman chatting with good humor of his own experiences. It looks easy. No doubt, if one has Professor Morison's scholarship and historical sense, it is easy. It is certainly pleasant to read. Pleasant also is the professor's light disregard of some of the fetishes of newspaper "good grammar." Reporters will be horrified to see that he can make the word "none" singular or plural at will, and get away with it.

The two-volume edition includes a large assortment of notes to chapters omitted from the popular issue, sailing charts, and comments upon navigation, and an exhaustive discussion of the probable origin of syphilis. This last matter is dealt with in a short note in the cheaper edition; and after a careful survey of both, this reviewer can assure readers of the one-volume treatise that they are missing nothing of importance. They are getting the meat without the gristle.

WILLIAM MC FEE

Russia at War

THE VOICE OF FIGHTING RUSSIA. Edited by Lucien Zacharoff. Preface by Hewlett Johnson, Dean of Canterbury. Alliance Book Corporation. $3.

ALL-OUT ON THE ROAD TO SMOLENSK. By Erskine Caldwell. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.

"THE VOICE OF FIGHTING RUSSIA" is an anonymous anthology. There is a list of contributors, but the reports are unsigned. I could easily sort the stories into those written by professional writers and journalists, and those written or told by Red Army men, peasants, guerrilla fighters, women and children. Among the authors of the first group are men who for years have with the same eloquence hailed abortions, modern art, smart clothes, nationalism, free school lunches, folk music, Bolshevik leaders, democracy, or family ties, or condemned them when the line demanded it. I do not doubt their sincerity at the present moment, but I feel happier to have more than their high-flown language to tell me what is going on in Russia today. The matter-of-fact heroism of soldiers, guerrillas, and civilians, the heartbreaking process of scorching the earth, the readiness of every man, woman, and child to sacrifice everything make moving reading when related in simple words by the people who do the sacrificing and the dying. Some of the stories tell how the Russians die. Only one battle cry is mentioned throughout the book: "For Fatherland and Stalin!" The Czarist soldier used to die for "Fatherland and the Czar!" The Germans die for the "Führer." But surely the Russians must be dying, willingly and heroically, for more than a leader, even though his name is Stalin. They did not fight the civil war for Lenin or Trotsky. Today they have the hard-won gains of the October Revolution and many hopes for the future to fight and die for.

The feats of the guerrilla fighters are presented very dramatically, but their importance is probably underrated. During the civil war, without leadership, weapons, or experience, the Russian guerrillas contributed greatly to the final victory over an enemy overwhelmingly superior in numbers and weapons. How much more effective they must be after years of training in this type of fighting, with government guidance, with ample supplies—and with no traitors in their midst. For there are no traitors—not because they were shot in the purge but because no Russian expects anything from fascism but barbarism and slavery.

The Germans are represented in this book as stupid and cowardly: they run as soon as they sight the enemy; their higher officers are afraid to go near the fighting line; the soldiers fight only because their officers force them to. It would have been more complimentary to the Red Army to picture the enemy as he is in reality—strong, well-equipped, and as ready to fight as the Russians are. These pages, as well as the letters of Russian parents to their sons at the front, are full of official political phraseology, reminiscent of Pravda editorials; and an appeal from the Volga Germans to Reich Germans sounds compleetly out of tune with the Soviet government's decree ordering the entire population of the Volga German republic to be removed to Siberia.

Erskine Caldwell writes superbly of what he has seen with his own eyes or of concrete happenings reported to him by others. His account of the tank battles, the bombings of Moscow, the splendid work of civilian defense, and his visit to the front and his description of the deserted battlefield are forceful and exciting. And he also conveys the most important fact about Russia today—the absolute unity of the people in fighting the war and their inflexible determination to achieve victory at whatever sacrifice. He does not, however, seem to be very well acquainted with Soviet history—he never saw Moscow before 1941—and when he interprets Russian mentality and politics he frequently errs.

Mr. Caldwell thinks that "when the government seized all individually owned radio sets . . . the people from that time forward believed everything they were told by the government." They believed it before. And the handful of Russians who listened to foreign broadcasts never had any influence over the 190,000,000 for whom there was but one radio, one press, one voice. "There is no doubt," he says further, "that a controlled press is the ideal means of rallying a country like the Soviet Union, where people have been educated . . . in the tradition of looking to the government for guidance. Without an official press, its citizens would have been at a loss to know what was expected of them." These words, as well as the following, "In any discussion of the Soviet Union all arguments in the last analysis narrow down to the question of whether a person desires socialism, security, and restricted existence or whether he desires capitalism, insecurity, and freedom of action and speech," show that Mr. Caldwell's acquaintance with Soviet ideology dates from quite a late period. He will not find, in any of the writings of Lenin or any other leader of the 1917 revolution, advocacy of a controlled press or a restricted existence. It was always socialism plus freedom of action and speech. Dictatorship was accepted only as a necessary transitional stage, never as a system of government. He underestimates the Russians. They would, like everyone else in the world, greatly enjoy freedom. I know because I saw them listening to the radio with tears of happiness in their eyes when the new constitution, with its promise of freedom, was proclaimed in 1936.

Mr. Caldwell deplores the lack of initiative among the civilian population; he says regretfully that "many do not wish to accept responsibility," that "not everyone wants to be a director of his factory, and there is no other incentive in normal times to lift a person out of his rut." He tells us what happened on one occasion when the automobile he was driving was caught between two guard gates on a railway crossing. The gates were down and a train was approaching, but nothing could induce the guard to raise the gates. He was prepared to see five people killed rather than disobey an order. Not so many years ago the Russians—overworked, underfed, poorly clothed and housed as they were—were full of initiative and a sense of responsibility. They had a very important incentive, the task of building up the Soviet Union. But after so many had to pay with their lives or with exile for their own and their subordinates' slightest shortcomings, it is not surprising that people lost initiative and avoided responsibility. I cannot help feeling, however, that the Russians are themselves again in this respect. They could hardly fight as they do today if they were not able to use their ingenuity and their wits.

Mr. Caldwell says that "before the war started, Lozovsky was not known outside the Kremlin." As head of the Profintern (Trade Union International) Lozovsky attended numerous congresses and conferences abroad and was well known to millions who were interested in Soviet politics.

Russians will appreciate the warm sympathy with which Mr. Caldwell describes their struggle, but they will hardly like these words: "Stalin's success in mapping and directing the campaign against Germany will place him on a pedestal alongside, if not above, Lenin" (italics mine). They know that Lenin mapped and directed the 1917 revolution, which is still the most important event in their history; and despite their respect for Stalin their feelings for him have never approached the supreme adoration they had and have for Lenin. Mr. Caldwell talks of Stalin as a man who "knows the secret of dictatorship and the totalitarian state from a to z," whose "knowledge of military, economic, and political conditions . . . is superior to that of anyone else in the world," as "the supreme strategist of the age," who "has made a thorough study of fascism and Nazism," but "who has a slight conception of democracy and does not understand its composition and function." But why should totalitarianism be easier for a man of his genius to understand than democracy? And if he does not understand democracy, may he not be mistaken when he calls Russia "the greatest democracy on earth"?

Both of these books show clearly that the Russians, in the first moment of war, realized that nothing else mattered but a victory over Hitler, and reveal how almost overnight they transformed their entire industry into a war industry. Their history has taught them that the only way to win a war is to fight it with all the material and human resources the country possesses.

MARKOOSHA FISCHER

Loneliness in the Modern World

ESCAPE FROM FREEDOM. By Erich Fromm. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

FOR many years to come there will exist a peculiar problem in the intellectual life of America relative to the sudden arrival in this country of thousands of intelligent German refugees, bringing with them, on the one hand, the erudition, experience, and in some degree the prestige acquired from their European life, but bringing with them also certain prejudices, methodologies, and mythologies which belong to the Old World rather than to the New. It is inevitable that American colleagues will react and overreact to the productions of specific individuals among these newcomers with resentment, contempt, enthusiasm, adulation, protectiveness, or suspicion. To pretend to be completely objective is at worst a species of hypocrisy and at best self-deception. So I can only give my impressions of this book.

Erich Fromm was in Germany a distinguished sociologist. His book is written as if he considered himself a psychoanalyst. The problem of the lay analyst exiled from Europe has been an especially painful one because in Europe the clinical practice of lay analysis was permitted; in this country it is not.

But Dr. Fromm is wholly within his rights in applying psychoanalytic theory to sociological problems, as he has done in this book. He has done us a service in calling our attention to the social and philosophical changes incident to the Reformation, and his description of the psychology of Nazism is a valuable contribution. His theory is in brief that Luther and Calvin led a movement for independence in religious matters which deprived the church of its authority over the individual and made faith and salvation a matter of subjective individual experience, but that this created a feeling of isolation and powerlessness which made the new freedom a burden and a danger. Hence many individuals took flight into such movements as Nazism, in which they lost their feeling of loneliness at the cost of surrendering their freedom. (Of course this argument is debatable; Japanese fascism, for example, certainly can't be related to European religious revolutions.)

Dr. Fromm's book develops this interpretation and brings out the psychological elements in the revolt from the Catholic church during the Renaissance in a scholarly fashion. The concept of loneliness might seem to be overstressed, but perhaps the subjective experiences of the author in leaving his native land and being forced to take a new view of the actions of his own people may have made him keenly sensitive to the importance of this feeling. The sense of personal disorientation is a dominant theme: "The loss of the self has increased the necessity to conform, for it results in a profound doubt of one's own identity. If I am nothing but what I believe I am supposed to be—who am 'I'?"

Perhaps the best paragraph in the book is the following:

> What, then, is the meaning of freedom for modern man? He has become free from the external bonds that would prevent him from doing and thinking as he sees fit. He would be free to act according to his own will if he knew what he wanted, thought, and felt. But he does not know. He conforms to anonymous authorities and adopts a self which is not his. The more he does this the more powerless he feels, the more he is forced to conform. In spite of a veneer of optimism and initiative, modern man is overcome by a profound feeling of powerlessness which makes him gaze toward approaching catastrophes as though he were paralyzed.

The isolation of the author himself is also indicated by his singular selection of authorities. Although the book purports to be psychoanalytic in character, almost no psychoanalysts are quoted or cited. The name of Freud, to be sure, is invoked a dozen times or more, but each time with some patronizing remark to the effect that while Freud had some good ideas along this or that line, his great error, which Fromm corrects, is so and so. This curious presumptuousness on the part of a relatively unknown author writing in a field with which he is not specifically identified, makes for strange overtones which blur the clarity and force of the book. No intelligent person believes that Freud said the last word, but in the field of thought which Fromm invokes for the elaboration of his theory Freud did say the first word, and any attempt to revise it should be undertaken with a full sense of the magnitude and seriousness of the task and upon empirical and experimental grounds.

It is too bad that the subjective element so thoroughly pervades this book; it is too bad that it is written in such a heavy, tedious style; it is too bad that it contains so many flatly incorrect statements, especially of Freudian theories. In spite of these faults it is a thoughtful contribution to the problem of loneliness in its modern political implications.

KARL MENNINGER

The Art of Government

CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT AND DEMOCRACY. By Carl J. Friedrich. Little, Brown and Company. $4.

NO PROBLEM of the art and artifice of government and of the relation of government to the economic, cultural, and social vitalities of life remains unillumined by this comprehensive work on constitutional theory and practice. Its careful scholarship, its wide historical perspectives, its complete sanity and balance assure it an important place in contemporary political science.

The problems of representative government, the relation of the judicial to the executive and legislative functions, the place of the military and of bureaucratic functionaries in a democracy, the relative merits of written and unwritten constitutions, the issue of federalism as against centralism, the merits of various electoral systems, the functions of political parties, the relative merits of parliamentary and executive forms of authority, the difficulties of direct popular action—these are only a few of the many issues analyzed. In every case the experiences of the various democratic nations are brought to bear upon the problem, and divergent historical backgrounds are examined to determine why this or that form worked in one case and not in the other. Professor Friedrich has given a very good example in his own work of his conception of political theory.

> The more things you have to look at [he writes] the bigger must be the focus of your conceptual lens. Since we have to work with finite minds, we cannot hope to master all the facts in equal detail. . . . Theory is the magnificent invention by which we can behold more facts through the use of general concepts, a symbolic shorthand of the mind. If concepts embody valid generalizations concerning established matters of fact, they are good.

His study is all the more valuable because every analysis of constitutional mechanics is made with a full awareness of the vast and complex social and economic vitalities of life which it is the business of government to organize, direct, and bring into harmony; constitutionalism and democracy are never allowed to become ends in themselves.

It is difficult to quarrel with any of the balanced conclusions at which the author arrives; and even if one were disposed to do so, one has the satisfaction of knowing that the alternative solutions which one might prefer to those of the author have been carefully considered. The only criticism which can be made is the minor one of style. The writing is sprightly, and one is grateful that it escapes the stodginess of textbooks, but occasionally it is colloquial to the point of slanginess.

In a final chapter, dealing not with the problems of democracy but with those of political science, the author seeks to validate the conclusions of the social sciences by maintaining that they are equal to those of the natural sciences in scientific exactness. This problem is much more profound than is admitted by those social scientists who imagine that the social sciences are less exact than the natural sciences merely because they are younger. Professor Friedrich recognizes that there is a more important difference between the two. All generalizations about historical and human affairs betray the particular social and historical locus from which the generalization is made more obviously than do conclusions which natural scientists make about the stars, flowers, or geological formations.

I think Professor Friedrich is wrong, however, in regarding this difference as one of degree only and not of kind. He writes:

> It would be most unscientific for the student of politics to deceive himself about his personal bias, as unscientific as it would be for the natural scientist to neglect the chances of error resulting from the interference of uncontrollable factors and from psychological inaccuracies of observation.

The difficulty with this statement is its failure to recognize that it is not the personal bias of the political scientist which makes his knowledge relative so much as the bias of an age, a culture, a civilization, or a nation. The natural scientist comes much nearer to engaging pure reason in his enterprise than any cultural or historical scientist. In the work of the latter the conscious and unconscious hopes, fears, and ambitions of men and of nations, of cultures and civilizations, weight conclusions and give their own peculiar bias to supposedly objective judgments.

However difficult it may be to avoid an ultimate skepticism in the social sciences, Professor Friedrich has proved in his great work that careful scholarship does yield approximately valid conclusions that are of tremendous importance in actual history.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

The Italy of Tomorrow

THE REMAKING OF ITALY. By Pentad. A Penguin Special. 25 cents.

QUADERNI ITALIANI. Boston, Mass. $1.50.

IN THE 1860's, when Italy's unification was practically assured, an honest Piedmontese statesman thought up a successful slogan: "Italy is made; now let us make the Italians." In the eighty years that have elapsed it is difficult to say to what extent the Italians have been "made"; but their country must have been thoroughly unmade if a recent Penguin Special can bear the pessimistic, or optimistic, title "The Remaking of Italy." It is the work of four Italian exiles and a British officer, all of whom prudently hide themselves under the arithmetical nom de plume "Pentad." One of the authors, if my guess is right, belongs to a very promising category—that group of Italians in their late twenties or early thirties who, after having been Fascists in their years of innocence, have been converted to democracy by simply watching Fascism in action. Their development was spontaneous and healthy. Their attachment to freedom is solidly forged—unwitting sinners make the best saints. The Italy of tomorrow will presumably be led by just such catechumens.

The book has as many parts as it has authors. It opens with a bird's-eye view of Italian history, certainly useful for the layman and perhaps of some use even to the cognoscenti. The next two chapters picture Italy's relations with Germany and with England, playing an unhappy couple against a happy one and thus trying to prove that throughout the centuries "Great Britain has always been the true friend and Germany the real enemy of Italy." This may be good propaganda, but unfortunately it is only a half, or a third, of the truth. Time and again the Italians have had to fight against the guzzling Germans (as Dante called them); this is a textbook truth. That they have seldom before fought the English may be due more to geography than to what even Mussolini used to term the traditional friendship between the two countries. And it should never be forgotten that not "Great Britain" but many English liberals helped the Italian patriots to achieve their Risorgimento. But this is almost all that can be said. As to the present, I wonder, on second thought, if it is even sound propaganda to put the whole question before the Italians as a matter of "natural" friendship with England (or America) against "servitude to the Teutons." The Italians—"put wise" by Fascism as they are—realize only too well that this war is in essence a-national. It has already brought about, to borrow Croce's expression, the reductio ad absurdum of nationalism. The world cannot be divided vertically any more, only horizontally, since everyone's allies are everywhere. General Badoglio and, heaven knows, even Mussolini might shout at a given moment, "Kick the Germans out"; but no dissident Fascist could ever stomach a truly democratic slogan like "United Peoples."

The fourth part of the book is a brief history of Fascism. Apart from a few inaccuracies and some sensationalism, it is excellent reporting. The pompously vulpine character of the regime is brought into proper focus. "Too much of our country's history," Silone said once, "is just a mixture of violence and rhetoric." The real novelty of this book, however, is the last part, on Italy after Fascism, where for the first time in book form a "detailed plan of political and social reform" for the peninsula is outlined. The author of this chapter admits his indebtedness to the program of the movement Giustizia e Libertà, whose leader, Carlo Rosselli, the Fascists could silence only by murder. It is high time that the ideas of Rosselli and his friends should be made available to the general public. The main thought underlying their program is that a democratic Italy of tomorrow could not, even if it wanted to, put the clock back to the pre-Fascist, or Giolittian, era. Fascism has been, so to say, negatively progressive, in the sense that it has utterly destroyed the possibilities of a restoration of the old economic order. In an Italy freed from its black shirt European federalism and industrial democracy would be even more a physical necessity than a political demand, the only alternative being a relapse into some new brand of Fascism. This is why this plan advocates a republican regime with an Economic Congress added to the political assembly, an agrarian reform along cooperative lines, and finally the nationalization of banking and some key industries.

Interesting as they are, the plans of these Italian exiles are not half so provocative as two or three articles in a similar vein that have been smuggled out of Italy and grouped in a magazine called Quaderni Italiani, which is destined to be smuggled back into Italy. Our Italian friends report that the main underground movement among the intellectuals and the middle class in Italy has recently set up a new illegal party the name of which may some time make history—the Liberal-Socialist Party. Internal decentralization plus world federation, economic planning plus "religion of freedom"—these are a few of its aims. This is not the place to discuss its theoretical premises or its attempt to lay a new "philosophical and religious foundation for an integral democracy." Its approaches and exigencies, however, are quite illuminating. Whether the fact is saddening or comforting I don't know, but it is certainly true that the most resolute followers of the goddess Reason and the most daring lovers of the goddess Freedom seem to be living these days behind Fascist barbed wire.

PAOLO MILANO

CONTRIBUTORS

PIERRE COT, Air Minister of France in the Blum Cabinet, is being tried at Riom in absentia.

WILL CHASAN, authority on the American labor movement, has written frequently for The Nation on trade-union developments.

VICTOR RIESEL is labor reporter on the New York Post.

VIRGINIUS DABNEY, editor of the Richmond Times-Dispatch, will soon publish "Below the Potomac: A Book of the New South."

RUSTEM VAMBERY, formerly professor of criminology at the University of Budapest, is now a lecturer at the New School.

WILLIAM McFEE is the distinguished author of "Casuals of the Sea," "The Harbormaster," and other salty volumes.

MARKOOSHA FISCHER, wife of Louis Fischer, is a native of Russia who came to live in this country in 1939.

PAOLO MILANO, an Italian writer and dramatic critic, is now teaching romance languages at Queens College and the history of the drama at the New School for Social Research.

AMUSEMENTS

"Buoyant, Giddy & Funny"
—Atkinson, Times

JUNIOR MISS

LYCEUM Theatre, [illegible] St. E. of B'way. CH 4-4256
Evenings, 8:40; Matinees, WED. and SAT., 2:40

CHERYL CRAWFORD presents
George Gershwin's
PORGY AND BESS

"Go see 'Porgy and Bess' if you go to nothing else"
—Kronenberger, PM.

●

PRICES:
Evgs. . . . $2.75 [illegible]
Mats. . . . $2.20 to 55¢

MAJESTIC THEATRE, W. 44 St. Eves. incl. Sunday. Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30

SPRING BOOK NUMBER

THE NATION will publish its regular Spring Book Number on April 11. Because the expected advertising volume for this literary issue will require an increase in the size of the magazine, we should appreciate prospective advertisers' notifying us of their plans as soon as possible, since paper of the proper size must be ordered well in advance. Final deadline for the April 11 issue is April 1. Make your space reservation NOW.

THE Nation
55 Fifth Avenue New York, N. Y.

Don't Miss An Issue!
To keep THE NATION coming regularly
just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVE. • NEW YORK

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I inclose $............................ .

☐ One Year $5
☐ Two Years $8
☐ Three Years $11

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER
to new subscribers only
☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name..
Street..
City..
State..
3-14-42
Extra postage per year: Foreign and Canadian, $1.00

IN BRIEF

HANGOVER SQUARE. By Patrick Hamilton. Random House. $2.50.

Mr. Hamilton tells the story of George Harvey Bone's double personality with none of the pretentiousness or sensationalism one usually finds in novels about abnormal characters. George is a schizophrenic, a lonely, meak, weak, bleak, sensitive sort of public-house Londoner tortured by his love for a siren by the name of Netta, whom his nether self has resolved to kill. The gradual advance of the murderous self on his gentle, conscientious nature is well done and moving. London, 1939, is the appropriate mood; the threads of the plot are gathered up on September 3, that day of dénouement. Although somewhat repetitious, the story is very good indeed. There is also a bonus in the form of quotations from Milton's "Samson Agonistes," which should lead the reader back to another schizophrenic character who was, however, less a gentleman than George.

ROGUE'S LEGACY. By Babette Deutsch. Coward-McCann. $2.75.

This is a novel about François Villon, who lived in the shadow of the gibbet and died in a ditch, bequeathing a legacy of full-blooded verses, now riotous and now tender. Small wonder that people are constantly writing biographies of him, novels and operas in which he sings and fights his swashbuckling way through an unfriendly world in which he always seems to manage to have a good time—or that Miss Deutsch, herself a poet of exquisite taste, should present him with gusto and understanding, as an eternal seeker after an ideal, a carouser and lover, dreamer and thief, a tarnished, damned soul, whose poetry alone revealed the genuine virtue of his spirit.

THE PANAMA CANAL IN WAR AND PEACE. By Norman J. Padelford. The Macmillan Company. $3.

During World War I a former American ambassador to Denmark published memoirs covering his diplomatic experiences under some such title as "Four Years Near the German Frontier." In one respect "The Panama Canal in War and Peace" is a parallel case. Notwithstanding misleading advertising by the publishers this book is almost totally without military interest. Persons who hope to learn of the strategical significance of the Canal in the present war and of its defenses or possible vulnerability to attack must search elsewhere. By no stretch of the imagination could this be called a war or military book. On the other hand, it is a volume worth adding to any large library. By diligent personal research, aided by the United States government, Professor Padelford has compiled some compact, well-arranged chapters covering the history, legal status, operation, administration, and economic and political significance of our trans-isthmian canal. The book is well written and informative; footnotes are adequate. It is likely to remain for some time the standard reference work on this subject.

JOSEPH CONRAD: POLAND'S ENGLISH GENIUS. By M. C. Bradbrook. The Macmillan Company. $1.

All widely read novelists seem to undergo an eclipse shortly after their deaths. Miss Bradbrook believes that Conrad has values which are singularly applicable now. She gives a brief sketch of the man and a survey of his work, with a little bibliography, with the object of pointing these out. Profits go to the Polish Refugee Fund.

PUBLISHED THIS WEEK

The Nazi Underground in South America. By Hugo Fernandez Artucio. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

Feeding the Lions: An Algonquin Cookbook. By Frank Case. Greystone. $3.

This Is Your War. By Marquis W. Childs. Little, Brown. $1.50.

International Labor Conventions: Their Interpretation and Revision. By Conley Hall Dillon. North Carolina. $3.

Psychological Effects of War on Citizen and Soldier. By R. D. Gillespie. Norton. $2.75.

Tornado Across Eastern Europe: The Path of Nazi Destruction from Poland to Greece. By Josef Hanc. Greystone. $3.

Self-Analysis. By Karen Horney. Norton. $3.

Deadline: The Behind-the-Scenes Story of the Last Decade in France. By Pierre Lazareff. Random House. $3.

Ill Fares the Land: Migrants and Migratory Labor in the United States. By Carey McWilliams. Little, Brown. $3.

Industrialization of the Western Pacific. By Kate L. Mitchell. Institute of Pacific Relations. $2.50.

Comics and Their Creators. By Martin Sherwood. Hale, Cushman, and Flint. $2.75.

They Called Me Cassandra. By Geneviève Tabouis. Scribner's. $3.

The Wind Is Rising. By H. M. Tomlinson. Atlantic Monthly Press Book. Little, Brown. $2.50.

Thoughts Through Space. By Sir Hubert Wilkins and Harold M. Sherman. Creative Age Press. $4.50.

FILMS

THERE is nothing now to be gained by complaining about the star system. It has been sufficiently well established that it is the stars who sell the films. But I believe that it is the star system that is mainly responsible for our getting such unconvincing films about the war. For if you have stars, you are apparently bound to make them into heroes, in the Greek sense, and to put them into romantic situations; and modern warfare, however many instances it may furnish of conspicuous personal bravery, cannot properly be described in terms of romantic individualism. The aspects of it which still seem to offer the best scope for the familiar romantic treatment are those of aerial combat and espionage: and this may account for the recent overproduction of films about airmen and spies. Two more that have recently appeared are "Captains of the Clouds" (Warner Brothers) and "Mr. V" (United Artists). "Captains of the Clouds," which was made in technicolor with the cooperation of the R. C. A. F., is an uneasy mixture of a routine Warner Brothers piece about tough, competitive bush fliers and a semi-documentary illustration of the Canadian Air Force in training. How much you enjoy it will depend upon the degree to which you are excited by pictures of airplanes. The only remarkable thing about the story is that it allows James Cagney to come to grief in the Canadian Air Force through his excessive individualism, though his character is vindicated by an act of glorious self-sacrifice at the end. "Mr. V," on the other hand, makes practically no concession to reality. It shows us a Cambridge professor of archaeology who is endowed with all Leslie Howard's considerable charm taking a party of undergraduates to Germany just before the outbreak of this war and rescuing deserving Germans from concentration camps. We are used to seeing the Gestapo outwitted on the screen, but not as a rule with quite such ridiculous ease. Still, as a piece of fantasy the film is entertaining enough.

Mr. Howard appears also in "The Invaders," which has many of the properties of an espionage film though it is not strictly about spies. It tells the story of a landing party from a German "U" boat who find themselves stranded in Canada and who try, since the time of the action is before Pearl Harbor, to reach the neutral territory of the United States. They meet various distinguished actors on their way, beginning with Lawrence Olivier, whom they kill. By the time they reach Mr. Howard their number is reduced to two, and after their encounter with him, only the leader remains for Raymond Massey to finish off. The film has its exciting moments, but it suffers from a serious psychological weakness. The audience is intended to dislike the Germans and to desire their capture; and for this reason care is taken to make them, with one exception, personally disagreeable. But this is not done convincingly enough to overcome one's natural sympathy for the hunted; and the result is that conflicting emotions are aroused.

Three other fairly recent films deserve notice. None of them is about the war. "Johnny Eager" (M. G. M.) presents Robert Taylor as an attractive but ruthlessly egotistical gangster who is led to self-sacrifice in the end by Lana Turner's love. The film is a great deal better than its story and is worth seeing if only for the brilliant acting of Van Heflin. Good acting also distinguishes "King's Row" (Warner Brothers), a somber piece about life in a small town at the close of the last century. Ronald Reagan gives a particularly good performance as a young playboy whose legs are wantonly amputated by the town's sadistic doctor, portrayed by Charles Coburn. "Roxie Hart" is a burlesque of life in Chicago in the 1920's, culminating in a farcical trial in which Adolph Menjou secures the acquittal of Ginger Rogers for a murder she didn't commit anyway. The actors all appear to derive a great deal of enjoyment from it and communicate much of their pleasure; but most of the jokes are plugged too hard, particularly the one about the jury's interest in Miss Rogers's legs. Not but what they are very pretty legs.

P. H. RYE

Art Note

DARREL AUSTIN. Oils, drawings. Perls Galleries. Until March 28.

Austin has his petite sensation, which furnishes him with one or two provocative pictures, but when he tries to eke out a whole career with it, it becomes a trick, a formula, a routine. The green marsh mist and incandescent gases that dapple his canvases are distilled quite knowingly from the best materials, and designed to satisfy the most discriminatingly modern appetites. In my opinion this is the very last word in kitsch.

C. G.

American energy will win!

FOOD ENERGY COMPARISONS

Approximate Energy Units in Various Staple Foods

ONE BOTTLE OF PEPSI-COLA 5¢ . . .	185 Calories*
ONE LAMB CHOP (medium size)	178 Calories*
ONE WHITE POTATO (average size) . . .	92 Calories*
ONE WHOLE EGG	70 Calories*
ONE FRESH TOMATO . . .	20 Calories*

*STANDARD UNITS OF FOOD ENERGY

Bombers, battleships, tanks, guns—America's producing them at top speed, working day and night. Keep up the great work, America, with every ounce of energy you've got.

That's where Pepsi-Cola comes in. It provides quick food energy—sustains morale and sends millions back to work, ready to do a better and faster job with a smile.

America, let's go!

PEPSI-COLA

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

5¢ 12 OZ. BOTTLE

THE DRINK WITH QUICK FOOD ENERGY

MUSIC

ONE of the season's great occasions was the February 21 recital at which Landowska played in New York for the first time in many years. As she sat at the harpsichord waiting to begin Bach's Goldberg Variations the noise in Town Hall died out into an absolute silence which I cannot recall ever having experienced before at a concert. It was the breathless silence of expectation, and then—as she played the opening aria—of expectation fulfilled. Compared with the statement of the aria in the performance that Landowska put on records some years ago this one was more spaciously elaborated in greater detail—detail which was more richly inflected, now with power, now with subtlety, and always with extraordinary rhythmic continuity. These qualities of phrasing, together with the masterly use of the instrument's tonal resources, imparted exciting life even to some of the more mechanical examples of the variation process that followed; and they made the spacious statements of the wonderful slow variations in minor mode, the affecting restatement of the aria at the end, overwhelming.

Another great occasion was the February 10 concert of Toscanini and the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York. I had heard their three Saturday evening concerts in Philadelphia: the first one with the great performance of Schubert's C major Symphony that I discussed in this column in December; the second, in January, with nothing of the stature and impact of the Schubert (Bach's Passacaglia was played in Respighi's atrocious interpretazione orchestrale), but with a finely moulded performance of Haydn's Symphony No. 99, an exquisite realization of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and a performance of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" that was a magnificent construction in musical sound; the third, on February 7, with three superb works—Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" Symphony, Berlioz's "Queen Mab," Debussy's "La Mer"—in performances in which three of Toscanini's finest interpretive conceptions were beautifully realized in sound. These performances were repeated in New York—after a few days in which conductor and orchestra had continued to work together intensively in recording sessions, and in Carnegie Hall which is acoustically even finer than the Academy of Music. And merely as sounds produced by a conductor with an orchestra those February 10 performances ranged themselves with the other wonders of our age that have been achieved by human powers in Carnegie Hall—the sounds produced by Stokowski with the Philadelphia Orchestra, by Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony, by Toscanini with the New York Philharmonic. But they were not, of course, mere sounds; they were a vocabulary with which Toscanini expressed his understanding, his feeling for the music; and the living forms in sound which he created that night were the truest statements of what the works were and what they meant that I had ever experienced—statements which ranged themselves this time only with Toscanini's own previous statements, whose truth they intensified. One reason for the impression of rightness conveyed at every point in the progression of, say, the first movement of Tchaikovsky's symphony, was the actual plastic coherence of the form, produced by Toscanini's unfailing sense for continuity and proportion in the continuum of sound moving in time; and another was the fact that the nuances of sonority and pace with which this continuum was being moulded were the ones Tchaikovsky specified in his score to produce the form he had imagined.

This brings us to the matter of fidelity to the printed score. One American critic likes to contend that the composer does not create music at all, but only makes diagrams for the performer who is the real creator of the music. He might as well contend that "Hamlet" was created not by Shakespeare who wrote it but by the actors who have performed it. The composer does create the complete detailed form in sound in his mind, and his notations are intended to convey this imagined form to the performer, whose function is to produce the form in living sound. Actually the notations cannot convey the imagined form adequately, and the performer therefore cannot produce it entirely as the composer imagined it; but this does not free him from the obligation to produce it to the extent to which the notations do convey it. About halfway through the first movement of Debussy's "La Mer," after the music has died down into mutterings of basses and kettledrum, an upward leap of the cellos is followed by a slight swell of the kettledrum from pp to p and back, and this by an echoing swell of the horns. Debussy can write pp and p; but there is no notation with which he can convey exactly what he heard as pp and p; nor can he convey exactly what he imagined as the timbres of the horns. His notation, then, leaves room for the differences between Toscanini's values for pp and p and Koussevitzky's, the sound of Toscanini's horns and Koussevitzky's (to say nothing of Barbirolli or Mitropoulos); but it leaves no room for Koussevitzky's change of the swell of kettledrum followed by echoing swell of horns, to the simultaneous, thunderous swell of kettledrum and horns that can be heard in his recorded performance. For Koussevitzky a person who wants the composer's score adhered to does not want the music to be alive (the words are his). But it is Toscanini who, obeying Debussy's directions, gives life to the magical effect of horns echoing over the water; and it is Koussevitzky who, by his change, kills that effect.

Bach, Haydn, Mozart, even Beethoven give fewer directions than Tchaikovsky and Debussy; but the works have implied plastic requirements; and here again Toscanini—with his sense for form as a medium of feeling—succeeds where Koussevitzky—with his tendency to over-intensify contours and over-expand structural proportions in order to over-convey content—often fails.

B. H. HAGGIN

GOETHE............LINCOLN............BUNYAN and ALONZO GRAVES, author of
THE ECLIPSE OF A MIND
WERE ALL MANIC-DEPRESSIVE PERSONALITIES

King Saul
George III
Mary Lamb
Democritus
Nicolai Gogol
Charles Lamb
Martin Luther
William Cowper
Robert Schumann

Read this remarkable story of a man who while still in the hospital, traces back his own progress toward insanity. Beginning with the year 1640, when his forefathers came to America, he draws a broad, swift and significant picture of the genealogy of his psychosis.

Cloth bound 736 pages Price $5.00

THE MEDICAL JOURNAL PRESS
343 East 50th St. New York, N. Y.

Letters to the Editors

The Chicago "Sun"

Dear Sirs: I am sure the article by Milton Mayer entitled The Chicago Sun, Crusader Without a Cause, in your issue of March 7, was published with the best intentions. No doubt you hoped that the article would have a constructive effect, and that Publisher Field would be provoked into giving Chicago the type of paper we all agree it needs. But Mr. Mayer's article was such an out-and-out attack that it gave the impression not only that the Sun was dying but that he would be among the first to clap hands and say, "Good riddance."

I am not so sure that the Sun is a total washout. I am not so sure that we are doing the right thing by jumping all over it and trying to stamp out whatever life there may still be in it. In fact, the surprise is not that it hasn't turned out as well as was expected but that it is as good as it is, everything considered. You can admit that Mr. Field hasn't succeeded in putting out a Midwestern counterpart of the New York Times and still feel that the Sun is worth supporting. The real question for Chicago is not whether the Sun is good or bad, but what can be done to help it fight the Tribune. It is nonsense to think that, with intervention out of the way, there no longer is a cause worth fighting for in Chicago. The fact of the matter is that the Tribune—and I am surprised to see this fact blandly overlooked by Mr. Mayer—is still the mouthpiece of all that is politically sour in America.

We may be at war, and the Tribune may run its trite "our country, right or wrong" at the top of its masthead, but the Tribune is still the Tribune, a paper so fanatically obsessed with hatred of the President that its readers get the feeling that the worst thing that could possibly happen to this country would be victory in the war if that meant the New Deal's remaining in office. Taking journalism "strictly as art," Mr. Mayer says that the Tribune is "journalistically excellent," that it is "well written, well edited, and well printed"; and a more astonishing statement I have never read in The Nation. It may be well printed, but well written and well edited it certainly is not. I take it that "well written" means not only a good style but independent, honest reporting. How can any paper be called well written and well edited when every day almost every national "news" item printed in its columns is slanted so that it has an anti-New Deal bias? Several months ago the government announced its plane-production figures for the month, which happened to represent a new record. As treated in the Tribune, however, the item gave the reader very little idea that a new high in production had been set; rather, it made it appear that the country was faced with a plane scandal. How much do you think the people who read only the Tribune know about the trial of George Sylvester Viereck and the strange propagandist maneuvers involving Ham Fish, Stephen A. Day, and the late Senator Lundeen? I doubt if they know very much. I was in Chicago while the trial was going on, and I combed through the Tribune and found nothing at all. While in Chicago, incidentally, I picked up the Tribune the day after the President's speech—a speech, I am sure, which must have been featured by every paper in the country; every paper, that is, except the Chicago Tribune. There the chief headline was based on an extremely sketchy story: "Order Public Quiz on Navy." And Mr. Mayer takes the Sun to task for errors of judgment!

But the most surprising thing of all in Mr. Mayer's story was the passing reference to the regular columns of the Sun. I don't see how any paper can possibly be so feeble as Mr. Mayer says the Sun is when it publishes Sam Grafton, who, I was pleased to find, is making a very fine impression in the Midwest. NORMAN COUSINS

New York, March 6

One Voice Will Be Heard

Dear Sirs: Congratulations on Freda Kirchwey's fine editorial, New Leaders for Old, in your February 21 issue. Don't underestimate the need for such straightforward and eloquent statements of the political aspects of our present situation. It is terribly important now that the voiceless millions of this country should find somewhere an expression of their real beliefs and aspirations.

The press of this country has been repeatedly shown to represent the opinions of the tiniest possible minority of the population. I wade daily through a mass of slanted dispatches and columns without finding one word that could be said honestly to represent the opinions of the ordinary citizen of this republic. Pegler, Lippmann, Kent, Sullivan, Krock, to name a very few—whom do they imagine they speak for? They seem to have declared a kind of war upon the bulk of the citizens.

But let just one person speak out boldly and honestly, and no matter how loud the chorus of confusion, that one voice will be heard above it. People hear what they want to hear, and a great majority want to hear what you said in your editorial. They want the fascists cleaned root and branch out of our government; they want a democratic army; they want an immediate cessation of the continual aping of the worst side of the British, and a genuine cooperation with their democratic elements; they want an immediate, surgically clean break with all Axis powers, including Vichy and Spain. They recognize that a victory sabotaged in advance by the native fascist elements here would be almost worse than defeat itself.

I can make no grimmer commentary on our present setup than by having to ask you to withhold my name if this letter of sincerest congratulation on a truly fine, courageous editorial finds its way into your columns. I am working for victory in Washington, and the Dies committee is quite capable of conniving at the discharge of anyone in communication with a liberal magazine.

A. M.

Washington, D. C., March 4

Honolulu Blackout

[The following letter from Honolulu was recently received by a friend of The Nation's.]

Dear ——: . . . All mail is censored, so I will not, must not, write anything that has not been released by the proper authorities, which means only a light touch on the war. Everyone, naturally, is under suspicion, and many are called up for questioning.

I can tell you about our life, which was changed in a twinkling, and so ably and speedily, by the military government. You probably know all about the present setup. Blackout at six, and it must be perfect. No ray of light may be seen from crevices. Try it, though I fancy blackout in New York City is impossible. Everyone must be at home at 6 p. m. and stay there. Blackout material is scarce; it was all snapped up immediately, as were flash batteries and torches. We spend much time in our kitchen, and many articles which do not belong there are gradually finding permanent places in it, such as M's typewriter, books, etc. To go upstairs, one pulls aside a curtain, opens a door, quickly drops the curtain, closes the door, occasionally flicks on a blue flashlight to show the bends in a winding staircase. Strange to say, we sleep well. There is no hysteria, no whimpering.

Alcohol was shut off promptly and completely. The traffic situation, over which a commission was breaking its head, was simply solved by an allowance of ten gallons of gasoline per month.

To give time for airing the kitchen in daylight, we eat at 4:30, then walk for an hour and admire the beauty of the surrounding scene. During the evening, we go out into our large garden. . . . Occasionally we dine at the house of friends. Their dining-room is blacked out; ours is mostly glass and too difficult. There is a temporary shortage of meat and starches, but we shall be content if we can always find Ovaltine and Carnation milk. . . .

I shudder to think of what could happen in New York—to the subways for instance. A bomb hit the sidewalk opposite us, just missing a baby in its pram.

B. M.

Honolulu, January 22

Mr. Daniels Will Be Missed

Dear Sirs: Jonathan Daniels will be missed by at least one reader of The Nation. With all due respect to his "erudite" associates to whom he modestly refers, his viewpoint in the weekly page A Native at Large displayed a better emotional and intellectual balance than has appeared in the other columns of The Nation during the last three months. Perhaps his being "at large" and therefore free from the influence of the big city's intellectual tension had something to do with the serenity, quiet faith, and long view which have contrasted so agreeably with the heated speculations and forebodings about defeat emanating from the editor, Military Expert Mitchell, and other of your writers.

I must confess that at times recently The Nation has appeared to be on the verge of throwing up the sponge and giving up the cause of the United Nations as a bad job. To paraphase Pope:

> Defeat is a monster of so frightful mien,
> As to be hated, needs but to be seen;
> Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

So thank God for Mr. Daniels! Without being smugly complacent about America, he never deviated from a rugged faith in the strength and capacity of this great nation. That faith should make him even more useful as organizer of volunteer defense activities.

ARTHUR C. HICKS

Bellingham, Wash., March 3

Dear Sirs: I have wanted to take pen in hand on more than one occasion to write you concerning the many interesting, informative articles that I read in The Nation. When I read the article by Jonathan Daniels, For the Duration, in the issue of February 21, I could no longer restrain the urge.

Mr. Daniels's article may not have been the most important in the issue, but it was sincere and stimulating. I was touched by its warmth and humanity. If his page, A Native at Large, will be among the missing "for the duration" I believe your readers will feel it keenly. Freda Kirchwey made a grand gesture in suggesting that he continue writing for The Nation from Washington. Mr. Daniels's refusal on the ground that "this is not a part-time war to be worked at in part-time jobs" was commendable.

Many join me in the hope that his work in Washington will hasten our victory, and that his desire to return to The Nation's pages will be realized.

JACOB BRENNER

New York, March 4

Miss Boyle vs. Mr. Barker

Dear Sirs: This is addressed to you in emphatic protest against Mr. George Barker's type of reviewing. Let us call it once and for all the preconceived-notions school of reviewing. It is so feminine in nature that one of its gravest precepts is that the reviewer need under no circumstances open the book which he is intending to review.

I was indignant some weeks ago at Mr. Barker's review of Henry Miller's book. I think I should add that I have never cared for Mr. Miller's work, but Mr. Miller is a serious artist and as such he should have been given a serious review. And now Mr. Barker's puerile review of Eugene Jolas's "Vertical" makes me burst into written protest. We, the readers, the buying public, are not interested in Mr. Barker's patronizing little quips or in his undergraduate tone of hilarity. We would like to know what the book he is discussing is about, and as long as Mr. Barker doesn't know and is too busy or too insular-minded to find out, then the book should have been handed to someone with curiosity.

The book, it may be interesting to note, contains some of the most exquisite translations of French poetry that I have seen, a series of unusual reproductions of the work of modern French painters, and an article of Georges Duthuit's on the approach to a new mysticism entitled For a Sacred Art which could have afforded any reviewer ample material for discussion, and for lively discussion at that. "Vertical" has presented a number of ideas; of what ideological value they are it is the reviewer's task to try to determine. Either Mr. Barker was incapable of doing this, or else he has been told that when he's being funny he's really a scream, which is truly disastrous for a poet's soul.

KAY BOYLE

Nyack, N. Y., February 25

Anti-Axis Joke Collection

Dear Sirs: I am working on a book in which I should like to gather a great many anti-Axis jokes and stories. For many years I have been collecting such jokes and little satirical pieces about Hitler, Mussolini, Göring, Goebbels, and the other gangsters. They are very amusing, most of them emphasizing the meakness and refinement of these admirable gentlemen.

If any of your readers know any such jokes or satirical pieces I wish they would write them down and send them to me. The age or length doesn't matter, and they can be written in English, French, German, etc. If anyone sends clippings, will he please note the source.

A little humorous lampooning of those fellows is an important weapon in our hands today; almost as important as tanks and airplnaes.

LASZLO FODOR

New York, March 5

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 154 · NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 21, 1942 · NUMBER 12

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 325

EDITORIALS

Lend-Lease Results 328
The Poll Tax 329
The Puppet Axis by Freda Kirchwey 330

ARTICLES

Donald Nelson Has Chosen by I. F. Stone 331
Routes to Victory by Donald W. Mitchell 332
Coughlin's New Capital by Donald Grant 334
Headaches in Post-War Planning by Maxwell S. Stewart 336
Changes in Finland by Maurice Feldman 339
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 340
In the Wind 341

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Memo for Mr. Jarrell by Rolfe Humphries 342
The Sparrow Revolution by Katherine Anne Porter 343
Nazi-Ridden Rumania by Rustem Vambery 343
A New Poet by Stephen Spender 344
Britain and America by Alexander Kiralfy 345
Florida People by Louis B. Salomon 346
Authority and Liberty by Reinhold Niebuhr 347
In All Directions by George Barker 347
In Brief 348
Drama: A New Theory for J. M. B. by Joseph Wood Krutch 348
Records by B. H. Haggin 349

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 351

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor RICHARD H. ROVERE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., [illegible] Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered [illegible] second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 8, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

THE SUDDEN DRAMATIC SHIFT OF GENERAL Douglas MacArthur from his beleaguered outpost on Bataan Peninsula to supreme command of the Allied forces in the Pacific will have a tonic effect everywhere. His qualities of leadership, as well as his personal courage, have become an example throughout the United Nations and even among the forces of the Axis. The suicide of General Homma may be taken as a grim gesture of tribute to the man he could not conquer. General MacArthur cannot be asked to work similar miracles on the vast sprawling front of the southwestern Pacific. He cannot replace lost ships or fabricate bombing planes. But he can inspire the fighting Allies with a belief that final victory is inevitable and with a fighting spirit that has not always been evident. The change should be the signal for a new strategy of aggressive counter-attack.

*

THE BATTLE OF THE JAVA SEA WAS A SEVERE defeat for the United Nations. Five cruisers, including the 10,000-ton Houston, are known to have been sunk, and the Japanese claim additional victims, among them the American cruisers Augusta and Marblehead. At least six destroyers and a sloop are also admitted to have gone down. Known Japanese losses were restricted to one cruiser and one destroyer, although several other ships are reported to have been badly hit and others may have been destroyed in the final engagement, from which there were no survivors from the United Nations' ships. Disheartening though the defeat is, it is evident that the Dutch, British, Australian, and American squadrons had no choice but to fight, even against overwhelming odds. The stakes were high. Surabaya, the last good naval base in the southern Pacific, had to be defended if possible. Victory, or a deadlock, would probably not only have saved Java but have disrupted the entire Japanese offensive. Although the Japanese are reported to have had a superiority of nine cruisers to five, this advantage might easily have been overcome by the use of land-based planes from Java. But if such planes were used, no mention of the fact is made in the official communiqués. This raises again the question of what became of the 1,500 planes that were supposed to be stationed in Java.

THE MOST HOPEFUL ASPECT OF THE NEW British plan to secure India's cooperation in the war is the choice of the envoy who will present it to the Indian people. Sir Stafford Cripps is the one member of Churchill's Cabinet who can be regarded as an enthusiastic champion of Indian freedom, and his selection for this mission has been widely approved. Moreover, the fact that he volunteered to undertake the urgent and difficult task of consulting and negotiating with the Indian leaders must mean that the program formulated by the British Cabinet is something more than an eleventh-hour attempt to stall off trouble with vague promises. Even so, it will be almost a miracle if Cripps succeeds in inducing India to join whole-heartedly with the United Nations in resisting aggression. The fact that a settlement is sought only when Britain's hold over India is being threatened more seriously than ever before puts a premium on the demands of intransigent minorities. Ali Jinnah, president of the All-India Moslem League, has already threatened revolt if control of the Indian government is allowed to pass into the hands of the predominantly Hindu Congress Party. Jinnah may be bluffing, as Congress spokesmen seem to think, but in view of the ferments stirring the whole Moslem world and the fact that there are Moslem majorities not only in the Northwest Province but in Bengal and Assam, which adjoin Burma, his threats have to be taken seriously. Meanwhile we should feel happier about India if there were signs that responsible leaders were taking positive steps to resist Japanese aggression instead of waiting for Britain to confess its past crimes, as Mr. Gandhi suggests. They seem to forget that the immediate reason for defending India is not to save the British Empire but to save India itself from new conquest and worse exploitation.

*

THE RECENT RISE IN U-BOAT SINKINGS OFF the Atlantic coast has brought home once again the crucial nature of the shipping problem faced by the United Nations. Although details of necessity are withheld, it is no secret that the war in the South Pacific has greatly increased the shipping stringency. The loss of the oil-producing centers in the East Indies has added to the difficulty by making it necessary to ship large quantities of oil and gasoline over lines of communication that are some ten or twelve thousand miles long. Exact figures on construction and sinkings are lacking. But we know that American and British shipyards are each building at the rate of not more than one and a half million gross tons annually. Sinkings in the last half of 1941 were at the rate of approximately 2,200,000 tons annually, and have recently increased substantially. Thus it is obvious that construction is barely keeping pace with sinkings at a time when the demand for shipping for troop transport and provisioning has been greatly increased by developments in the Pacific. The immediate situation will not be helped by the fact that a very considerable increase in production is expected by late summer or early fall. Only one thing can help: the development of a strategy that will provide for the most efficient possible use of our limited shipping resources during the next few months.

*

THE R. A. F. HAS NOT WAITED FOR HITLER to open his spring offensive in the east to start its own drive against Nazi factories in Germany and the occupied countries. In addition to two attacks on plants in the Paris area there have been a number of heavy raids on Essen, Cologne, and Kiel, while frequent fighter sweeps along the Channel have taken a considerable toll in German machines at the expense of comparatively light British losses. British spokesmen promise that these attacks will be maintained and intensified. The mysterious Colonel V. Britton, broadcasting to the "enslaved peoples of occupied Europe," recently warned them "to get away from the factories." After giving details of the way the Nazis were using the industrial and mineral resources of France, Belgium, and Holland to strengthen their war machine he pointed out that in Germany good air-raid shelters are provided. "You should have them too," he said. "The R. A. F. is coming. Keep out of the way." Hard and steady bombing of German objectives will undoubtedly have a useful effect in disturbing production and in forcing Hitler to maintain large air forces in Western Europe. But there is an increasing tendency in Britain to question the efficiency of the high-level bomber as a decisive weapon unless enormous fleets can be employed almost continuously over a period of weeks. There is a belief too that the R. A. F. has neglected the dive bomber, which, in combination with armored ground forces, has again and again been proved a devastating means of attack. Planes of this type are not being made in Britain, but they are now being supplied from this country. Large numbers will be almost essential to the success of any effort to open up a new western front.

*

A NEW ATTEMPT IS BEING MADE BY THE Southern diehards in Congress to use the war as an excuse to abolish practically every gain made by labor under the New Deal. A few weeks ago a drive by Representative Smith of Virginia to suspend the forty-hour week for the duration was beaten back by a large majority. But now he has returned to the attack with legislative proposals which would not only abolish the legal forty-hour week "certainly for the duration of the war" but would abrogate all union contracts providing for a limited work week and for any form of union shop. Plainly this is not a plan to lengthen hours so much as one to reduce pay envelopes. Mr. Smith, it is true, tries to disguise the fact that his bills represent class legislation of the most blatant character by including provisions for turning back all net profits on government contracts in excess of 6 per cent of costs. This method of limiting profits is generally recognized as thoroughly unsatisfactory, since it encourages inflation of costs and unduly favors the business with a rapid turnover of capital. But even sound profits control will not justify efforts to beat down all labor standards. Mr. Smith and his associates assert that their proposals are being pushed forward by public clamor. They have yet to hear from the wage-earners, but they will.

*

HITLER'S MEMORIAL DAY SPEECH WAS A fresh pack of old lies. He spoke of the war as a "dispute . . . forced upon us" and of "the preparation of our enemies"; we wish this last were true. He spoke eloquently of "the Bolshevik colossus, the cruel menace of which it is now recognized should not be allowed"; he disowned any interest in the rest of the world outside Europe; he even repeated the old saws about the Jewish conspiracy. He reproached the Russian winter but paid it the compliment of telling the truth about it. "It was weeks earlier than any experience or knowledge gained from scientific forecasts led us to expect, that winter set in upon us." He admitted a reversal but blamed it all on the weather, giving practically no credit to the Russian armies, which, we are told on reliable authority, also set in and are continuing to set in on the German heroes. Hitler demanded new and greater sacrifices of the German people and promised in return "a long and blessed peace." "A new world," he said, "is being forged." And who can doubt that Hitler's New Order will go down as the greatest forgery in history?

*

THE NEWS THAT THE SWEDISH GOVERNMENT has suppressed a number of publications for printing stories reflecting on the Nazis is disturbing, especially at a time when German troops are being massed ostentatiously along the Baltic and Goebbels is conducting an anti-Swedish press campaign. It is true that another paper has been prosecuted almost simultaneously for calling Stalin "a mass murderer," and that the suppressions appear more severe than they actually were, since they only applied to one issue and were probably enforced only after the distribution had been completed. Nevertheless, the action has more than a faint odor of appeasement. It was prompted by accounts of tortures suffered in Nazi concentration camps by fourteen Norwegians who had escaped. The Swedish Minister of Justice says that these stories cannot be verified, but there is, unfortunately, every reason to suppose that they were true. No doubt Berlin objects to such facts being published, but the Stockholm government cannot be so naive as to think that paying heed to Berlin's protests will protect them from Nazi demands of a more serious nature. The only thing that will prevent the invasion of Sweden if and when Nazi strategy requires that step will be the certain belief in Berlin that the Swedes will fight and exact a high military price. Concessions on minor matters do not mean that Stockholm would capitulate to major demands, but they do encourage the Germans to believe that it would. That is one reason why appeasement is so dangerous. And another result not to be ignored is the depressing effect on public morale.

*

WE SHIVER WHEN AMBASSADOR HENRI-HAYE declares very positively that Japan will not be permitted to take over Madagascar, and our alarm is intensified by Sumner Welles's apparent readiness to be satisfied by such "assurances." We have not forgotten, if the State Department has, how frequently Vichy's protests of determination to resist demands by the Axis have proved preludes to surrender. On February 23, 1941, an official spokesman in Vichy insisted that Japanese proposals for a settlement between Indo-China and Thailand involving extensive territorial concessions by France would be firmly rejected. "We still have our empire," he added, "and we are determined to fight anyone who might attack it." But it wasn't very long before Vichy did accept Tokyo's terms and thus paid the bribe which led Thailand to accept a junior partnership in Japan's aggression. In the summer of 1941 Vichy again talked big about resisting Japanese demands for military occupation of Indo-China, only to yield on the ground that the colony needed protection from the British. And let us not forget that by handing over Indo-China Vichy made a major contribution to the success of the Japanese in the southwestern Pacific. In the light of the record it would be gross folly to expect Vichy to defend Madagascar should Tokyo decide that its occupation was desirable. And that may happen any time, for the island has great strategic value as a base from which to attack United Nations shipping proceeding by way of the Cape to the Near East or India and to undertake military and naval operations against South Africa. The United Nations have every justification for trying to be first on the spot for once, but no action is likely so long as Washington continues a policy of appeasement which makes Vichy more valuable to the Axis as a "neutral" than it would be as an open ally.

*

ONLY A DAUMIER COULD DO JUSTICE TO THE dramatic scene in the courtroom at Riom last week when Léon Blum made his magnificent speech in defense of the French Republic, the Front Populaire, and his conduct as their representative. In a four-hour speech he said that the Axis had started the war, he proclaimed himself a Jew and a Marxist, and he predicted that France would once again be free. "During the last fifteen minutes," reads one report, "he held spellbound an audience not by any means prejudiced in his favor." We doubt that the French press printed as full an account of the proceedings as the reporters for the foreign press were allowed to send out, but we may be sure that Blum's words will find their way into every French home. Hardly less sensational was the defense of Daladier, who turned upon his accusers with a ferocity and an eloquence which reduced the ten judges and the rest of the courtroom to "absolute silence." His speech was followed by immediate adjournment. Berlin is furious at the turn the Riom trials have taken. They were designed to prove that the French Republic declared war on Germany on orders from Britain; they have brought forth instead a sensational indictment of Hitler and his Vichy satellites. It is reported that the German government is about to seize upon the procedure at Riom as an excuse for "revision" of Franco-German relations. It would be ironical indeed if, thanks to the courage of Blum and Daladier, the men of Vichy should be deprived even of their pretense of independence.

*

THE INDIGNATION AROUSED IN THE BRITISH and American press by Secretary Eden's revelation of Japanese atrocities at Hongkong is justified; but it is, to say the least, ironical that anger over Japan's treatment of its victims should have been so long delayed. There was no reason to expect that the residents of Hongkong would be treated any less cruelly than the residents of Soochow, Kiukiang, Hangchow, and Nanking—unless it be the one suggested in Mr. Eden's remarkable statement that the atrocities were perpetrated "without distinction of race or color." The racial arrogance implied in this remark provides a perfect basis for Japan's appeal for Asiatic solidarity against white domination. The Japanese have been guilty of vastly greater arrogance, as well as unspeakable barbarism, in their relations with conquered peoples, but such statements as that of Mr. Eden give them the advantage of being able to trade on the sins of their predecessors.

*

ALTHOUGH MARTIN DIES IS UNPOPULAR with most members of the House, his Committee to Investigate un-American Activities has been extended for another year and will probably get another $100,000 to pay its expenses. The vote for extension was 331 to 46. Chairman Sabath of the Rules Committee, John M. Coffee (Democrat) of Washington, and Joseph Clark Baldwin (Republican) from the New York City "silk-stocking district," with Eliot and Marcantonio, were among the few who had the courage to attack the Texas demagogue. Sabath asked that the Dies committee be abolished because it had failed to investigate "the real Fascists and Nazis in the United States." Coffee declared that Fritz Kuhn, William Dudley Pelley, and George Deatherage had all at one time or another warmly indorsed the work of the Dies committee. Baldwin proposed that the job of exposing fifth-column influences be left to the FBI. The moral to be drawn from the vote is that if the Dies committee is not to go on with its un-American activity forever, its opponents will have to begin the work of fighting it much earlier than they did this time. We suggest the formation of a National Committee to Send Dies Back Where He Came From which should begin work now on the task of defeating him when his inevitable request for an extension comes up next year.

*

OFFICIALS OF THE WAR PRODUCTION BOARD seem curiously indifferent to the survey made by Joseph W. Frazer, president of Willys-Overland. Frazer, head of the first automobile company to be converted to arms production, did what WPB officials should have done. He sent out a questionnaire in January to dealers all over the country, and on the basis of returns from the first 10 per cent he estimates that they have idle facilities and floor space equal to an arms factory ten miles square. There are 40,000 of these dealers, and to judge from these first returns they have about 18,000 lathes, 15,000 grinders, 1,400 shapers, 16,000 drills, 52,000 welders, 40,000 buffers, 1,600 screw machines, and 4,200 sprays which could be brought into war work under a "bits-and-pieces" program. The only way to make use of them would seem to be to pass some such legislation as the Murray bill now before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. This would establish a government corporation which would act as a prime contractor and break down arms blueprints into "bits and pieces" for small shops of this kind. It would also act as a finance company, providing funds for raw materials and wages in order to get work under way. Donald M. Nelson has expressed himself in favor of the bill. The principal obstacle seems to be Jesse Jones.

Lend-Lease Results

THE isolationists who have been quick to blame Britain for its failure to invade the Continent and for the tragic collapse of the United Nations in the South Pacific should study carefully the report of the first year of American lend-lease efforts. While the President's report on a full year's operation shows some gain in recent months, the results as a whole constitute a powerful indictment of American sloth and complacency in the months preceding our entry into the war. In twelve months our total exports of lend-lease supplies to Great Britain, Russia, China, and the other Allies were valued at only $1,100,000,000. Just how much of this was made up of foodstuffs and raw materials and how much of planes, tanks, and weapons of war is not revealed. But we know from previous reports and from the agricultural supplies listed that food alone comprised at least $400,000,000. It is evident, therefore, that only a small proportion of the total could have consisted of fighting equipment. In addition, there were, of course, considerable expenditures from lend-lease funds for the servicing, rental, and repair of ships, and for production facilities within the United States. The total expenditures for all purposes reached $2,500,000,000, which is but a minute fraction of the $48,000,000,000 which has been appropriated for lend-lease purposes.

Food, raw materials, ships, and repair facilities are important to the war effort of the United Nations. And the very real difficulties which the Administration has confronted in obtaining adequate production of planes, tanks, and other combat weapons should not be minimized. But it is perfectly clear that Britain could not possibly have hoped to stage an effective offensive on the basis of the supply of weapons contributed by the United States in the past twelve months. A year ago, when the lend-lease program was in its initial stages, we estimated that American exports of war materials to Britain would have to average $1,000,000,000 a month in order to balance the productive resources of Germany and the occupied areas of Europe. This, of course, took no account of the requirements of Russia or China. Actually, our aggregate contribution to the United Nations was about one-fifth of Britain's needs alone. In relation to needs, it has unquestionably been proportionately less to Russia and China.

It is evident that no small share of the responsibility for our failure to live up to the promise of lend-lease rests on the shoulders of the Administration. Our production for 1941 in no way approached either our capacity or our responsibilities. For this Knudsen, the OPM, and the whole policy of business-as-usual must be blamed. But the share of the isolationists in our failure must not be forgotten. They not only fought a delaying action against the lend-lease plan when it was before Congress, but through opposition to the turning over of existing American ships and war supplies greatly reduced the amount of effective aid which we could deliver last summer and fall. One hesitates to think, for example, what effect it might have had on the course of the war if a few hundred American army and navy fighter planes had been turned over to Britain for use in Singapore and the South Pacific. Perhaps Britain would not have used the planes for this purpose. If that had been the case, the responsibility for the defeats in that area could rightfully be placed on the shoulders of the British. But under existing circumstances the United States must take the major share of the blame. We simply haven't delivered the goods.

The Poll Tax

LIKE the fight against slavery before it, the fight against the poll tax is a fight to save the North and the rest of the country from the power wielded in Congress by a small and reactionary Southern oligarchy. The power of this oligarchy, once based on black slaves, is based today in large part on voteless men and women, white as well as black. An examination of Congressional committee chairmanships will show the extent to which these bodies are dominated by men who can return to Congress year after year because a majority of the voters in their states or districts are disfranchised. Northern big business is relying more and more on these "unrepresentatives" to pass reactionary measures which could not win the approval of a democratic electorate. Ten of the thirty-three standing committees in the Senate are headed by men from the eight poll-tax states, most of them men of the extreme right. These ten are Byrd, of Virginia, Rules; Glass, of Virginia, Appropriations; George, of Georgia, Finance; Connally, of Texas, Foreign Relations; Smith, of South Carolina, Agriculture and Forestry; Russell, of Georgia, Immigration; Bankhead, of Alabama, Immigration and Reclamation; Caraway, of Arkansas, Enrolled Bills; McKellar, of Tennessee, Post Office and Roads; and Hill, of Alabama, Expenditures of Executive Departments. Of the ten, only Hill can be counted a progressive.

In the House twelve of the forty-four standing committees have chairmen from the poll-tax states: Fulmer, of South Carolina, Agriculture; Steagall, of Alabama, Banking and Currency; Ramspeck, of Georgia, Civil Service; McGehee, of Mississippi, Claims; Whittington, of Mississippi, Flood Control; Sumners, of Texas, Judiciary; Bland, of Virginia, Merchant Marine and Fisheries; Vinson, of Georgia, Naval Affairs; Lanham, of Texas, Public Roads and Grounds; Mansfield, of Texas, Rivers and Harbors; Rankin, of Mississippi, World War Veterans; and Jarman, of Alabama, Printing. A few of these occasionally turn up on the progressive side of an issue, but most of them are thoroughly reactionary.

The poll tax, by cutting down the number of voters, gives these men a permanence in Congress that men from other districts can rarely achieve. This fact in combination with the seniority system gives them key positions in the machinery of Congress. The committee chairmen wield great power over legislation, and thus the entire country may find itself governed by men who represent few people even in their own districts.

Since its adoption by Florida in 1889 the poll tax has become the principal Southern device for disfranchising the poor white as well as the Negro. It is time we realized that it disfranchises indirectly the rest of us as well.

The Puppet Axis

